 the "mountains" like Tabor, that reminded the ancients of a woman's breast, the undulating, serpentine road with massive and shocking drops in Samaria, the incomparably undulating topography of the beige hills east of Jerusalem, the monumental Jewish tombs in the Kedron Valley, the western retaining wall of the Temple with the humongous stones, the first-century streets and shops (now in ruins) beneath the Temple Mount, the ancient dark grey olive tress congregating on the Mount of Olives, the restful coolness provided by vines, olive trees, and bubbling springs, the marvelously silver waterfalls near Caesarea Philippi, and the stimulating warmth of a friendly sun on a cold day.

Reflecting, as one walks through the valleys and ravines of the Land, reminds one of Jesus' story of the lost sheep (Matt 12 and Luke 15). Seeing shepherds and their habits help us comprehend many poems, psalms, and narratives (viz. Ps 23 and John 10). Such treacherous terrain brings life to our reading of the Parable of the Good Samaritan.

3. Cultural Topography

The second of the three helpful distinctions in studying the impact of the Land on Jesus' consciousness is cultural topography. This term signifies the aspects of topography that are not dimensions of geography but are also part of the phenomenological topography that shaped human culture, like the various Jewish groups, trees, animals, winds, vistas, sounds, smells, wells dug by humans, and all human creations, including gymnasia and hippodromes, along with the Roman roads and the monumental masterpieces constructed under the "kingship" of Herod the Great, notably the new cities of Caesarea Maritima (on the coast) and Sebaste (in the heart of Samaria), and the transformation of Jerusalem into a major city in the Roman Empire.<sup>32</sup>

We have already noted that the Land in which Jesus was born and in which he lived had been made holy by God's choice of place and people (Jesus' people). In one deep sense, the people of Israel—Jews like Jesus—also are a part of the Land and become a part of topography. Theologically, all humans are attached to the earth and move from "dust" to "dust," but Jews, like Jesus and those in the Palestinian Jesus Movement, have a special attachment to a special land: the Land.

Jesus' landscape was not only defined by a nation, Israel; it was culturally defined by numerous Jewish groups. Too many scholars have assumed that Josephus rightly divided Judaism into four groups: Pharisees, Sadducees, Essenes, and Zealots (Ant. 18.11–25; cf. War 2.119–166). There were many more groups and each of the four groups was subdivided significantly. Jesus' cultural topography included more than the four groups usually mentioned. We must not forget the Samaritans, Enoch groups, Baptist groups, the 'ammê ha-'ares (the land-people who were not necessarily illiterate and secular), and the domineering sacerdotal aristocracy that included more than Pharisees and Sadducees.

---

<sup>32</sup> B. Mazar rightly points out that Herod the Great transformed Jerusalem into "a splendid metropolis," especially by the addition of his palace in the northwest of the Upper City and the expansion and improvement of the Temple on the eastern promontory, "Mount Zion"; Mazar, The Mountain of the Lord: Excavating Jerusalem (Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1975), 78.

Trees loom large in the minds of many who have given us the biblical text and the parabiblical documents.<sup>33</sup> The Bible begins with the story of Paradise; in central focus is the tree of life. The Psalmists often refer to the righteous as an evergreen tree well planted (as in the famous passage in Ps 1:3). Isaiah imagined Israel as the trees of a vineyard (Isa 5:7). The Righteous Teacher, so important for the Qumranites, envisioned that through him God had planted men who are “trees of life,” like the cypress, elm, and cedar (1QH XVI [olim XI]).

Knowing Jesus’ landscape helps us appreciate his metaphorical use of the olive tree, the vineyard (Mark 12, Matt 20 and 21), the good and bad tree (Matt 7 and 12), the fig tree (Luke 13 and 21), and the vine and its branches (John 15). Clearly, Jesus knew the biblical metaphor of tree; frequently he must have pondered the symbolical meaning of the tree as he sat under one or saw many trees around him or in the distance or looked down on Jerusalem from among the olive trees in the Mount of Olives. Perhaps he knew, since he admired the serpent, that trees, like serpents, are in touch with the source of life; that is, they are chthonic beings.<sup>34</sup>

Animals are dimensions of cultural topography. That is certainly clear, when one sits quietly in a cave and the landscape changes with the appearance of gazelles (often appearing in the same beige color as the ground). To reply that animals only move above the landscape is imperceptive. They help define what is being seen; and, moreover, snakes move over water, creep on the land, and slip down into regions the ancients considered mysterious. While elephants,<sup>35</sup> giraffes, cobras, and crocodiles remind us of other places (like India, Africa, and Egypt), donkeys, camels, sheep,<sup>36</sup> goats, eagles,<sup>37</sup> pigeons, bees,<sup>38</sup> and doves help

---

<sup>33</sup> Very helpful are the insights found in E. O. James’ The Tree of Life: An Archaeological Study, Studies in the History of Religions 11 (Leiden: Brill, 1966).

<sup>34</sup> See the discussions in Charlesworth, The Serpent.

<sup>35</sup> See the humorous use of elephants in 3 Maccabees.

<sup>36</sup> Sheep had developed a deep symbolical meaning, long before Jesus; see esp. 1 Enoch 89–90.

<sup>37</sup> Eagles were known to denote God’s messengers; see esp. 4 Ezra and 2 Baruch.

<sup>38</sup> Concerning the metaphorical use of bees, recall the diet of John the Baptizer and consult the use of bees in Joseph and Aseneth. Also honey with milk was an old metaphor for the Land (e.g., Exod 3:8, 17), which continued in the Odes of Solomon 4, 30, and 40.

us comprehend the Holy Land.<sup>39</sup> Many such animals, as is obvious, appear in the story of Jesus found in the intra-canonical gospels. Sheep, goats, and donkeys were part of Jesus' topography. Seeing and hearing them move over the rocky terrain in the Middle East helps remind one of the Parable of the Vineyard and the Parable of the Prodigal son.

Winds shape life in the Land. On some days, especially in Jericho and Jerusalem, the hot hamzins, the desert storms that blow northward out of the Negev or Arabah, often cover everything with desert sand. These storms from the desert can stop work, but they also add rich soil to gardens and fields. On other occasions, an unbearable day can become almost pleasant when a cool breeze picks up, especially if it brings a little moisture from the Mediterranean.

The vistas are so awe-inspiring that one's views sporadically stimulate reflection about God, creation, and the astounding beauty of the earth. Driving down from Jerusalem to Jericho, I often pull over to marvel at the landscapes that seem ethereal. Such thoughts as the following have come to mind over the past three decades: How and in what ways has topography helped shape biblical theology? What did many Jews, including Mary Magdalene and Jesus, think when they saw such startling scenery?

Sounds shape culture; the quiet in Lower Galilee, especially near Korazin, and in the Judean desert contrasts with the noise of commerce, especially in the suq of Jerusalem. One can imagine the quiet contemplation of Qumranites as one sits in a high cave, looking down on Khirbet Qumran, and realizing in the silence that an ibex has paused outside, quite oblivious of your presence. No virtual silence is as salubrious as that which accompanies the dawn near the rhythmic restful shores of the Kinneret. One may appreciate the old Jewish legend that the lake is called "Kinneret," because it is shaped like a harp (in Hebrew kinnor) or because the waves produce music that is reminiscent of strumming from a harp. In the early morning, if one is lucky one might hear the approach of a shepherd boy leading his flock, which is salubriously calm due to his playing of a flute.<sup>40</sup>

---

<sup>39</sup> On the symbol of the "dove" see the Odes of Solomon 24 and the Apocalypse of Elijah 3.

<sup>40</sup> Major Mark Johnston shared with me his experience, after sleeping alone near Ein Gedi in the Spring of 1989, when assigned to Battalion 2/6 of the Second Marine Division: "I heard the playing of a flute. As the sound of the flute came closer to where I was camping, I realized that a shepherd boy was playing a flute. A small flock of sheep followed him. The sound of the flute tended to calm the sheep. I watched and

Sounds certainly shape the day in the Holy Land today. One is awakened in Jerusalem by the call to prayer by the muezzin, the Muslim crier who from a minaret five times daily calls “the faithful” to prayer. In many villages and cities, especially Jerusalem and Nazareth, the day moves forward by the rhythmic ringing of the large bells in the cathedrals of the Greek Orthodox, the Lutherans, the Roman Catholics, and other Christian groups. These clarions may perhaps help us hear other echoes from sounds that shaped days two thousand years ago. Two alone must now suffice. First, Jews, like Jesus, heard the blowing of the shofar (the ram’s horn) that announced festivals and other religious occasions; eventually the shofar was blown in synagogue services to celebrate Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur. Second, many Jews, including Jesus, heard the peal of the trumpet from the top of the Temple Mount (the stone on which the trumpeter stood has been recovered).<sup>41</sup>

Many sounds are exactly as they were in the first century. On hillsides and in the busy Jerusalem suq we hear the braying of donkeys for no apparent reasons. On occasion, especially in the rolling hills west of Jericho, one might hear the howl near dawn of a hungry hyena or be confronted by the snarl from a rabid dog. Near Qumran, on the Mount of Olives one often hears the deep unforgettable and unique sounds of camels clearing their throats expressing some displeasure. And, of course, in many villages and on the outskirts of cities one may hear the crowing of the cock at sunrise (recall Mark 14:27–31, 72).

One cannot really “feel” the topography of the Land until one smells it. Very pleasant to me is the scent from the saffron and other spices in the market places, the smoke from nargila pipes, and the jasmine in Jerusalem that fills the evening and morning air with pungent and pleasing aromas. Other odors shock the senses: the smell of women and men, especially those living close to the land, who do not take baths frequently and often have not been introduced to deodorant, and of course the stench of droppings from camels, goats, horses, and donkeys (and to be honest, even humans).

---

listened for about twenty minutes before they all disappeared from view. I felt transported to the time of David, who according to tradition had hid from Saul near here.” Major Johnston helps us better comprehend how cultural and tradition topography enables us to read with more empathy the biblical narratives.

<sup>41</sup> For an informed study of the Temple Jesus knew, see D. Bahat, “The Herodian Temple,” in The Cambridge History of Judaism, 3:38–58.

Jacob's well in Shechem provided water for his flocks and can still be seen today. According to the author of the Fourth Gospel, Jesus knew Jacob's well. He paused at the well, exhausted and thirsty, and conversed with a Samaritan woman: Jesus left Judea and headed "to Galilee. He had to pass through Samaria. So he came to a city of Samaria, named Sychar, near the field that Jacob gave to his son Joseph. Jacob's well was there, and so Jesus, exhausted as he was from his journey, sat down beside the well" (John 4:3–6).

Houses and monuments that were constructed just before or during Jesus' ministry have been unearthed. These help us comprehend some aspects of his life. The walls of houses in Capernaum seem too narrow to support tiled roofs, as in Jerusalem and Pompeii, so the account of the moving of the room so as to let down a paralytic makes sense in that environment. The monumental tombs, some of which may still be seen in the Kedron Valley, help us better know how and what ways we might better perceive and comprehend Jesus' Jewishness.

The gymnasia and hippodromes in many places, including Jerusalem, indicate that Jews as well as Romans, Idumeans, and others also frequented athletic contests.<sup>42</sup> Psychological, sociological, and archaeological examinations of these aspects of Jesus Research help us discern how a culture helps shape one's perception of topography.

We learn, inter alia, that the house of study (beth midrash) was called a "synagogue," a place in which Jews came (ago) together (syn). The Greek name indicates the level and extent to which Greece and Rome had penetrated into and reshaped the cultural topography of the Land. The crosses erected above the land that marred the landscape warn us that protests against these incursions erupted, especially during the time of Jesus, and it is unwise to assume positivistically that Mark created the concept of Jesus' followers carrying the cross and placed the logion in the mouth of one who had never seen crosses in Galilee and in the Land (cf. Mark 8:34).

But there is more that must be reported now, even though space for discussion is severely limited. With the conquests of Alexander and his

---

<sup>42</sup> A hippodrome was built in Jerusalem; and one was built on the shores of the Mediterranean within Roman Caesarea. Though now considerably dated, H. A. Harris' book on athletic contests and the Jews deserves careful reading; see Harris, Greek Athletics and the Jews, Trivium Special Publications (Cardiff: The University of Wales Press, 1976).

incursions into Palestine in the fourth century BCE, and the direct involvement of the Hellenistic kingdom ruled by the Seleucids,<sup>43</sup> the Land of Israel became more significantly part of world culture, as it had been earlier, notably in the sixth century BCE. Monuments recently erected in Palestine during the time of Jesus signified Roman suppression,<sup>44</sup> broke the second commandment, and thrust emperor worship into Jewish minds. Many Jews, not only the devout but also the secular, felt what the Romans intended: a slap in the face. Other Jews, even some who would have claimed to be devout, saw no problem with full accommodation to Greek and Roman cultures. For example, we now know that astrology, which clearly began within non-Jewish cultures, was inherited and re-minted by many Jews, both within (the Qumran horoscopes) and without Palestine (Treatise of Shem).<sup>45</sup>

It is well known that Greek art overpowered and influenced Roman art,<sup>46</sup> but it is not widely perceived that Augustus, when he obtained sole power over the Roman Empire in 31 BCE, had to re-invent worship, art, and a new visual language.<sup>47</sup> Augustus' reforms not only reshaped the landscape of Rome, but also redefined the cultural topography of ancient Palestine, which had already felt the incursions of

---

<sup>43</sup> See the discussion of the world culture developed during the Hellenistic period by J. J. Pollitt in Art in the Hellenistic Age (Cambridge: CUP, 1986).

<sup>44</sup> Recall the oath of Gangra, of 3 BCE [E] 315], according to which all in the Roman Empire were obligated to report whatever was spoken against or plotted against the Empire. While this oath is linked to Pamphlagonia, it would be unwise to think such an oath was irrelevant for Palestinian Jews. Herod had his spies, as is certainly clear. For the oath, see D. C. Braund, Augustus to Nero: A Sourcebook on Roman History 31 BC–AD 68 (Totowa, New Jersey: Barnes and Noble Books, 1985), 185–186.

<sup>45</sup> For further reflections, see Charlesworth (with J. R. Mueller), "Die 'Schrift des Sem': Einführung, Text und Übersetzung," ANRW II 20.2 (1987): 951–987, and Charlesworth, "Jewish Interest in Astrology during the Hellenistic and Roman Period," ANRW II 20.2 (1987): 926–950 (with colored illustrations).

<sup>46</sup> For a study of iconography and symbology during the time of Jesus, see Charlesworth, The Serpent: A Symbol of Life or Death? Anchor Bible Reference Library (New York: Doubleday, 2005).

<sup>47</sup> I am indebted to the research published by P. Zanker. See his The Power of Images in the Age of Augustus, trans. by A. Shapiro (Ann Arbor: The University of Michigan Press, 1988, 2000), esp. 2–4. Although Zanker does not delve into the re-shaping of Palestinian culture after Augustus and through Herod the Great, the book contains some insights fundamental for a perception of the cultural topography that helped shape Jesus' mind.

Roman culture, especially through Pompey the Great<sup>48</sup> and Antony.<sup>49</sup> During the time of Jesus, Herod the Great minted coins with the caduceus on the back (that is, two serpents facing each other). Images of the emperor appeared on coins, and the eagle was depicted on standards; these images shocked faithful Jews, who rioted against them during the time of Pontius Pilate.

As we Westerners look eastward to Rome—as well as Greece and the Land—for culture, art, architecture, and language, so the Romans looked to the East for culture and wealth. As the East, including Iran, had helped shape Roman culture, including the monarchy,<sup>50</sup> Rome had re-shaped the cultural topography of Jesus' land. Palestine was thus not a backwater country, as so many tend to claim; it was the bulwark of Rome against Parthia and Iran, the only other major power in or near the Roman Empire. Perhaps such incursions into the Land of the covenant made Jesus more Jewish, as we know especially from his retort to the Syrophenician woman and the charge, “Go nowhere among the Gentiles” (Matt 10:5).

Two examples alone must now suffice to stimulate reflections on how this aspect of cultural topography shaped the life and teaching of Jesus from Nazareth. Jews must have been offended when they saw Romans raising a colossal statue to a god or the emperor in Caesarea Maritima, during the constructions directed by Herod the Great. Walking through Galilee they were most likely shocked by the construction of the monumental edifice to Augustus raised up in the Golan on the road that led from Capernaum to Damascus (this “temple” was once thought to be in Caesarea Philippi).<sup>51</sup>

It is too easy to overlook the fact that Roman art served propaganda and the proclamation of “the good news” from the emperor. Emperor worship and pagan gods were seen re-shaping topography. The Romans

---

<sup>48</sup> Recall that Hyrcanus II had appealed to Pompey to settle his dispute with Aristobulus II; thus, in 63 BCE Rome entered Jesus' land, but not peacefully as too many scholars have claimed. Pompey subdued Jerusalem after a three-months siege and when the Jews were resting on Shabbat.

<sup>49</sup> Recall that, in Rome before the Senate, Antony nominated Herod to become king.

<sup>50</sup> I am indebted to insights obtained from reading W. Ball's Rome in the East: The Transformation of an Empire (London and New York: Routledge, 2000).

<sup>51</sup> The monument is constructed of the most elegant marble and was also expanded later, probably during the time of Hadrian. This monument dominated the topography of Upper Galilee in the Golan, but a description of it has not yet been published.

now controlled the art and architecture early Jews saw in Palestine.<sup>52</sup> Clearly, Peter and Paul knew the colossus in Caesarea Maritima, and Jesus probably saw the elegant marble monument to Augustus in the Galilee.

The effect of Roman art was profound.<sup>53</sup> The Greeks and Romans thought of themselves as made of marble and gold, but the subjected Jews, “the elect people of God,” reduced by those to whom God had given awesome power, at least sociologically and psychologically, were in many ways reduced to imagine that they were fashioned from dust. When such loss of esteem occurred, as the topography of the so-called Promised Land became more dominated by Rome, Jews—such as Jesus—were forced to imagine that God was no longer working through history; yet God would come faithfully, as promised, from above to establish a new heaven and earth.

Observant Jews, including Jesus, moved from Galilee to Judea, to celebrate the annual festivals as demanded by Torah—Shabuot (Pentecost), Sukkot (Tabernacles), and especially Passover. Such travel was more convenient due to the construction of Roman roads. While the author of Sibylline Oracles 4.127, in the second half of the first century CE, referred to the “broad roads” in “the great land of the Jews,” none of these roads seem to have been constructed with the industriousness of the Via Appia or the Via Egnatia. Yet such roads must have been impressive, since the remains of a Roman road with its aqueduct can still be seen in the Wadi Kelt. Thus roads constructed to facilitate the transportation of Roman soldiers also served the migration of peoples, the flow of commerce from East to West, and the multitude of pilgrims flowing into the Holy City. These pilgrims came to the Holy City from the West (especially Antioch, Alexandria, Athens, Rome, and Cyrene) as well as the East (including Parthians, Medes, Elamites, and residents of Mesopotamia [to note Acts 2:9]). Along these roads those borne on gold covered litters and those riding in elegant chariots mixed with traders on camels, as well as those on lowly donkeys or walking with nothing to carry.

---

<sup>52</sup> See the informative discussion of Jewish art and archaeology by R. Hachlili in Ancient Jewish Art and Archaeology in the Land of Israel (Leiden, New York: Brill, 1988).

<sup>53</sup> See the reflections by J. Onians in Classical Art and the Cultures of Greece and Rome (New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1999); see esp. xiii.

Jesus frequented the “villages” of Cana, Capernaum, Bethsaida, and Nazareth. The last two are situated in elevated terrain. Most ancient cities were built on hills for protection. The most majestic of these cities—Megiddo, Hazor, Gezer, and Jericho—still rise impressively above the local terrain. Pondering how these cities rise above and dominate the topography reminds many of Jesus’ words, “a city set on a hill cannot be hid” (Matt 5:14).

Fortunately, some of the most impressive building projects in the Land occurred just before or during the time of Jesus including the cities of Zippori (Sepphoris) and Tiberias in Galilee, Caesarea Maritima on the Mediterranean coast, and Sebaste in the heart of Samaria. The latter two cities were named by Herod the Great in honor of the Roman Emperor. Attempts to understand Jesus’ life, mission, and teaching have brought into prominence that Jesus, according to our canonical records, on the one hand, never entered Zippori or Tiberias (or even Gamla in the Golan) and, on the other hand, he focused his ministry in a very small area. His ministry was limited to the villages on the northwestern shores of the Kinneret. The area is impressively circumscribed, from Migdal, on the western shore of the Kinneret, to Bethsaida, on the northeast shore of the Jordan River.

Future research on Jesus’ life and message needs to be attuned more carefully to what can be known archaeologically and sociologically about Jesus’ choice of places in which to work. This task is fortunately facilitated by what is becoming apparent regarding the location of these places and what is clear from archaeological discoveries and research. If we can trust our intra-canonical gospels, Jesus seems to have lived and worked in a cultural topographical setting that is rural, yet informed and shaped by cities being built nearby.

Jesus’ Jewishness also appears more clearly when we study mikvaot and stone vessels. Both of these were designed for the Jewish rites of purification (recall John 2). Thanks to indefatigable archaeological work, mikvaot and stone vessels have been found not only in Herodian Jericho, Qumran, and Jerusalem, but also in many of the villages in Lower Galilee, where Jesus centered his ministry. It seems rather obvious to me that Jesus knew the exaggerated rules for purification being developed within the Jerusalem cult, that spies were sent out from Jerusalem to test his observance of ritual purity, and that he rejected these new laws. In the face of the aristocrats who demanded the purchasing of stone vessels, ritual cleansing in a mikva, and observance of heightened rules for observing ancient laws of purity codified especially in Leviticus, Jesus retorted, “Hear me, all of you, and understand: there is nothing outside a person which by going in can defile; but the things which come out of a person are what defile a person” (Mark 7:14–16).

Equally fortunately for us, the first and second Jewish revolts leveled some areas, like Gamla and Jerusalem, so that beneath a stratum of black ash one can enter a world untouched for almost 2,000 years. Notably, in Capernaum one can walk beside basalt houses, one of which has a good chance of being the home of Peter. A few yards to the north, one may look beneath the foundation of the ruins of the white synagogue and observe the black basalt remains of another monumental building, perhaps the synagogue in which Jesus taught.<sup>54</sup> These topographical features clarify the cultural context of Jesus’ life and message.

4. Tradition Topography

The third of the three helpful distinctions is tradition topography. It is this aspect of Palestinian topography that deeply shapes the human consciousness of those who contemplate the mighty events that occurred in the Land. The topography of Palestine was not seen by the early Jews, like Jesus, as primarily physical. As M. Merleau-Ponty pointed out in the Phenomenology of Perception, we do not see an objective world. We create a world in which we live through our pre-suppositions, understandings, and especially memories.<sup>55</sup> To perceive a landscape demands memory. As Merleau-Ponty stated, “in order to fill out perception, memories need to have been made possible by the physiognomic character of the data.”<sup>56</sup>

---

<sup>54</sup> For more on Herod the Great, the administration of the area, the economy at this time, Jewish art and architecture, and the cult, see the various chapters in M. Avi-Yonah, The Herodian Period, The World History of the Jewish People 1.7 (Jerusalem, New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press, 1975). The work is, of course, considerably dated.

<sup>55</sup> As D. Mendels points out, Pausanias “had the ability to present a landscape as a space that had become an important framework for memories of the past, reminding his readers of their own individual bygones, mythological and real” (xi) It would be foolish to reserve this insight to Pausanias alone; clearly memory and landscape shaped perception for others also, including Jesus and his group. See Mendels, Memory in Jewish, Pagan and Christian Societies of the Graeco-Roman World, Library of Second Temple Studies 45 (London, New York: T&T Clark International, 2004).

This dimension of phenomenology means that religious Jews like Jesus perceived the Land not as an object. They perceived through a shared memory; they saw the Land through memories from their own experiences as well as through memories bequeathed to them by those who shaped the Tanach and all traditions deemed sacred to them. Not only the Holy Land but all the earth receives the praise of worshipping Jews (as one would expect, since poets tend to praise earth’s beauty):

The pastures of the wilderness overflow,
The hills gird themselves with joy,
The meadows clothe themselves with flocks,
The valleys deck themselves with grain,
They shout and sing together for joy
(Ps 65:12–13)

In the first line quoted, the poet referred to “wilderness.” Too often this concept is misperceived as a place of punishment. For early Jews, including, Jesus, “the wilderness” symbolized the place of preparation. The point is made clearly in the self-understanding of the Qumranites who interpreted Isa 40:3 to mean that they were to obey the Voice and go into the wilderness to prepare the Way of Yahweh (see IQS).

In a world permeated by the Torah and the celebration of God’s creating activity, the earth and the Land become alive and supply life with hope, even when God’s word seems to be drowned out by the thunderous noise from a Roman cavalry. The Jewish theology of Jesus’ time, which deeply shaped not only his thought but also his life, was permeated, almost in every scroll, by apocalypticism and eschatology.<sup>57</sup> Thus, topography was perceived to be shaped by cosmic and heavenly forces experienced on earth.

Scholars will debate how much of the traditions attributed to Jesus actually derive from him, yet most scholars will agree that Jesus is distinguished from his earliest followers by his poetic vision of the

---

<sup>56</sup> M. Merleau-Ponty, Phenomenology of Memory, trans. C. Smith (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul and New York: The Humanities Press, 1962), 19.

<sup>57</sup> Some authors have challenged this sound and well-accepted conclusion. For an authoritative word on how Jesus’ message was shaped by apocalyptic and eschatological thought, see D. C. Allison, “The Eschatology of Jesus,” in The Encyclopedia of Apocalypticism: The Origins of Apocalypticism in Judaism and Christianity, ed. J. J. Collins, (New York: Continuum, 1999), 267–302.

Land. Many, especially the Greeks who joined the Jesus Movement, do not seem to have shared his love for the Land. We have the Greek translation of his Aramaic teachings; perhaps Jesus said, “Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the land” (τῆν γῆν, Matt 5:5). Perhaps Jesus’ prayer for his followers meant:

Your kingdom come
 Your will be done
 As in heaven so also on the Land (gēs)
 (Matt 6:10).

For deeply religious Jews, like Jesus, the topography of the Land takes on paradigmatic significance because of the sacred traditions associated with a site.<sup>58</sup> The contrast between tradition topography and geophysical topography is extreme. Atheists and secular persons can discuss the geographical features of the topography with religious people, but secularists are rather lost in comprehending how “people of the Book” perceive the Land’s topography through spiritual symbolism.

Jesus, as well as those who heard him and others who followed him, knew the traditions that shaped the Land and defined the topography of their lives. Tradition topography shaped those with a religious consciousness and believed that God did enter history and had been present in the Land through his mediators and perhaps at times in a more direct way. This aspect of topography is usually ignored in studies of the Land, yet it shaped Jewish lives and thoughts far more deeply than the earlier geophysical upheavals that created the Ramon crater and the tectonic shifts and climate changes sometime after 60,000 BCE. These upheavals and other forces drained the fresh-water lake that once had stretched from the Hermon to the end of what is now the Dead Sea.

Mount Hermon was not primarily a mountain isolated north of Galilee. It filled symbolism so that it shaped even the perception of Zion. A psalmist proclaimed the following about unity among kindred:

It is like the dew of Hermon, which falls on the mountains of Zion
 (Ps 133:3).

---

<sup>58</sup> No less than 524 sites are known; see esp. Y. Tsafrir, L. Di Segni, and J. Green, Maps and Gazetteer, Tabula Imperii Romani: Iudaea, Palaestina: Eretz Israel in the Hellenistic, Roman and Byzantine Periods (Jerusalem: The Israel Academy of Sciences and Humanities, 1994).

Where did the Evangelists imagine was the Mount of the Transfiguration? Some tradition situates it on Mount Tabor. Perhaps it was on Mount Hermon, as some scholars now indicate.<sup>59</sup>

The poet who gave us Psalm 133 mentioned dew. “Dew” obviously obtained symbolical meaning long before Jesus (see esp. 1 En. 75–76). Another memorable passage that develops the symbolic meaning of dew is found in a document composed a little later. The author of 3 Baruch has Michael announce to Baruch that the birds “continuously praise the Lord,” and corrects the human claim that rain comes from the sea, revealing that there are two types of rain: “There is rain from the sea and from water on earth; but that which produces the fruits is from here. Know from now on that what is called dew of heaven comes from here” (3 Bar. 10.9).

Where did John probably baptize Jesus? It was, according to tradition, just north of the Dead Sea, in the River Jordan. This place is in or near the site where both the Baptizer and Jesus imagined Elijah had ascended into heaven (2 Kings 2:11). Surely, our search for the meaning of the theophany at Jesus’ birth should be enriched by imagining how tradition topography helped shape that narrative of the Evangelists. To what extent did tradition topography even shape the experience and memory of the Baptizer and especially Jesus? B. Chilton suggests that Jesus, who was clearly the Baptizer’s most famous disciple, was taught by his teacher to embody the mystical imagery of Ezekiel which anchored heaven with the Land.<sup>60</sup> Not far from the site of Jesus’ baptism is Jericho, the city that Jesus and his followers understood had been conquered magically by God through Joshua and given to the People called into existence by their liberation from bondage in Egypt.

A day’s walk up from Jericho through the Wadi Kelt is Jerusalem. This old city is where Abraham met Melchizedek. The city created by David was elevated with a Temple by Solomon. Jerusalem became the Holy City and its sacredness was enhanced by the holy things accomplished there in later times, especially during the times of Jeremiah, Isaiah, Nehemiah, Ezra, and Judas Maccabeus, who instituted a festival Jesus celebrated, Hanukkah (1 Macc 4 and John 10:22–24).

---

<sup>59</sup> See esp. B. Chilton, Rabbi Jesus (New York, London: Doubleday, 2000), 190–196.

<sup>60</sup> See B. Chilton, Rabbi Jesus, 52–53.

The early followers of Jesus remembered the Temple as the place where Jesus taught and worshipped. For example, Peter and John continue to worship in the Temple, especially at the time of prayer: "Now Peter and John were going up to the Temple at the hour of prayer, the ninth hour" (Acts 3:1). Jesus' disciples were entering Herod's Temple. It was monumental, and perhaps exceeded the temples in Rome. The Talmudic sage who compiled Baba Bathra exclaimed, with much imagination that can now be justified due to archaeological excavations on the outskirts of the Temple Mount, "He who has not seen Herod's Temple has never seen a stately structure in his life" (4.5).

Just to the west of the walls of Jerusalem are two other sites connected with the life of Jesus. His followers commemorated the location where they knew Jesus had been crucified by Roman soldiers. Nearby was the tomb in which his corpse had been laid, and the spot from where they believed God had raised him from the dead to eternal life. Such locations were no longer merely geographical; they are associated with Jesus' life and took on new meaning in the preaching in Jerusalem during the thirties and forties (in the didache and kerygma).

Mount Tabor, which Jesus and his followers must have seen many times, and the Jezreel Valley (Emeq Yizreel or Plane of Esdraelon), through which they obviously walked, were sacred because of the miracles accomplished there, especially under Deborah. Jesus' saying that the one who lives by the sword will die by the sword might have been stimulated by thoughts of the numerous battles fought in the Jezreel Valley, which he could see spread before him just to the south as he sat on some promontory near Nazareth.

Jesus is reported to have visited Tyre and Sidon. Such a journey would have stimulated thoughts about David and Solomon, since it was the northeast border of the land controlled by the monarchy, and also about Ahab and Jezebel, the priestly daughter from Tyre who worshipped Baal.

Jesus spent time in Bethsaida and performed miracles there, even though they are only alluded to in the gospels. Bethsaida, mentioned in all four intra-canonical gospels, is also the home of some of Jesus' disciples (at least Peter, Andrew, and Philip). The city, built on and with rugged basalt stones, ceased to exist in 67 CE, during the First Jewish Revolt.

Today archeologists have exposed majestic Iron Age basalt walls on the northern side of Bethsaida. The site was probably conquered in the eighth century BCE by the Assyrian armies, but the ancient walls would have been seen by Jesus and some of his followers. These massive walls date from the time when David took a wife, Maacah, from this place. Perhaps in Bethsaida, near such massive walls and gate, Jesus and his followers reminisced about earlier centuries, especially the time of David and his alignment with the kingdom of Geshur.

Reflections on the various dimensions of the topography of the Land help us to see the realia that appear in Jesus' parables. For example, in the "Parable of the Sower" (Matt 13:1–9),<sup>61</sup> the reader is prodded to remember what had been seen topographically and to imagine their spiritual meaning: house, sea, boat, beach, seeds, path, birds, rocky ground, soil, sun, root, thorns, good soil, and grain. Grain—that is, wheat and barley—not only color the Land at the time of harvest, they shape the annual pilgrim festivals; and the author of Sibylline Oracles 8 refers to God's work as grinding flour: "The mills of God grind fine flour, though late" (8.14 [this text, however, was most likely composed by a Jew about one hundred years after Jesus]).

5. Summary

It has become obvious that a study of the importance of topography for understanding Jesus includes more than geography. It entails also a study and appreciation of what is anchored in the land; among such features of topography are houses, monuments, roads, villages, and cities. Thus topography conceptually extends to include what is part of the landscape, such as winds, vistas, sounds, smells, and wells. Topography also involves an examination of the traditions through which Jesus and his fellow Jews imagined the Land. This was the part of the earth God had promised to Abraham and the people who would descend from him. In it they would constitute a multitudinous nation. This dimension of topography is demanded by the recognition that when early Jews, like Jesus, saw Hazor and Tabor they remembered how during the time of the Judges God's people had defeated the Canaanites, those who had formerly lived in this land. When they saw Jericho, they remembered the tradition of how Elisha had cleansed the water, and earlier how Joshua had conquered Jericho. Looking to the mountains east of the Dead Sea they caught a glimpse of Mount Nebo, from which, according to old traditions, Moses looked westward and down on the Promised Land.

---

<sup>61</sup> According to Jewish lore, the archangel Michael taught agriculture to Adam; cf. Life of Adam and Eve 22.

When Torah-observant Jews went up to Jerusalem they remembered, sometimes through word-images memorized from the Psalms, how Yahweh had so many times visited the Holy City. They recalled the memories of how David obtained the city from the Jebusites, how Solomon built the first Temple, how Hezekiah had removed the upraised serpent that had been worshipped.

Most importantly, Jesus and his disciples most likely shared the Jewish conviction that Jerusalem, the navel of the earth,<sup>62</sup> would be the center in which God would gather his elect people. This eschatological perception is preserved especially in Psalms of Solomon 11.2–3,

Stand on a high place, Jerusalem, and look at your children,
From the east and the west assembled together by the Lord.
From the north they come in the joy of their god;
From far distant islands God has assembled them.

Applying a broad understanding of topography we may now imagine some aspects of Jesus' life.

With the imagination supplied by comprehending the full range of meanings represented by topography, we can imagine that Jesus and his group, on the way from Galilee to Jerusalem, would pause on the Mount of Olives and recall how Yahweh had protected his holy dwelling from the Assyrians, and how Ezra and Nehemiah had led the returnees from Babylon to rebuild the city and restore Torah worship. To comprehend and appreciate this dimension of topography, it is helpful to imagine how Jesus and his followers, looking from an elevated position to the East, might look down on the glistening gold of the Temple and recall reciting in the synagogue one or more of the following psalms:

O Lord, I love the house in which you dwell,
And the place where your glory abides
(Ps 26:8).

One thing I asked of the Lord,
That will I seek after:
To live in the house of the Lord
All the days of my life,

---

<sup>62</sup> Ezek 38:12; cf. 1 En. 26.1, Jub. 1.2, 28; 8.19; and Let. Aris. 83, contrast the Prayer of Jacob 8.

To behold the beauty of the Lord,
 And to inquire in his temple
 (Ps 27:4).

How lovely is your dwelling place,
 O Lord of hosts!
 My soul longs, indeed it faints
 for the courts of the Lord;
 My heart and my flesh sing for joy to the living God
 (Ps 84:1).

Obviously, most citizens of a country tend to idolize it. Scots cherish the lochs and Burns' poems, Texans feel a deep attachment to their state, Africans admire their own country, Australians talk about their attachment to and love for their own homeland, and this list is easily extended. For those who believe in the biblical God, however, something else appears. The importance of "the Holy Land" is both axiomatic and mind-shaping. Scots, Texans, and Australians revere the land of the Bible as "the Holy Land." No one in Palestine or Israel today would call Scotland, Texas, and Australia God's Holy Land. During the time of Jesus, not only Palestinian Jews but those living in the Diaspora, revered the Land and many considered it the earth's center (cf. Jubilees). Why? The answer is surely because the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob had chosen it from all the countries of the world. God's actions for his chosen people had occurred elsewhere; but they were concentrated in "the Land." Thus, Jesus' perception of Palestinian topography was culturally and traditionally colored by the sacred texts and memories bequeathed to him.

These reflections remind us that the places made sacred by God's actions had deeply shaped the perceptions of Jesus and his fellow Jews.<sup>63</sup> Such memories were awakened each time Jews, during the synagogue liturgy, celebrated God's mighty deeds on behalf of the chosen people, the "children of Israel." Further reflections should help us grasp that some of the sites now held sacred by those in the Palestinian Jesus Movement had no previous religious significance: notably, Nazareth, Cana, Capernaum, Korazin, and Migdal.

---

<sup>63</sup> For a fascinating and popular re-creation of Jesus' life, according to the finest canons of historiography with in depth appreciation of topography, see G. Theissen, The Shadow of the Galilean, trans. J. Bowden (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987).

6. Conclusion

One of the main tasks of a biblical professor is to inculcate in students an appreciation (and when possible aptitude) for a poetic vision of life. He or she has a daunting task: to stimulate others to perceive the real behind realia. A secular person today, driving through the Galilee, would see only flowering bougainvillea growing aimlessly. Those who followed Jesus, and remembered his words about the lilies of the fields, as well as the Jews who cherished the Davidic Psalms, might imagine the Spirit moving purposely and coloring the Land with flowers. Once love was expressed with images derived from landscapes, as we know especially from the Song of Solomon.<sup>64</sup> Such love was sometimes for humans and at other times for the divine.

With a better feeling for Palestinian topography we increase our chance of better understanding of Jesus' life and message in its cultural and topographical context. Perhaps we might hear Jesus' intended meaning echo off canyons we had never perceived and thus could not have pondered entering.

A study of the topography of the Land helps correct misperceptions derived from only looking at a concretized text, bound in a volume, labeled "the New Testament." We have come to understand that Jesus and his followers did not see a landscape already objective and interpreted; they perceived their topography not only in terms of its geographical feature but also in terms of how it had been framed for them culturally and traditionally.

Two centuries before Jesus, Polybius, in Book 12, pointed out that too many "historians" had attempted to write history by sitting in a library. Polybius correctly pointed out that the historian should visit the place in which an event occurred to obtain more precise information. Polybius advised that historiography must include, inter alia, "the survey of cities, places, rivers, lakes, and in general all the peculiar features of the land (καὶ καθόλου τῶν κατὰ γῆν) and sea and the distances of one place from another.”<sup>65</sup> Perhaps the preceding reflections will prove prolegomena for an improved appreciation of Jesus’ life and teaching not only within his homeland but also within our own.

---

<sup>64</sup> Now, see the beautiful pictures and poetry in Ch. Getraide and Y. Taharlev, I'll Take you There: Landscapes and Love Verses, trans. I. Cohen (Tel Aviv: Cordinata Ltd, 2002).

---

<sup>65</sup> Polybius, Hist. 12.25<sup>e</sup>. For the Greek and English, see W. R. Paton, ed. and trans., Polybius, LCL 159 (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1976), 374–375.

BACKGROUND II: (SOME) LITERARY DOCUMENTS

MARTIN MCNAMARA

1. Introduction: Sources

In this present part of this volume, due attention is given to the contributions made by archaeology and geography and to the results of researches in the political and social sciences with regard to the world of Jesus.

The present essay will devote itself principally to the thought world of the first century of our era, in so far as this can be known from the sources that can be legitimately used for such a study. Needless to say, while concentrating principally on Jesus, by the nature of the case what will be said holds for the entire first century of our era, if not for longer. This will include the early church, with the formation of the gospel tradition and the writings of the gospels as well as the brief period of Jesus' public ministry. The thought world, the mind set, the thought patterns, the religious language used, must hold as much for the continuation of Jesus' ministry in the Church as for Jesus himself. In fact, religious imagery, language, phraseology occurring in the gospels on the lips of Jesus and demonstrably attested for that period in Jewish literary sources, may as easily be from a later stage in the formation of the gospels, or from the evangelists themselves, as from Jesus.

1.1. Sources

The sources on which one has to draw are the Hebrew Bible, the extra books (Apocrypha, Deuterocanonicals) of the Greek Old Testament and the Pseudepigrapha, the Dead Sea Scrolls, rabbinic literature and Aramaic Targums.

1.1.1. Sources: Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha

The apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha have been edited in English translation by R. H. Charles in 1913,<sup>1</sup> and a much wider collection of the

---

<sup>1</sup> R. H. Charles, ed., The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament in English, 2 vols. (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1913).

Old Testament Pseudepigrapha (63 in number) by J. H. Charlesworth in 1983 and 1985.<sup>2</sup> The Pseudepigrapha as edited by J. H. Charlesworth represent a great diversity of genres and have been classified in his edition as Apocalyptic Literature and Testaments, Expansions of the “Old Testament” and Legends, Wisdom and Philosophical Literature, Prayers, Psalms, and Odes, and Fragments of Lost Judeo-Hellenistic Works.

Most of these Pseudepigrapha have been transmitted in the Christian church, rather than by Jews, and in translation (mainly Greek, Ethiopic, Syriac, Georgian, Armenian, Latin, occasionally Irish) rather than in their original language of composition, although the original Semitic originals of some of them have been found among the Dead Sea Scrolls. The question which arises with regard to individual writings among the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha is whether it is in whole or in part a Christian rather than a Jewish composition, or at least has been influenced or recast by a Christian hand. Even when regarded as of Jewish origin, the original language (Hebrew, Aramaic, Greek) and exact place of origin (Palestine, the Diaspora) can present a problem. The questions will be considered for each of the works as occasion demands.

While we are chiefly interested in works composed in Palestine and in Hebrew or Aramaic, attention will also be paid to works written in Greek and outside of Palestine when those can be supposed to show contact with Palestinian Jewish tradition.

1.1.2. Sources. The Dead Sea Scrolls

The total number of manuscripts recovered from the Dead Sea area from 1947 onwards amounts to about 800. Of these 250 are copies of various biblical books. So little of the text of 275 to 300 other manuscripts has been preserved that they reveal little or nothing with regard to content.<sup>3</sup> The remaining manuscripts contain a variety of texts, most of them hitherto unknown. These can be grouped under the following broad headings: Community rules; halakhic texts; literature with eschatological content; exegetical literature; parabiblical literature; poetic texts; liturgical texts; astronomical texts, calendars and horoscopes.<sup>4</sup> It is generally agreed that these manuscripts represent the library of a monastic community at Qumran. The group, begun apparently by a person referred to as “The Teacher of Righteousness,” broke with the Judaism of the Jerusalem Temple about 140 BCE, and withdrew to Qumran. The writings, whether biblical or otherwise, were seen by the community as connected with their tradition, their prehistory and later history. The manuscripts appear to have been deposited in the caves by the Dead Sea in 68 CE on the advance of the Roman armies towards Jerusalem. Not all the works were composed by the Qumran community. Some of them, such as texts of the Books of Enoch and possibly Jubilees, predate the community. Others do not appear to present any sectarian views. Many of them, however, contain the halakha, the religious views and eschatological outlook of the Qumran community. The manuscripts date from the third century BC to the first century CE, shortly before the works were deposited in the caves. A number of the commentaries on Scripture, seeing the biblical text as referring to their own community, were composed in the first century CE. How widely views expressed in these writings were known or shared by Jews elsewhere in Palestine and outside can only be a matter of speculation.

---

<sup>2</sup> J. H. Charlesworth, ed., The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha (London: Darton, Longman and Todd). 1: Apocalyptic Literature and Testaments, 1983; 2: Expansions of the “Old Testament” and Legends, Wisdom and Philosophical Literature, Prayers, Psalms, and Odes, Fragments of Lost Judeo-Hellenistic Works (1985) (Abbreviated below as OTP 1 and OTP 2 respectively).

<sup>3</sup> See F. Garcia Martinez, The Dead Sea Scrolls Translated. The Qumran Texts in English, 2nd ed. (Leiden: Brill; Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1996), xxiv.

1.1.3. Sources. Rabbinic Literature and Aramaic Targums

Not too long ago, the chief sources used for a study of the New Testament and of questions fundamentally about Jesus were the writings of rabbinic literature. It has since been recognised that the rabbinic Mishnaic corpus was formed between the Fall of Jerusalem in 70 CE and the redaction of the Mishnah ca. 200 CE. The corpus of rabbinic Midrashic literature is also considered to be later, a certain amount of it intended to counteract Christian claims with regard to who were heirs to the earlier biblical tradition and its interpretation. While taking all this new understanding of Rabbinic tradition into account, it can be assumed that within the rabbinic midrashic corpus (especially the earlier works) there is material that represents old and pre-Christian tradition and understanding of the message of the Hebrew Bible. In this matter, judgment will have to be given with regard to each particular item, weighed in conjunction with evidence from other sources.

---

<sup>4</sup> Following the headings used by García Martínez, The Dead Sea Scrolls Translated.

The Targums (Aramaic translations of the Hebrew Bible), and particularly the Targums of the Pentateuch and Prophets, were also once considered major sources for questions of New Testament study and questions relating to the historical Jesus. Their relevance was later called into question because of the date of the extant manuscripts.

From the mid-1940's to the mid-1970's there was a revival of interest in the targumic tradition, its antiquity, and its importance for an understanding of the New Testament, with a particular interest in the Palestinian Targums of the Pentateuch, the Aramaic of which was even regarded as representing the language of Jesus. This new interest was given impetus by early texts of the Palestinian Targum from the Cairo Genizah published by Paul Kahle in 1930, Kahle's Schweich Lectures on the Cairo Genizah finds in 1941, but especially by the discovery of Codex Neofiti 1 in the Vatican Library in 1949 and its identification in 1956 by Alejandro Díez Macho as an almost complete text of the Palestinian Targum of the Pentateuch. The relevance of the Palestinian Targums to New Testament studies was seriously challenged in the mid-1960's. Its form of Aramaic, being from the third century at the earliest, was demonstrably much later than that of Qumran and the New Testament period. As a result of such reservations, in recent decades the Targums have been relatively little used in gospel or New Testament studies.

A general reconsideration here seems called for. There is more to the Targums than lexical forms. There is the question of religious vocabulary, expressing the mindset in which the targumic tradition originated. This was characterised by belief in the resurrection, as distinct from Qumran where there does not appear to have been any such belief. In this essay I will use the Targums as seems indicated in the consideration of individual themes.

1.2. Jewish Literary Documents in Palestine First Century BCE and First Century CE

I here treat of Galilee and Judea as one entity from the religious and literary point of view, going on the view that New Testament Galilee represents in the main the continuation of a settlement there by Jews from Judea ca. 100 BCE.<sup>5</sup> When we speak of the use of literary documents in this period the limits of our knowledge of relevant facts must be borne in mind. Outside of the Qumran community, we do not know what literary circles existed, how widespread literacy was, or how information was disseminated. However, there are indications that with regard to non-biblical material, older texts were being copied, and new works were being composed. This is true in particular of apocalyptic texts. The apocalyptic literary movement continued. Texts of the books of Enoch (all but the Similitudes, 1 Enoch 37–71) continued to be copied in Qumran. The author of the New Testament Letter of Jude (Jude 14–15) explicitly cites 1 Enoch 1:9. The Similitudes of Enoch were probably composed during the first century of our era. The work variously known as the Assumption of Moses and the Testament of Moses appears to have been in part reedited, if not entirely composed in this same century. The apocalyptic works 4 Ezra and 2 Baruch, from about 100 CE (roughly contemporary with the canonical Apocalypse of John), are further proof of continued creativity with regard to works in this literary genre. As other works most probably composed in Palestine during the first century CE I may instance the Apocalypse of Abraham, the Biblical Antiquities of Pseudo-Philo, the Life of Adam and Eve (The Apocalypse of Moses), the Lives of the Prophets, the Testament of Abraham and possibly The Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs.

1.3. Formation of a Tradition

The corpora of the Pseudepigrapha and of the Qumran texts were composed in good part between 200 BCE and 100 CE. Behind both probably stands a tradition and an understanding of the Scriptures that has been in formation from the time of Ezra if not earlier. The formation of the canon of the Hebrew scriptures is not altogether clear, but it would appear that by the time of Ezra (458 BCE) a good part of the “(Latter) Prophets” had been formed. The redaction of the Pentateuch may also have been completed by then. In Ezra chapter 7 and Nehemiah 8 we read of “the book of the Law of Moses which the Lord had given to Israel” (Neh 8:1). Ezra is presented as having read from this book, “from the law of God” (8:8). The book in question was in some way related to our present Pentateuch, if not identified with it. It is, however, difficult to link Ezra’s activity and reforms with any specific book or text of the Pentateuch. The nearest texts would seem to be from Leviticus.<sup>6</sup> While a process of Scripture explanation may have begun with Ezra, it is extremely difficult to establish what exactly this was and how it was carried out in Ezra’s day, or later times. It is now recognized that a certain amount of interpretation took place in the process of the final editing of the canonical books, although the extent of this is not always agreed on.

---

<sup>5</sup> Present-day scholarship devotes particular attention to the geographical and cultural situation in New Testament Palestine, to the Jewishness of Galilee from the Hasmonean settlement there from the end of the second century BCE onwards. See in particular J. L. Reed, Archaeology and the Galilean Jesus. A Re-examination of the Evidence (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity, 2000), esp. 23–53; S. Freyne, Galilee, Jesus and the Gospels. Literary Approaches and Historical Investigations (Dublin: Gill and Macmillan, 1988); idem, Jesus, A Jewish Galilean. A New Reading of the Jesus-Story (London and New York: T&T Clark International, 2004); idem, Galilee and Gospel. Selected Essays, WUNT 125 (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 2000), esp. 1–25: brief account of the history of Galilean scholarship, including archaeology of the region); M. Rapinchuk, “The Galilee and Jesus in Recent Research,” Currents in Biblical Research 2.2 (2004): 197–222.

Translation, too, can be an occasion of interpretative renderings, embellishments or additions. Our oldest translation is the Greek Septuagint. The Greek (LXX) translation of the Pentateuch was made about the mid-third century BCE and that of the other books at later dates. The Greek translation of the books of the Hebrew Canon seems to have been completed by the time the prologue of the Greek translation of Ben Sirach was made (ca. 120 BCE). To what extent individual books pass beyond translation to interpretation, and specifically messianic interpretation, is debated. Some would see a significant messianic interpretative element in the LXX. In his book on Royal Messianism J. Coppens expressed the opinion that the Septuagint shows signs of a developing messianism,<sup>7</sup> a view shared by other scholars, more recently by W. Horbury.<sup>8</sup> Primary texts adduced in this regard are Isa 7:14 and Ps 109(110):3. To these other scholars would add Gen 3:15; 49:10; Num 24:7, 17; 2 Sam 7:16; Isa 9:5–6; 11:4; 14:29–32; Ezek 21:30–32; 43:3; Dan 7:13; Hos 8:10; Amos 4:13; Zech 9:10, to which might be added Lam 4:20 and Ezek 27:23 which played an important role in early Christian literature. Other scholars are skeptical.<sup>9</sup> After a brief overview, J. Lust comments that one cannot say that the LXX as a whole displays a messianic exegesis. Most often the translation is literal, without any messianic bias. In other cases it shows a shift in accentuation, thereby weakening the royal messianic character of the text.<sup>10</sup> Despite the insertion of the term of ἄνθρωπος (“man”) in Num 24:7, 17 Lust comments: “There is hardly any reason to state that the LXX version is more messianic than the MT. The term ἄνθρωπος (‘man’) does not have direct messianic connotations.”<sup>11</sup>

---

<sup>6</sup> See M. McNamara, “Reception of the Hebrew Text of Leviticus in the Targums,” in The Book of Leviticus. Composition and Reception, ed. R. Rendtorff and R. A. Kugler, Supplements to Vetus Testamentum 93, Formation and Interpretation of Old Testament Literature 3 (Leiden: Brill, 2003), 269–298.

<sup>7</sup> See J. Coppens, Le messianisme royal: ses origines, son développement, son accomplissement, Lectio Divina 54 (Paris: Cerf, 1968), 119. In his later work Le messianisme et sa relève prophétique: les anticipations vétérotestamentaires, leur accomplissement en Jésus, Bibliotheca Ephemeridum Theologicarum Lovaniensium 38 (Gembloux: Duculot, 1974), 149, his position is less clear: “...the Septuagint displays numerous traces of a continuous development.”

1.4. Approach to Use of the Documents

Documents from the late Second Temple period can be used in at least two different ways in the study of the background of the historical Jesus or the world of Paul. Each of the documents, or group of documents (for instance apocalyptic writings), can be examined individually and its relevance to the subject evaluated.<sup>12</sup> Another approach is to study specific themes in the light of the evidence from one or more of the Jewish writings as appears relevant. This is the approach followed in this contribution. Limitations of space indicate that a selection of documents and themes has to be made. In this essay I study the material under four large headings: themes and traditions that can be in some

---

<sup>8</sup> W. Horbury, Jewish Messianism and the Cult of Christ (London: SCM, 1998): developing royal messianism (48, 50–51, 55, 130–131; supporting pre-existent messianism, 90–96; introducing messianic interpretation, 29–31, 37, 53, 147–148). References to earlier scholars with this position in J. Lust, “Messianism and Septuagint,” Congress Volume Salamanca 1983, Supplements to Vetus Testamentum 36 (Leiden: Brill, 1985), 174–191.

<sup>9</sup> See L. Greenspoon, “Hebrew into Greek: Interpretation in, by, and of the Septuagint,” in A History of Biblical Interpretation, 80–113, at 96–98 (“‘Messianizing’ in the LXX?”), with bibliography, including five studies by J. Lust.

<sup>10</sup> J. Lust, “Messianism and Septuagint,” 175.

<sup>11</sup> J. Lust, “Messianism and Septuagint,” 178.

<sup>12</sup> This is the method employed for a study of Paul, and a fresh appraisal of his setting in Second Temple Judaism in Justification and Variegated Nomism, 1: The Complexities of Second Temple Judaism, ed. D. A. Carson, P. T. O’Brien and Mark A. Seifrid, (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck; Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Academic, 2002).

ways considered as deriving from the Bible (an interpreted Bible); Wisdom tradition; apocalyptic texts and eschatological-type documents; messianic-type expectations.

2. Individual Documents and Traditions

2.1. An Interpreted Bible

Ben Sirach's grandson's preface (whether written in 132 or 118 BCE) to his Greek translation of his grandfather's Hebrew wisdom writing seems to indicate that by the year 180 BCE or so there existed a Hebrew canon of the Law, the Prophets and the other (works), although the contents of the "other writings" was probably then not closed. Most of the Pseudepigrapha and Qumran writings presuppose the Hebrew canon, or the greater part of it, and treat or expand it in different ways. Some of the works can be regarded as rewritten Bibles (of one or more biblical books), such as Jubilees, the Qumran texts The Temple Scroll and Genesis Apocryphon, and Pseudo-Philo's Biblical Antiquities (from Adam to the death of Saul). Others of these writings contain principally legendary material about biblical characters, for instance the Life of Adam and Eve, the Lives of the Prophets. Though the connection of these individual post-biblical works with the Bible differs, they all indicate that their point of departure has been the Scriptures, around which different developments take place. While the canonical Scripture text would have remained intact, read and listened to as God's word privately, and publicly in liturgical services, at the same time there grew up around it an entire interpretative tradition. Sometimes this tradition was directed by the beliefs and expectations of a community such as Qumran, on other occasions by an understanding more widely accepted without any necessary connection with any particular Jewish group. Laws governing this development have not as yet been investigated.<sup>13</sup> One such law would appear to be deep reflection on the Bible,

---

<sup>13</sup> For biblical interpretation see G. Vermes, Scrolls, Scriptures and Early Christianity, Library of Second Temple Studies 56 (London and New York: T&T Clark International, 2003), 44–55; exegesis of an editorial type (grouping and collating parallel texts; harmonising expositions, clarifying additions, recasting and supplementations); exegesis of individual books (rewritten Bible-type exegesis; the Qumran pesher); thematic exegesis (Testimonia genre; the Qumran midrash). At the end of the essay Vermes' final comment concerns the need to insert Qumran's contribution into the corpus of Scriptural exegesis in post-biblical Judaism after investigation of its points or particular books of the canon, accompanied by observation on the occurrence of similar phrases or incidents, and the combining of these to produce new presentations or midrashim. We shall examine a few of these in the midrash on the well that followed and with regard to resurrection on the third day. But there are others.

2.1.1. The Well that Followed<sup>14</sup>

In the biblical narrative of the desert wanderings important incidents are connected with water. Thus, the water of Marah, Exod 15:22; the twelve springs at Elim, Exod 15:27; the waters brought forth from the rock at Rephidim, Exod 17:1–7; Num 33:14; the arrival at Kadesh, with the note that Miriam died there, followed immediately by the statement that there was no water for the people, and the account of the miracle of water from the rock, Num 20:1–5. Finally we have the account of the arrival at Beer (in Hebrew meaning “Well”) where the Hebrews sang the “Song of the Well” (Num 21:16–20). From this there developed a midrash on a well of water that followed Israel in the desert wanderings, and was known as Miriam’s well.

There are strong indications that this was a firmly established tradition in Palestinian Judaism in the first century of our era. We find it mentioned three times in the Biblical Antiquities (Liber Antiquitatum Biblicarum, L.A.B.) of Pseudo-Philo. This work is a rewritten Bible for the narrative from Adam through David to the death of Saul. It has many haggadic additions and interpretations of biblical texts, some of them also found in the Palestinian Targums and rabbinic literature. It is generally assigned a date in the second half of the first century CE, probably before the fall of Jerusalem in 70 CE. Some scholars, however, prefer a somewhat later date, between 70 CE and 150 CE.<sup>15</sup> of contact with parallel phenomena in the Apocrypha, Pseudepigrapha, the New Testament, Josephus, Targums and midrash.

---

<sup>14</sup> See M. McNamara, Palestinian Judaism and the New Testament, Good News Studies 4 (Wilmington, DE: Michael Glazier, 1983), 241–244; G. Bienaimé, Moïse et le don de l'eau dans la tradition juive ancienne: Targum et Midrash, Analecta Biblica 98 (Rome: Biblical Institute Press, 1984).

<sup>15</sup> D. J. Harrington (“Pseudo-Philo,” OTP 2, 299) opts for a date before 70 CE. See also F. Murphy, Pseudo-Philo: Rewriting the Bible (New York: Oxford University Press, 1993), 6; C. Perrot and P. M. Bogaert, Pseudo-Philon: Les Antiquités Bibliques, vol. 2 (Paris: Éditions du Cerf, 1976), 66–74. H. Jacobsen finds the arguments for a pre-70 date unconvincing and prefers a date between 70 CE and the middle of the second century (H. Jacobsen, A Commentary on Pseudo-Philo's Liber Antiquitatum. With Latin Text and English Translation, AGJU 31 [Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1996], 1, 199–210). R. Deines

In L.A.B. the tradition on the well that followed Israel in its wanderings is first encountered at the narrative of entry into the wilderness, and last at the account of Moses' death. It is one of the three gifts of God to Israel, the others being the manna and the cloud. The first occurrence is as follow, in L.A.B. 10.7:

Now he led his people out into the wilderness; for forty years he rained down for them bread from heaven and brought quails to them from the sea and brought forth a well of water to follow them. Now with a pillar of cloud he led them by day, and with a pillar of fire he gave them light by night.<sup>16</sup>

The tradition occurs again in L.A.B. 11.5 where it is said that the water of Marah 'followed them in wilderness forty years and went up to the mountain with them and went down into the plains'. The same three divine gifts are noted together in the final mention of the well, in LAB 20.8 where the well of the water of Marah is said to have been given for Miriam.

This tradition as formulated in L.A.B. 11.5 is similar to the tradition as found in the Palestinian Targum of Num 21:16–20. Here the Hebrew text has a reference to a well, followed by a series of place names. In the Aramaic paraphrase the place names are interpreted as common nouns; the Hebrew text itself disappears to give a coherent midrash on the well. I give the Palestinian Targum text of Num 21:16–20 in the translation of Neofiti.<sup>17</sup> (Italics denote targumic paraphrase.)

(16) And from there the well was given to them. This is the well of which the Lord said to Moses: 'Gather the people together and I will give them water.' (17) Then Israel sang this song of praise: 'Spring up, O well!'—They sang to it; and it sprang up. (18) It is the well which the princes of the world, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, dug from the beginning; the intelligent ones of the people perfected it, the seventy sages who had been set apart; the scribes of Israel, Moses and Aaron, measured it with their rods; and from the wilderness it was given to them as a gift. (19) And after the well had been given to them as a gift, it went on to become for them swelling believes that L.A.B. is best characterised as a book of consolation in the time between the two revolts (70 CE and 132–135 CE) (R. Deines, "The Pharisees between 'Judaisms' and 'Common Judaism'," in Justification and Variegated Nomism, 1: The Complexities of Second Temple Judaism, ed. D. A. Carson, P. T. O'Brien and M. A. Seifrid, [Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck; Grand Rapids: Baker Academic 2001], 443–504, at 486).

---

<sup>16</sup> In the translation by D. J. Harrington, "Ps.-Philo, Biblical Antiquities," OTP 2, 317.

<sup>17</sup> Translation by M. McNamara, Targum Neofiti 1: Numbers, The Aramaic Bible 4 (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1995), 119–121.

torrents. And after it had become swelling torrents, it went on to go up with them to the tops of the mountains and to go down with them to the deep valleys. (20) And after it had gone up with them to the tops of the high mountains and had gone down with them to the deep valleys, it was hidden from them in the valley which is at the boundaries of the Moabites, the top of the height which looks out opposite Beth Jeshimon.

The text given is that of Neofiti, with which the Fragment Targums agree almost verbatim, and Pseudo-Jonathan differs but little. Onqelos Num 21:19 has the same paraphrase: “Now since it was given to them, it went down with them into the valleys, and from the valley it went up with them to the high country.” The paraphrase of Num 21:19 is also found in the Tosefta, t. Suk 3:11, “travelling with them up the mountains and going down with them to the valleys,” going on to cite Num 21:17–18 and 21:19–20.<sup>18</sup>

That this tradition was well known in Palestine in Jesus’ day seems highly probable. Paul (1 Cor 10:4) refers to it, possibly in a slightly variant form (a rock following). In the Tosefta text (t. Suk. 3:11) the tradition on the well following is found in conjunction with other biblical references to wells and water. This and other water marvels were apparently recalled during the ceremony of the carrying of water at the feast of Tabernacles.

2.1.2. The Cloud (of Glory) and the Manna

In first-century Palestine with this tradition on the well we may also presume that the other two gifts of the wanderings period, the manna and the cloud (of glory) were also known. Glory and manna (the bread of life) are themes that figure prominently in the Fourth Gospel.

2.1.3. The Law as the Tree of Life in the Palestinian Targum Gen 3:24

In the Qumran text with the Beatitudes (4Q525 [4QBeat]), considered below, the terms wisdom and the Law (Torah) are used more or less synonymously. This would have been the general belief of Judaism at the time, in particular in the Palestinian Targums. In their teaching on the Law (Torah) the Targums develop further what is already very much present in late Second Temple Judaism, as evidenced for instance in Sirach and Baruch 3:9–36. In their approach to the Law the Targums are heirs to the traditions of the school, the bet ha-midrash, which by the time of Jesus the son of Sirach (ca. 180 BCE) was meditatively reflecting on Israel’s entire tradition, the Law (of Moses), the prophets and the Other Writings. In singing her own praises, Wisdom personified, which came forth from the mouth of the Most High (Sir 24:3), tells us that the Creator of all things gave her a commandment, the one who created her assigned a place for her tent, and he said: “Make your dwelling in Jacob, and in Israel receive your inheritance” (Sir 24:8). Ben Sirach himself practically identifies wisdom with the law of Moses: “All this is the book of the covenant of the Most High God, the law which Moses commanded us as an inheritance for the congregation of Jacob” (24:25). The Torah, or “the law which Moses commanded,” is brimful with wisdom, it runs over with understanding, it pours forth instruction (παίδεῖα) (24:25–27). Sir 24:25–27 compares the Law, identified with wisdom, with the rivers of Paradise, spoken of in Gen 2:10–14, and goes on to say that the first man (in the Garden of Eden presumably) did not know wisdom fully. The biblical account says that there was a tree of life in the middle of the Garden of Eden (Gen 2:9), a tree which could be regarded as capable of making one wise (Gen 3:6). In Prov 3:18 Wisdom is described as a tree of life for all those who lay hold of her; long life is in her right hand (Prov 3:16). In Prov 8:30 wisdom says that at the beginning of God’s work she was beside him יום יום (“day day”), generally rendered “daily,” and as his delight. Now, according to a Jewish principle as found in 2 Pet 3:8 (see also Ps 90:4) one day in the Lord’s sight is as a thousand years. Thus arose the Jewish belief that the Law was there from the beginning, and in the Garden of Eden. According to Gen 2:15 the Lord God took the man (האָרם) and placed him in the garden of Eden “to till it and keep it.” This is paraphrased in the Palestinian Targum as follows: “The Lord God took Adam and had him dwell in the garden of Eden to toil in the Law and observe its commandments.” There is a neat summary of Jewish belief in the Law, the tree of life, given in a midrash inserted in the Neofiti Pal. Targum rendering of Gen 3:24. It reads (in Neofiti’s rendering; italics, for almost the entire text, denote targumic paraphrase).<sup>19</sup>

---

<sup>18</sup> Hebrew text in The Tosefta according to the Codex Vienna, ed. P. Lieberman, 2nd ed., Seder Mo’ed, (The Jewish Theological Seminary of America, The Maxwell Abell Publications Fund: Jerusalem, 1992), 268–269; English translation by J. Neusner, The Tosefta. Second Division: Moed (New York: Ktav, 1981), 220–221.

<sup>19</sup> Translation by M. McNamara, Targum Neofiti 1: Genesis, The Aramaic Bible 1A (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1992), 63–64.

Two thousand years before he created the world he had created the Law; he had prepared the garden of Eden for the just and Gehenna for the wicked. He had prepared the garden of Eden for the just that they might eat and delight themselves from the fruits of the tree because they had kept the precepts of the Law in this world and fulfilled the commandments. For the wicked he prepared Gehenna, which is comparable to a sharp sword devouring with both edges. He prepared within it darts of fire and burning coals for the wicked, to be avenged of them in the world to come because they did not observe the precepts of the Law in this world. For the Law is a tree of life for everyone who toils in it and keeps the commandments: he lives and endures like the tree of life in the world to come. The Law is good for all who labour in it in this world like the fruit of the tree of life.

2.1.4. Good Works; Rewards in the World to Come

According to Matthew's Gospel (Matt 5:16) Jesus tells his disciples to let their light shine before others so that they see their good works (καλὰ ἔργα) and give glory to their Father in heaven. The phrases "good works" or "bad works" are not found in the Hebrew Bible or in Greek Septuagint. The central Pauline epistles, naturally, make no mention of "good works," but the phrase occurs in 2 Thess 2:17 and deuterio-Pauline writings (1 Tim 2:10; 5:10, 25; 6:8; 2 Tim 2:21; 3:17; Tit 1:16; 2:7, 14; 3:8; 3:14; Heb 10:24; 13:21).

With good works goes "reward" (μισθός), something spoken of often by Jesus as his words are recorded in all three synoptics. Those who suffer for the sake of righteousness should rejoice: their reward is great in heaven (Matt 5:12//Luke 6:23). Those who love their enemies without expecting anything in return will have great reward (Luke 6:35; see Matt 5:46). Whoever gives a cup of water to drink to someone because they bear the name of Christ, will by no means lose the reward (Mark 9:41//Matt 10:42). Jesus stresses that reward, treasure, must be laid up in heaven (Matt 6:19–21//Luke 12:32–34. The reward is from the Father in heaven (Matt 5:4, 6, 15). It is possible that this reward in heaven may be lost, especially by those who practice their piety (do their good deeds) to be seen by others, and receive glory on earth. By so doing they forfeit reward before their Father in heaven and have already received their reward on earth (Matt 6:1, 2, 5, 16). This language can be regarded as fundamentally that of Jesus. As H. Priesker has noted: "Mt. 6:19–21 = Lk. 12:33f. speak in current Jewish imagery."<sup>20</sup>

---

<sup>20</sup> H. Priesker, "μισθός: The Concept of Reward in the New Testament," TDNT 4 (1967): 714–728, at 714.

In few places is this Jewish imagery of good works and merit (אגר טב) clearer than in the Palestinian Targums of the Pentateuch. In these there is frequent mention of good works. Whenever the Hebrew words שלם or תמים refer to persons they are translated in the Targums as “perfect in good works.” The relevance of good and evil deeds and the question of reward and punishment appear to have been a matter of debate in early Judaism. According to an inserted piece in the Aramaic translation of Gen 4:6–8, Cain and Abel argued as to whether the world was governed by God according to the fruits of good works.

The good reward is already there, stored up for the just in the world to come, or for the world to come. It is thus expressed in an oracle of Balaam, in a midrashic expansion of the biblical text: “Blessed are you (טוביכוון), just ones! What a good reward is prepared for you before the Lord for (or: “in”) the world to come” (Pal. Tg. Num 23:23).<sup>21</sup> All observance of the commandments has its reward, but some of the reward can be given by God in this life instead of being reserved for the world to come. In an expansion of the biblical text of Deut 7:10 the Pal. Tg. has Moses say of God:

(7:9). You shall know, then, that the Lord your God is God, the faithful God who keeps the covenant and steadfast love for a thousand generations for the just ones who love him and for those who keep the precepts of his law, (10) and who repays in this world the rewards of their good works to those who hate him, in order to take revenge on them in the world to come. And he does not delay the good reward for those who hate him: while they are still in this world, he repays them the reward of the small precepts that are in their hands.<sup>22</sup>

Abram expresses this great fear of being rewarded in this life, with no reward stored up for him in the world to come. This is clearly expressed in an expanded introduction to Gen 15 in the Palestinian Targum, which is as follows (given in Neofiti’s translation; italics denote targumic midrash):<sup>23</sup>

(15:1) After these things, after all the kingdoms of the earth had gathered together and had drawn up battle-lines against Abram and had fallen before him, and he had killed four kings from among them and had brought back nine encampments, Abram thought in his heart and said: “Woe, now, is me! Perhaps I have received the reward of the precepts<sup>24</sup> in this world and there is no portion for me in the world to come. Or perhaps the brothers or relatives of those killed, who fell before me, will go and will be in their fortresses and in their cities and many legions will become allied with them and they will come against me and kill me. Or perhaps there were a few meritorious deeds (מצוות קלילין)<sup>25</sup> in my hand the first time they fell before me and they stood in my favour, or perhaps no meritorious deed (מצוה) will be found in my hand the second time and the name of the heavens will be profaned in me.” For this reason there was a word of prophecy from before the Lord upon Abram the just saying: “Do not fear, Abram, for although many legions are allied and come against you to kill (you), my Memra will be a shield for you; and it will be a protection for you in this world and although I delivered up your enemies before you in this world, the reward of your goods work is prepared for you before me in the world to come.”

<sup>21</sup> Translation by M. McNamara, Targum Neofiti 1: Numbers, 134.

<sup>22</sup> Translation by M. McNamara, Targum Neofiti 1: Deuteronomy, The Aramaic Bible 5A (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1997), 54.

<sup>23</sup> Translation by M. McNamara, Targum Neofiti 1: Genesis, 93–94.

2.1.5. The Binding of Isaac (the ‘Aqedah)<sup>26</sup>

So much has been written on the ‘Aqedah that it can be touched on here only in passing. The evidence would seem to indicate that the tradition was known in the first century CE, if not earlier. It is introduced twice into the narrative of L.A.B. but never directly on a comment on Gen 22. We find it in L.A.B. 18 in an answer by God to a query of Balaam as to why Israel should be tempted. God replies recalling his promise to Abraham that his seed would be as the stars of heaven, and that he required of him his son as a burnt offering. “And because he (Isaac) did not resist, his offering was acceptable in my sight, and for his blood I have chosen them” (L.A.B. 18.5). The narrative of the sacrifice of Isaac is given in some detail in L.A.B. 32.1–4, in a hymn sung by Deborah, Barak and all the people. It tells of Isaac’s birth and of the angels’ envy of him, leading to God’s command to Abraham to sacrifice his son.

<sup>24</sup> Or: “reward for [keeping] the commandments.”

<sup>25</sup> Sokoloff, A Dictionary of Jewish Palestinian Aramaic of the Byzantine Period (Bar Ilan: University Press, 1990), 493 (under the headword קליל, קליל) renders the Aramaic words מצוות קלילין of this text of as “light commandments” and of the Frg. Tg. of the text as “easy commandments” (Dictionary, 325, under the headword מצווה).

<sup>26</sup> See M. McNamara, The New Testament and the Palestinian Targum to the Pentateuch, Analecta Biblica 27 (Rome: Biblical Institute Press, 1966), 164–168; R. Le Déaut, “La présentation targumique du sacrifice d’Isaac et la sotériologie paulinienne,” in Studiorum paulinorum congressus internationalis catholicus 1961, Analecta Biblica 17–18.2 (Rome: Biblical Institute Press, 1963), 563–574; G. Vermes, “Redemption and Genesis XXII—The Binding of Isaac and the Sacrifice of Jesus,” in Scripture and Tradition in Judaism: Haggadic Studies, Studia post-Biblica 4 (Leiden: Brill, 1961 [2nd rev. ed. 1973]), 193–227.

Isaac replies at length on his sacrifice, ending: “And what if I had not been born in the world to be offered as a sacrifice to him that made me? And it shall be my blessedness beyond all men, for there shall be nothing like this; and in me shall the generations be instructed, and by me the peoples shall understand that the Lord has accounted the soul of a man worthy to be a sacrifice to him” (L.A.B. 32.3). In his reply to Abraham God says: “And your memorial shall be before me for ever, and your name and the name of this your son from one generation to another” (L.A.B. 32.4).

I may here introduce the rather well-known Palestinian Targum form of the midrash on the ‘Aqedah (giving the text of Targum Neofiti). The Targum paraphrase stresses that on the journey to Mount Moriah Abraham and Isaac went together “with a perfect heart” (Tg. Neof. Gen 22:6). Gen 22:10 is thus rendered in Neofiti (italics denote additional material to the HT):<sup>27</sup>

And Abraham stretched out his hand and took the knife to slaughter his son Isaac. Isaac answered and said to his father Abraham: “Father, tie me well lest I kick you and your offering be rendered unfit,<sup>28</sup> and we be thrust down into the pit of destruction in the world to come.”

Abraham’s prayer in Gen 22:14 is thus paraphrased:<sup>29</sup>

And Abraham worshipped and prayed in the name of the Memra of the Lord and said: “I beseech by the mercy that is before you O Lord—everything is manifest and known to you—that there was no division in my heart the first time you said to me to offer my son Isaac, to make him dust and ashes before you; but I immediately arose early in the morning and diligently put your word into practice with gladness and fulfilled your decree. And now when his sons are in the hour of distress (בשעת עקתא) you shall remember the Binding of their Father Isaac, and listen to the voice of their supplication, and answer them and deliver them from all distress (עקא), so that the generations to arise after him may say: ‘On this mountain of the sanctuary of the Lord Abraham sacrificed his son Isaac, and on this mountain the glory of the Shekinah of the Lord was revealed to him’”.

<sup>27</sup> Translation by M. McNamara, Targum Neofiti 1: Genesis, 117–118.

<sup>28</sup> Neofiti margin has: “[lest] in the hour of my distress [בשעת צערי] I move convulsively and I create confusion and our sacrifice been found blemished...”

<sup>29</sup> Translation by M. McNamara, Targum Neofiti 1: Genesis, 118–119.

2.1.6. The Hour of Distress<sup>30</sup>

It is agreed that “the hour” is a central theme in the Fourth Gospel. It is the “hour” for Jesus to part from this world to his Father (John 13:1), the “hour” for him to be glorified and for the Father to be glorified in him (John 12:23, 17:1). His “hour” was that of his passion and death, an hour of distress, although this word is not used in the Fourth Gospel. Jesus’ soul is troubled, and he asks whether he should request the Father to save him from this hour, answering his own question: “No, for this purpose I have come to this hour” (John 12:27).

In the context of this Johannine theme I believe the similar theme of “the hour of distress” in Codex Neofiti and its margins merits consideration. The phrase occurs seven times in Tg Neofiti outside of translation texts, “distress” being expressed by one of three synonyms צער, עקא, עקא—the latter a Greek loanword: ἀνάγκη—(Gen 22:10, margin; 22:14, text and margin; 35:3; 38:25; Lev 22:27; Deut 20:19; 32:15). The fundamental texts are in the midrash of the bindings of Isaac (cited above). This was Isaac’s “hour of distress,” and was intended to serve as a reminder to God to come to the aid of Isaac’s children in their hour of distress. Jacob expresses his intention to build an altar to the Lord at Bethel who answered him the hour of his affliction (בשעת עקת) (Gen 35:3). In a lengthy midrashic development on Lev 22:27 (with mention of a bull or sheep or goat as an offering), the mention of the “sheep” is linked with the lamb Isaac; his Aqedah is recalled, and Isaac’s children are seen as praying in “the hour of their affliction” (בשעת אננקי) saying: “Answer us in this hour . . . and remember in our favour the Aqedah of Isaac our father.”<sup>31</sup> The phrase “hour of his/its trouble” (בשעת עקתה) is used in Neof Deut 20:19 in relation to trees under siege, and in Deut 32:15 in an additional paraphrase: “they denied the fear of the Strong One who had redeemed them in the hour of their trouble” (בשעת עקתהון).

There is another important occurrence of the theme in a text in no way connected with the Aqedah. It occurs in a lengthy midrashic development in Tg. Neofiti Gen 38:25 on Tamar’s discourse as she was being brought out to be burned. The relevant section for our purpose reads:<sup>32</sup>

<sup>30</sup> See M. McNamara, Targum and Testament. Aramaic Paraphrases of the Hebrew Bible. A Light on the New Testament (Shannon, Ireland: Irish University Press; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1972), 143–144; C. E. Morrison, “The ‘Hour of Distress’ in Targum Neofiti and the ‘Hour’ in the Gospel of John” (a paper read at the Fourth Congress of the International Organization of Targumic Studies, Leiden, 2004 [Forthcoming]). I am grateful to Dr Morrison for providing me with a pre-publication copy of his paper.

<sup>31</sup> Note that this midrash seems to suppose the destruction of the Temple.

She (Tamar) lifted up her eyes on high and said: "I beseech by the mercies from before you, O Lord, You are he who answers the afflicted in the hour of their affliction (דִּי עֲנִי לְעִיקֵי בִשְׁעַת עֲקָתָהוֹן) answer me in this hour, which is the hour of my affliction (שְׁעַת אֲנִיָּקִי)..."

2.1.7. Eternal Shame<sup>33</sup>

The beautiful midrash of Tg. Neofiti Gen 38:25, in part just cited, continues with a reply by Judah in which he confesses his responsibility for Tamar's pregnancy. I reproduce it here because of its similarity to some concepts and phrases in the words of Jesus (see Mark 9:43; Matt 25:41; Mark 8:38; Luke 9:26; Mark 4:24; Matt 7:2; Luke 6:38). In his reply Judah confesses:

It is better for me to burn in this world, with extinguishable fire, that I may not be burned in the world to come whose fire is inextinguishable. It is better for me to be ashamed in this world that is a passing world, that I may not be ashamed before my just fathers in the world to come. And listen to me my brothers and house of my father: In the measure in which a man measures it shall be measured to him, whether it be a good measure or a bad measure.

2.1.8. Resurrection<sup>34</sup>

The New Testament and Josephus provide ample information concerning belief in bodily resurrection among the Jews during the first century of the common era. The Sadducees denied it outright. The Pharisees believed in it firmly (Josephus, War 2.163; Ant. 18.14; Acts 4:1–2; 23:6–10). In reply to a question of the Sadducees Jesus strongly espouses the doctrine of the Pharisees on the matter (Mark 12:18–27; Matt 23:23–33; Luke 20:27–28). The Essene position appears to have been belief in an afterlife, without mention of resurrection. In Jesus' day

<sup>32</sup> Translation by M. McNamara, Targum Neofiti 1: Genesis. On the midrash see E. M. Menn, Judah and Tamar (Genesis 38) in Ancient Jewish Exegesis: Studies in Literary Form and Hermeneutics, JSJSup 51 (Leiden: Brill, 1997), 236.

<sup>33</sup> See M. McNamara, Targum and Testament, 135–136; The New Testament and the Palestinian Targum to the Pentateuch, 138–142.

<sup>34</sup> See M. McNamara, Palestinian Judaism, 180–185. M. McNamara, Intertestamental Literature, Old Testament Message 23 (Wilmington, DE: Michael Glazier, 1983), 233–237.

Jewish belief in an afterlife with rewards and punishments is indicated by texts such as Luke 16:19–31 (Lazarus in Abraham’s bosom; the rich man in Gehenna) and Luke 23:43 (the repentant thief with Jesus in Paradise), while explicit belief in the future resurrection is expressed by Martha (John 11:23). Belief in the resurrection is also expressed in the Life of Adam and Eve (28.4), a work probably written in Palestine in the first century CE. When he is driven out of Paradise and refused access to the Tree of Life, the Lord tells Adam that when he comes out of Paradise, if he guards himself from all evil, preferring death to it, at the time of the resurrection the Lord will raise him up again, and then there will be given to him from the tree of life, and he will be immortal forever. Somewhat similarly in the Palestinian Targum paraphrase of Gen 3:19: “...to dust you shall return. But from the dust you are to arise again to give an account and a reckoning of all that you have done.” In the Lives of the Prophets (probably representing first-century CE Palestinian tradition) the doctrine of the resurrection is assumed without argument or polemic (2.15; see also 3.12).

Given belief in the resurrection of the body it was natural that Pharisee scribes and rabbis of the first century should seek a foundation for the doctrine in their scriptures. We have no evidence that they invoked Exod 3:6, the text referred to by Jesus. The texts called on for this belief by rabbis of the third and fourth centuries are Deut 3:6 (“Let Reuben live...”), Exod 15:1, Ps 84:4 and Gen 3:19.<sup>35</sup>

The prevailing belief in Palestine in Jesus’ day was probably in bodily resurrection at the end of time. The Essenes believed in immortality without bodily resurrection, and the commonly accepted view is that this was also the position with the Qumran community, although some on the strength of the text 4QMessianic Apocalypse (4Q521), fragment 2, col. II, 11–13 (a text considered in greater length below) think that they believed in a resurrection. Amongst great news things that God will perform in the future age of the Messiah, “the Lord will perform marvellous acts such as have not existed, just as he sa[id]: For he will heal the badly wounded and will make the dead live (מתים יחיה), he will proclaim good to the meek, give lavishly [to the need]y, lead the exiled and enrich the hungry.”<sup>36</sup>

<sup>35</sup> See M. McNamara, Palestinian Judaism, 181–182.

<sup>36</sup> See J. Tabor and Wise, “4Q521 ‘On Resurrection’ and the Synoptic Gospel Tradition,” in Qumran Questions, ed. J. Charlesworth (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic

We have a good example of belief in immortality rather than in resurrection in the apocryphal work 4 Maccabees. This is a philosophical work, generally thought to have been composed in the first century CE. Its original language was Greek. It was composed in the Diaspora, more probably in Antioch of Syria rather than in Egypt. And yet it is closely linked with Palestinian tradition and seeks foundation in the Bible for its belief in eternal life for the just. At the end of the work the mother of the martyrs reminds her sons of the death of their father and of the teaching he gave them, particularly on those who bore witness to their faith in the Bible narrative. "While he was still with you he taught you the law and the prophets" (18:10). She goes on to give examples from the Law, the Prophets and the writings and concludes (18:16–19): "He recounted to you Solomon's proverb: 'There is a tree of life for those who do his will' (see Prov 3:18). He confirmed the saying of Ezekiel, 'Shall these dry bones live' (Ezek 37:2–3). For he did not forget to teach you the song that Moses taught, which says, 'I will kill and I will make alive: this is your life and the length of your days' (Deut 32:39)." We can presume that the pious father also interpreted these as containing the doctrine of immortality. They could as easily have been taken as referring to bodily resurrection.

Jesus' reasoning on the inner meaning of Exod 3:6 may have a parallel in 4 Maccabees. Jesus says that God in this passage proclaims himself as the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, commenting that he is the God not of the dead but of the living (Mark 12:26; Matt 22:22), to which Luke adds "For all live to him" (Luke 20:38). In 4 Maccabees 7:19 the author remarks that the martyrs "believe that they, like our patriarchs Abraham and Isaac and Jacob, do not die to God but live in God." Likewise in 16:25: "They knew that those who die for God live in God, as do Abraham and Isaac and Jacob and all the patriarchs." They further console themselves with the belief that if they die for the commandments they will be welcomed by Abraham, Isaac and Jacob (13:14–15, 17–18).

---

Press, 1995), 161–163; E. Puech, "Une apocalypse messianique (4Q521)," RevQ 15.60 (1992): 475–522; E. Puech, La croyance des Esséniens en la vie future: immortalité, resurrection, vie éternelle?, Histoire d'une croyance dans le judaïsme ancien, vols I, II, Études Biblique Nouvelle Série 21–22 (Paris: Gabalda, 1993), 627–692.

2.1.9. Consolation and Resurrection to Come on the Third Day.<sup>37</sup>

A stream of Jewish belief and piety different from that of the Essenes and Qumran is preserved in the tradition handed down by rabbinic Judaism. Absence of early written documentation makes it somewhat uncertain what form this took in the early or later part of the first century of our era. One central belief in this tradition, and one absent from Qumran, was belief in the resurrection of the body. An early form of his belief is attested in the book of Daniel (Dan 12:1–3), from about 165 BCE. In this Jewish tradition, as represented by the Aramaic renderings (targumim), Israel looked forward to the tranquility of Eden (שְׁלוֹוֹתָה דְעֵדֶן), the determined time of the blessing and consolation (בְּרִכְתָּא וְנִחְמָתָא) (Pal. Tg. Gen 49:1),<sup>38</sup> the resurrection of the dead.

The resurrection of the dead could be regarded as synonymous with the future messianic age. In the targum of Hosea 6:2 this belief has replaced the biblical text itself.<sup>39</sup> The biblical text represents Israel as turning to the Lord in repentance. The Lord has stricken them, but will also bind up their wounds. “After two days he will revive us, and on the third day he will raise us up, and we shall live before him” (Hos 6:2). Here “after two days” and “on the third day” are intended to express a short space of time. The targumist paraphrases of the future messianic age of consolation and of the resurrection, rendering thus: “He will give us life in the days of consolations (אמתה, אמתה), that will come; and on the day of the resurrection of the dead he will raise us up and we shall live before him.”<sup>40</sup> The targumist paraphrases “after two days” as “in the days of consolations that will come,” and “on the third day” as “on the day of the resurrection of the dead.” This eschatological or messianic interpretation of this verse seems to have been current in rabbinic circles.<sup>41</sup> The understanding of “on the third day” of the resurrection and salvation must have been helped by the occurrence of the terms “showers” and “spring rain” in the following verse, terms which recall “dew,” understood in rabbinic tradition as indication the resurrection (see Isa 26:19), and also by rabbinic reflection on the various occurrences of “third day” in the Bible, all of which are seen to have been salvific,<sup>42</sup> e.g., Gen 22:4; 42:17; Exod 19:6; Josh 2:16; Hos 6:2; Jonah 2:1; Esther 9:2.

<sup>37</sup> See McNamara, Palestinian Judaism, 182–185; A. Rodríguez Carmona, Targum y Resurreccion, 148–153; “Resurrection on the Third Day,” in Hosea, H. W. Wolff (ET Philadelphia, 1977): 117–118; L. Smolar and M. Aberbach, Studies in Targum Jonathan to the Prophets and Targum Jonathan to the prophets by Pinkhos Churgin (New York and Baltimore: KTAV Publishing House and The Baltimore Hebrew College, 1983; original edition 1927), 181–183; P. Churgin, Targum Jonathan to the Prophets (Yale University Press, 1927), 107 (reprinted with Smolar and Aberbach, 1977, 335).

<sup>38</sup> Unpointed, the words בְּרִכְתָּא and נִחְמָתָא can be either singular or plural; here I take them as singulars; Kaufmann and Sokoloff take them as plural forms: S. A. Kaufman and M. Sokoloff, A Key-in-Context Concordance to Targum Neofiti (Baltimore and London: The John Hopkins University Press, 1993), 262, no. 044; 978, no. 007. See also Pal. Tg. (Tg. Nf.) Num 23:23: “At this time (variant Tg. Neof. marg. “At that time”) there shall be announced (lit. “said”) to the house of Israel the good things and the consolations (בְּרִכְתָּא וְנִחְמָתָא) that are to come upon you and (upon) those of the house of Israel.” This is followed by a prophetic macarism by Balaam: “Blessed are you, just ones! (טוֹבִיכוֹן צְדִיקִיה) What a good reward is prepared for you before the Lord for the world to come.” For the “good things” (τὰ ἀγαθὰ) in the messianic age see Matt 7:11; Rom 10:15 (= Isa 52:7); Heb 9:11; 10:1.

<sup>39</sup> See McNamara, Palestinian Judaism, 182–185; also, esp. on (Targum) Hosea 6:2, Kevin J. Cathcart and Robert P. Gordon, The Targum of the Minor Prophets. Translated, with a critical introduction, apparatus and notes, The Aramaic Bible 14 (Wilmington, DE: Michael Glazier, 1989), 41 (notes on Tg. Hos. 6:2), 7 (introduction); R. Gordon, “The Targumists as Eschatologists,” SVT 29 (1978): 113–130, at 115–121.

With regard to the concept and term “consolations” we may also note Luke’s Infancy Narrative. Symeon was awaiting the consolation of Israel (προσδεχόμενος παράκλησιν τοῦ Ἰσραήλ) (Luke 2:25); Anna spoke of the child Jesus to all who awaited the redemption of Jerusalem (πᾶσιν τοῖς προσδεχομένοις λύρωσιν Ἰερουσαλήμ) (Luke 2:38).

With the crucifixion, the death and resurrection and ascension of Jesus, and with the coming of the Holy Spirit, the early Christian community felt a need to explain all this in connection with the Scriptures, the Hebrew and Greek texts of which were available to them. In Luke 24:27, in the narrative of the two disciples on the way to Emmaus, we are told that Jesus, beginning with Moses and all the prophets, interpreted to them the things about himself in all the scriptures. Next the risen Christ appeared to the eleven apostles and their companions, recalling the words he had spoken to them while he was still with them—that everything about him in the law of Moses, the prophets, and the psalms must be fulfilled. Then he opened their minds to understand the scriptures, and he said to them: “Thus it is written, that the Messiah (Christ) is to suffer and to rise from the dead on the third day...” (Luke 24:44–47). This text linking the suffering of Christ and his resurrection from the dead on the third day with scripture probably represents a very early Jerusalem tradition.<sup>43</sup> We find it again in Paul as part of traditional creed on the resurrection in 1 Cor 15:3–4: “For I handed on to you as of first importance (NRSV; ἐν πρώτοις, NBJ “in the first place”) what I in turn had received: that Christ died for our sins in accordance with the scriptures, and that he was buried, and that he was raised on the third day in accordance with the scriptures...” Paul presumably had received this formulation of the tradition from Antioch, which in turn would have received it from Jerusalem, possibly even at his first visit to Peter ca. 39 CE (Gal 1:18). The scriptures regarded as prophesying the passion and death of Christ can be presumed to have been principally the passage on the Suffering Servant in Isa 53. It is more difficult to find a scripture text about the resurrection on the third day. The text in question, as noted, is probably Hosea 6:2, but as interpreted midrashically in the Targum, in keeping with rabbinic Judaism.<sup>44</sup>

<sup>40</sup> In the translation by Cathcart and Gordon, The Targum of the Minor Prophets, 41.

<sup>41</sup> See San. 97a; Rosh Hashana 31a; Churgin, 335 (original edition, 107; see note 37 above).

<sup>42</sup> See Rodriguez Carmona, Targum y Resurrección, 148–153.

2.1.10. Legends on the Prophets

We may consider legends about the prophets in the general context of an interpreted Bible, or expansions of the Old Testament. We consider two in particular: the so-called Ascension of Isaiah and the Lives of the Prophets.

The writing known as the Ascension of Isaiah is a composite work, which falls into two parts: chapters 1–5 and chapters 6–11.<sup>45</sup> The first part is now known as the Martyrdom of Isaiah, the second as the Vision of Isaiah. The Martyrdom is itself composite, 3:13–4:2 being an independent unit. The vision is a Christian work. The Martyrdom is at the

---

<sup>43</sup> On “on the third day” (in Luke) see S. V. McCasland, “The Scripture Basis of ‘On the Third Day,’” JBL 48 (1929): 124–137; J. Kloppenborg, “Analysis of the pre-Pauline Formula 1 Cor 15:3b-5 in Light of some Recent Literature,” CBQ 40 (1978): 350–367, at 363–364 (“on the third day” in Luke 9:22 [and Matt 16:21] as a reference to Hos 6:20); see also M. L. Barré, “New Light on the Interpretation of Hos 6:2,” VT 28 (1978): 129–141, esp. 138–140; Dupont, Études sur les Actes des Apôtres, Lectio Divina 45 (Paris: Cerf, 1967), 256.

<sup>44</sup> See M. McNamara, Palestinian Judaism, 183–185.

<sup>45</sup> See M. A. Knibb, “Martyrdom and Ascension of Isaiah,” OTP 2, 143–155; C. A. Evans, “Scripture-based Stories in the Pseudepigrapha,” in Justification and Variegated Nomism, 1:57–72, at 57–61; G. W. E. Nickelsburg, “Stories of Biblical and Early Post-Biblical Times,” in Jewish Writings of the Second Temple Period: Apocrypha, Pseudepigrapha, Qumran Sectarian Writings, Philo, Josephus, ed. M. Stone, CRINT 2.2 (Assen: van Gorcum; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984), 52–56 (“The Martyrdom of Isaiah”).

latest from the first century CE, but is more probably earlier, from the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, 167–164 BCE. Its original language was probably Hebrew. According to the Martyrdom (3.11–12; 5.1–16), Isaiah was sawn in two by a wood saw (a saw for cutting wood) during the reign of Manasseh. This tradition is probably referred to in Heb 11:37, and can be presumed to have been current in Palestine in Jesus' day.

The contents of the Lives of the Prophets are summed up in the title of the work in a major Greek manuscript and in some of the many vernacular translations: "The names of the prophets, and where they are from, and where they died and how, and where they lie."<sup>46</sup> In some cases the information passes beyond the biblical evidence and gives legendary information. This small work gives "lives" of the four Major Prophets (including Daniel), the Twelve Minor, and then Nathan, Abijah, Joad, Azariah, Elijah, Elisha and Zechariah son of Jehoiada. According to the Lives 1.1, Isaiah died under Manasseh, by being sawn in two. Lives 1.8 says that he was buried with great honour, which may suggest the erection of a monument, though not necessarily in the author's own time.

Although some scholars have argued for a Semitic original (Hebrew or Aramaic), the work seems to have been written in Greek, although containing Palestinian traditions. While transmitted in Christian manuscripts and versions, it contains little of Christian content and appears to be of Jewish origin, and probably from the first century CE, before the fall of Jerusalem. Herod the Great erected an expensive memorial of white marble at the entrance to David's tomb (Josephus, Ant. 16.182), and this may have led to a movement to build monuments to the prophets as national heroes. The saying of Jesus in Luke 11:47 (see also Matt 23:29): "Alas for you who build the tombs of the prophets, the men your ancestors killed," implies that the memorials had been only recently constructed.

The Lives of the Prophets 23 has the following on the death of Zechariah son of Jehoiada.<sup>47</sup>

<sup>46</sup> On the Lives of the Prophets see D. R. A. Hare, "The Lives of the Prophets," OTP 2, 379–384, with English translation, 385–390; C. A. Evans, "Scripture-based Stories in the Pseudepigrapha," in Justification and Variegated Nomism, 1:69–72 (with an indication of principal texts and translations, and studies on the text, 69–70, n. 28).

<sup>47</sup> In the translation by D. R. A. Hare, OTP 2, 398.

Zechariah was from Jerusalem, son of Jehoiada the priest, and Joash the king of Judah killed him near the altar, and the house of David poured out his blood in front of the Ailam; and the priests took him and buried him with his father.

This goes beyond the biblical account of 2 Chr 24:20–21 which simply says that because of his preaching, the people (of Judah) conspired against him and by the command of king Joash they stoned him with stones in the court of the house of the Lord. The Lives' statement that Zechariah was killed near the altar agrees with Jesus' words that Zechariah died (Matthew: "was murdered") "between the sanctuary and the altar" (Matt 23:35; Luke 11:51). Luke does not mention the name of Zechariah's father; Matthew says it was Berachiah (not Jehoiada). No satisfactory explanation of Matthew's text has been given.<sup>48</sup>

2.1.11. The Life of Adam and Eve

This work has been preserved in Greek (under the title Apocalypsis Moysis), Latin (with the title Vita Adae et Evae, L.A.E.) and other languages. The Latin text is longer than the Greek (beginning with an account of the repentance of Adam and Eve absent from the Greek), but probably represents the original form better.<sup>49</sup> The narrative, passing beyond the biblical text, goes from the repentance of the first parents to their death and burial. It is of the Jewish midrashic kind, with a theology of the Palestinian and rabbinic type, without any sectarian tendencies. Satan is a pre-existent fallen angel. He narrates his expulsion from heaven (L.A.E. 12–17). He seeks to destroy men's souls (L.A.E. 17.1) by disguising himself as an angel of light (L.A.E. 9.1, 3; 12.1; Apoc. Mos. 19.3). The work has little that is specifically Christian and would fit Palestine of the first century CE. The original language of the work is uncertain: probably Greek, although some scholars prefer Hebrew. It was probably composed in Palestine. Its date of composition cannot be fixed exactly. It may be the first century CE, possibly a little earlier, or somewhat later—100 BCE–200 CE according to some.

<sup>48</sup> See M. McNamara, The New Testament and the Palestinian Targum to the Pentateuch, 160–163.

<sup>49</sup> See J.-C. Pettoirelli, "Essai sur la structure primitive de la Vie d'Adam et Ève," Apocrypha 14 (2003): 237–256.

2.2. Wisdom Tradition

2.2.1. Introduction. The Wisdom Tradition

The origins, or at least one of the sources, of the wisdom tradition in Israel may have been in the family, and possibly continued to survive there, for some time at least. One of the collections in the Book of Proverbs is the teaching of King Lemuel's mother (Prov 31:1–9). Wisdom, after all, is always presented as female, a woman, the teacher Hochmah, Sophia. However, in good part the biblical wisdom collection of works represents the school. It is the product of a learned class, transmitted from a teacher to students within this learned tradition. Qoheleth was a teacher, who taught people knowledge, weighing and studying and arranging many proverbs (Eccl 12:9–10). Ben Sirach (ca. 180 BCE) is quite clear that the wisdom study to which he had dedicated his life is for the learned and those fairly well off (Sir 39:1–11; 51:13–22). He invites students to his schoolhouse (in Jerusalem), to devote themselves to the pursuit of wisdom as he had done (51:23–28). The Wisdom of Solomon was written wholly in Greek, and about 30 BCE. Although most probably written in Alexandria, and au fait with Greek philosophical culture, it is an extension of the biblical wisdom teaching and seems quite conversant with later Palestinian Jewish tradition.

How much of the Wisdom tradition was transmitted, was active and widely available in Palestine in the first century of our era is not altogether clear. That there was a special interest in Ben Sirach (at least in learned circles) is clear from the fragmentary manuscripts of the work from the Dead Sea Scrolls and a long text from Masada (with Sir 39:27–44:17) dating from the early first century BCE. Tobit can also be classed as a wisdom composition. Fragments of this work both in Aramaic and Hebrew (dating from ca. 100 BCE to 50 CE) have been found in Qumran.

The wisdom tradition continued to be cultivated in the Qumran community.<sup>50</sup> Among the Dead Sea Scrolls there are a number of texts which have been classified as 'Wisdom Poems'.<sup>51</sup> All are from Cave 4.

---

<sup>50</sup> See F. García Martínez, ed., Wisdom and Apocalypticism in the Dead Sea Scrolls and in the Biblical Tradition, Bibliotheca Ephemeridum Theologicarum Lovaniensium 168 (Leuven: Leuven University Press/Peeters, 2003); D. Harrington, Wisdom Texts from Qumran (London: Routledge, 1992), 88–92 on the bearing of the Qumran texts on "Jesus and Wisdom."

<sup>51</sup> In English translation in F. Garcia Martinez, The Dead Sea Scrolls Translated, 379–398.

One (4Q184) is entitled '4Q Wiles of the Wicked Woman', an allegorical poem on Need, personified as a woman, inspired by Proverbs 7, and with magical connotations. Some of the other texts will be considered immediately below.

Most of these Wisdom texts from Qumran belong to the genre of aphorisms, sayings or instructions, so much part of the biblical and later Jewish tradition. What is missing are texts on personified wisdom found in Prov 8:22–31; Sir 1:4, 9; 24:1–22; Baruch 3:9–4:1; Wis 7:22–30. The Qumran texts do not appear to be sectarian, and might well have circulated outside of the Essene community, or could be dependent on a more widespread Wisdom tradition. The text of Ben Sirach may have been widely known throughout Palestine.

When we come to evaluate the bearing of this evidence on the question of the historical Jesus we must keep in mind the complexity of the gospel evidence, namely the question of Jesus himself during his ministry and the Jesus tradition as handed on, and reformulated in an ongoing developing Christology, in the Q document and elsewhere.

2.2.2. The Wisdom Tradition and Jesus

The logia, sayings, aphorisms of the Q document might well go back to Jesus himself, not necessarily in the formulation in which we now have them. In one sense Jesus could be described as a wisdom teacher, although of course he was much more.

There is the further question of the relationship of Jesus to personified wisdom according to Q, as presented in Luke and Matthew. For this we must consider three texts presented in Matthew 11 and their parallels in Luke. The first is the ending to Jesus' comparison between himself and John the Baptist in Matt 11:19// Luke 7:35, ending "... the Son of Man came to you eating and drinking, and they say: 'Look, a glutton and a drunkard, a friend of tax collectors and sinners'". Luke's continuation is: "Nevertheless wisdom is vindicated by all her children." Matthew has: "Yet wisdom is vindicated by her deeds." It is generally accepted that Luke is more faithful to Q. The meaning there would be that Jesus (with John and possibly others) is an envoy of divine wisdom. Matthew seems to have identified Jesus with wisdom, which would be in keeping with his introduction to the section: "When John heard of the deeds (τὰ ἔργα) of Christ..." (Matt 11:2). Matthew's identification of Jesus with wisdom seems clear in his ending to this section (11:28–30), absent from Luke, where Jesus speaks in language heavily dependent on Sir 51:23–27: "Come to me, all you who are weary and carrying heavy burdens, and I will give you rest (ἀναπαύσω ὑμᾶς).

Take my yoke upon you, and learn from me; for I am gentle and humble in heart, and you will find rest for your souls. For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light." At the end of his work the teacher Sirach (51:27) calls on would-be students: "Draw near to me, you who are uneducated... Acquire wisdom... Put your neck under her yoke, and let your souls receive instruction; it is to be found close by. See with your own eyes that I have laboured but little, and have found for myself much serenity (ἀνάπαυσιν)..." (NRSV). It is also possible that there is an identification of Jesus with wisdom in Q as found in Matt 11:25–27//Luke 10:21–22. There is a further text towards the end of Jesus' condemnation of the Scribes and Pharisees (Luke, Pharisees and Lawyers) in Matthew and Luke. In Luke (Luke 11:49): "Therefore also the Wisdom of God said: 'I will send them prophets and apostles, some of them they will kill and persecute.'" Matthew's text has (Matt 23:34) Jesus, not Wisdom, as the speaker: "Therefore I send you prophets, sages and scribes, some of whom you will kill and crucify, and some you will flog in your synagogues..." What wisdom text is being referred to in the Lukan passage (whether an apocryphal work, general biblical texts, or others), is not certain. It appears that Matthew's change is due to his understanding of Jesus as Wisdom personified.<sup>52</sup>

With regard to these texts the question arises whether we are dealing with words of the Jesus of history or Christological formulations of the early Church. New Testament theologians such as James D. G. Dunn believe that the latter is the case, and would situate them with the post-Pauline writings of the New Testament.<sup>53</sup> In any event, the gospel texts indicate the continuance of the wisdom tradition in New Testament Palestine, and its use there in the formulation of early Christology.

---

<sup>52</sup> For the question of wisdom in Matthew, see J. Kampen, "Aspects of Wisdom in the Gospel of Matthew in Light of the New Qumran Evidence," in Sapiential, Liturgical and Poetical Texts from Qumran. Proceedings of the Third Meeting of the International Organization for Qumran Studies, Oslo, 1998, ed. D. K. Falk, F. García Martínez and E. M. Schuller, (Oslo: International Organization for Qumran Studies, 1999; Leiden: Brill, 2000), 227–239; also M. D. Johnson, "Reflections on a Wisdom Approach to Matthew's Christology," CBQ 36 (1974): 44–64; R. Pregeant, "The Wisdom Passages in Matthew's Story," SBLSP (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1990): 469–493; D. C. Allison, Jr., "Two Notes on a Key Text: Matthew 11:25–39," JTS 39 (1988): 477–485; C. Deutsch, Lady Wisdom, Jesus and the Sages: Metaphor and Social Context in Matthew's Gospel (Valley Forge: Trinity Press International, 1996); C. Deutsch, "Wisdom in Matthew: Transformation of a Symbol," NovT 32 (1990): 13–47.

<sup>53</sup> J. D. G. Dunn, Christology in the Making. A New Testament Inquiry into the Origins of the Doctrine of the Incarnation (London: SCM, 1980), 196–206.

2.2.3. Qumran Wisdom Text with Beatitudes (4Q525 [4QBeat])<sup>54</sup>

4Q525 is a wisdom text in Hebrew preserved in twenty-three fragments. It is in Herodian script (late first century BCE). Fragment 2 contains a list of five beatitudes, introduced in biblical style with the word אֲשֶׁרִי. As J. A. Fitzmyer has noted, such a collection of beatitudes in a pre-Christian Palestinian Jewish writing provides an interesting example of a literary form that until now was attested only in the Greek New Testament, or in literature dependent on the gospels of Matthew 5 and Luke 6. It provides a background for the collection of beatitudes in these two gospels. The similarity between the Qumran and New Testament texts is at the level of literary form. With regard to content, the Qumran text is about wisdom and the Jewish Law, and the New Testament is eschatological in character, about the Kingdom.<sup>55</sup> With regard to the question of the historical Jesus, the question remains whether the original list of the New Testament beatitudes comes from Jesus himself or from the early Christian community, and whether the immediate Semitic source of the Greek Q text was in Hebrew or Aramaic.

The Qumran text reads:<sup>56</sup>

Frag. 2 col. II, 1 [Blessed is the one who speaks the truth] with a pure heart, and does not slander with his tongue.

Blessed are those who adhere to his laws, 2 and do not adhere to perverted paths.

Blessed are those who rejoice in her, and do not explore insane paths.

3 Blessed are those who search for her with pure hands, and do not importune her with a treacherous heart.

Blessed is the man who attains Wisdom,

4 and walks in the law of the Most High, and dedicates his heart to her ways, and is constrained by her discipline and always takes pleasure in her punishments; . . .

<sup>54</sup> See E. Puech, "4Q525 et les péripécopes des béatitudes en Ben Sira et Matthieu," RB 98 (1991): 75–96; J. A. Fitzmyer, "A Palestinian Jewish Collection of Beatitudes," in The Dead Sea Scrolls and Christian Origins (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2000), 111–129. The translation here given is that by F. García Martínez, The Dead Sea Scrolls Translated, 395.

<sup>55</sup> For a comparison of the Beatitudes in the Qumran text with those of Matthew see G. J. Brooke, "The Wisdom of Matthew's Beatitudes (4QBeat and Mt 5:3–12)," ScrBul 18 (1989): 33–41.

<sup>56</sup> In the translation by F. García Martínez, The Dead Scrolls Translated, 395.

2.3. Apocalyptic Texts and Eschatological-Type Documents

2.3.1. Introduction

The two canonical apocalyptic writings are the Book of Daniel and the New Testament Apocalypse of John (Revelation). There is also the 'Little Apocalypse' of Mark 13. This particular genre is older than Daniel and had a continuous history in Judaism until about 100 CE.

2.3.2. The Enochic Corpus

Jewish apocalyptic has its richest manifestation in the various compositions connected with Enoch, put together in the Book of Enoch (1 Enoch). Thus we have 1 Enoch 1–36, The Book of the Watchers or Enoch's Heavenly Journeys from the third century BCE, if not earlier; 1 Enoch 72–82, The Astronomical Book of Enoch, from before 200 BCE. Then we have the apocalyptic section of the Book of Daniel (Dan 7–12) from about 164 BCE, and contemporary with it Enoch's Book of Dream Visions (1 Enoch 83–90) from about 165 BCE, followed somewhat later by another Enochic composition, The Admonitions of Enoch (1 Enoch 91–107; 100–75 BCE).

2.3.3. The Similitudes of Enoch

(1 Enoch 37–71) deal with the coming judgment of the righteous and wicked, the Messiah, the Son of Man ("that Son of Man"), Paradise, the resurrection of the righteous.<sup>57</sup> The "Son of Man" is identified with Enoch. The relationship of this section of the Book of Enoch with the New Testament has been much discussed, especially with regard to the designation "Son of Man" and possible or likely influence of Enoch on the New Testament usage.<sup>58</sup> Because, unlike the other sections of 1 Enoch, no manuscripts or fragments of the Similitudes have been found among the Qumran Scrolls, J. T. Milik has argued that they are a Christian, not a Jewish composition, possibly from the third century CE. This viewpoint has not been generally accepted. There are strong arguments in favour of a first century CE date, prior to 70 CE, possibly early or mid-first century.<sup>59</sup>

---

<sup>57</sup> On the "Similitudes" see, among others, G. W. E. Nickelsburg, Jewish Literature between the Bible and the Mishnah: A Historical and Literary Introduction (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1981), 214–223; J. J. Collins, The Apocalyptic Imagination. An Introduction to Jewish Apocalyptic Literature, 2nd ed. (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1998), 177–193.

<sup>58</sup> In Collins's opinion (The Apocalyptic Imagination, 192), "The Similitudes did not significantly influence the New Testament in this matter."

2.3.4. The Assumption (Testament) of Moses

This work is a farewell discourse given by Moses prior to his death. It is in the format of a predictive delineation of the history of Israel from their entrance into Canaan until the end of time. It has been preserved in Latin, which is a translation from Greek, itself regarded as a version of a Semitic (Aramaic or Hebrew) original. It has reference to a mysterious person called Taxo (chapter 9) and to the thirty-four year reign and death of a king, obviously Herod the Great. Different dates of composition have been advanced: after the Second Jewish revolt (132–135 CE), Maccabean times, the first century BCE to before 70 CE. In any event it seems that it represents a form of Palestinian belief and expression of the time of Jesus. It has a description of the appearance of God's kingdom at end time (As. Mos. 10.1–10), the opening section of which merits reproduction here. It reads:<sup>60</sup>

Then his kingdom will appear throughout his whole creation.
Then the devil will have an end.
Yea, sorrow will be led away with him.
Then will be filled the hands of the messenger, who is in the highest place appointed.
Yea, he will at once avenge them of their enemies
For the Heavenly One will arise from his kingly throne.
Yea, he will go forth from his holy habitation with indignation and wrath on behalf of his sons.

2.3.5. 4 Ezra (ca. 95–120 CE)

4 Ezra (2 Esdras 3–14) was composed after the destruction of Jerusalem and the Temple by the Romans in 70 CE. In this work, as in the contemporary work 2 Baruch and the canonical Apocalypse of John, Rome is designated as Babylon, destroyer of the First Temple. In the course of seven scenes (dialogues and visions) between the seer Ezra and God various topics are treated: the problem of evil, Israel's sufferings, God's plans for the last times, the New Jerusalem. Various signs of the end are given on different occasions. After the signs foretold have come to pass there will be a temporary messianic kingdom (4 Ezra 7:26–44). In the ‘Eagle Vision’ in the fifth scene (chaps. 11–12) symbolism is used to describe the Roman persecution of the Jews, much as the canonical Apocalypse describes Rome as a dragon. In the sixth scene (chap. 13) a mysterious man arises from the sea. He is the pre-existent Messiah.

---

<sup>59</sup> Thus Collins, The Apocalyptic Imagination, 178, with reference to the similar views of J. G. Greenfield, M. Stone, D. W. Suter, and M. Black. M. A. Knibb prefers as a date 70–135 CE (after the destruction of Qumran).

<sup>60</sup> In the translation by J. Priest, OTP 1, 932–933.

2.3.6. 2 Baruch (ca. 100 CE)

2 Baruch or Syriac Apocalypse of Baruch (preserved in full only in Syriac), like 4 Ezra, is a Jewish response to the destruction of Jerusalem in 70 CE. It is generally believed to have been composed 95–120 CE, probably in Hebrew, possibly in Greek. It has similarities with 4 Ezra, to be explained either through dependence on it, or dependence of both on the same or similar sources. The work seems to be a literary unity. It narrates Baruch’s fastings, his prophetic warnings, and the three visions he received explaining the destruction of the city.

4 Ezra and 2 Baruch, from our point of view, are the end of a long line of apocalyptic writings from Enoch through Daniel, and Qumran, from ca. 200 BCE to 100 CE.

2.3.7. Testament of Abraham: Vision of the Two Gates; Bosom of Abraham; Mansions of the Just (Testament of Abraham; 1st century CE?)<sup>61</sup>

The work commonly known as the Testament of Abraham (a title found in only part of the transmission history), dealing with Abraham’s encounter with death, is really not a Testament. The Greek manuscripts fall into two clearly distinct recensions—the longer (A) and the shorter (B). These cannot be harmonized, although both may stem from a single earlier form. There has been a great diversity of opinion as to whether the work is a Jewish or Christian composition, whether the language of the original was Greek or Semitic (Hebrew), and whether the work was written in Egypt or Palestine. There is likewise a diversity of opinion about the date of composition, with regard to each of the two recensions and to the original, ranging from the third century BCE to the fourth and fifth century CE (or even later). There is now rather general agreement that the Christian content of the work is minimal. It is basically Jewish. M. Delcor has argued that the original Testament of Abraham, which lies behind both recensions, was a Jewish work which incorporated a variety of traditions, some traceable to the Septuagint, some paralleled in the Palestinian Targums. He believes that it was written in Egypt, perhaps by a member of the sect of the Therapeutae, about the beginning of the Christian era. There is general agreement that the original language of A was Greek. Some have argued that the language of B was Hebrew. E. P. Sanders believes that the original language of both A and B was Greek, and the place of origin Egypt. He believes that the original work combined genres and motifs known to the author from other literature: some aspects of the testament genre, the “ascension” or heavenly tour genre, and the motif of resistance to death, apparently borrowed from the Moses traditions. In his view it seems best to assume a date for the original of ca. 100 CE, plus or minus twenty-five years. This original work was rewritten by more than one hand, and A in particular shows traces of late redactional activity, including some late words and traces of New Testament passages. But the redactional activity did not extend to the work’s content. If it did, it would undoubtedly have resulted in a pronounced Christianising of the text, especially the judgment scene. In Sander’s opinion, despite being repeatedly copied by Christian scribes, the Testament of Abraham in both recensions remains unmistakably Jewish.<sup>62</sup>

<sup>61</sup> See G. W. E. Nickelsburg, “Stories of Biblical and Early Post-Biblical Times,” in Jewish Writings of the Second Temple Period: Apocrypha, Pseudepigrapha, Qumran Sectarian Writings, Philo, Josephus, ed. M. Stone, CRINT 2.2 (Assen: van Gorcum; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984), 33–68, at 60–64; H. C. Cavallin, “Das Leben nach dem Tode im Spätjudentum und im frühen Christentum,” ANRW II 19.1 (1979): 240–343, at 302–304 (“Das Testament Abrahams,” with the Greek text of Recension A 11 and Recension B. 8 on the two gates).

The Testament of Abraham paints a remarkable portrait of Abraham in his fear of death, and in his lack of understanding of sinners—unlike God. On being told by God through a message by the archangel Michael (in A, but not in B, called archistratêgos, rendered by E. P. Sanders as “Commander-in-chief”; see LXX Josh 5:13–15) to prepare for death, Abraham refuses to accept the message voluntarily. He later agrees to accept if he is first given a vision of the inhabited world. He is taken in orbit in a chariot and given a view of people at their daily work, then of persons involved in sin of various kinds. At Abraham’s request these are immediately punished (by death). God gets alarmed, and calls on Michael: “O Michael, Commander-in chief, command the chariot to stop and turn Abraham away, lest he should see the entire inhabited world. For if he were to see all those who pass their lives in sin, he would destroy everything that exists. For behold, Abraham has not sinned and has no mercy on sinners. But I made the world, and I do not want to destroy anyone of them, but I delay the death of the sinner until he should convert and live. Now conduct Abraham to the first gate of heaven, so that he may see the judgments and the recompenses and repent over the souls of sinners he has destroyed” (T. Ab. 10. 12–15). The text continues (T. Ab. 11.1–12) as follows:<sup>63</sup>

---

<sup>62</sup> E. P. Sanders, “Testament of Abraham,” OTP 1, 875.

Michael turned the chariot and brought Abraham toward the east, to the first gate of heaven. And Abraham saw two ways. The first way was strait and narrow and the other broad and spacious. [And he saw there two gates. One gate was broad], corresponding to the broad way, and one gate was strait, corresponding to the strait way.... [The] strait gate is (the gate) of the righteous, which leads to life, and those who enter through it come into Paradise.... [T]he broad gate is (the gate) of the sinners, which leads to destruction and to eternal punishment.... [M]any are the ones who are destroyed, while few are the ones who are saved. For among seven thousand there is scarcely to be found one saved soul, righteous and undefiled.

As Sanders remarks,<sup>64</sup> the commentators correctly note that the theme of two ways is a common feature of Jewish literature. Sanders also notes that the verbatim agreement between this passage and Matt 7:13–14, however, is marked: the combination of “gate” and “way,” the use of precisely the same four adjectives (στενή, τεθλιμμένη, πλατεία and εὐρύχωρος), and the phrases “which leads to life” and “which leads to destruction” which also appear in this chapter. Apart from such minor verbal additions, however, in Sanders’ opinion the text can be accepted as Jewish.

God commands that Abraham be taken into Paradise, “where there are the tents of my righteous ones and (where) the mansions of my holy ones, Isaac and Jacob, are in his bosom, where there is no toil, no grief, no moaning, but peace and exultation and endless life” (T. Ab. 20.13–14). The expression “bosom of Abraham” recalls Luke 16:22–23, the “mansions” (monai), John 14:2. In the account of Abraham’s death, “bosom of Abraham” is inappropriate: he and his descendants Isaac and Jacob are unwittingly presented as already in Paradise.

<sup>63</sup> Translation by E. P. Sanders, OTP 1, 888.

<sup>64</sup> E. P. Sanders, in OTP 1, 888 note b.

If this work is really Jewish, it gives us a rare insight into thought patterns and language of a world fundamentally that of Jesus: the interest in the small number of those to be saved (Luke 15:23), the theme of the many and the few (Matt 22:14; 4 Ezra 8:3), the broad and the narrow gate (door) (Matt 7:13–14; Luke 13:22–24).

2.4. Testaments (Farewell Discourses)<sup>65</sup>

“Testaments” are a recognized genre of Second Temple Judaism, with roots already in the Hebrew Bible. While there are certain difficulties in defining the genre exactly, Testaments are characterised by a narrative framework which includes an introduction in which the testator gathers family or friends to give his near-death speech, which generally has a moral exhortation and predictions concerning the future. A number of the Pseudepigrapha classed as Testaments are generally dated to the first century BCE or the first century CE. It was thus a genre well known in first-century Palestine, and as such is of interest in the examination of questions having to do fundamentally about Jesus. Jesus’ “Farewell Discourse” (John 13–17) and Paul’s farewell address to the elders of the church of Ephesus (Acts 20:17–38) can be considered as belonging to this genre.

2.5. Messianic-type Expectations

2.5.1. Introduction

“Fundamentally about Jesus” is fundamentally about Jesus the Christ. The term “Christ” would appear to have become a personal name for Jesus by the forties of the first century. The original connotations of χριστός, “the anointed,” “the Messiah,” may have by then been lost in the expanding Christian Jesus movement. There seems to have been a rather general expectation of the Messiah (together with Elijah and “the prophet”) in Jesus’ day in Palestine. The Gospel of John may be representing historical fact when he has John the Baptist deny that he is the Messiah, as he was suspected of being by the Pharisees (John 1:19–28). At Caesarea Philippi Peter expressed the view of Jesus’ disciples that he was the Messiah (Mark 8:27–30), a view apparently not shared by the bulk of the people, who had mixed opinions of Jesus’ identity (John the Baptist, Elijah, one of the prophets; Mark 8:28). It will, then, be of some interest to see what roughly contemporary documents have to say on the Jewish Messiah.

---

<sup>65</sup> See J. J. Collins, “Testaments,” in Jewish Writings of the Second Temple Period: Apocrypha, Pseudepigrapha, Qumran Sectarian Writings, Philo, Josephus, ed. M. Stone, CRINT 2.2 (Assen: van Gorcum; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984), 325–355; J. H. Charlesworth, Introduction (to Testaments), in OTP 1, 773; R. A. Kugler, “Testaments,” in Justification and Variegated Nomism. Vol. 1. The Complexities of Second Temple Judaism, 189–213; M. McNamara, Intertestamental Literature, 86–105 (with emphasis on the theology of the writings). The texts are translated by various authors in OTP 1, 775–995; as a background to Jesus’ farewell discourse see R. E. Brown, in The Gospel According to John XIII–XXI, AB (London: Chapman, 1966), 597–601 (The literary genre of the Last Discourse).

While by virtue of the word Messiah, χριστός, anointed, could designate a king or a priest, the general meaning of the word in first-century Palestine was the son of David, expected to come to restore the Davidic dynasty and fulfil the promises made to David. These promises enshrined in 2 Sam 7:7–17 were kept alive in the liturgy. However, after the destruction of the Davidic dynasty with the destruction of Jerusalem in 585 and the failure to have it restored under Persian rule in 520 (see Hag 1–3, esp. 3:23), interest in messianism and the restoration of the house of David seems to have waned, to return again only about 100 BCE.

2.5.2. Messianic Expectations in the Psalms of Solomon Pss. Sol. 17<sup>66</sup>
 The Psalms of Solomon (18 in number) have been fully preserved in Greek manuscripts and defectively in some Syriac texts. It is generally agreed that the original language was Hebrew. There is no evidence of any Christian influence on the work, which is Jewish through and through. From internal evidence we can say that the writer believed himself to belong to the circle of the righteous (Pss. Sol. 3.3–8; 9.3; 15.13). His opponents are described as the unrighteous (Pss. Sol. 15.4–13), sinners, lawless ones. They are accused of general misbehaviour and specifically of having set up a non-Davidic monarchy (Pss. Sol. 17.4–6) and with having profaned the Temple and its sacrifices (2.3; 8.11–12). The writer and his circles await in patience, and pray for, the advent of the legitimate Davidic Messianic king (17.21–35; see also 18.5–9). The work is generally seen to refer to Pompey's capture of Jerusalem in 63 BCE and his death in Egypt in 48 BCE to which three of the Psalms refer (Pss. Sol. 2, 8, 17), and is regarded as having been composed in part at least about that time. The work may have been produced by a "school" rather than by a single author. While it was once believed that the author (or authors) belonged to the Pharisaic party, it is now recognised that we know too little of the religious groupings of Palestine of that period to affirm this. There may have been groups other than the three well-known ones, Pharisees, Sadducees, Essenes.<sup>67</sup>

<sup>66</sup> See G. L. Davenport, “The ‘Anointed of the Lord’ in Psalms of Solomon 17,” in Ideal Figures in Ancient Judaism: Profiles and Paradigms, ed. J. J. Collins and G. W. E. Nickelsburg, SBLSCS 12 (Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1980), 67–92; J. H. Charlesworth, “The Concept of the Messiah in the Pseudepigrapha,” in W. Haase and H. Temporini, ANRW II 19.1 (1979): 188–218, at 197–199 (Pss of Solomon); J. J. Collins, The Scepter and the Star: The Messiah in the Dead Sea Scrolls and Other Ancient Literature (New York: Doubleday, 1995), 49–56; idem, The Apocalyptic Imagination, 143–144.

Pss. Sol. 17 is clearly heavily influenced by the biblical Ps 2. There is no use of Ps 110, a Davidic psalm par excellence. Possibly the linking of kingship and priesthood in this psalm may explain this. The assumption of both kingship and high priesthood by the Maccabees Jonathan and Simon (1 Macc 14:41) was highly offensive to Essenes and Pharisees.

In Pss. Sol. 17 the psalmist prays for the coming of the Messiah, the Lord Messiah (Pss. Sol. 17:21–25, 30–32):<sup>68</sup>

See, Lord, and raise up for them their king, the son of David, to rule over your servant Israel in the time known to you, O God. Undergird him with the strength to destroy the unrighteous rulers...to smash the arrogance of sinners like a potter's jar; to shatter all their substance with an iron rod (Ps 2:9); to destroy the unlawful nations with the word of his mouth (see Apoc 2:16)...At his warning the nations will flee from his presence.... There will be no unrighteousness among them in his days, for all shall be holy, and their king shall be the Lord Messiah.

Similarly in Pss. Sol. 18:5–9. I cite vv. 5–6:<sup>69</sup>

May God cleanse Israel for the day of mercy in blessing, for the appointed day when his Messiah will reign.
Blessed are those born in those days, to see the good things of the Lord which he will do for the coming generation; (which will be) under the rod of discipline of the Lord Messiah, in the fear of his God...

<sup>67</sup> See S. P. Brock, in The Apocryphal Old Testament, H. E. D. Sparks, (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1984), 651; R. B. Wright in OTP 2, 642.

<sup>68</sup> In the translation by R. B. Wright, OTP 2, 667, arguing in note to v. 32 for the retention of the manuscript reading "Lord Messiah."

<sup>69</sup> In the translation by R. B. Wright, OTP 2, 669, again arguing for the translation of christou kuriou as "the Lord Messiah," rather than "the Lord's Messiah."

2.5.3. Messianic Expectations at Qumran<sup>70</sup>

Here it is not necessary to enter in detail into the messianic expectations of the Qumran community. This is already well known, and can be found in a variety of books dealing with the Dead Sea Scrolls.<sup>71</sup> They looked forward to the coming of the Royal Davidic triumphant Messiah, whom the texts can also refer to as the “Branch of David,” the “Messiah of Israel,” the “Prince of [all] the Congregation” and the “Sceptre.” They also speak of the advent of a second priestly Messiah, named the “Messiah of Aaron.” They look forward as well to the coming of a person called “a prophet” (with citation of Deut 18:18–19). The text known as a Midrash on the Last Days (4QFlorilegium) (4Q174) (dating probably from the late first century BCE) contains a number of biblical passages which it interprets of the (Qumran) community and its expectations. Thus 2 Sam 7:10 is understood of the “House” (Temple) that God will build for the (Qumran) community in the end of the days. The temple is identified with their community. “This is the House into which [the unclean shall] never [enter, nor the uncircumcised,] nor the Ammonite, nor the Moabite, nor the half-breed, nor the foreigner, nor the stranger, ever; for there shall my Holy Ones be.” 2 Sam 7:11c–14 is interpreted of “the Branch of David who shall arise with the Interpreter of the Law [to rule] in Zion [at the end] of time. As it is written, I will raise up the tent of David that is fallen (Amos 9:11). That is to say, the fallen tent of David is he who shall arise to save Israel.” A little later Ps 2:1 (“Why do the nations rage...”) is cited and interpreted: “Interpreted, this saying concerns [the kings of the nations] who shall [rage against] the elect of Israel in the last days.”<sup>72</sup> A text somewhat similar to the former, known as a Messianic Anthology or Testimonia (4Q175), is dated to the early first century BCE. It contains five (messianic) texts, two from Deuteronomy on the prophet like Moses (Deut 5:28–29; 18:18–19), Num 24:15–17 with the oracle of Balaam on the Star out of Jacob who will crush the temples of Moab (Royal messiah), Deut 33:8–11 with the blessing of Levi (Priestly Messiah), and Josh 6:26 followed by a text from the apocryphal “Psalms of Joshua.”<sup>73</sup>

<sup>70</sup> See J. A. Fitzmyer, “Qumran Messianism,” in The Dead Sea Scrolls and Christian Origins (Grand Rapids, MI and Cambridge, U.K.: Eerdmans, 2000), 73–110.

<sup>71</sup> For instance Vermes, The Dead Sea Scrolls in English. The revised and extended 4th ed., 60.

<sup>72</sup> Translation by G. Vermes, 353–354, at 354.

<sup>73</sup> Ed. DJD 5, 57–60. English translations in Vermes, The Dead Scrolls in English, 355–356; F. García Martínez, The Dead Sea Scrolls Translated, 137–138.

Together with these explicitly messianic texts from Qumran we may also consider some others which look to the future hope of God's saving visitation of his people, inspired by prophetic texts, especially the latter half of the Book of Isaiah. They indicate a presence in Israel of fulfilment not necessarily connected with a warring Messiah.

Here we examine two such texts from Qumran.

(a) 4QMessianic Apocalypse (4Q521).<sup>74</sup> The Qumran manuscript is from the first quarter of the first century BCE. This work is classed as a wisdom text. Its first editor, Emile Puech, described it as an apocalypse, a designation called into doubt by J. J. Collins and J. A. Fitzmyer since the fragment reveals "none of the formal characteristics of apocalyptic revelation."<sup>75</sup> E. Puech believes it exhibits belief in the resurrection, a disputed point which need not detain us here.<sup>76</sup> The text clearly speaks of a Messiah (God's Messiah), but a prophetic rather than a kingly one, as J. J. Collins has remarked, acting as God's agent or eschatological prophet.<sup>77</sup> The composition draws heavily on Ps 146 and Deutero-Isaiah. God himself is given as the agent of the marvels in the new age. The text is fragmentary. I give the relevant portions of it here.<sup>78</sup>

Frag. 2 col. II, 1[for the heavens and the earth will listen to his Messiah, [למשיח] 2 [and all] that is in them will not turn away from the holy precepts, Be encouraged, you who are seeking the Lord in his service! . . . 7 For he will honour the devout upon the throne of eternal royalty, 8 freeing prisoners, giving sight to the blind, straightening out the twisted. 9 Ever shall I cling to those who hope. In his mercy he will jud[ge,] 10 and from no-one shall the fruit [of] good [deeds] be delayed, 11 and the Lord will perform marvellous acts such as have not existed, just as he sa[id] 12 for he will heal the badly wounded and will make the dead live (מתיים יחיה), he will proclaim good news to the meek (ענוים יבשר)

<sup>74</sup> Ed. E. Puech, DJD 25, 1–38; pls. I–III (with French translation of frag. 2, p. 11); idem, "Une apocalypse messianique (4Q521)," RevQ 15.60 (1992): 475–522; idem, La croyance des Esséniens en la vie future: immortalité, resurrection, vie éternelle? Histoire d'une croyance dans le judaïsme ancien, vols I, II, Études Biblique Nouvelle Série 21–22 (Paris: Gabalda, 1993), 627–692; J. J. Collins, "The Works of the Messiah," Dead Sea Discoveries [electronic journal] 1 (1994): 98–112; J. García Martínez, "Los Mesías de Qumran. Problemas de un traductor," Sef 33 (1993): 345–360, esp. 347–352; J. A. Fitzmyer, "Qumran Messianism," 93–95.

<sup>75</sup> J. J. Collins, "The Works of the Messiah," 98; J. A. Fitzmyer, "Qumran Messianism," 94.

<sup>76</sup> See J. A. Fitzmyer, "Qumran Messianism," 95.

<sup>77</sup> J. J. Collins, "The Works of the Messiah," 98–99.

<sup>78</sup> In the translation by F. García Martínez, The Dead Sea Scrolls Translated, 394.

13 give lavishly [to the need]y, lead the exiled and enrich the hungry.
14 [...] and all [...]

(b) The Heavenly Prince Melchizedek (11QMelch = 11Q13).<sup>79</sup> The first-century BCE document sigled 11QMelch (= 11Q13) is preserved in thirteen fragments. It takes the form of an eschatological midrash in which the proclamation of liberty to the captives at the end of the days announced in Isa 61:1 is understood as forming part of the general restoration of property during the year of Jubilee (Lev 25:13), which is seen in the Bible as a remission of debts (Deut 15:2). The work cites these biblical texts, but also others, such as Isa 52:7 (“your God reigns...”). The heavenly deliverer in this text is called Melchizedek, who is to be understood here as the archangel Michael. The text is a product of the Qumran community. It uses the peshet form of interpretation. It expresses the expectations and hopes of the Qumran community. However, the biblical texts on which the work is based were the common property of all Israel, and a number of them may well have been high in Jewish consciousness in the first century of our era, during the days of Jesus and the formation and publication of the gospel tradition. They need not have had any necessary connection with an angelic redeemer such as Michael (Melchizedek). According to Luke (Luke 4:16–21) Jesus proclaimed that the redemption announced in Isa 61:1 was being fulfilled in his own person. I give the text in the translation of F. García Martínez.<sup>80</sup>

Col. II 1 [...] your God... [...] 2 [...] And as for what he said: (Lev 25:13) “In this year of jubilee, [you shall return, each one, to his respective property, as is written: (Deut 15:2) “This is] 3 the manner (of effecting) the [release]: every creditor shall release what he lent [to his neighbour. He shall not coerce his neighbour or his brother when] the release for God [has been proclaimed].” 4 [Its interpretation for the last days refers to the captives, about whom he said: (Isa 61:1) 'To proclaim liberty to the captives.' And he will make 5 their rebels prisoners [...] and of the inheritance of Melchizedek, for [...] and they are the inheritance of Melchizedek, who 6 will make them return. He will proclaim liberty for them, to free them from [the debt] of all their iniquities. ... And about him he said: (Ps 7:8-9) 'Above it you return to the heights, God will judge the peoples.' As for what he said: (Ps 82:2) 'How long will you judge unjustly and show partiality to the wicked? Selah.' 12 Its interpretation concerns Belial and the spirits of his lot, who were rebels [all of them] turning aside from the commandments of God [to commit evil.] 13 But, Melchizedek will carry out the vengeance of God's judgements [on this day, and they shall be freed from the hands] of Belial and from the hands of all the spirits [of his lot.] 14 To his aid (shall come all the gods of [justice; he] is the one [who will prevail on this day over] all the sons of God, and he will pre[side over] this [assembly.] 15 This is the day of [peace about which God] spoke [of old through the words of Isaiah] the prophet, who said: (Isa 52:7) 'How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of the messenger [מבשר] who announces peace, of the messenger [מבשר] of good who announces salvation,] saying to Zion: "your God [reigns.]" 17 Its interpretation; The mountains are the prophets... 18 And the messenger [המבשר] is [the anointed] of the spirit about whom Dan[iel] spoke [...and the messenger [מבשר] of] 19 good who announces salvation is the one about whom it is written that [he will send him (Isa 61:2-3) 'to comfort the afflicted...']. To comfort the afflicted', its interpretation:] to instruct them in all the ages of the world....

<sup>79</sup> On this text see A. S. van der Woude, “Melchizedek als himmlische Erlösergestalt in den neugefundenen eschatologischen Midraschim aus Qumran Höhle XI,” OTS 14 (1965): 334–373; M. de Jonge and A. S. van der Woude, “11Q Melchizedek and the New Testament,” NTS 12 (1965–66): 301–326; J. A. Fitzmyer, “Now this Melchizedek...” (Heb 7:1)” and “Further Light on Melchizedek from Qumran Cave 11,” in idem, Essays on the Semitic Background of the New Testament (London: Chapman, 1971), 221–243; 245–267; new edition and translation of the text in F. García Martínez, E. J. C. Tigchelaar and A. S. van der Woude, eds., DJD 23: Qumran Cave 11.II (11Q2–18) (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1998); for col. II, 1–19 Hebrew text, 224–225; English translation, 229–230.

<sup>80</sup> F. García Martínez, The Dead Sea Scrolls Translated, 139–140.

2.5.4. Messianic Expectations in the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs<sup>81</sup>

There is little agreement among scholars with regard to the original language, provenance or date of composition of the work known as The Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs, extant in Greek, Armenian and Slavonic. There are currently three main views with regard to the work. One is that it is Jewish but interpolated by a Christian. Variant forms of this view are currently defended. An earlier view was that the work is Christian, not Jewish, a position more recently defended by M. de Jonge, who stresses that in any case the final stage of the composition is Christian and that it is difficult to go behind it, a viewpoint also upheld by John J. Collins.<sup>82</sup> A third view, put forward after the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls (principally by A. Dupont Sommer and M. Philonenko), is that the work is of Essene origin. This view has little following. Attempts have been made to isolate what are regarded Christian interpolations from the Jewish original, and even to trace stages of Jewish formation before a Christian redaction. De Jonge repeatedly pointed out that much of the material could have been written by either Christian or Jew. Given this variety of opinion, views with regard to a date of the original differ—from Maccabean times to the second century CE or even later. With regard to the place of composition, the predominant view is that it was Egypt; another opinion opts for Syria.

<sup>81</sup> See A. Hultgård, L'Eschatologie des Testaments des Douze Patriarches, 2 vols. (Uppsala: Almqvist & Wiksell, 1977, 1981); A. Hultgård, "The 'Ideal' Levite, the Davidic Messiah and the Saviour Priest in the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs," in Ideal Figures in Ancient Judaism, 93-110; M. de Jonge, Jewish Eschatology, Early Christian Christology, and the Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs (Leiden: Brill, 1991).

Despite the uncertainties regarding the work I here give two texts from it, one on the Royal Davidic messiah, the other on the messiah from the tribe of Levi (Priestly Messiah).

(a) The Davidic Messiah (Testament of Judah 23). The Testament of Judah 23 speaks of the sins of Judah's descendants, which will bring punishment on them, including the consumption of God's sanctuary by fire. Then salvation comes, in the advent of a person who can be regarded as the Royal Messiah (T. 12 Pabr., T. Jud. 24):<sup>83</sup>

And after this there shall arise for you a Star from Jacob in peace: And a man shall arise from my posterity like the Sun of righteousness, walking with the sons of men in gentleness and righteousness, and in him will be found no sin. And the heavens will be opened upon him to pour out the spirit as a blessing of the Holy Father. And he will pour the spirit of grace on you. And you shall be sons in truth, and you will walk in his first and final decrees. This is the Shoot of God Most High; this is the fountain for the life of all humanity. Then he will illumine the scepter of my kingdom, and from your root will arise the Shoot, and through it will arise the rod of righteousness for the nations, to judge and to save all that call on the Lord...

(b) The Priestly Messiah (Testament of Levi 18). The Testament of Levi 18 also tells of the divine punishments in store for the priestly house of Levi. However, a new age will dawn with the advent of a new priest, who may be regarded as the Priestly Messiah. The relevant section of the Testament of Levi 18 is as follows:<sup>84</sup>

---

<sup>82</sup> J. J. Collins, Between Athens and Jerusalem. Jewish Identity in the Hellenistic Diaspora (New York: Crossroad, 1983), 154; idem, The Apocalyptic Imagination. An Introduction to Jewish Apocalyptic Literature, 2nd ed. (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1998), 133–143 (on the work's messianic expectations, 141–142).

<sup>83</sup> In the translation by H. C. Kee, OTP 1, 801.

When vengeance will have come upon them from the Lord, the priesthood will lapse. And then the Lord will raise up a new priest to whom all the words of the Lord will be revealed. He shall effect the judgment of truth over the earth for many days. And his star shall rise in heaven like a king; kindling the light of knowledge as day is illumined by the sun. . . .

The heavens will be opened, and from the temple of glory sanctification will come upon him, with a fatherly voice, as from Abraham to Isaac. And the glory of the Most High shall burst forth upon him. And the spirit of understanding and sanctification shall rest upon him [in the water].

The Jewish nature of this text can be seriously called into question, not least because of the pacific understanding of the Oracle of Balaam (on the star from Jacob) in Num 24:17, generally interpreted in early Jewish literature as referring to a warlike figure.

2.5.5. Messianic Expectations in the (Palestinian) Targums, especially Num 24:17–24

The use of evidence from the Targums (Aramaic translations of the Hebrew Bible) for a study of the New Testament or first-century Judaism has been called into question over the past half century, chiefly because of the difficulty in dating the Targums or targumic traditions. For practical purposes, by reason of an early date the only Targums that are in question are Onqelos and the Palestinian Targums for the Pentateuch and the Targums of the Prophets. Over the past decades Bruce Chilton has made a deep study of the Targum of Isaiah in relation to the message of Jesus, and his work has impressed many. In his monograph Jesus and His Contemporaries. Comparative Studies Craig E. Evans has an excursus on early messianic traditions in the Targums. He examines in some detail thirteen texts from the Targums of the Pentateuch and the Prophets and three from Targum Psalms. At the end of his review he gives his concluding comments:<sup>85</sup>

What this survey shows is that whereas much, even most, of the messianic tradition in the Targums derives from times after the New Testament, a fair portion of it reflects interpretive traditions and ways of speaking from the first century and even earlier. Bruce Chilton's work on the Isaiah Targum has shown how at many points Jesus' utterances, as well as his general concept of the kingdom of God, cohere with targumic language and themes. Jesus research cannot, therefore, neglect the Targums.

<sup>84</sup> In the translation by H. C. Kee, OTP 1, 794–95. The concluding words (within square brackets) are regarded by Kee apparently as an interpolation (see Mark 1:9–11).

<sup>85</sup> C. A. Evans, Jesus and His Contemporaries. Comparative Studies (Leiden: Brill Academic Publishers, 2001), 155–181, at 181.

There are really only two texts in the Targums of the Pentateuch in which all the Targums (Onqelos and the different recensions of the Palestinian Targum) give a messianic interpretation, namely Gen 49:11–12 and Num 24:17–24. To these we may add the Palestinian Targums of Gen 3:15 where healing of the son(s) of the woman is predicted in the days of King Messiah: "For her son, however, there will be a remedy, but for you serpent, there will be no remedy, for they will make peace (שפיוּתִיה) in the future, in the days of king Messiah." The messianic interpretation of Gen 49:11–12 is a natural expansion, given the underlying Hebrew text. (Hebrew in RSV: "The scepter shall not pass from Judah, nor the ruler's staff from between his feet, until Shiloh comes; and to him shall be the obedience of his peoples.")

Here I pay special attention to the Palestinian Targums paraphrase of the last oracle of Balaam (Num 24:14–24)—on the star to arise out of Jacob. I have treated of this in detail elsewhere.<sup>86</sup> The warlike interpretation of the oracle is found in the Qumran War Scroll (1QM; 1QWar Scroll), a work composed probably in the last decades of the first century BCE or the beginning of the first century CE.<sup>87</sup> The work is on the final war against the Kittim (Romans), possibly combined with the final forty-year war against the Gentile world as well.<sup>88</sup> In 1QM, col. XI there is a profession of faith that the battle is God's, from heaven. "Truly, the battle is Thine! Their bodies are crushed by the might of thy hand and there is no man to bury them" (1QM XI, 1). Next, this principle is exemplified through Goliath and the Philistines, then by Balaam's oracle: "Truly the battle is Thine and the power from Thee! It is not ours. Our strength and the power of our hands accomplish no mighty deeds except by Thy power and by the might of Thy great valour. Thus thou hast taught us from ancient times, saying, A star shall come out of Jacob..." (col. II, 5–6), with citation of Num

<sup>86</sup> M. McNamara, "Early Exegesis in the Palestinian Targum (Neofiti) Numbers 24," PIBA 16 (1993): 57–79. See also C. A. Evans, Jesus and His Contemporaries, 56–57, 162–63.

<sup>87</sup> See G. Vermes, The Dead Sea Scrolls in English, 124.

<sup>88</sup> See G. Vermes, The Dead Sea Scrolls in English, 124.

24:17–19.<sup>89</sup> The oracle is interpreted in a warlike fashion again in the Damascus Document (CD) VII (from about 100 BCE), a text which also provides an insight into the manner in which the Qumran community could adapt a biblical text and reinterpret it. Because of a belief of an exile of the community to Damascus Amos 5:26–27 is cited in an adapted form. The Hebrew Text of Amos in question reads (RSV): “You shall take up Sakkuth (= the tabernacle of) your king, and Kaiwan (= the basis) your star-god (כִּיּוֹן צִלְמֶכֶם כּוֹכַב אֱלֹהֵיכֶם) which you made for yourselves; therefore I will take you into exile beyond Damascus, says the Lord.” In the Damascus Document rewriting of this text all reference to idolatrous practices are omitted or reinterpreted: “And all the apostates were given up to the sword, but those who held fast escaped to the land of the north, as God said: I will exile the tabernacle (מִכּוֹת) of your king and the bases (כִּיּוֹן) of your statues from my tent to Damascus (Amos 5:25–26). The Books of the Law are the tabernacle of the king; as God said: I will raise up the tabernacle of David which is fallen (Amos 9:13). The king is the congregation; and the bases of the statues are the Books of the Prophets whose sayings Israel despised. The star [of Amos’s original text] is the Interpreter of the Law who came to Damascus; as it is written: A star shall come forth out of Jacob and a sceptre shall rise out of Israel (Num 24:17). The sceptre is the prince of the whole congregation, and when he comes he shall smite all the children of Seth (Num 24:17).”<sup>90</sup>

In his history of the Jewish War, Josephus mentions that a prophecy was a major factor in moving the Jewish people to revolt in 66 CE. He writes: “But what more than all else incited them to the war was an ambiguous oracle, likewise found in the sacred scriptures, to the effect that one from their own country would become ruler of the world. This they understood to mean someone of their own race, and many of their wise men went astray in that interpretation of it. The oracle, however, in reality signified the sovereignty of Vespasian, who was proclaimed Emperor on Jewish soil” (War 6.12–314). This Jewish oracle seems to have been known independently of Josephus by Tacitus (Hist. 5.13) and Suetonius (Div. Vesp. 4.5).

<sup>89</sup> In the translation by G. Vermes, The Dead Sea Scrolls in English, 136.

<sup>90</sup> In the translation by G. Vermes, The Dead Sea Scrolls in English, 103.

The oracle of Num 24:17 is also used in the Testament of Judah 24, in a text already cited: "And after this there shall arise for you a star from Jacob in peace." The association of the star of this particular oracle with peace, however, makes the Jewish origin of this passage of the Testaments doubtful, a suspicion in keeping with the views of many scholars on the Jewishness of the Testaments. In the first century of our era, and earlier, the oracle was interpreted as referring to war and victory over the Gentiles. This might urge caution in seeing a reference to the oracle in the star guiding the Magi. Had Matthew wanted to make such an association he could have here cited in full, as he does for other prophecies. Militaristic associations of the current interpretation of the oracle of Balaam may have made him avoid any use of it.

After this examination of the understanding of the 'star' oracle (Num 24:17) in Judaism at the turn of the era, we can now consider the paraphrase of the Palestinian Targum as presented in Codex Neofiti. The Hebrew Text (in the RSV rendering) of Num 24:17, we may recall, has:

17. I see him, but not now; I behold him, but not nigh: a star shall come forth out of Jacob, and a sceptre shall rise out of Israel; it shall crush the forehead of Moab, and break down all the sons of Seth.... 19 By Jacob shall dominion be exercised, and the survivors of cities be destroyed!

This is rendered in the Palestinian Targums as follows (in the translation of Neofiti):

17. I see him, but he is not here now; I observe him, but he is not nigh. A king is to arise from those of the house of Jacob, and a redeemer and ruler from those of the house of Israel; and he shall kill the mighty ones of the Moabites and blot out all the sons of Seth, and he shall cast out the owners of property... 19. A king is to arise from those of the house of Jacob, and he will blot out the one who has sinned from the sinful city, that is <Rome>...<sup>91</sup>

The interpretation of the text, with the star and scepter understood as king and ruler, can clearly be understood as messianic, and as another witness to the militaristic understanding of an oracle that was to play a major role in the history of Palestine soon after Jesus' ministry.

---

<sup>91</sup> Translation by M. McNamara, Targum Neofiti 1: Numbers, 140. The copyist of Neofiti omits the name Rome, possibly to avoid censorship. The name Rome is in the three texts of the Fragment Targum.

3. Some Concluding Observations

At the end of this examination of some of the literary documents at our disposal for a study of issues fundamentally about Jesus, a few concluding observations may be permitted.

In a consideration of the literary documents bearing on the question “Fundamentally about Jesus,” pride of place must of course be given to the books of the Hebrew Bible, especially those seen as foretelling his coming and his preaching of the kingdom. The non-canonical documents from the later Second Temple period are in various ways connected with the Hebrew Scriptures, as continuing its worldview (as in the case of apocalyptic texts and testaments), as expansions or interpretations of scripture, or as legends connected with the biblical narrative.

The available evidence shows that there was a rich production of texts connected with Palestine between 200 BCE and 100 CE. The texts represent a variety of genres. Some can be connected with specific groups within Judaism, such as the Qumran sectaries, apocalyptic circles. Others appear to represent what is often described as “mainstream Judaism.”

In New Testament times some of the earlier texts were still being read and regarded as authoritative (as 1 Enoch 1.9 in Jude 14). In the first century BCE and the first century CE a number of new texts, and in a variety of genres, were being composed, and with a variety of interests, within the Qumran community and outside it in Palestine in Hebrew and Aramaic, and also outside Palestine (Egypt, Antioch of Syria) in Greek.

These literary documents have a direct bearing on the gospel narrative about Jesus, whether with regard to literary genre (for instance apocalyptic, beatitudes), religious beliefs (for instance resurrection, messianic expectations), expansions and interpretations of scripture and other ways. They show that the Jesus of the gospel narratives stands squarely within Palestinian Jewish tradition.

It may be recalled that the literary documents here examined are but a section of those known to us, and that the number of texts fortunately preserved represents but a fraction of those composed during the period in question. It is also worth noting that the written documents still extant or now lost would represent but a fraction of the thought world of the living tradition of Jesus’ day and that of the early church.

Awareness of the literary documents may have a bearing not only on the question of the historical Jesus but also on our understanding of the formation of the gospel tradition and of the redactional work of the evangelists. A study of the New Testament belief that Jesus was raised from the dead on the third day in accordance with the Scriptures indicates that the early church was reflecting on its message against a midrashic (and targumic-type) exposition of the Bible, and that this was the case from a very early period—the late thirties at the latest.

A related question is Luke's relation to earlier sources. The third evangelist may be less 'creative' than is often supposed by some, for instance in the Ascension narrative with its mention of resurrection on the third day (Luke 24:46). Similarly with regard to the opening scene of Jesus' ministry at Nazareth, and Jesus' assertion that in him the prophecy of Isaiah (Isa 61:1–2; 58:6) was being fulfilled (Luke 4:16–19). While the presentation is Lukan, the Qumran texts (11QMelch; 4QMessianicApocalypse [4Q521]) show that fulfilment of such prophetic texts was awaited in Qumran and elsewhere.

These are but a few of the many ways in which the literary documents at our disposal may be used in a study of questions relating fundamentally to Jesus during his existence on earth and of questions relating to his person and teaching as these were reflected on in the early church.

BACKGROUND III: THE SOCIAL AND POLITICAL CLIMATE IN WHICH JESUS OF NAZARETH PREACHED

WOLFGANG STEGEMANN

1. Introduction

Several years ago, in 1999, an international group of Jesus researchers held a symposium at Tutzing in Germany on “Jesus in new contexts.”<sup>1</sup> The goal of this academic meeting was to debate one segment of the discussions connected with the so-called Third Quest, viz. the methodologies entailed and the knowledge gained when questions from the sphere of the social sciences (social history, sociology, cultural anthropology) are utilized in Jesus research. I believe that there is a striking difference precisely on this point between the so-called “Third Quest for the historical Jesus” and its predecessors. The man from Nazareth and the community of disciples which he founded are no longer considered in isolation, but rather in the context of the existential world of Israel, and indeed of the Mediterranean region as a whole. Previously, Jesus was interpreted in detachment from the socio-cultural conditions of his age. He was isolated in the manner of a “monad” from the world in which he lived; at best, he was located in a special “world (of Jesus)” all of his own, which was surrounded by other “worlds.” It is true that the social circumstances of the life of Jesus and of the Jesus movement have been investigated repeatedly from the end of the nineteenth century onwards, but social-historical Jesus research remained a marginal activity.<sup>2</sup> It is only since the last third of the twentieth century that Jesus research has concentrated more strongly on contexts of the preaching, the praxis, and the general experiences of the man from Nazareth, other than those contexts which belong to the history of religions. These contexts are the politics, economy, and society of the period in question (i.e., roughly the first third of the first century of the Common Era), as well as the cultural and religious values, institutions, and practices in Israel, or Mediterranean culture in general, at that time.

---

<sup>1</sup> This symposium is documented in W. Stegemann, B. J. Malina, and G. Theissen, eds., Jesus in neuen Kontexten (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer Verlag, 2002); ET: The Social Setting of Jesus and the Gospels (Augsburg: Fortress Press, 2002).

<sup>2</sup> We should mention at least J. Jeremias, Jerusalem zur Zeit Jesu. Eine kulturgeschichtliche Untersuchung zur neutestamentlichen Zeitgeschichte, 3rd ed. (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1962).

Halvor Moxnes has spoken here of “space” and “place,” and has written an inspiring monograph which seeks to “put Jesus in his place”—the title of his book is programmatic.<sup>3</sup> Space does not allow me to develop my arguments with anything like the wealth of detail, the comprehensiveness, and the differentiation in Moxnes’ book; I must limit myself to some basic remarks about the political and social contexts or “places” of the preaching and the experiences of Jesus. I am afraid that all I have to offer are my own knowledge and insights about the “place” of Jesus, i.e., insights and knowledge drawn from the reading of ancient texts and modern academic secondary literature. These cannot lay claim to be an historiographical representation of “what really happened” (to use L. von Ranke’s phrase). And I am very well aware that my picture of the social and political conditions in which Jesus lived is itself an academic construction. We shall not discuss this aspect of the topic, which the theory of history shows to be fundamental, but I should like at least to mention briefly that subjective decisions are involved even in the fundamental principles of historical inquiry, which are based ultimately on personal evaluations of the available data, not on so-called objective facts. And I agree with the differentiation “between event, data, and fact” which James Dunn, following R. G. Collingwood, makes:

The historical ‘event’ belongs to the ir retrievable past. All the historian has available are the ‘data’ which have come down through history—personal diaries, reminiscences of eyewitnesses, reports constructed from people who were present, perhaps some archaeological artifacts, as well as circumstantial data about climate, commercial practice, and laws of the time, and so forth. From these the historian attempts to reconstruct the ‘facts.’ The facts are not to be identified as data; they are always an interpretation of the data.<sup>4</sup>

Let us take as an example the question—still an object of dispute—whether the Jesus movement arose in a social or political crisis and is therefore a “crisis phenomenon” of some kind, or whether it developed in a period of peace in which there were indeed crises, but nothing unusual or abnormal. But what do the words “unusual” and “abnormal” mean here? To illustrate the problems involved, I quote from an essay by G. Theissen:<sup>5</sup>

---

<sup>3</sup> H. Moxnes, Putting Jesus in His Place: A Radical Vision of Household and Kingdom (Louisville, KY: John Knox, 2003).

<sup>4</sup> J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus Remembered (Grand Rapids and Cambridge: William B. Eerdmans, 2003), 102. For a more detailed argument: W. Stegemann, Jesus und seine Zeit (Suttgart: Kohlhammer Verlag, 2010), 124–127.

When Jesus and his movement are interpreted from the perspective of social history, we find an alternative which can be summarized under the headings ‘crisis interpretation’ and ‘peace interpretation.’ The crisis interpretation says that the activity of the Jesus the Jewish charismatic can be understood only in connection with the social crisis of his age; to some extent, his activity is a response to this crisis. The ‘peace interpretation’ says that the time and place in which Jesus lived were relatively free of tensions and conflicts; Jesus’ peaceful message is better explained on the basis of this kind of area than on the basis of a social crisis.

Theissen cites several representatives of these two interpretations.<sup>6</sup> Naturally, a scholar’s assessment will depend on how he or she understands the term “crisis,” but this is not the main point here. What interests me is the fact that even on fundamental issues, the quest for the historical Jesus arrives at diametrically opposite decisions on the basis of the same “data.” These differences are due not least to the way in which individual scholars evaluate the existing data: if it is permissible to over-simplify, we may say that even in the high-level reflections involved in the differentiated analysis of data in the quest for the historical Jesus, one scholar affirms: “The glass is half-empty,” while another affirms with equal vigor: “The glass is half-full.” In the case of the crisis/peace interpretations, the question is: Do I regard the data about social conflicts and rebellious uprisings in Galilee or Judea at the time of Jesus (which certainly exist) as the tip of the iceberg, and conclude that there was a broad potential for crisis in Jewish society at that period; or do I regard these data as information about exceptional events which are in contrast to the broad societal experience of peace and the absence of conflict? I shall return to this problem below.

---

<sup>5</sup> G. Theissen, “Jesus und die symbolpolitischen Konflikte seiner Zeit. Sozialgeschichtliche Aspekte der Jesusforschung,” reprinted in G. Theissen, Jesus als historische Gestalt. Beiträge zur Jesusforschung, ed. Annette Merz (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2003), 168–193, at 168.

<sup>6</sup> For the crisis interpretation, cf. R. A. Horsley, Jesus and the Spiral of Violence. Popular Jewish Resistance in Roman Palestine (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1987); E. W. and W. Stegemann, Urchristliche Sozialgeschichte. Die Anfänge im Judentum und die Christuskommunitäten in der mediterranen Welt, 2nd ed. (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer Verlag, 1997) (Eng. trans. by O. C. Dean Jr.: The Jesus Movement. A Social History of Its First Century [Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1999]). For the peace interpretation, cf. from a social and economic perspective, E. P. Sanders, Judaism. Practice and Belief 63 BCE–66 CE (London and Philadelphia: SCM Press, 1987), 157–169; concentrating on Galilee (in contradistinction to Judea): S. Freyne, Galilee, Jesus and the Gospels. Literary Approaches and Historical Investigations (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1988), 135–175.

I understand the structural differentiation of a society as the attempt to reduce complexity to comprehensible factors. For example, we may distinguish between the following categories of factors: cultural (including religious), social, political, economic, and ecological (geography, climate, etc.).<sup>7</sup> I am of course aware that all these are inter-connected and that none of these societal sectors has clearly definable boundaries. For example, the cultural values and norms of a society always determine its social, economic, or political activity and the corresponding communication among its members. As K. C. Hanson and D. E. Oakman put it, "For Palestine in the time of Jesus, and the Mediterranean culture generally, kinship institutions conditioned politics; both in turn conditioned [and are conditioned by] religion and economy."<sup>8</sup>

Here, we shall study only one limited sector, viz. social and political factors in Jewish society at the time of Jesus. It is in the context defined by these factors that we can understand the preaching, praxis, and experiences of Jesus, or of the Jesus movement. I hope that the concept of "climate" in the title of this essay will alert the reader to the fact that I do not assume a causal connection between the political and societal conditions of life and the preaching and praxis of Jesus. Rather, I shall seek to describe the kind of social and political context in which the preaching, praxis, and fate of Jesus can take on a measure of plausibility.

2. The Political Climate

A man who proclaims that the kingdom of God (basileia tou theou) is drawing near (Mark 1:14–15 parr.), and summons twelve members (hoi dôdeka) from the group of his adherents to form a stable institution which represents the twelve tribes of the people of Israel (Mark 3:16–19 parr.; 1 Cor 15:5) and perhaps even installs them as joint rulers in the kingdom of God which he has proclaimed (Luke 22:28–30); a man who enters Jerusalem in the manner of the awaited Davidic Messiah-King (Mark 11:1–11 parr.), who carries out a demonstrative symbolic action in the temple precincts (Mark 11:15–19 parr.); a man who is finally condemned in Jerusalem by Rome’s prefect in Judea to die on a cross—how could such a man be understood without the political context of his period? The data mentioned here make it clear that Jesus’ activities took place in the public sphere of society, and probably also intended to exercise political influence, i.e., to shape or reshape his own society and possibly also to use (heavenly) power to enforce demands and goals in this society.

---

<sup>7</sup> On this, cf. also K. C. Hanson and D. E. Oakman, Palestine in the Time of Jesus. Social Structures and Social Conflicts (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1998). These two authors draw a distinction in their "General Model for First-Century Palestinian Society" between two fundamental factors, viz. "Historical Factors" and "Environmental Factors" ("Mediterranean climate; Geography of the Levant"), and between two systems, viz. "Cultural System" and "Social System" (p. 15).

<sup>8</sup> Ibid., 16.

Jesus acted here within the context of established structures of government. When problems arose, the important decisions were taken ultimately by the procurator of Rome in Syria and the prefect of Rome in Judea, supported by the military and by the local elite in Galilee and Judea. In Judean and Galilean society at the time of Jesus, political government was represented primarily by the leading elite of the Imperium Romanum, which had dominated this region since the conquest of the Palestinian territory by Pompey in 63 BCE. The very names of Galilean towns—Tiberias, Caesarea Philippi, Bethsaida Julias, or the nearby Caesarea on the coast—betray the dominant position of Rome. And the infrastructure in the towns, like the regional network of roads, similarly betrays this influence.

Against the background of this infrastructure, the close link between the Jesus movement and Capernaum which we see in the gospels makes good sense. This town was situated on the north-west shore of the Sea of Galilee and was easily reached by land and sea routes. It is clear that Capernaum was a minor urban center, easily accessible via a good network of roads. D. C. Duling has offered a detailed picture of the network of roads in Galilee (and beyond).<sup>9</sup> Estimates of the population in archaeological publications vary considerably. Meyers and Strange base their calculations on a geographical site of Capernaum

---

<sup>9</sup> D. C. Duling, “The Jesus Movement and Social Network Analysis (Part I: The Spatial Network),” BTB 29 (1999): 156–175; idem, “The Jesus Movement and Social Network Analysis (Part II: The Social Network),” BTB 30: (2000): 1–12. Cf. also the regional map in J. L. Reed, Archaeology and the Galilean Jesus. A Re-Examination of the Evidence (Harrisburg: Trinity Press International, 2002), 147.

covering ca. 30 hectares, and posit a population of between 400 and 500 persons per hectare, i.e., between 12,000 and 15,000 inhabitants.<sup>10</sup> J. L. Reed arrives at a significantly smaller number of inhabitants, since he posits a population of no more than between 100 and 150 persons per hectare in Capernaum, and assumes that the inhabited site there covered at most 10 hectares. According to his calculations, therefore, Capernaum had no fewer than 600 inhabitants and no more than 1,500.<sup>11</sup> He writes:<sup>12</sup>

Compared to the major Galilean cities of Sepphoris and Tiberias, which had between 8,000 and 12,000 inhabitants, Capernaum's population size was modest. At the same time, compared to the many Galilean hamlets made up of several extended families and small villages like Nazareth with fewer than 400 inhabitants, Capernaum would have been viewed as one of the larger villages.

Clearly, Capernaum was no polis, but simply a large village, with an architectural design which shows no evidence of Roman influence or Roman presence; it is only after 70 CE that inscriptions attest a Roman military presence.<sup>13</sup> It is possible that the members of the Jesus movement had a "base" in Capernaum, such as the house of Peter, from which they set out for their charismatic praxis of prophetic proclamation and healings, and to which they then returned.

It is above all the end of Jesus' life in Jerusalem, i.e., his crucifixion at the command of Pontius Pilate, the Roman prefect in Judea, that tells us who had the supreme authority in the land: Rome had reserved to itself the special privilege of all legal matters connected with capital punishment. This should not however be taken to mean that Rome, like a modern occupying power (e.g., as in Germany after the Second World War), occupied and "administered" the entire territory of Judea or Galilee. The ca. 3,000 soldiers of the Roman auxiliary troops who were stationed there could never have carried out such a task. Their function was rather to ensure order and tranquility in the land, with garrisons at various places, e.g., in Jericho and Ashkelon. There was a garrison of ca. 500 soldiers in Jerusalem, who could quench small outbreaks of anti-Roman rebellion at once. Rome had larger military

---

<sup>10</sup> E. Meyers and J. F. Strange, Archaeology, the Rabbis and Early Christianity (Nashville: Abingdon, 1983), 58.

<sup>11</sup> J. L. Reed, Archaeology (n. 9 above), 149–152.

<sup>12</sup> Ibid., 152.

<sup>13</sup> Ibid., 156.

forces stationed in Syria: three to four legions, amounting to ca. 20,000 soldiers.

Rome made use of the indigenous structures of power to administer the occupied territories, and won over the loyalty of the elite. During Jesus' lifetime, Herod Antipas reigned in Galilee as a client prince dependent on Rome (4 BCE–39 CE), but Judea was ruled directly by Roman prefects from 6 BCE onwards. During the period of Jesus' public ministry, this office was held by Pontius Pilate, who administered Judea for ten years during the principate of Tiberius (26–36 CE).<sup>14</sup> Pilate too worked closely with the Jewish elite—in this case, above all with the high priest of the day and with the Sanhedrin. In keeping with the relatively slight importance and size of Judea, Pilate as praefectus was only a member of the ordo equester, and was probably subordinate to the legate of Rome in Syria. Like all the Roman governors in the occupied territories, he was commander-in-chief of the soldiers. He was also supreme judge (especially in questions concerning capital punishment, of course); he had ritual and cultic tasks, and had to ensure tranquility and good order.<sup>15</sup> Contemporary verdicts see Pilate as extremely corrupt and cruel (cf. Philo, Legat. 300–303); while some modern historians view his conduct of office as cruel and anti-Semitic, others see him as a man without any extensive political experience and lacking in tact.<sup>16</sup> Here too, much depends on one's subjective evaluation. For example, Josephus tells us (War 2.169–174; Ant. 18.55–59) that Pilate brought into Jerusalem the military standards of the legions, which were decorated with images of the emperor, thereby breaching the prohibition against images. Finally, after persistent protests by the Jewish people, he had these standards removed. Pilate may have acted brutally and without political savoir faire on this occasion, but ultimately it is difficult to know whether this tells us anything about the alleged bad character of the prefect of Judea, since we must remember that this event was exceptional. For the same reason, it does not allow generalizing conclusions about a cruel and brutal oppression of the Jewish people by the might of Rome. However, the famous statement by Tacitus in his Histories (5.9) about the Jews—sub Tiberio quies (“under Tiberius there was calm”)—suggests that this particular epoch was an exception, and that the Roman supremacy in Judea and Galilee was normally harsh and also unjust.

<sup>14</sup> Josephus, Ant. 18.89.

<sup>15</sup> For a brief and informative overview of the Roman provincial administration, with an extensive bibliography, cf. R. Haensch, "Die römische Provinzialverwaltung im Frühen Prinzipat," in Neues Testament und Antike Kultur 1: Prolegomena, Quellen, Geschichte, ed. K. Erlemann, K.-L. Noethlichs, K. Scherberich, and J. Zangenberg, (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 2004), 149–158.

<sup>16</sup> H. K. Bond, Pontius Pilate in History and Interpretation (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988).

The sub Tiberio quies applies particularly to Galilee,<sup>17</sup> where (unlike in Judea) Roman soldiers were not permanently stationed.<sup>18</sup> There are no reports of rebellions in Galilee between 4 BCE and the beginning of the Jewish-Roman War (66–70 CE). In general, we must assume that Rome’s presence in Galilee and in Judea (apart from high festivals, when the prefect resided in Jerusalem) was experienced directly, especially by the rural population, not so much through the Roman soldiers, but rather through the tax burdens. I agree with Dunn’s comment: “The main political impact on the villages of Galilee, and on Jesus for most of his life, would have been in terms of taxes.” Dunn calculates that the tribute to the Romans amounted to ca. 12.5% per annum, while the so-called religious contributions (tithes and the temple tax) amounted to ca. 15% of people’s income; in addition, there were taxes and customs fees to be paid to Herod Antipas.<sup>19</sup>

We have no exact and detailed figures that tell us the amount of the tax burdens. Estimates vary between a tax of 12% and a tax of 15% on the national product... If we... bear in mind that poor Egyptian fellahin at the same period had to pay ca. 60 drachmas out of an average annual income of 210 drachmas, it is clear that a poor Palestinian farmer would scarcely have fared better. If we assume that he had to pay taxes for a family consisting of several members and that his income lay on the subsistence level, these exactions must have been an intolerable burden... A change of ruler always meant changes on points of detail, but the sum total of the burden of taxation on the people must have been relatively constant—and that means, very high. Even Tacitus admits that the taxes in the province of Judea were a heavy burden (Ann. 2.42), and it is clear that Herod was obliged several times to reduce the taxes (Ant.

---

<sup>17</sup> On this, cf. e.g., S. Freyne, Galilee from Alexander the Great to Hadrian, 323 BCE to 135 CE A Study of Second Temple Judaism (Wilmington, DE: Glazier, 1980), 68–71; Reed, Archaeology (n. 9 above); cf. also Dunn, Jesus Remembered (n. 4 above), 310.

<sup>18</sup> Z. Safrai, “The Roman Army in the Galilee,” in The Galilee in Late Antiquity, ed. L. I. Levine, (New York and Jerusalem: The Jewish Theological Seminary of America, 1992), 103–114.

<sup>19</sup> Dunn, Jesus Remembered (n. 4 above), 310–311.

15.303, 365; 16.64). In principle, however, the taxes were collected with absolute rigor.<sup>20</sup>

It must of course be admitted that we can do no more than estimate the severity of the burden of taxation on the population. James Dunn calculates a total burden of one third of production and income,<sup>21</sup> while others arrive at higher or lower figures. In general, however, the conclusion must be that the burden of taxes and payments was crushingly high for the great majority of the population, especially because (as the example of the rural population of Egypt shows) this amounted to a considerable percentage of a family income which was too low to begin with. When combined with the problems of debt (to which we shall return) and the ever looming possibility of catastrophe in the form of bad harvests, this high level of taxation could lead to the ruin of ordinary people. It is therefore unsurprising that there was popular anger at the taxes that went to the foreign occupying power, as well as those that went to support the local elite with their conspicuous building activities and their luxurious lifestyle. It was above all the poor rural population that suffered under the excessive taxation. Philo gives a vivid description of their situation in the first century CE (Spec. 3.159):<sup>22</sup>

Not long ago a certain man who had been appointed a collector of taxes in our country, when some of those who appeared to owe such tribute fled out of poverty, from a fear of intolerable punishment if they remained without paying, carried off their wives, and their children, and their parents, and their whole families by force, beating and insulting them, and heaping every kind of contumely and ill treatment upon them, to make them either give information as to where the fugitives had concealed themselves, or pay the money instead of them, though they could not do the one thing or the other; in the first place, because they did not know where they were, and secondly, because they were in still greater poverty than the men who had fled. But this tax-collector did not let them go till he had tortured their bodies with racks and wheels, so as to kill them with newly invented kinds of death, fastening a basket full of sand to their necks with cords, and suspending it there as a very heavy weight, and then placing them in the open air in the middle of the market place, that some of them, being tortured and being overwhelmed by all these afflictions at once, the wind, and the sun, and the mockery of the passers by, and the shame, and the heavy burden attached to them, might faint miserably, and that the rest, being spectators, might be grieved and take warning by their punishment, some of whom, having a more acute sense of such miseries in their minds than that which they could receive through their eyes, since they sympathized with these unfortunates as if they were themselves suffering in the persons of others, put an end to their own lives by swords, or poison, or halters, thinking it a great piece of good luck for persons, liable to such misery, to be able to meet death without torture.

<sup>20</sup> Stegemann and Stegemann, Urchristliche Sozialgeschichte (n. 6 above), 113.

<sup>21</sup> Dunn, Jesus Remembered (n. 4 above), 311.

<sup>22</sup> Eng. trans.: <http://www.earlyjewishwritings.com/philo.html>. Plutarch gives an account of similar cruelties to tax debtors in Asia Minor (Lucullus 20). At a later period (end of the third century CE), Lactantius describes how the tax registration (census) was carried out and what this led to: De mort. pers. 23.

The readiness of the rural people to engage in a revolt or a war against Rome (and against the local elite which was Rome's ally) in the 60's of the first century is surprising, since it went against their customary behavior; but there can be no doubt that this was generated precisely by the factors I have described here. Naturally, things had not come to such a pitch in the historical epoch that interests us, the first third of the century, and the phenomenon of anti-Roman rebel groups, the so-called sicarii or zealots, appears only at the period of the Jewish-Roman War itself, i.e., thirty years after the death of Jesus.<sup>23</sup> This fact alone makes it difficult to affirm that there was a permanent basic revolutionary mood in Judea or Galilee. And this in turn means that despite his execution on a cross, the condemnation of Jesus as a rebel against Rome<sup>24</sup> can scarcely be derived from a general picture of Jewish society at that date.

Not even R. Horsley, who notes an increasing "spiral of violence" in the Judean territory in the time of Jesus, assumes that Jewish society at that date was a breeding ground for revolutionary violence; and he does not include Jesus among the "zealots."<sup>25</sup> Rather, he understands Jesus as a non-violent social revolutionary who criticized above all the rich elite in his society and envisaged the national renewal of Israel on the basis of an egalitarian societal model with the goal of social justice: "The principal thrust of Jesus' practice and preaching... was

---

<sup>23</sup> On this, cf. the brief summary by Theissen, "Jesus und die symbolpolitischen Konflikte" (n. 5 above), 173–174.

<sup>24</sup> On this question, cf. the older monograph by S. G. F. Brandon, Jesus and the Zealots. A Study of the Political Factor in Primitive Christianity (New York: Scribner's, 1967), and the critical analysis by M. Hengel, War Jesus Revolutionär? (Stuttgart: Calwer Verlag, 1970).

<sup>25</sup> R. Horsley, Jesus and the Spiral of Violence (n. 6 above), 167.

to manifest and mediate the presence of the kingdom of God.”<sup>26</sup> Similarly, J. D. Crossan interprets Jesus’ preaching and praxis against the background of a social conflict between an oppressive urban elite of patrons and the mass of the rural populace whom they oppressed (as their clients). Naturally, this conflict was not confined to the Jewish territory; it marked all the societies in the Mediterranean world.<sup>27</sup> In other words, the background to a revolutionary interpretation is not sought directly in the political exercise of sovereignty by Rome and/or the indigenous partners of the empire, but rather in a societal situation which was gravely unjust; however, these scholars do not deny that the local elites and the representatives of Rome intended this state of affairs, made it worse, and finally took to arms to defend it.

The phenomenon of so-called “social banditry” is extremely important in this context.<sup>28</sup> E. Hobsbawm has described peasant revolts as “pre-political,” since they do not involve political programs or reforms.<sup>29</sup> Hanson and Oakman writes that when peasants revolt, “They react against economic, military, or ideological pressures manifested in new or increased taxes, occupation by foreign troops, disruption of temple functions.”<sup>30</sup> Social banditry is thus an ultimate form of reaction, a desperate expression of opposition to an unjust rule. Jesus himself was assuredly not a social bandit of this kind, but (as Hanson and Oakman convincingly argue) it was easy to take him for one of them:<sup>31</sup> when he is arrested, he is treated like a social bandit (γῆστῆς), as we see from Mark 14:48. He is crucified together with two social bandits (γῆσταί, Mark 15:27), and Pilate yields to pressure from the crowd and frees Barabbas, who is clearly also a γῆστῆς (Mark 15:6–15). Like the social bandits, Jesus came from the countryside (Mark 2:1) and like them, he found it

---

<sup>26</sup> Horsley, Jesus and the Spiral of Violence 207. J. Laaksonen, Jesus und das Land. Das gelobte Land in der Verkündigung Jesu (Åbo: Åbo Akademis förlag, 2002), 8, criticizes Horsley’s interpretation. His main argument is that “the kingdom which Jesus proclaimed” was “utterly eschatological and theocentric.” The first of these two terms has been the subject of renewed debate in recent years; and even a theocentric sovereignty means a government, as we can see in the theocracies of our own days.

<sup>27</sup> J. D. Crossan, The Historical Jesus. The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1991).

<sup>28</sup> On this, cf. especially Stegemann and Stegemann, Urchristliche Sozialgeschichte (n. 6 above), 157–160, and Hanson and Oakman, Palestine in the Time of Jesus (n. 7 above), 86–90.

<sup>29</sup> E. Hobsbawm, Bandits (London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1969).

<sup>30</sup> Hanson and Oakman, Palestine in the Time of Jesus (n. 7 above), 87.

<sup>31</sup> Ibid., 88.

problematic to pay tribute to Rome (Mark 12:13–17). It is at any rate possible that this background explains why the Romans took notice of Jesus, and why Pontius Pilate ordered his execution. In other words, I believe that it is possible that the Romans regarded Jesus as a social bandit (lêstês) and that this is why they crucified him with two other social bandits. The political and social backgrounds to Jesus' preaching and praxis would thus come together precisely in his death.

3. The Social Climate

In terms of their technological standard, the structure of government, and the means of production and redistribution, the societies of the Roman world can be classified as developed agrarian societies.<sup>32</sup>

This societal category offers the best interpretation of Galilee and Judea in the time of Jesus. The concept of agrarian society indicates that agriculture formed the economic backbone and that the overwhelming majority of the population—probably more than 90%—lived in the countryside and earned their living by farming. Not only did most people find their food here: most of the working population were engaged in agriculture. The concept of agrarian society does not however express the importance of the cities. Economically speaking, this consisted primarily in the fields of crafts and trade; and urban dwellers were also consumers of agricultural products.

Let us take the example of Galilee. According to Josephus (Vita 234), there were 204 localities in Galilee in the first century, but only a few of these were cities (e.g., Sepphoris and Tiberias, or smaller places like Tarichaea/Magdala). It is estimated that between ca. 150,000 and 200,000 people lived in Galilee at this period, most of them in small places like Nazareth. Only Sepphoris and Tiberias had large numbers of inhabitants: Meyers estimates 18,000 for Sepphoris and 24,000 for Tiberias,<sup>33</sup> but J. L. Reed assumes much smaller numbers. According to his calculations, between 8,000 and 12,000 persons lived in Sepphoris in the first century, and between 6,000 and 12,000 in Tiberias.<sup>34</sup> In Nazareth, which covered an area of ca. 5 hectares and lay off the trade routes, the population was probably under 400 persons, all of whom seem to have been involved in agriculture.<sup>35</sup> Some of them may have found work in nearby Sepphoris.

---

<sup>32</sup> On the categories involved here, cf. G. Lenski, Macht und Privileg. Eine Theorie der sozialen Schichtung (Frankfurt a.M.: Suhrkamp Verlag, 1977); for a summary, cf. Stegemann and Stegemann, Urchristliche Sozialgeschichte (n. 6 above), 19–25; Crossan, The Historical Jesus (n. 27 above); D. A. Fiensy, The Social History of Palestine. The Land is Mine (Lewiston, Queenston, and Lampeter: The Edwin Mellen Press, 1991), vi–viii is fundamental. Cf. also G. E. M. de Ste. Croix, The Class Struggle in the Ancient Greek World (Ithaca, NY: Cornell University, 1981), 210–211.

<sup>33</sup> E. M. Meyers, “Jesus und seine galiläische Lebenswelt,” ZNT 1 (1998): 27–39, at 27–29.

The traditional view—which can still be encountered today—that there was a sharp social, economic, and cultural antithesis between the city and the countryside seems to me to have been superseded. In the particular case of Galilee, the hostile attacks and lootings by the agricultural workers in Sepphoris and the attacks on Tiberias in the years between 66 and 70 CE, which Josephus relates in his Vita (66–67), do not constitute a counter-argument, because this was an exceptional situation which cannot be regarded as typical of the relationship between the urban and the rural populations. Rather, cities functioned as a kind of focal center for entire regions, so that the surrounding villages belonged to their catchment area and were influenced by them. In the case of Jesus' own village, Nazareth, this would mean that it belonged to the sphere of influence of Sepphoris, ca. 7 km away. "Tiberias and Sepphoris must be seen as minor urban centers, dominating the agricultural landscape of Galilee, but not large enough to attract substantial international trade."<sup>36</sup> In this respect, neither Tiberias nor Sepphoris can be compared to Caesarea Maritima or Tyre and Scythopolis. It is interesting to note that Sepphoris is not even mentioned in the Gospels! This has given rise to a number of speculations. Perhaps the town is not mentioned simply because it played no role in the history of the Jesus movement, which was active more in the proximity of the Sea of Galilee, especially in the vicinity of Capernaum.<sup>37</sup>

Another element in the influence of the cities on the social and political structures and on the character of the Mediterranean agrarian societies was the residence in the cities of the elites who dominated both the rural and the urban areas as big landowners with the authority

---

<sup>34</sup> Reed, Archaeology (n. 9 above), 80–82.

<sup>35</sup> Ibid., 131–132.

<sup>36</sup> Ibid., 96.

<sup>37</sup> On the problem of the relationship between city and countryside, cf. R. L. Rohrbaugh, "The Pre-Industrial City in Luke-Acts," in The Social World of Luke-Acts, ed. J. H. Neyrey, (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson 1991), 125–149.

to enforce societal control. Agricultural production (and naturally, not this alone) was subordinated to a political and societal system of government which concentrated the wealth of society via redistribution in the hands of a numerically small elite. This is why agrarian societies typically display not only these conditions of agricultural and economic production, but also the social injustice which results from the fact that the distribution of the goods of society is controlled by one small societal group, viz. the elite.

In his Social History of Palestine, Fiensy summarizes some essential aspects of the importance of this interpretative model of the developed agrarian society as follows:<sup>38</sup>

First of all then, peasants work their land for subsistence. They are not agricultural business people farming for profit, and land is not capital or commodity... Peasants do not view land as an investment and farming as a business. Farming is their way of life and the land their inherited means of life. Second, peasants... include... freeholders and tenants, but also day laborers and slaves... Third, peasants normally work their land as a family unit (nuclear or extended). The entire family must work together to provide a subsistence for itself. In the case of day laborers, however, the laborer works for wages usually apart from his family. Agricultural slaves may have had no families. Finally, all peasant societies are marked by a radical bifurcation in which a small group of aristocrats stands over against the mass of agriculturalists. The latter must surrender their surplus to the former...

The social stratification of agrarian societies is in accordance with this picture: we can distinguish between two basic societal sectors, elite and non-elite (i.e., the great mass of the population). Many different models of social stratification in classical antiquity have been proposed, but all contemporary models agree on this point, unlike earlier models which usually assumed the existence of a so-called middle class. We need not discuss here the nuances entailed in the distinction of these two large societal groups.<sup>39</sup> Ekkehard W. Stegemann and I have suggested the following model.<sup>40</sup>

We assume that societal systems of distribution are determined by three "basic elements": power, privileges, and prestige. These are the most important variables which determine the social position of a per-

---

<sup>38</sup> Fiensy, Social History (n. 32 above), vii.

<sup>39</sup> A comparable model of the societal structure of Palestine in the Herodian period, but following Lenski more closely, is proposed by Fiensy, ibid., 155–170.

<sup>40</sup> Stegemann and Stegemann, Urchristliche Sozialgeschichte (n. 6 above), 58–94.

son in the societal system. We agree with Lenski<sup>41</sup> in seeing the factor of power as the chief variable. This determines how the surplus of a society (i.e., the product of work which exceeds basic needs) is distributed. The privileges, which are understood as possession or control of part of the surplus which a society produces, depend on a share in societal power. And prestige is above all a function of power and privileges. A social class includes all those persons in a society who are in a similar social position because of their share in power, privileges, and prestige.

This dichotomous model, which defines social inequality by positing the existence of upper and lower classes, or elite and non-elite (the masses), has proved useful in describing the social stratification of society in classical antiquity. The existence of a “middle class (or classes)” in ancient societies is an unacceptable hypothesis, because the sharing in power divided these societies into a small powerful elite on the one hand and the powerless masses on the other. This constellation decided what share an individual would receive in societal privileges, especially in personal property, but also in terms of legal advantages. Extensive property was the only means by which rich men who did not occupy leading political positions, as well as women without a husband and freed slaves, could compensate for their lack of direct sharing in power, since their wealth gave them influence over those who exercised power. This means that those who had neither a leading political office nor private wealth did not belong to the societal elite. In order to do justice to the social differentiations which existed both within the elite and within the mass of the population, I use the plural “upper class groups” and “lower class groups.”

Within the upper classes, we can distinguish three groups: the Roman imperial aristocracy (the emperor’s house, the senators, and the knights), the provincial aristocracy (the elite in the provinces, such as the Herodian ruling house and the chief priests in Judea/Jerusalem), and the urban aristocracy (the decurions/Sanhedrin in Jerusalem). In this context, a special role is played by the group of the so-called retainers of the upper class. We could also call this group the functional elite, since it includes persons with particular competences (e.g., scribes and the financial administrators of royal houses or cities) who performed essential tasks for the elite but did not enjoy their prestige and social status; nor was it possible for them to have a direct share in political power. In these societies, wealth is in principle a privilege of the upper classes, but here too it is distributed very variously. The elite is estimated at between 2% and 10% of the total population.

---

<sup>41</sup> Lenski, Macht und Privileg (n. 32 above), 70–72.

The great mass of the population makes up the non-elite (lower classes) which possessed no power or privileges, unlike the ruling groups. This includes above all farmers (and fishers in Galilee), all rural agricultural workers or tenants (γεωργοί), day laborers (μίσθιοι) or slaves, as well as craftsmen, small tradesmen and businessmen, especially in the cities. On the lower margin of the lower classes, i.e., to some extent under subsistence level, we find beggars, prostitutes, shepherds, and bandits. One who was obliged to live below this subsistence level belongs to the absolutely poor (πτωχοί) who lacked even the minimum necessary for life. Everyone else belonged to a spectrum from the relatively poor (πένητες) to the relatively well off. In general, we may say that a total lack of political power, a lack of social prestige, and economic poverty are typical of the lower classes.

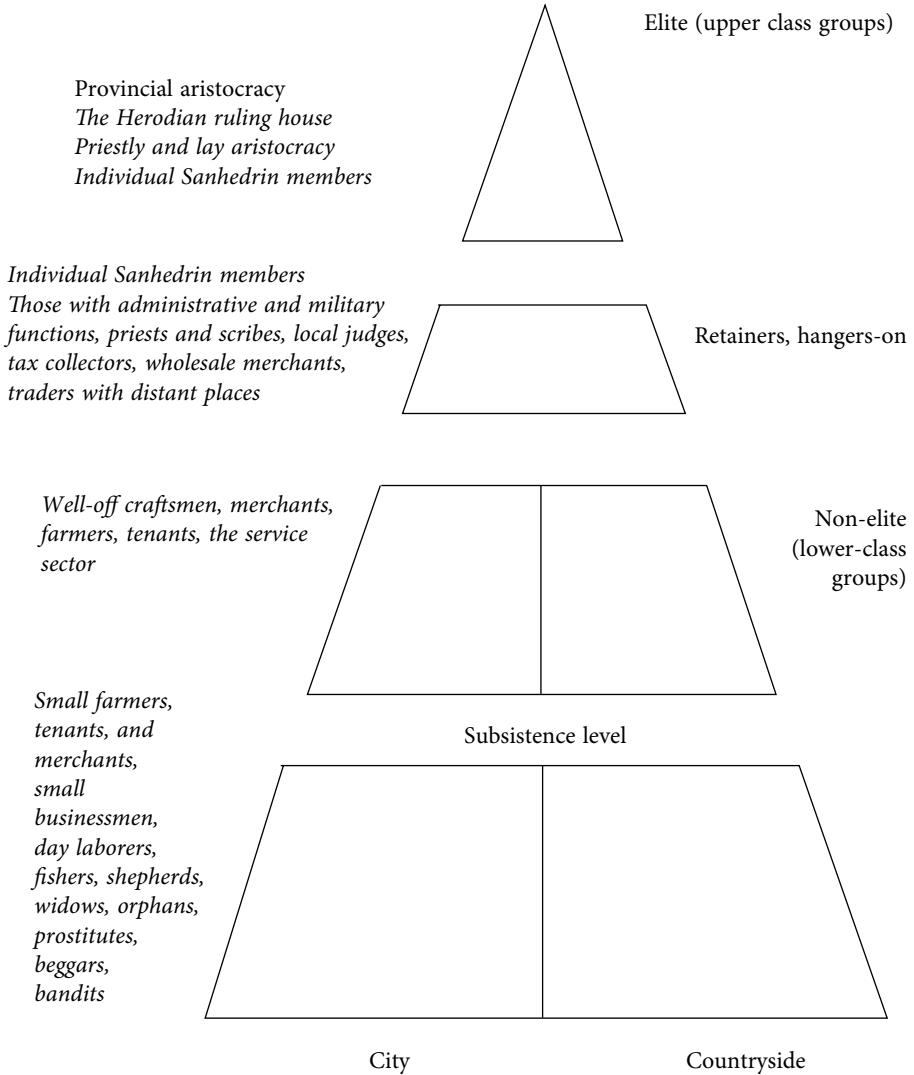

The following social pyramid (from Stegemann and Stegemann, Urchristliche Sozialgeschichte, 127) gives an overview of this situation.

In principle, the distribution of wealth and poverty runs parallel to the social stratification set out above. Only members of the elite were rich in the strict sense of the term, although there were of course considerable nuances within this group.

Examples of wealth: wealth was expressed above all in the extensive possession of land. There was an immense concentration of landed property everywhere in the Roman empire. In North Africa, for example, 50% of landed property was in the hands of six big landowners, while in some places more than 60 peasant families had to share a plot of 2,200 square meters. In Galilee, the kings seem to have possessed extensive estates only in the outer districts, in the Plain of Jezreel, in Beth Anath to the north of Upper Galilee, and along the coast.<sup>42</sup> The wealthy had palaces (domus) in the cities and villas in the countryside. Their houses were usually luxuriously furnished, so that the furnishings alone represented a considerable value in monetary terms. In the imperial period, the city residences, e.g., of the senators in Rome, increased in number, and their furnishings became more elaborate. Impressive examples of the luxurious residences of the rich are the palaces of the Flavians in Rome and of the Herodians in the land of Israel. Banquets were a special characteristic of wealth, and the clothing of the rich marked them off from the rest of the population. Wealth and status were signaled by a purple-dyed outer garment of wool and an under-garment of fine linen. When Jesus describes John the Baptist, he asks the people whether they went out to him in the desert to see a man in soft garments. And he himself at once answers his own rhetorical question: “Those who are gorgeously appareled and live in luxury are in king’s courts” (Luke 7:25).

---

<sup>42</sup> J. L. Reed, Archaeology (n. 9 above), 85.

Social pyramid: Societal stratification of Jewish society in the land of Israel (without specifying religious groups)

It was certainly possible for individual families from the lower classes to attain a certain measure of prosperity, as we see for example in the funeral monuments of craftsmen who had worked on the construction of the Jerusalem temple,<sup>43</sup> but we cannot assume that all such lower-class craftsmen became prosperous. I believe that we have a comparable case in some free farmers, such as we find in the Lukan parables, where they are described as “rich” (πλούσιος): cf. Luke 12:16–21; 16:1–8, 19–31; 15:11–32). Perhaps the “householders” (οικοδοασπότης) whom we meet in Matthean parables (cf. Matt 13:24–30; 20:1–16) belong in the same category. In any event, however, one should not suppose that these prosperous members of the lower classes were numerous. I believe that the great majority of the population lived on a scale between “poor” and “destitute.”

This applies to the small-scale free farmers and fishers, most of whom (as Ben-David has calculated) were scarcely capable of earning the basic minimum needed for the sustenance of their families.<sup>44</sup> If his calculations are approximately correct, a free farmer in Palestine would have had to cultivate an area of at least between 8 and 10 hectares in order to guarantee the basic minimum sustenance for a family of seven persons; other calculations arrive at a somewhat smaller cultivated area,<sup>45</sup> but even if we assume that only an area of 0.5 hectares per person was required, a large family in classical antiquity—such as the family of Jesus, which according to Mark 6:3 numbered at least nine persons—would have needed a cultivated area of ca. 4.5 hectares. In

<sup>43</sup> Fiensy, Social History (n. 32 above), 164.

<sup>44</sup> Cf. A. Ben-David, Talmudische Ökonomie. Die Wirtschaft des jüdischen Palästina zur Zeit der Mischna und des Talmud (Hildesheim and New York: Georg Olms, 1974), 297–299. Cf. also Fiensy, Social History (n. 32 above), 93–94; Z. Safrai, The Economy of Roman Palestine (London and New York: Routledge, 1994), 358–364.

<sup>45</sup> Stegemann and Stegemann, Urchristliche Sozialgeschichte (n. 6 above), 81–83.

Italy, according to one calculation, the small farmers possessed an area of 2.5 hectares.

J. L. Reed assumes that 1 hectare of cultivated land can provide two persons with the grain necessary for their sustenance:

The average per capita intake of grain, the basic staple of the Mediterranean diet in antiquity, is estimated at 250 kg per inhabitant. A good return on 150 kg seed per hectare in Galilee's fertile soil could yield an annual crop of 1,000–1,200 kg, of which 150 kg would have to be set aside for next year's seed. Given the necessity of a biennial fallow, and not accounting for any taxes in kind passed on outside Galilee, 1 hectare could supply grain for two people. The best arable land around Sepphoris in the Beth Netofah Valley is around 5,000 hectares; along the Nahal Zippori another 1,000 hectares are found; and the Tir'an Valley measures around 3,000 hectares. This would supply grain for around 18,000 people per year.<sup>46</sup>

There are many indications that the region around Sepphoris was one of the most fertile in Galilee; this also helps explain why the city was founded. Nevertheless, this does not mean that the Galilean population in the vicinity of Sepphoris was rich in any real sense, for if the inhabitants of Sepphoris alone numbered ca. 12,000, and a third of the harvest went to pay taxes and contributions, then in fact only the inhabitants of Sepphoris would have been able to satisfy their hunger—on this calculation, the surrounding districts with their rural population would lack food. One good example of the situation in Galilee is provided by the two grandsons of Jude, a brother of Jesus. When the Emperor Domitian asked them about their possessions,<sup>47</sup>

They said that the between the two of them they had only nine thousand denarii, half belonging to each of them; and this they asserted that they had not in money, but only in thirty-nine plethra of land, so valued, from which by their own labors they both paid the taxes and supported themselves. And then they showed also their hands... as a proof of personal labor.

This means that each grandson of Jesus' brother possessed ca. 6 hectares of cultivated land! Once taxes and contributions had been paid, this would under even the most favorable circumstances have supplied only a family of 8 persons with the grain they needed—and extremely few persons will have had as much agricultural land as this. There were big landowners in Galilee too, and it is possible that here too extensive properties were in the hands of a few persons. The so-called parable of the “wicked husbandmen” (Mark 12:1–12) describes a typical situation: the land belongs to a “lord” who is absent (i.e., who lives in a city). He lets it out to tenants and sends a representative of his interests to collect the dues. The parable of the laborers in the vineyard (Matt 20:1–3) indicates that small farmers could find extra work at harvest time; at the same time, however, it indicates that this possibility of extra income was limited. Women on their own (widows) and their children were particularly hard hit by poverty and destitution, and it is not by chance that the gospels contain specific exhortations to look after children (presumably orphans or foundlings): cf. Mark 9:33–37 par.; Mark 10:13–16.<sup>48</sup>

<sup>46</sup> Reed, Archaeology (n. 9 above), 88.

<sup>47</sup> Hegesippus apud Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.20,1–6. Eng. trans.: Eusebius, The Ecclesiastical History, trans. H. J. Lawlor and J. E. L. Oulton, 1: Translation (London: SPCK, 1927), 80.

What did the poor wear and eat? It seems that among the ordinary people, the possession of two under-garments distinguished the better-off from those who were poorer. The outer garment was such a valuable possession for the poor that it could serve as a “pledge” (Matt 5:40). One who wore no outer garment showed thereby either that he was extremely poor and/or that he lived outside the normal criteria, like the demoniac in Luke 8:27. In this context, the term “naked” (γυμνός) designates persons without a cloak, who had only an under-garment or rags on their bodies. Both these situations express a particularly low social status; this is also expressed by dark, rough, and shabby outer garments, which were considered typical of poor people and slaves. In principle, meat was prohibitively expensive. At most, it was eaten only on high feast days. The staple food of the poor was gray bread and olive oil, with vegetables (above all onions) or eggs where possible. We read in a midrash (Sif. Deut. 37.76b): “If your father is rich, he feeds you on meat, fish, and old wine... if your father is poor, he feeds you on vegetables and peas.” There can be no doubt that large sections of the population suffered from chronic undernourishment,

---

<sup>48</sup> Cf. W. Stegemann, “Lasset die Kinder zu mir kommen. Sozialgeschichtliche Aspekte des Kinderevangeliums,” in Traditionen der Befreiung. Sozialgeschichtliche Bibelauslegungen 1: Methodische Zugänge, ed. W. Schottroff and W. Stegemann, (München: Kaiser and Gelnhausen, Berlin, and Stein: Burckhardhaus-Laetare, 1980), 114–144.

and in times of distress many poor families were reducing to eating grass and roots.

The gulf between the poor and the rich is marked most clearly by the problem of debt, which was caused (as I have mentioned above) by the iron grip of the rulers on the land and the heavy burden of taxation. We find references to the problem of debt above all in Josephus and the synoptic gospels,<sup>49</sup> and in the Mishnah. The parable of the merciless debtor (Matt 18:23–35) gives a particularly vivid picture.<sup>50</sup> Naturally, a debt of 10,000 talents (= 60,000,000 denarii!), the first debt to be mentioned in the parable, is utterly exaggerated and scarcely conceivable among private persons, although we know of some private fortunes on this scale (indeed, some members of the imperial dynasties possessed even larger sums). Debts on such a scale or even higher were incurred only in connection with the reimbursement of the costs of a war, i.e., as tribute imposed on the conquered rulers or peoples, and when the licenses to collect taxes in the provinces were auctioned. On the other hand, debts of 100 denarii (as in the second scene of the parable) were not at all uncommon. “The great majority of debts in classical antiquity involved such sums.”<sup>51</sup> A variety of measures could be taken by creditors against tardy or insolvent debtors,<sup>52</sup> from the remission of the debt (which was in fact forbidden in the sabbath and jubilee year before the prosbol of Hillel; it might occur at a change of ruler), via reduction and deferment of payment, to the collection of the debt by means of public or private imprisonment (cf. Matt 5:25–26/Luke 12:57–59; Matt 18:30; Josephus, War 2.273), seizure by a bailiff, and debt-slavery (where above all the debtor’s children and wives had to pay for him: cf. Matt 18:25). Scholars dispute whether debt-slavery occurred in Judea, but in addition to this parable and Matt 5:25–26/Luke 12:57–59, Josephus (cf. Ant. 16.1–3) and rabbinic texts suggest that it did exist; it seems however that the Essenes rejected it (cf. Philo, Quod omnis probus liber sit 79). The coercive measures employed by creditors could also include physical violence, such as throttling the debtor (cf. Matt 18:28) or torturing him (cf. Matt 18:34); these could

<sup>49</sup> Cf. Matt 5:25–26/Luke 12:57–59; Matt 5:40; Matt 5:42/Luke 6:35; Luke 4:18; 16:1–8; 6:12; 18:23–35.

<sup>50</sup> M. Leutzsch, “Verschuldung und Überschuldung, Schuldenerlaß und Sündenvergebung,” in Schuld und Schulden. Biblische Traditionen in gegenwärtigen Konflikten, ed. M. Crüsemann and W. Schottroff, (München: Kaiser Verlag 1992), 104–131.

<sup>51</sup> Ibid., 120.

<sup>52</sup> Ibid., 108–110.

also be inflicted on relatives, neighbors, and friends of the debtor. The measures taken by the creditor—and indeed, whether or not he took any measures—depended on the social position of the debtor; coercive measures are more likely to have been employed when there was a large social gulf between the creditor and the debtor than in cases where the debt was incurred between members of the upper class whose position was equal. “On occasion, however, Roman provincial governors did not shrink from employing such measures in order to persuade local dignitaries to pay their debts.”<sup>53</sup> Debtors had only limited legal means to help them when debts were to be “settled” (cf. also Luke 16:1–3) but they could not pay. They could request a deferment or even a remission of payment, but it was also possible to get a more highly placed person or body to intervene in order to prevent the punishment from being carried out, as at Matt 18:31. Where this was unsuccessful, the only way out was flight or suicide. It is not by chance that the destruction of archives relating to debt is mentioned in the accounts of rebellions.

We may sum up this review of living conditions by saying that the great majority of the rural population in antiquity lived on the narrow margin between survival and hunger, because the average size of their fields was too small, bad harvests had catastrophic consequences, and the small farmers had to pay excessive taxes and incurred heavy debts. It is clear that the ordinary people in the countryside—i.e., the great majority of the population—lived in constant anxiety about whether they could earn enough for basic sustenance. We get a glimpse of the wretched living conditions of many persons in antiquity from the treatise of the physician Galen (born 129 CE) De alimentorum facultatibus 7.749–751:

Among many of the peoples conquered by the Romans, e.g., by the city dwellers, it was customary immediately after the harvest to gather and store up enough grain for the next year and to leave what remained over for the people in the countryside, for example peas and beans; a large amount of this too made its way into the city. The rural population ate the peas and beans in the winter, and were therefore obliged to have recourse to unhealthy foodstuffs in the spring. They ate twigs and shoots of trees and bushes, as well as tubers and roots of indigestible plants; they ate their fill of wild herbs, and also cooked fresh grass.

---

<sup>53</sup> Leutsch, “Verschuldung”, 122.

This “unhealthy” consumption of twigs and fresh grass in the spring-time shows that their reserves lasted only for the winter. We must of course assume that the majority of the urban population too was poor, but this text by Galen suggests that they were not actually threatened by starvation. It is clear that the magistrates, especially the “inspectors of the market,” saw to this, in order to ward off social unrest. In particular, the inhabitants of Rome seem to have profited from this politically sensitive situation. Perhaps we can say in general that living conditions in the urban centers in the west of the Roman empire were more or less bearable; this was certainly the case in Rome, which covered its needs with grain from Egypt and North Africa. But we must assume that in the eastern regions of the empire, even in the cities, large sectors of the population became poorer and poorer.

4. Concluding Remarks

Can we sum up briefly the political and social climate in Galilee and Judea at the time of Jesus? This is no doubt possible, but we must also remember that every summary of this kind is subjective. It is an academic construction that seeks, as Hegel said, to employ concepts in order to understand time (from a political and social perspective). This means that scholars can reach widely differing conclusions precisely in this field. For example, J. L. Reed criticizes the emphasis that Louise Schottroff and I made on poverty in one of the first social-historical interpretations of the Jesus movement—a good thirty years ago!—as an “exaggeration.”<sup>54</sup> On the basis of a large number of data in the gospels and in other texts, we concluded that there was an economic and political crisis in Jewish Palestine in the time of Jesus, and we described the Jesus movement as a “poverty movement” by and for poor Jewish men and women. We also held that this primarily concerned the rural population, whose situation we interpreted in general terms as one of crisis and economic catastrophe. We found the main evidence for this conclusion in the gospels themselves, where we saw a significant link between the preaching and experience of Jesus, or of the Jesus movement, with the problem of poverty—i.e., of absolute poverty, which is suggested both by the relatively frequent occurrence of the Greek term πτωχός and by astonishingly concrete and (by comparison with other texts from classical antiquity) frequent descriptions of the situations of destitute persons. The methodological path led us from the gospels to a thorough analysis of the social history of ancient Mediterranean society as a whole, and that of Palestine in particular. We also believed that the execution of Jesus by the dominant Roman power in Palestine belonged in this context too. The mode of execution and the description of the men who were crucified with Jesus as “bandits” (λησταί) indicate that Jesus was (wrongly) taken by the Romans for an anti-Roman rebel, and probably for a “social bandit”—a case for which the death penalty was envisaged.

---

<sup>54</sup> L. Schottroff and W. Stegemann, Jesus von Nazareth, Hoffnung der Armen (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer 1978); Reed, Archaeology (n. 9 above), 97–98. He makes a similar criticism of Horsley, Jesus and the Spiral of Violence (n. 6 above).

One can of course arrive at other conclusions, as does J. L. Reed. On the basis of the available data, which is much more differentiated by now, and especially of his encyclopedic knowledge of the relevant archaeological publications, he interprets the utterances of Jesus, e.g., in the so-called Sermon on the Mount (Q 6:20, “Blessed are you πτωχοὶ”), as a reaction to the “economic strain” imposed on the whole of Galilee by Antipas’ construction of the cities of Sepphoris and Tiberias. It was this strain that led to the poverty in Galilee to which the gospels refer. Reed also discusses the excessive debts of the rural population and points out with good reason that Jesus draws an antithesis between the current process of monetarization and the ideal of the traditional reciprocity between neighbors. I believe that ultimately, there is no great distance between these interpretations. Reed argues (more clearly than Schottroff and Stegemann) that the foundation of two urban centers in Galilee changed the economic situation to the disadvantage of the rural population; I willingly admit that this shift in the political and social climate of Galilee lends an additional plausibility to the rise of the Jesus movement.<sup>55</sup>

---

<sup>55</sup> Eng. trans.: Brian McNeil.

THE CHRONOLOGY OF JESUS

HAROLD W. HOEHNER*

Jesus Christ entered into the history of our world. Christianity, therefore, has an historical basis. Since chronology is the backbone of history, chronology serves as a necessary framework onto which the events of history may be fitted. Hence, a chronology of Jesus' life gives a framework to his activities on earth.

1. The Birth of Jesus

The earliest Christians were not as much concerned about the date as about the fact of the birth of Jesus. However, for a chronological framework there are three areas that need to be considered: (1) the year of the death of Herod, (2) the census of Quirinius, and (3) the star of the Magi.

1.1. The Death of Herod

According to Matt 2:1 and Luke 1:5, Jesus was born during the reign of Herod the Great, king of the Jews. More specifically, in Matt 2:15–16, 19–20, he was born shortly before Herod's death. Herod was proclaimed king of the Jews by the Roman Senate by nomination of Antony and Octavius in late 40 BCE,<sup>1</sup> but he did not gain control of his domain until summer or fall of 37 BCE.<sup>2</sup> He died after he had reigned for thirty-seven years from the time he was made king or thirty-four years from the time of his possession of the land, 4 BCE.<sup>3</sup> Shortly before his death, there was an eclipse of the moon.<sup>4</sup> This is the only eclipse mentioned by Josephus and it occurred on March 12/13, 4 BCE.<sup>5</sup> After

---

* Harold W. Hoehner (1935–2009)

<sup>1</sup> Josephus, Ant. 14.381–385; War 1.282–285.

<sup>2</sup> Ant. 14.470–480; War 1.349–352.

<sup>3</sup> Ant. 17.191; War 1.665.

<sup>4</sup> Ant. 17.167.

<sup>5</sup> Emil Schürer, The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ (175 BC–AD 135), trans. T. A. Burkill et al., new English version rev. and ed. Geza Vermes, Fergus Millar, and Matthew Black, vol. 1 (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1973), 327 n. 165.

his death there was the celebration of the Passover,<sup>6</sup> the first day of which would have occurred on April 11, 4 BCE.<sup>7</sup> Hence, his death occurred sometime between March 12 and April 11. Since the thirty-fourth year of his reign would have most likely begun on Nisan 1, 4 BCE (March 29, 4 BCE),<sup>8</sup> his death would have occurred sometime between March 29 and April 11, 4 BCE.<sup>9</sup> For these reasons, Christ could not have been born later than March/April of 4 BCE.

This date for the death of Herod has been challenged, suggesting that he died in 1 BCE.<sup>10</sup> It is argued that Herod's appointment as king and his capture of Jerusalem took place not in 40 and 37 BCE but in 39 and 36 respectively, and therefore, reckoning the thirty-four years

<sup>6</sup> Josephus, War 2.10; Ant. 17.213.

<sup>7</sup> Cf. Richard A. Parker and Waldo H. Dubberstein, Babylonian Chronology 626 BC–AD 75, 2nd ed., Brown University Studies 19 (Providence: Brown University Press, 1956), 45.

<sup>8</sup> Ibid.

<sup>9</sup> Schürer, The History of the Jewish People, 1:326–328 n. 165; Harold W. Hoehner, Chronological Aspects of the Life of Christ (Grand Rapids: Zondervan Publishing House, 1977), 12–13; J. van Bruggen, “The Year of the Death of Herod the Great (Τελευτήσαντος δὲ τοῦ Ἡρώδου...), Mt ii 19),” in Miscellanea Neotestamentica, ed. T. Baarda, A. F. J. Klijn, and W. C. van Unnik, vol. 2, NovTSup 48 (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1978), 1–15; William P. Armstrong, and Jack Finegan, “Chronology of the NT,” in Geoffrey W. Bromily et al., eds, ISBE 1 (Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Co., 1979), 686–687; Harold W. Hoehner, “The Date of the Death of Herod the Great,” in Chronos, Kairos, Christos: Nativity and Chronological Studies Presented to Jack Finegan, ed. Jerry Vardaman and Edwin M. Yamauchi (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1989), 101–111; Paul L. Maier, “The Date of the Nativity and the Chronology of Jesus' Life,” in ibid., 115–118; Alla Kushnir-Stein, “Another Look at Josephus' Evidence for the Date of Herod's Death,” Scripta Classica Israelica 14 (1995): 73–86; Peter Richardson, Herod: King of the Jews and Friend of the Romans, Studies on Personalities of the New Testament (Columbia University of South Carolina Press, 1996), 18–20, 296; Nikos Kokkinos, The Herodian Dynasty: Origins, Role in Society and Eclipse, JSPSup 30 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998), 172–173, 372–373; S. E. Porter, “Chronology, New Testament,” in Dictionary of New Testament Background, ed. Craig A. Evans and Stanley E. Porter (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2000), 201; cf. Daniel R. Schwartz, Studies in the Jewish Background of Christianity, Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament 60 (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr [Paul Siebeck], 1992), 157–166.

<sup>10</sup> W. E. Filmer, “The Chronology of the Reign of Herod the Great,” JTS 17 (1966): 283–295; Ernest L. Martin, The Birth of Christ Recalculated, 2nd ed. (Pasadena, CA: Foundation for Biblical Research, 1980); John Thorley, “When Was Jesus Born?” Greece & Rome (April 1981): 84–85; Ormond Edwards, “Herodian Chronology,” PEQ 114 (January–June 1982): 29–42; Ernest L. Martin, “The Nativity and Herod's Death,” in Chronos, Kairos, Christos: Nativity and Chronological Studies Presented to Jack Finegan, ed. Jerry Vardaman and Edwin M. Yamauchi (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1989), 85–92; Jack Finegan, Handbook of Biblical Chronology: Principles of Time Reckoning in the Ancient World and Problems of Chronology in the Bible, rev. ed. (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson Publishers, 1998), 299–301.

from the capture of Jerusalem, Herod would have died around 2 BCE. Furthermore, it is suggested that there was a total lunar eclipse on January 9/10 in 1 BCE and thus Herod would have died in 1 BCE<sup>11</sup> and Jesus would have been born around 2 BCE. This view is attractive to those who hold that Jesus died in 33 CE, as I do, because it is easier to explain statements such as Jesus' ministry commencing when he was thirty years old (Luke 3:23).

However, this view flies in the face of historical evidence from the first century. Two areas must be examined: (1) the calculation of the beginning and the end of Herod's reign; and (2) observation of chronological statements regarding his successors' reigns.

First, regarding the duration of Herod's reign: Herod was made king of the Jews by the Roman Senate by nomination of Antony and Octavius in the 184th Olympiad, i.e., at the end of 40 BCE.<sup>12</sup> This is the last time Antony and Octavius were in Rome together. The date of Jerusalem's capture by Herod is disputed on two grounds. On the one hand, Dio Cassius places the capture in 38 BCE during the consulship of Claudius and Norbanus (49.23.1). But this is too early, because Herod was not able to receive troops before the autumn of 38 BCE, shortly after Antony had captured Samosata (Josephus, Ant. 14.439–447; cf. Plutarch, Ant. 34.2–4), and because Josephus states that the final siege of Jerusalem was in the third year after Herod had been appointed king (Ant. 14.465). Thus, Jerusalem could not have been captured before 37 BCE. On the other hand, Josephus states that Jerusalem's capture occurred twenty-seven years after Pompey's capture of Jerusalem, hence Filmer would date it on the Day of Atonement 36 BCE.<sup>13</sup> However, Jerusalem's defeat could not have been as late as 36 BCE, for in the spring of that year Antony led a large campaign against Parthia (Dio Cassius, 49.24–31) with approximately 100,000 soldiers, and it seems highly unlikely that Antony would have had a

---

<sup>11</sup> Filmer, "The Chronology of the Reign of Herod the Great," 285–293; Edwards, "Herodian Chronology," 29–33; Martin, "The Nativity and Herod's Death," 86–87; Finegan, Handbook of Biblical Chronology, 300–301.

<sup>12</sup> Josephus, Ant. 14.389; War 1.282–285; this is confirmed by Tacitus, Hist 5.9; Dio Cassius, 49.22; Appian, BC 5.75; cf. Schürer, The History of the Jewish People, 251, 281–282 n. 3; Finegan, Handbook of Biblical Chronology, 84, 292. Because of the narrative in Josephus, it is necessary for Herod's appointment to be at the end of 40 BC. This makes Josephus slightly inaccurate, because the 184th Olympiad ended on June 30, 40 BC.

<sup>13</sup> Filmer, "The Chronology of the Reign of Herod the Great," 285–289.

large contingent of soldiers for the capture of Jerusalem in the same year.<sup>14</sup> Although 63 BCE minus the twenty-seven years would result in 36 BCE, Josephus must have been counting the years inclusively, as he does elsewhere, because he states that Jerusalem was captured during the consulship at Rome of Marcus Agrippa and Caninius Gallus in the 185th Olympiad, which would be in the summer of 37 BCE.<sup>15</sup> Thirty-four years subtracted from 37 BCE would then result in 4 BCE, making the thirty-seven years from 40 BCE and thirty-four years from 37 BCE, reckoning inclusively.

Second, we must observe the reigns of Herod's three sons and note how they confirm the 4 BCE date for the death of Herod. Although there was considerable dispute about who would succeed Herod, it is necessary to reckon the beginning of that person's reign immediately after Herod's death.<sup>16</sup>

Archelaus was deposed in his tenth year according to Antiquities (17.342), or in his ninth year according to Jewish War (2.111). The difference of a year could be due to Josephus' use of sources, or possibly to the fact that he counted from the time of Archelaus' return from Rome to his domain in 3 BCE, whereas in Antiquities he calculated from the time of Herod's death. The ten-year length of reign is more accurate, because Josephus confirms it in his Life (1). If this is true, reckoning the tenth year from 4 BCE would result in Archelaus' deposition in 6 CE. This is further substantiated by Dio Cassius, who explicitly states that Archelaus was banished during the consulship of Aemilius Lepidus and Lucius Arruntius, i.e., in 6 CE (55.25.1; 27.6). Therefore, the date of 4 BCE for Herod's death fits well.

---

<sup>14</sup> M. Stern, "Appendix: Chronology," in The Jewish People in the First Century. Historical Geography, Political History, Social, Cultural and Religious Life and Institutions, ed. S. Safrai, M. Stern, D. Flusser, and W. C. van Unnik, vol. 1, Compendia Rerum Iudaicarum ad Novum Testamentum, sec. 1.1 (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, and Assen: van Gorcum & Comp. B.V., 1974), 67.

<sup>15</sup> Josephus, Ant. 14.487; cf. War 1.351; Finegan, Handbook of Biblical Chronology, 84, 292. Filmer does not reckon the years inclusively, but Bernegger gives ample evidence that Josephus did count inclusively. Cf. P. M. Bernegger, "Affirmation of Herod's Death in 4 BC," JTS 34 (1983): 526–531; Hoehner, "The Date of the Death of Herod the Great," 103–105.

<sup>16</sup> Harold W. Hoehner, Herod Antipas, SNTSMS 17 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1972; reprint, Grand Rapids: Zondervan Publishing House, 1980), 18–39; Timothy D. Barnes, "The Date of Herod's Death," JTS 19 (1968): 204–209; van Bruggen, "The Year of the Death of Herod the Great," 4–8.

Herod Antipas was deposed in the summer of 39 CE.<sup>17</sup> This is substantiated by numismatic evidence which shows that the last coins of Herod Antipas were minted in his forty-third year.<sup>18</sup> Calculating backward results in 4 BCE for Antipas' accession and the death of Herod the Great.

According to Josephus, Philip the Tetrarch died in the twentieth year of Tiberius' reign (19 August 33 to 18 August 34 CE), after thirty-seven years of rule over Trachonitis, Gaulanitis, and Batanea.<sup>19</sup> Since Philip reigned for thirty-seven years, that is, he was in his thirty-eighth year (his last coin was minted in his thirty-seventh year),<sup>20</sup> and reckoning backward from the Julian year which ended on 31 December CE 34, Philip would have begun his reign in 4 BCE. Again, this would demonstrate that Herod the Great died in the same year.

Herod Agrippa I, the grandson of Herod the Great, must be considered here because of the chronological link to Philip the Tetrarch and Herod Antipas. Herod Agrippa died when he was fifty-four, in the seventh year of his reign. Josephus mentions that Agrippa reigned for four years under Gaius, ruling during three of these over the tetrarchy of Philip; Antipas' territory was added in his fourth year.<sup>21</sup> From this one can calculate that Agrippa reigned during Gaius' four years as emperor, from 18 March 37 CE to 24 January 41 CE. Although Gaius conferred on Agrippa the tetrarchy of Philip shortly after he became emperor, it was not until Gaius' second year (summer 38) that Agrippa went to secure his territory.<sup>22</sup> Furthermore, Agrippa acquired Antipas' territory in the fourth year of Agrippa's rule (40 CE), a year after Antipas' banishment. This is a reasonable inference, for some time must have elapsed between Antipas' deposition and Agrippa's

<sup>17</sup> Josephus, Ant. 18.252; cf. 256; 19.351. See Hoehner, Herod Antipas, 262–273.

<sup>18</sup> Frederic W. Madden, History of Jewish Coinage and of Money in the Old and New Testament, Prolegomenon by Michael Avi-Yonah, Library of Biblical Studies (New York: KTAV Publishing House, 1967; reprint, London: Bernard Quaritch, 1864), 99; A. Reifenberg, Ancient Jewish Coins, 2nd and rev. ed. (Jerusalem: Rubin Mass, 1947), 45; Ya'akov Meshorer, Jewish Coins of the Second Temple Period (Tel-Aviv: Am Hassefer, 1967), 72–75, no. 75; David Hendin, Guide to Biblical Coins (New York: Amphora Books, 1987), 68–69, coins 68, 68a, 69.

<sup>19</sup> Josephus, Ant. 18.106.

<sup>20</sup> Madden, History of Jewish Coinage, 102; Reifenberg, Ancient Jewish Coins, 44; Meshorer, Jewish Coins of the Second Temple Period, 76–77, no. 84; Hendin, Guide to Biblical Coins, 69–71, coin 72.

<sup>21</sup> Josephus, Ant. 19.351.

<sup>22</sup> Josephus, Ant. 18.23.

acquisition of his lands. Hence, Agrippa I's rule fits well within the chronological scheme of his acquisition of the territories of Herod's sons. All of this indicates that Herod the Great died in 4 BCE.

Because the historical data point to 4 BCE for the succession of Herod's sons, Filmer suggests that Archelaus and Antipas were co-regents with Herod until his death in 1 BCE.<sup>23</sup> However, there is no evidence in the sources to suggest this. Moreover, Herod was not inclined to share or delegate his authority. Martin, realizing Filmer's dilemma, suggests that Herod had fallen out of favor with the Emperor Augustus in 4 BCE and that another son, Antipater (not Antipas), had a two-year joint rule with Herod until Herod's death in 1 BCE.<sup>24</sup> Herod had indeed fallen out of favor with the Emperor, but this was immediately after his war with the Arabs around 10/9 BCE<sup>25</sup> and just before he killed his sons Alexander and Aristobulus in 8/7 BCE, not during the period from 4 to 1 BCE.<sup>26</sup> It is unlikely that Herod's disgrace could have happened later than after 7 BCE. Furthermore, Herod had spoken of Antipater as his successor,<sup>27</sup> and this indicates that Antipater was not on the throne as co-regent.<sup>28</sup> Besides this, how could Antipater be co-regent with Herod when he was in Rome during this time? Hence, we must conclude that Herod was sole ruler until his death in 4 BCE.

1.2. The Census of Quirinius

According to Luke 2:1–5, Augustus ordered a worldwide census prior to Jesus' birth. Subsequently, Joseph and Mary traveled to their hometown, Bethlehem, to register. The purpose of a census was to provide statistical data for the levy of taxes in the provinces. The date of this census is difficult to pinpoint. Although Luke seems to imply that a worldwide census was decreed at that particular time, no Roman historian specifically mentions this census, though there were periodic censuses in various provinces. For example, in Gaul censuses were

<sup>23</sup> Filmer, "The Chronology of the Reign of Herod the Great," 296–297.

<sup>24</sup> Martin, The Birth of Christ Recalculated, 115–122.

<sup>25</sup> Josephus, Ant. 16.282–290.

<sup>26</sup> Josephus, Ant. 16.352; cf. Hoehner, "The Date of the Death of Herod the Great," 108–109.

<sup>27</sup> Josephus, War 1.623; Ant. 17.116; cf. Barnes, "The Date of Herod's Death," 204–209.

<sup>28</sup> Barnes, "The Date of Herod's Death," 206.

conducted in 27 and 12 BCE, and in Cyrene in 7 BCE.<sup>29</sup> There is evidence that in Egypt a census occurred at seven-year intervals, in 11/10 BCE, 4/3 BCE, 4/5 CE, and 11/12 CE.<sup>30</sup> Augustus was the first in history to order a census or tax assessment of the whole provincial empire.<sup>31</sup> There was undoubtedly a census in Judea conducted by Publius Sulpicius Quirinius, governor of Syria (6–7 CE or 6–9 CE), after Archelaus' deposition in 6 CE, which provoked a revolt led by Judas the Galilean.<sup>32</sup> Some suggest that Luke dated the birth of Christ in connection with this census in 6 CE,<sup>33</sup> but this is clearly a historical blunder.<sup>34</sup> Although Luke acknowledged this census in Acts 5:37, he did not associate it there with Jesus' birth. This date would have been too late in light of the fact that he states in Luke 1:5 that the births of John the Baptist and Jesus took place in the days of Herod the Great, thus agreeing with Matthew's chronology (Matt 2:1). Also, Luke is consistent when he states that Jesus was about thirty years of age when he began his ministry (Luke 3:23), which was preceded a short time before by the ministry of John the Baptist, which began in the fifteenth year of Tiberius (Luke 3:1–2). Since the fifteenth year of Tiberius can be dated around 27 to 29 CE (see the discussion below), this means that if Jesus had been born in 6 CE, he would have been only twenty-one to twenty-three years old, not about thirty years old, when he began his ministry.

To resolve this issue, we must pay attention to the meaning of the adjective "first" in reference to the census in Luke 2:2. There have been several attempts to resolve this dilemma.<sup>35</sup> One view, championed by Ramsay, argues that Quirinius was governor of Syria twice: once from

<sup>29</sup> G. H. Stevenson, "The Imperial Administration," in The Cambridge Ancient History, vol. 10: The Augustan Empire 44 BC–AD 70, ed. S. A. Cook, F. E. Adcock, and M. P. Charlesworth (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1934), 192–193.

<sup>30</sup> Roger S. Bagnall and Bruce W. Frier, The Demography of Roman Egypt, Cambridge Studies in Population, Economy and Society in Past Time 23 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994), 4–5.

<sup>31</sup> A. N. Sherwin-White, Roman Society and Roman Law in the New Testament (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1963), 168.

<sup>32</sup> Josephus, Ant. 17.1–10; Acts 5:37.

<sup>33</sup> Mark D. Smith, "Of Jesus and Quirinius," CBQ 62 (2000): 278–293.

<sup>34</sup> Cf. Bo Reicke, The New Testament Era: The World of the Bible from 500 BC to AD 100, trans. David E. Green (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1968), 106, 135–136.

<sup>35</sup> For a recent discussion, see Stanley E. Porter, "The Reason for the Lukan Census," in Paul, Luke and the Graeco-Roman World: Essays in Honour of Alexander J. M. Wedderburn, ed. Alf Christophersen, Carsten Claussen, Jörg Frey, and Bruce Longenecker, JSNTSup 217 (London: Sheffield Academic Press, 2002), 165–188.

11/10 to 8/7 BCE, the time of the “first” census, and later in 6–7 CE or 6–9, the time of the second census.<sup>36</sup> This has been challenged, since Quirinius was most likely a governor of Galatia and involved with the Homanadensian war in Galatia sometime between 5 and 3 BCE, and thus could not have been the governor of Syria.<sup>37</sup>

Another consideration was first proposed by Herwartus in the seventeenth century; it has been revived by Lagrange<sup>38</sup> and more recently by Heichelheim,<sup>39</sup> Turner,<sup>40</sup> and Ogg.<sup>41</sup> It renders the superlative πρῶτος, “first” (number one among at least three) as the comparative πρότερος, “former” (one of two), translating Luke 2:2: “This census was before that [census] when Quirinius was governor of Syria.” However, in later Greek the true comparative “πρότερος has surrendered the meaning ‘the first of two’ to πρῶτος which now means only ‘earlier’.”<sup>42</sup> Hence, it could be rendered “this census was earlier than [the census] when Quirinius was governor of Syria.” This construction

<sup>36</sup> W. M. Ramsay, Was Christ Born at Bethlehem? A Study on the Credibility of St. Luke, 2nd ed. (London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1898), 149–173, 227–248; W. M. Ramsay, The Bearing of Recent Discovery on the Trustworthiness of the New Testament, 4th ed. (London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1920), 275–300.

<sup>37</sup> Ronald Syme, “Galatia and Pamphilia under Augustus: The Governorships of Piso, Quirinius, and Silvanus,” Klio 27.1/2 (1934): 131–138; Barbara Levick, Roman Colonies in Southern Asia Minor (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1967), 203–214, esp. 210–214; Robert K. Sherck, “Roman Galatia: The Governors from 25 BC to AD 114,” in Aufstieg und Niedergang der römischen Welt: Geschichte und Kultur Roms im Spiegel der neueren Forschung, Principat, vol. 7.2, ed. Hildegard Temporini (Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 1980), 967–969, 1040.

<sup>38</sup> M.-J. Lagrange, “Où en est la question du recensement de Quirinius?,” RB 8 (1911): 60–84.

<sup>39</sup> F. M. Heichelheim, “Roman Syria,” in An Economic Survey of Ancient Rome, ed. Tenney Frank, vol. 4 (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press, 1938), 160–162.

<sup>40</sup> Nigel Turner, Grammatical Insights into the New Testament (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1965), 23–24.

<sup>41</sup> George Ogg, “The Quirinius Question Today,” ExpTim 79 (1968): 233–235.

<sup>42</sup> F. Blass and A. Debrunner, A Greek Grammar of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature, trans. and rev. of the 9th–10th German ed. incorporating supplementary notes of A. Debrunner by Robert W. Funk (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1961), §62; cf. also James Hope Moulton, Prolegomena, 3rd ed., vol. 1, A Grammar of New Testament Greek (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1908), 79, 107; Maximilian Zerwick, Biblical Greek. Illustrated by Examples, trans. Joseph Smith, Scripta Pontificii Instituti Biblici 114 (Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1963), 50; Henry George Liddell and Robert Scott, A Greek-English Lexicon, rev. and aug. Henry Stuart Jones and Roderick McKenzie, 9th ed. with a Revised Supplement 1996, ed. P. G. W. Glare and A. A. Thompson (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1940), 1535; Walter Bauer, A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature, rev. and ed. Frederick William Danker, 3rd ed. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2000), 893.

is cumbersome. Nevertheless, along the same line of argumentation, Higgins suggests that πρῶτος was used adverbially as equivalent to πρό in John 15:18, “It [the world] has hated me before it hated you.” “If this is conceded, there is no need to infer a compendious comparison, and πρώτη governs the participial phrase.”<sup>43</sup> In agreement, Pearson shows that πρῶτος is used in the same way in two other places in John: John 1:15, “He who comes after me is greater than I am because he existed before me,” and John 1:30, “After me comes a man who is greater than I am, because he existed before me.”<sup>44</sup> Although Luke 2:2 presents a difficulty in understanding the function of the dependent genitive participle ἡγεμονεύοντος and how it relates to πρῶτος, Pearson notes that the participle is a part of the genitive absolute (ἡγεμονεύοντος τῆς Συρίας Κυρηνίου) which is dependent on the preceding independent clause, with ἐγένετο functioning as a copulative, thus: “This census was before Quirinius governed Syria.”<sup>45</sup> Porter refines this by saying that one should not think of this as a genitive absolute, but rather take the participle ἡγεμονεύοντος as attributively modifying the noun Κυρηνίου. “The confusion here is caused by the fact that the participle and noun are in the genitive case, as is required by the comparative construction, rather than the structure being a genitive absolute.”<sup>46</sup> In fact, Luke does not distinguish an earlier census from the one conducted in 6 CE when Quirinius was governor of Syria. Rather, he states that the census at the time of Jesus’ birth took place some time before Quirinius was governor. Thus, Luke 2:2 could be translated: “This census occurred before Quirinius was governor of Syria.” This seems to be a reasonable way to resolve the problem.

Although the exact date of the census is not certain, it is reasonable to conclude that the census would have been taken after Herod fell into disfavor with Augustus in 8/7 BCE. More specifically, it was probably after Herod’s execution of his sons Alexander and Aristobulus in

---

<sup>43</sup> A. J. B. Higgins, “Sidelights on Christian Beginnings in the Graeco-Roman World,” EvQ 41 (1969): 200.

<sup>44</sup> Brook W. R. Pearson, “The Lucan Censuses, Revisted,” CBQ 61 (1999): 280–282; cf. S. R. Llewelyn, “The Provincial Census and Jesus’ Birth in Bethlehem,” in New Documents Illustrating Early Christianity, vol. 6, A Review of the Greek Inscriptions and Papyri Published in 1980–81, ed. S. R. Llewelyn and R. A. Kearsley (Sydney: Macquarie University, 1992), 130–132; Johannes P. Louw, Eugene A. Nida et al., eds., Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament Based on Semantic Domains (New York: United Bible Societies, 1988), §67.18.

<sup>45</sup> Pearson, “The Lucan Censuses, Revisted,” 281.

<sup>46</sup> Porter, “The Reason for the Lukan Census,” 175.

7 BCE, when there was an intense struggle for the throne by his other sons. This led Herod to change his will three times before his death in the spring of 4 BCE.<sup>47</sup> Furthermore, not only were there intrigues within the household, but Herod's illness became more intense. His death was imminent. With such instability and such a bad state of health, this would have been an opportune time for Augustus to have had a census taken in order to assess the situation before Herod's death. It must also be noted that Augustus was well aware of the situation in Israel, because each time Herod changed his will and wanted to eliminate one of his sons, he had to ask the emperor's permission. Therefore, a census within the last year or two of Herod's reign would have been reasonable, and indeed most probable. This fits well with both Matthew's and Luke's chronologies, which seem to indicate that the census and Christ's birth took place before Herod's death.

1.3. The Star of the Magi

Another element in the birth of Jesus is, according to Matt 2:1–12, the Magi (astrologers) from the East who came to Jerusalem searching for Jesus because they had seen a star at its rising (i.e., in the East) and came to worship him. There are three approaches to this story. First, some think it is a religious myth or a literary device created by Matthew with little or no historical basis.<sup>48</sup> However, the mention of historical details such as Herod, Bethlehem of Judea, and religious leaders,<sup>49</sup> supports the historical reality of a story that could be verified by eyewitnesses. Second, some think that the star was a miraculous intervention of God to announce the arrival of the Messiah.<sup>50</sup> This view helps little in the attempt to date the birth of Jesus, except for the fact that this miraculous appearance of the star occurred while Herod the Great was still alive.

<sup>47</sup> Hoehner, Herod Antipas, 269–276.

<sup>48</sup> Cf. W. D. Davies and Dale C. Allison Jr., A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Gospel according to Saint Matthew, ICC 1 (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1988), 231; Raymond E. Brown, The Birth of Messiah: A Commentary on the Infancy Narratives in the Gospels of Matthew and Luke, new updated ed., ABRL (New York: Doubleday, 1993), 36, 170–173, 188–200, 608–613; Christopher Cullen, “Can We Find the Star of Bethlehem in Far Eastern Records?,” QJRS 20 (1979): 158; Dale C. Allison Jr., “What Was the Star that Guided the Magi?,” BRev 9 (December 1993): 24; Kim Paffenroth, “The Star of Bethlehem Casts Light on Its Modern Interpreters,” QJRS 34 (December 1993): 449–460; Kim Paffenroth, “Science or Story? The Star of Bethlehem,” ExpTim 106 (1994): 78–79.

<sup>49</sup> For the historical validity of the Magi, see Edwin M. Yamauchi, “The Episode of the Magi,” in Chronos, Kairos, Christos: Nativity and Chronological Studies Presented to Jack Finegan, ed. Jerry Vardaman and Edwin M. Yamauchi (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1989), 15–39.

The third approach is to consider that Magi of Mesopotamia, most likely Babylon or Persia,<sup>51</sup> observed an astronomical phenomenon which motivated them to come to Jerusalem. From October 1604 to October 1605, the astronomer Johannes Kepler carefully noted his observations of the supernova (a giant stellar explosion) which was in the vicinity of the conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn with Mars close by, in modern times called the “massing” of the planets.<sup>52</sup> Although the conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn, occurring once every 19.86 years, was considered significant astrologically, the conjunction of Jupiter, Saturn, and Mars, occurring once every 805 years, makes the latter more significant. Kepler calculated that in 7 BCE the triple conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn (May 27, October 6, and December 1) was followed soon (February in 6 BCE) by Mars moving into the area.<sup>53</sup> The triple conjunction and the massing of the planets would have alerted the Magi that something significant was about to occur—but would this been enough to begin their journey?

---

<sup>50</sup> Cf. Kenneth Boa, and William Proctor, The Return of the Star of Bethlehem, Garden City, NY: Doubleday & Company, 1980), 123–124.

<sup>51</sup> David Hughes, The Star of Bethlehem Mystery (London: J. M. Dent & Sons, 1979), 35–42; Mark Kidger, The Star of Bethlehem: An Astronomer's View (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1999), 178–179.

<sup>52</sup> Johannes Kepler, De stella nova in pete Serpentarii et qui sub ejus exortum de novo iniit, trigono igneo, Prague: Paul Sess, 1606, quoted by A. J. Sachs and C. B. F. Walker, “Kepler’s View of the Star of Bethlehem and the Babylonian Almanac for 7/6 BC,” Iraq 46 (1984): 43. See also David H. Clark and F. Richard Stephenson, The Historical Supernovae, Pergamon International Library of Science, Technology, Engineering and Social Studies (Oxford: Pergamon Press, 1977), 191–206; F. Richard Stephenson and David A. Green, Historical Supernovae and Their Remnants, International Series on Astronomy and Astrophysics (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 2002), 60–81.

<sup>53</sup> Sachs and Walker, “Kepler’s View of the Star of Bethlehem,” 43; Colin J. Humphreys, “The Star of Bethlehem, a Comet in 5 BC and the Date of Christ’s Birth,” TynBul 43.1 (1992): 45; cf. also Konradin Ferrari-D’Occhieppo, “The Star of the Magi and Babylonian Astronomy,” in Chronos, Kairos, Christos: Nativity and Chronological Studies Presented to Jack Finegan, ed. Jerry Vardaman and Edwin M. Yamauchi (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1989), 42–46; Simo Parpola, “The Magi and the Star,” BRev 17 (2001): 20–23. Kidger (Star of Bethlehem, 198–218) makes a good case for the position that the Magi would not have set off if they had seen only the triple conjunctions in 7 BCE.

In this regard, Humphreys states that one needs to observe the characteristics of the star of Bethlehem as recorded in Matthew's Gospel.<sup>54</sup> The text states that the Magi saw the star when it rose (Matt 2:2); when they arrived in Bethlehem, the star they had seen appeared again and stood over the place where Jesus was, viz. Bethlehem (2:9). Although a supernova could have alerted the Magi that something was about to occur, Humphreys correctly notes that it would not have been close enough to the earth to lead them to where Jesus was.<sup>55</sup> Rather, he suggests that it was a comet which the Magi observed and followed, clearly visible to the naked eye over a period of time.<sup>56</sup> Halley's comet has often been suggested but that appeared in 12 BCE, too early to be the star of Bethlehem.<sup>57</sup> The Chinese, who precisely recorded visible comets, mention a comet that was first seen between March 9 and April 6, 5 BCE described as a tailed comet visible for more than seventy days.<sup>58</sup> Humphreys rightly suggests that this fits well with requirements of Matthew's text. This comet appeared in the area of the sky, including

---

<sup>54</sup> Humphreys, "The Star of Bethlehem," 34–44. This article is very helpful in the discussion of these issues.

<sup>55</sup> Hughes thinks the triple conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn in 7 BCE (May 27, October 6, and December 1) was the star of Bethlehem, so that Jesus was born in mid-September of that year (The Star of Bethlehem Mystery, 164–194, 199–200). Kidger (Star of Bethlehem, 219–287, esp., 253, 274–275, 282–284) believes that besides the triple conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn in 7 BCE, the star of Bethlehem was a nova in February or March of 5 BCE (a year after the massing of the planets in 6 BCE), so that Jesus was born in late March or early April of 5 BCE. The problem with these views lies in reconciling Matthew's account (the star that stood over Jesus' birthplace) with a triple conjunction or a nova that are far away.

<sup>56</sup> Humphreys, "The Star of Bethlehem," 35.

<sup>57</sup> Some have proposed that Jesus was born in 12 BCE: see Jerry Vardaman, "Jesus' Life: A New Chronology," in Chronos, Kairos, Christos: Nativity and Chronological Studies Presented to Jack Finegan, ed. idem and Edwin M. Yamauchi (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1989), 55–82; Nikos Kokkinos, "Crucifixion in AD 36: The Keystone for Dating the Birth of Jesus," in ibid., 160–162; idem, "The Relative Chronology of the Nativity in Tertullian," in Chronos, Kairos, Christos II: Chronological, Nativity, and Religious Studies in Memory of Ray Summers, ed. E. Jerry Vardaman (Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1998), 119–131. However, scholars have not accepted this position, because of the difficulties it presents with regard to the historical data presented in the gospels. This view has been challenged by Jack V. Scarola, "Chronology of the Nativity Era," ibid., 61–84.

<sup>58</sup> Observations of Comets from 611 BC to AD 1640 Extracted from the Chinese Annals, trans. John Williams (London: Printed for the author by Stangways and Walden, 1871; reprint, Hornchurch, Essex, England: Science and Technology Publishers, 1987), 10, no. 52; Ho Peng Yoke, "Ancient and Mediaeval Observations of Comets and Novae in Chinese Sources," Vistas in Astronomy 5 (1962): 148 (63); Finegan, Handbook of Biblical Chronology, 314–315.

Capricorn, which rose above the eastern horizon in March/April. Since it was visible at twilight, the Magi saw it at its rising, that is, in the East (2:2). Since it was visible for over seventy days, this would give the Magi time to journey to Israel.<sup>59</sup> The normal route from Babylon to Israel was the Fertile Crescent, a distance of about 900 miles. With a fully loaded camel, experienced drivers could travel as much as 80 to 100 miles a day, while even clumsy and inexperienced drivers traveled no less than 30 miles a day. So it was not unreasonable to travel an average of 50 miles a day; this means that the distance could be traversed in less than 20 days.<sup>60</sup> If they first saw the comet in March/April and began to travel west shortly thereafter, they would have arrived in Jerusalem around April/May. When they arrived in Jerusalem, they asked where the king of the Jews had been born (2:2). On hearing this, Herod assembled the chief priests and scribes to inquire where Christ was to be born. The religious leaders informed Herod that the Old Testament prophet had written that he was to be born in Bethlehem (Mic 5:2). Herod summoned the Magi and asked them when the star appeared, and then sent them to Bethlehem (Matt 2:7–8), a journey of only four or five miles. When the Magi went to Bethlehem, the star they saw in its rising (the East) went before them and stood over the place where the child was (2:9). Hence, the Magi, having observed the triple conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn in 7 BCE (i.e., May 27, October 6, and December 1) and the massing of Jupiter, Saturn, and Mars in 6 BCE, finally saw this tailed comet when they were still in the East in March/April in 5 BCE. It was then that they went to Jerusalem. They went there because of these signs, but there is no indication that the star (i.e., the comet) led them from the East to Jerusalem. It was in Jerusalem that they were told that Christ was to be born in Bethlehem. Accordingly, they proceeded south, and the star (i.e., the comet) which they had seen at its rising (the East) reappeared and they rejoiced (2:10) greatly. There have been sightings of comets over cities which resembled swords, and in Matthew it was most likely a tailed comet with the head of the comet<sup>61</sup> appearing to stand over where

---

<sup>59</sup> Humphreys, "The Star of Bethlehem," 43–48.

<sup>60</sup> See Hughes, The Star of Bethlehem Mystery, 41–42.

<sup>61</sup> Seymour and Seymour believe this was the comet in April of 4 BCE, mentioned in Observations of Comets from 611 BC to AD 1640, 10 no. 53: John Seymour and Michael W. Seymour, "The Historicity of the Gospels and the Astronomical Events concerning the Birth of Christ," QJRAS 19 (1978): 195–196. However, this comet did

Jesus was, viz. Bethlehem.<sup>62</sup> Since Bethlehem was a small town, the Magi would have been able to discover where the newborn baby was. Subsequently, they did not go back to Herod as they had been ordered, and this prompted Herod to kill all the male children in Bethlehem two years old and under.<sup>63</sup> When Herod had inquired when the star appeared (2:7, 16), in all probability the Magi related to him not only the appearance of the comet of 5 BCE but also the triple conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn in 7 BCE and the massing of the planets in 6 BCE. Hence, Herod's slaughter of all the male babies two years of age and under left nothing to chance.<sup>64</sup>

We may infer from these data that the birth of Jesus occurred at some time in the spring of 5 BCE. Humphreys attempts to pinpoint it to the time of the Passover which was the time that some Jews thought the Messiah would be born. He suggests that Jesus could have been born on Nisan 10, the time when the Passover lamb was selected, making it April 14 or 15, 5 BCE. The crowds coming to the Passover not have a tail, and they think it should be labeled a nova. Yet how could it be possible to observe a nova standing directly over the place where Jesus was born?

---

<sup>62</sup> The astronomer Michael Molnar held that it was a comet, but two lunar occultations (laymen would label this "eclipses") of Jupiter by the moon in Aries (to the astrologers, this signified an important birth in Herod's kingdom): the first on March 20, 6 BCE when the Magi would have observed it in Babylon, and the second on April 17, 6 BCE when the Magi noticed it in Bethlehem, the latter eclipse marking the birth of Jesus: Michael R. Molnar, "The Magi's Star from the Perspective of Ancient Astrological Practices," QJRAS 36 (1995): 109–126; idem, The Star of Bethlehem: The Legacy of the Magi (New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1999). Molnar notes that since this eclipse was first seen by the Magi in April 6 BCE, Herod may have assumed that this was when Jesus was born, and that this was why he ordered all male children two years old and under to be killed. However, the text of Matthew seems to indicate that it was a visible star rather than an eclipse. We must also ask how an eclipse could stand over the place where Jesus was born. Besides this, to date the birth of Jesus in the spring of 6 BCE makes it too early to fit with other chronological pegs for the life of Jesus.

<sup>63</sup> Some think the massacre of the male children is a legend or folklore, see A. H. M. Jones, The Herods of Judaea (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1938), 155; Michael Grant, Herod the Great (New York: American Heritage Press, 1971), 12, 228–229; Brown, The Birth of Messiah, 227. However, the historicity of this incident has the support of many: cf. Stewart Perowne, The Life and Times of Herod the Great (London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1956), 172; Abraham Schalit, König Herodes: Der Mann und sein Werk (SJ 4) (Berlin: Walter de Gruyter & Co., 1969), 648–649; Richard T. France, "Herod and the Children of Bethlehem," NovT 21 (1979): 98–120; Paul L. Maier, "Herod and the Infants in Bethlehem," in Chronos, Kairos, Christos II: Chronological, Nativity, and Religious Studies in Memory of Ray Summers, ed. E. Jerry Vardaman (Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1998), 169–189; Finegan, Handbook of Biblical Chronology, 296–297.

<sup>64</sup> Humphreys, "The Star of Bethlehem, 36–37, 47–49.

would explain why the inn was full (Luke 2:7).<sup>65</sup> While this is possible, it seems strange that none of the Gospel writers, especially Matthew, mentions that Jesus was born at Passover time. Thus, the spring of 5 BCE remains the most likely time for Jesus' birth.

2. The Commencement of Jesus' Ministry

The next chronological marker in the life of Jesus is the commencement of his ministry. Jesus' visit to the temple when he was twelve is mentioned (Luke 2:41–51), but this incident is vague with reference to chronology. Hence, it is not helpful in establishing a chronological framework for Jesus' life. However, there are three chronological markers which do need to be considered: (1) the commencement of John the Baptist's ministry, (2) the commencement of Jesus' ministry, and (3) the first Passover of Jesus' ministry.

2.1. The Commencement of John the Baptist's Ministry

Luke 3:1–3 specifically mentions that in the fifteenth year of Tiberius, John the Baptist began his ministry in the area of the Jordan River. It was during this time that he baptized Jesus, marking the beginning of Jesus' ministry which commenced after the opening of John's ministry. Since Luke dates the beginning of John's activity with chronological notes of secular history (which he does not do for the beginning of Jesus' ministry), it is necessary to determine when John embarked on his ministry. This will establish the terminus a quo of Jesus' ministry.

Augustus died on August 19, 14 CE.<sup>66</sup> Since Tiberius immediately succeeded him, it is necessary to know how to reckon the fifteenth year of his reign. There are five ways to do this. The first way is the normal Roman method, which would mean that Tiberius' first year would have run from August 19, 14 CE to August 18, 15; the fifteenth year would have run from August 19, 28 CE to August 18, 29. The major objection to this view is that it would be too complicated and confusing to calculate according to dynastic years.<sup>67</sup> However, since the combined work of Luke-Acts is addressed to Theophilus (Luke 1:3) and refers to him as “most excellent” (κράτιστε), a term Luke otherwise employs only as a form of address to a Roman official (Acts 23:26; 24:3; 26:25), it is plausible to deduce that Theophilus would have been familiar with dynastic years.<sup>68</sup>

<sup>65</sup> Humphreys, "The Star of Bethlehem", 52–53.

<sup>66</sup> See Appian, Bella Civilia 2.149; Plutarch, Aug. 56.30; Suetonius, Caesar 81.2; idem, Augustus 100.1; Dio Cassius, 56.30; Josephus, Ant. 18.32; War 2.168.

<sup>67</sup> Benedictus Niese, "Zur Chronologie des Josephus," Hermes 28 (1893): 210–211.

The second method evolves from the first, because some scholars find the above date too late. They suggest that Luke was counting from the decree by which Tiberius became co-regent with Augustus.<sup>69</sup> On the basis of Velleius Paterculus, 2.121, Mommsen dates the decree to the end of 11 CE,<sup>70</sup> which would make 25/26 CE the fifteenth year of Tiberius. But this method must be rejected, because there is no evidence for its employment, either from historical documents or from coins, whereas there is abundant evidence that Tiberius calculated his first year from immediately after the death of Augustus. Any theory that has to distort the normal sense of the text is eo ipso suspect.

The third method proposes that Luke calculated from Nisan 1, making the first year of Tiberius begin on August 19, 14 CE and end on Nisan 1, 15; his fifteenth year would run from Nisan 1, 28 to Nisan 1, 29<sup>71</sup> or from April 15, 28 to April 4, 29.<sup>72</sup> Without any supporting evidence, Ogg assumes this to be true. Although the Mishnaic tractate Rosh HaShanah 1.1 specifically states that the regnal years were reckoned from Nisan 1, a discussion on this in the Talmud indicates that it was not universally accepted. During the Maccabean times, 2 Maccabees used the Seleucid era, which reckoned from October; the situation in 1 Maccabees is rather unclear, but it seems to date the years beginning with Nisan when following Palestinian sources, and beginning with Tishri when following a Syrian source.<sup>73</sup> Although Ogg concludes from the Old Testament that the Jews reckoned from Nisan 1; in fact, they reckoned from both Nisan and Tishri.<sup>74</sup> Beyond this, it

<sup>68</sup> Finegan, Handbook of Biblical Chronology, 338.

<sup>69</sup> Ramsay, Was Christ Born at Bethlehem?, 199–202, 221.

<sup>70</sup> Theodor Mommsen, Römisches Staatsrecht, 3rd ed., vol. 2, part 2 (Leipzig: S. Hirzel, 1887), 1159 n. 3.

<sup>71</sup> George Ogg, The Chronology of the Public Ministry of Jesus (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1940), 200–201.

<sup>72</sup> Parker and Dubberstein, Babylonian Chronology 626 BC–AD 75, 46.

<sup>73</sup> Bickermann, “Makkabäerbücher,” in Pauly's Real-encyclopädie der classischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. Wilhelm Kroll, vol. 14.1 (Stuttgart: J. B. Metzlersche Verlagsbuchhandlung, 1928), 781–784; J. C. Dancy, Commentary on I Maccabees, Blackwell's Theological Texts (Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1954), 50–51.

<sup>74</sup> Edwin R. Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings, 3rd ed. (Grand Rapids: Zondervan Publishing House, 1983), 43–60, 180.

is difficult to determine whether they used the accession-year system (where the first year of a king's reign began on the first day of the new year after he became king) or the non-accession year (where the first year of the king is that portion of the year between his accession and the first day of the new year). Schürer thinks that the Nisan system was used by Josephus for calculating the rule of Herod the Great.<sup>75</sup> But would Luke, a Gentile, use this system when writing to a Roman official? That seems most unlikely.

The fourth method is that used by Syria from the time of Augustus to Nerva, whereby the regnal years of Roman emperors were reckoned from Tishri 1, as were those of the old Syro-Seleucids.<sup>76</sup> Thus, the first year of Tiberius would have run from August 19, 14 CE to Tishri 1, 14 (October 15, 14) and his fifteenth year from Tishri 1, 27 to Tishri 1, 28,<sup>77</sup> or from September 21, 27 to October 8, 28.<sup>78</sup> Those who hold this view suppose that since Luke was from Antioch, he would have calculated the reigns of emperors according to the calendar with which he was familiar.<sup>79</sup> Besides this, the official Jewish New Year, except possibly during the exilic period, commenced with Tishri 1 (especially after Nehemiah's reformation),<sup>80</sup> making it natural to reckon regnal years from the New Year. Two difficulties with this view are that the Jews did not always reckon regnal years from Tishri, and that there is no certainty that Luke was from Antioch.

The fifth method is to suppose that Luke used the Julian calendar. By this method, if one calculates according to the non-accession-year <sup>75</sup> Schürer, The History of the Jewish People, 1:326–328 n. 165.

<sup>76</sup> Mommsen, Römisches Staatsrecht, 2, part 2: 802–804. For a discussion of the Syrian calendars, see Finegan, Handbook of Biblical Chronology, 53–59.

<sup>77</sup> Conrad Cichorius, "Chronologisches zum Leben Jesu," ZNW 22 (1923): 17–19; George B. Caird, "The Chronology of the NT," in The Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible, ed. George Arthur Buttrick et al., vol. 1 (Nashville: Abingdon Press, 1962), 601.

<sup>78</sup> Parker and Dubberstein, Babylonian Chronology 626 BC–AD 75, 46.

<sup>79</sup> William M. Ramsay, "Numbers, Hours, Years, and Dates," in A Dictionary of the Bible, ed. James Hastings et al., Extra Volume (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1904), 481; Cichorius, "Chronologisches zum Leben Jesu," 18–19.

<sup>80</sup> J. F. McLaughlin, "New Year," in The Jewish Encyclopedia, ed. I. Singer et al., vol. 9 (New York: Funk and Wagnalls Company, 1905), 254–256; Julian Morgenstern, "Year," in The Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible, ed. George Arthur Buttrick et al., vol. 4 (Nashville: Abingdon Press, 1962), 923–924; cf. Mayer Irwin Gruber, "Year," in EncJud, ed. Cecil Roth et al., vol. 16 (Jerusalem: Keter Publishing House Jerusalem, 1972), 724–726; Ephraim Jehudah Wiesenberg, "Calendar," ibid., vol. 5 (Jerusalem: Keter Publishing House Jerusalem, 1972), 43–50; idem, "Tishri," ibid., vol. 15 (Jerusalem: Keter Publishing House Jerusalem, 1972), 1154.

system, Tiberius' first year ran from August 19 to December 31, 14 CE, and his fifteenth year ran from January 1 to December 31, 28. However, if one reckons according to the accession-year system, August 19 to December 31, 14 is considered the accession year, and January 1 to December 31, 15 is considered the first year of Tiberius' reign. Thus, his fifteenth year would have run from January 1 to December 31, 29. The use of the Julian calendar and the calculation according to the accession-year system were employed by Roman historians such as Tacitus and Suetonius.<sup>81</sup> The chief argument for this view is that since Luke was addressing a Roman official named Theophilus (Luke 1:3), it is probable that he was addressing Roman readers or those under Roman dominion, who would be familiar with the Julian calendar.<sup>82</sup>

In conclusion, of the five methods, the second is unacceptable and the third is unlikely. If one were to accept 30 CE as the crucifixion date, the fourth method would be the most probable. This would mean that John the Baptist began his ministry sometime between September 21, 27 CE and October 8, 28. This allows for Jesus' ministry to have lasted slightly more than two years. However, if one thinks that Jesus was crucified in 33 CE, then either the first or the fifth method would be the most probable, dating the beginning of John's ministry somewhere between August 19, 28 and December 31, 29.<sup>83</sup> This would allow at least a three-year ministry of Jesus. Either of these methods satisfies the requirements of the biblical narratives, and both methods were used for calculation in Jesus' time. We would then conclude that John the Baptist's ministry began sometime in 29 CE.

2.2. The Commencement of Jesus' Ministry

Nothing is specifically stated regarding the interval of time between the commencement of John the Baptist's ministry and the beginning of Jesus' ministry. The gospels give us the impression that Jesus began his ministry shortly after John the Baptist began his.

Luke 3:23 mentions that Jesus was "about thirty years of age" when he began his ministry. If Jesus was born in the spring of 5 BCE, as concluded above, how does this agree with the fifteenth year of Tiberius' reign, which (according to Luke 3:1–3) marked the commencement of John the Baptist’s ministry? If one accepts the fourth method listed above and dates Jesus’ baptism shortly before Passover of 28 CE, Jesus would then have been about thirty-two years of age. With both the first and fifth solutions, it is possible that Jesus was baptized early in 29 CE (on the fifth view, Jesus could have been baptized as early as the autumn of 28), with his ministry beginning shortly before the Passover of 29. Jesus would thus have been around thirty-two or thirty-three years old. However, it seems more plausible (using the first or fifth method) that John baptized Jesus some time in 29 CE, with Jesus’ ministry beginning in the summer or autumn of 29, so that Jesus would have been thirty-three years of age at the start of his ministry. This conclusion is supported by the fact that Luke uses the term “about” (ὥσεί) to denote approximation, indicating that Jesus was not exactly thirty years of age when he began his ministry. Luke 3:1 states that it was exactly the fifteenth year of Tiberius when John the Baptist began his ministry, but 3:23 states that Jesus was “about” thirty years old when he began his ministry. Luke does this elsewhere. For example, two Synoptic accounts state that the transfiguration occurred six days (Matt 17:1; Mark 9:2) after Peter’s confession and Jesus’ prediction of his passion, but Luke 9:28 states that it was “about” (ὥσεί) eight days later. It is not unreasonable, then, to deduce that Jesus was “about” thirty years of age when he began his ministry.

<sup>81</sup> For a discussion of this, see Finegan, Handbook of Biblical Chronology, 338–339.

<sup>82</sup> Finegan, Handbook of Biblical Chronology, 338.

<sup>83</sup> Cf. John P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, ABRL (New York: Doubleday, 1991), 1:383–386.

2.3. The First Passover of Jesus’ Ministry

Shortly after his baptism, the first recorded visit of Jesus to Jerusalem (John 2:13–3:21) marks the first Passover of his ministry. It was at this time that he cleansed the temple and the Jews asked him to give them a sign that he had authority to do such a thing. He replied, “Destroy this temple and in three days I will raise it up.” The Jews responded, “It has taken forty-six years to build this temple, and are you going to raise it up in three days?” There are two words for “temple.”<sup>84</sup> The first word, ἱερόν, refers to the whole sacred area which includes the three courts. The second term, ναός, refers to the sacred building alone which is located within the priests' court.<sup>85</sup> The gospels also make this distinction. When referring to the whole sacred area, ἱερόν is used (Matt 21:12 = Mark 11:15 = Luke 19:45) while on the other hand ναός is used when speaking of the sacred building (Matt 27:51 = Mark 15:38 = Luke 23:45). The Gospel of John is consistent with this distinction, noticeably in 2:14–15 where Jesus found the money changers in the temple court, namely, τὸ ἱερόν (cf. also John 2:14, 15; 5:14; 7:14, 28; 8:2, 20, 59; 10:23; 11:56; 18:20); and cf. 2:19–20 where John uses ὁ ναός when the Jews talk about the destruction of the temple edifice. Therefore, in the above mentioned passage the Jews were speaking of the temple edifice, not of the whole sacred precincts. According to Josephus, the reconstruction of the temple began in the eighteenth year of Herod's reign,<sup>86</sup> or 20/19 BCE<sup>87</sup> (this coincides with the time of Augustus' arrival in Syria, which according to Dio Cassius occurred in the spring or summer of 20 BCE),<sup>88</sup> and the first part to be rebuilt was the temple edifice (ναός). This work was carried out by the priests in one year and six months,<sup>89</sup> and thus completed in 18/17 BCE. Adding forty-six years to the last figure, we arrive at 29/30 CE. This means, then, that Jesus' first Passover was in the spring of 30 CE, or April 7, 30 CE. The Jews argued that the temple edifice had stood for forty-six years and was now just beginning its forty-seventh year. This conclusion fits well a dating of Jesus' baptism to the summer or autumn of 29 CE, as I have previously stated. Thus, there was a period of anywhere from four to nine months between Jesus' baptism and the first Passover of his ministry.

---

<sup>84</sup> I am grateful to Finegan for the distinction he draws between the two Greek terms for “temple”: see Finegan, Handbook of Biblical Chronology, 348–349.

In conclusion, the fifteenth year of Tiberius, 28–29 CE, marked the commencement of John the Baptist's ministry. If John began his ministry in the early part of 29 CE and Jesus was baptized in the summer or autumn of that same year, he would have been thirty-three years old. Jesus' first Passover in 30 CE would have been four to nine

<sup>85</sup> Cf. Josephus, Ant. 15.417–420. This distinction is also obvious in the description of Solomon's temple, cf. Ant. 8.95–96.

<sup>86</sup> Josephus, Ant. 15.380.

<sup>87</sup> According to Josephus, War 1.401, Herod began rebuilding the temple in his fifteenth year. This may be simply a mistake on the part of Josephus; or it may refer to a time of preparation before the actual construction began (Schürer, The History of the Jewish People, 1:292 n. 12; Finegan, Handbook of Biblical Chronology, 347–348).

<sup>88</sup> Dio Cassius, 54.7.4–6. Dio states that Augustus went to Syria in the spring of the year when Marcus Apuleius and Publius Silius were consuls, i.e., 20 BCE.

<sup>89</sup> Josephus, Ant. 15.421.

months after he began his ministry, which was forty-six years after the  $\nu\acute{o}\acute{o}\varsigma$  was completed. Therefore, Jesus began his ministry sometime in the summer or autumn of 29 CE.

3. The Duration of Jesus' Ministry

Since the gospel writers never specifically state the duration of Jesus' public ministry, there has been room for many differences of interpretation regarding the sequences and duration of his ministry. The synoptic gospels mention only one Passover (Matt 26:2, 17, 18, 19; Mark 14:1, 12, 14, 16; Luke 22:1, 7, 8, 11, 13, 15) whereas John's Gospel mentions at least three (first: 2:13, 23; second: 6:4; third: 11:55; 12:1; 13:1; 18:28, 39; 19:14; some think that the feast mentioned in 5:1 refers to yet another Passover, although it is not specifically labeled as such).

Early gnostic commentators such as Valentinus (born ca. 100 CE, who was educated at Alexandria and later taught at Rome; flourished 160–80) thought that the duration of Jesus' ministry was about a year because of Luke 4:19, where he quotes Is 61:2: "To proclaim the acceptable year or the Lord." However, Valentinus' contemporary Irenaeus, from whom one obtains information about Valentinus, refuted this theory by indicating that there were a number of Passovers in the Gospel of John.<sup>90</sup> Clement of Alexandria<sup>91</sup> (ca. 150–215) and Origen<sup>92</sup> (ca. 185–254), and more recent scholars such as Conzelmann<sup>93</sup> and probably Sanders<sup>94</sup> accepted a one-year ministry of Jesus. However, to accept a one-year ministry on the basis of Luke 4:19 is questionable, because Isaiah's prophecy indicates the Messiah's arrival, not the duration of his ministry. Also, to compress Jesus' ministry into one year is to ignore John's three Passovers during: John 2:13 (at the time of Jesus' first journey to Jerusalem); 6:4 (at the time of the feeding of the five thousand); and 11:55 (the passion Passover). Furthermore, to attempt to fit a one-year ministry into the synoptic accounts is difficult. Mark 6:39 mentions "green grass" in connection with the feeding of the five

<sup>90</sup> Irenaeus, Adversus Haereses 2.22.3, 5.

<sup>91</sup> Clement of Alexandria Stromata, 1.21.146.

<sup>92</sup> Origen, De Principiis 4.1.5.

<sup>93</sup> Hans Conzelmann, History of Primitive Christianity, trans. John E. Steely (Nashville: Abingdon Press, 1973), 30.

<sup>94</sup> E. P. Sanders, The Historical Figure of Jesus (London: Penguin Books; New York: Penguin Books USA, 1993), 11–12, 54–55, 282–290.

thousand, which occurred at time of the second Passover recorded in John (6:4). This incident must have occurred in the year after the disciples plucked fully ripened grain (Mark 2:23), which would be in the spring, the time of the Passover. Accordingly, a year elapses between Mark 2:23 and 6:39. There would have been yet another year between Mark 6:39 and the passion Passover in Mark 14:1. This makes a one-year ministry highly untenable.

Since the Gospel of John specifically mentions three Passovers (2:13; 6:4; 11:55), it has been suggested that Jesus' ministry lasted a little over two years. Early supporters of this view are Apollinaris, bishop of Laodicea in Syria (ca. 310–390)<sup>95</sup> and Epiphanius, bishop Salamis in Cyprus (ca. 315–403).<sup>96</sup> More recent proponents of this view are Sutcliffe,<sup>97</sup> Blinzler,<sup>98</sup> Caird,<sup>99</sup> Ruckstuhl,<sup>100</sup> Schnackenburg,<sup>101</sup> Culpepper,<sup>102</sup> and Wright.<sup>103</sup> In order to maintain a two-year ministry, some assume a transposition of chapters 5 and 6 of the Gospel of John.<sup>104</sup> However, there is no textual evidence for this transposition. Even without accepting the transposition of these two chapters, there are

<sup>95</sup> Preserved by Jerome, Commentariorum in Daniele 9.24.

<sup>96</sup> Epiphanius, Panarion 51.30.

<sup>97</sup> Edmond F. Sutcliffe, A Two Year Public Ministry Defended, The Bellarmine Series 1 (London: Burns, Oates & Washbourne, 1938).

<sup>98</sup> Josef Blinzler, Der Prozess Jesu, 4th ed. (Regensburg: Verlag Friedrich Pustet, 1969), 103–104.

<sup>99</sup> Caird, "The Chronology of the NT," 601–602.

<sup>100</sup> Eugen Ruckstuhl, Chronology of the Last Days of Jesus, trans. Victor J. Drapela (New York: Desclee Company, 1965), 6.

<sup>101</sup> Rudolf Schnackenburg, The Gospel according to St. John, trans. Kevin Smyth, Herder's Theological Commentary on the New Testament 1 (New York: Herder and Herder, 1968), 345.

<sup>102</sup> R. Alan Culpepper, "The Gospel of Luke," in The New Interpreter's Bible, ed. Leander E. Keck et al., vol. 9 (Nashville: Abingdon Press, 1995), 93.

<sup>103</sup> Compare the date of 28 CE for the beginning of his ministry (N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God, Christian Religions and the Question of God 2 [Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1996], 147) with 30 CE as the date of his crucifixion (N. T. Wright, The New Testament and the People of God, Christian Religions and the Question of God 1 [Minneapolis: Fortress Press; London: SPCK, 1992], 479).

<sup>104</sup> Cf. J. H. Bernard, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Gospel according to St. John, ICC vol. 1 (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1928), xvi–xix; Rudolf Bultmann, The Gospel of John, trans. G. R. Beasley-Murray, R. W. N. Hoare, and J. K. Riches (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1971), xiii, 111–112, 209–210, 237–238; Rudolf Schnackenburg, The Gospel according to St. John, trans. Kevin Smyth, Herder's Theological Commentary on the New Testament 1 (New York: Herder and Herder, 1968), 46; idem, The Gospel according to St. John, trans. Cecily Hastings, Francis McDonagh, David Smith, and Richard Foley, Herder's Theological Commentary on the New Testament 2 (New York: Crossroad Publishing Company, 1980), 90–91, 138.

two time notes, viz. John 4:35 and 5:1, which indicate that there must be more than a year between the Passovers of John 2:13 and 6:4. This will be discussed below. Thus, a two-year ministry of Jesus is not long enough for all the events mentioned in the gospels.

It is better to advocate a three- or three-and-a-half year ministry of Jesus. Early advocates of a three- to three-and-a-half year ministry of Jesus are Melito of Sardis (d. ca. 190)<sup>105</sup> and Eusebius (ca. 260–340)<sup>106</sup> as well as other patristic writers.<sup>107</sup> More recently, a three-year ministry has been defended by Ogg,<sup>108</sup> Hendriksen,<sup>109</sup> Caird,<sup>110</sup> Hoehner,<sup>111</sup> Guthrie,<sup>112</sup> Finegan,<sup>113</sup> and Porter.<sup>114</sup>

Besides the three Passovers explicitly mentioned in the Gospel of John (2:13; 6:4; 11:55), there are reasonable grounds to suggest that there was an additional year of Jesus' ministry between the Passovers mentioned in John 2:13 and 6:4. One point of chronology that is common to all four gospels is the feeding of the five thousand (Matt 14:13–21; Mark 6:32–44; Luke 9:10–17; John 6:1–14), which is dated some time near the Passover of John 6:4. This is confirmed by Mark 6:39, where the incidental mention of "green grass" indicates the springtime, the time of the Passover. Moreover, earlier in the synoptic gospels there is recorded the incident of the disciples plucking fully ripened grain (Matt 12:1; Mark 2:23; Luke 6:1), which would point to the spring a year earlier. On the other hand, the Passover of John 2:13 is too early for the incident of the disciples plucking grain, because

<sup>105</sup> Preserved in Anastasius Sinaïta, Viae dux 137.7.43–46.

<sup>106</sup> Eusebius, Demonstratio Evangelica 8.2.106–111 (§400). The three and a half years are based on the half-week of Daniel 9:27; cf. Eusebius, Historia Ecclesiastica 1.10.2–6.

<sup>107</sup> For a good discussion, see Ogg, The Chronology of the Public Ministry of Jesus, 76–90, 98–103, 119–128.

<sup>108</sup> Ogg, The Chronology of the Public Ministry of Jesus, 1–149; Idem, "Chronology of the New Testament," in Peake's Commentary on the Bible, ed. Matthew Black and H. H. Rowley (London: Thomas Nelson and Sons, 1962), 729.

<sup>109</sup> William Hendriksen, Exposition of the Gospel according to John, New Testament Commentary 1 (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1953), 187–189.

<sup>110</sup> Caird, "The Chronology of the NT," 602.

<sup>111</sup> Hoehner, Chronological Aspects of the Life of Christ, 55–60.

<sup>112</sup> Donald Guthrie, New Testament Introduction, 4th ed. (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1990), 310.

<sup>113</sup> Finegan, "Chronology of the NT," 688–689; idem, Handbook of Biblical Chronology, 349–351.

<sup>114</sup> Porter, "Chronology, New Testament," 203–204. Of course, many of those who accept the transposition of John 5 and 6 see the feast of John 5:1 as the Passover, referring back to John 6:4 (e.g., Bernard, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Gospel according to St. John, 225; Bultmann, The Gospel of John, 240).

the Passover of John 2:13 occurred shortly after Jesus had been baptized and had started his ministry. Furthermore, after the Passover of John 2:13 his ministry was carried out in Judea; but the plucking of the grain occurred when he was in Galilee. Therefore, the plucking of the grain would fit well around the time of the Passover between the Passovers mentioned in John 2:13 and 6:4.

The additional year of Jesus' ministry between the Passovers of John 2:13 and 6:4 is substantiated by the two time notes mentioned after the first Passover of 2:13. First, according to John 4:35, Jesus states that there are "yet four months, then comes the harvest." This would locate Jesus in Samaria in January/February after the Passover of John 2:13, and the harvest would then be in April/May of that year, the time of the unmentioned Passover. The second time note is in John 5:1 where another feast is mentioned. Although in John 5:1 a few manuscripts (e.g., C L Δ Π Ψ 0141 f<sup>1</sup> 33) include the article "the" feast (ἡ ἑορτή), causing speculation that this points to one of the pilgrim feasts (Passover, Pentecost, or Tabernacles), the preferred reading found in many manuscripts (e.g., Π<sup>66</sup> Π<sup>75</sup> A B D G N T Wsupp Θ f<sup>33</sup>) omits the article. Although some think it may refer to feasts such as Purim (March),<sup>115</sup> Trumpets<sup>116</sup> (September/October), or the Day of Atonement,<sup>117</sup> most exegetes think it refers to one of the pilgrim feasts. Some think it refers to the unmentioned Passover<sup>118</sup> or Pentecost,<sup>119</sup> but it seems most likely that it refers to the Feast of Tabernacles.<sup>120</sup> First,

<sup>115</sup> Karl Wieseler, A Chronological Synopsis of the Four Gospels, trans. Edmund Venables (Cambridge: Deighton, Bell, and Co., 1864), 187–202; John Bowman, "The Identity and Date of the Unnamed Feast of John 5:1," in Near Eastern Studies in Honor of William Foxwell Albright, ed. Hans Goedicke (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press, 1971), 43–56; idem, The Fourth Gospel and the Jews: A Study in R. Akiba, Esther and the Gospel of John, PTMS 8 (Pittsburgh: Pickwick Press, 1975), 99–132.

<sup>116</sup> Brooke Foss Westcott, The Gospel according to St. John: The Greek Text with Introduction and Notes, vol. 1 (London: John Murray, 1908), 204–207; F. F. Bruce, The Gospel of John: Introduction, Exposition and Notes (Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1983), 121.

<sup>117</sup> C. E. Caspari, A Chronological and Geographical Introduction to the Life of Christ, trans. rev. by the author, trans. with additional notes by Maurice J. Evans (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1876), 130–132.

<sup>118</sup> Irenaeus, Adversus Haereses 2.22.3; Bernard, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Gospel according to St. John, 1:225–226.

<sup>119</sup> Chrysostom, In Joannem Hom. 36.1; Cyril of Alexandria, In Joannem Hom. 36 (54.1); Schnackenburg, The Gospel according to St. John, 2:93.

<sup>120</sup> Ogg, The Chronology of the Public Ministry of Jesus, 298–300, 322–323; Caird, "The Chronology of the NT," 602; Finegan, Handbook of Biblical Chronology, 351–352; Andreas Köstenberger, John, BECNT (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Academic, 2004), 177.

the Feast of Tabernacles is elsewhere referred to in John simply as “the feast”<sup>121</sup> (7:2, 10, 14, 37) whereas the Passover is not referred to as “the feast,” but rather as “the Passover” (2:13, 23; 6:4; 11:55*bis*; 12:1; 13:1; 18:39; 19:14). Second, although various feasts have been conjectured here, the Feast of Tabernacles fits better chronologically in the Gospel of John. In John 2:13, the first Passover is mentioned. Then in 4:35 there is the reference to January/February after the first Passover. If 5:1 were the next Passover, it would come immediately after 4:35, whereas there is a hint of some extended time between 4:35 and 5:1 before Jesus went back to Jerusalem. The next chronological note is the Passover of 6:4, which is followed by the Feast of Tabernacles in 7:2. This means that a year has elapsed between the conjectured Feast of Tabernacles in 5:1 and 7:2.

In conclusion, the three-year ministry of Jesus from the first Passover to the passion Passover is the most viable option. Of course, since Jesus’ baptism and public ministry preceded the first Passover, the total length of his ministry would be about three and a half or three and three-quarter years.

4. The Death of Jesus

In determining the date of the death of Jesus, it is necessary to consider both the day of his death and the year of his death.

4.1. The Day of Jesus’ Death

There are two areas to be considered. First, on what day of the week was Jesus crucified? Because Jesus states in Matt 12:40: “For as Jonah was three days and three nights in the belly of the large fish, so shall the Son of man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth,” some affirm that Jesus could not have died on Friday. Some think that Jesus died either on Wednesday or Thursday, allowing for three days and three nights. However, the fact is that the Jews reckoned a part of a day as a whole day. In the light of this, Jesus’ death on Friday does not present a real problem. Furthermore, the New Testament repeatedly refers to Jesus’ resurrection as having occurred on the third day (not on the fourth day): e.g., Matt 16:21; 17:23; Luke 9:22; 18:33; Acts 10:40; 1 Cor 15:4. Moreover, the gospels specifically mention the day before the Sabbath (Friday) as the day of his death (Matt 27:62; Mark 15:42; Luke 23:54; John 19:14, 31, 42). Therefore, both scripturally and traditionally, it seems best to accept Friday as the day of the week that Jesus died. The passion week can be charted as follows:

---

<sup>121</sup> If one accepts the article before the word “feast” in John 5:1, this argument gains strength.

Second, what day of the month was the Last Supper? All the gospels state that Jesus ate the Last Supper the day before his crucifixion (Matt 26:20; Mark 14:17; Luke 22:14; John 13:2; cf. also 1 Cor 11:23). The synoptic gospels (Matt 26:17; Mark 14:12; Luke 22:7–8) portray the Last Supper as the Passover meal celebrated on Thursday evening, Nisan 14, and Jesus' crucifixion took place on the following day, viz.

Day	Event	Scripture
Saturday	Arrived at Bethany	John 12:1
Sunday	Crowd came to see Jesus	John 12:9–11
Monday	Triumphal entry	Matt 21:1–9; Mark 11:1–10; Luke 19:28–44
Tuesday	Cursed fig tree Cleansed temple	Matt 21:18–19; Mark 11:12–14 Matt 21:12–13; Mark 11:15–17; Luke 19:45–46
Wednesday	Fig tree withered Temple controversy  Olivet Discourse	Matt 21:20–22; Mark 11:20–26 Matt 21:23–23:39; Mark 11:27–12:44; Luke 20:1–21:4 Matt 24:1–25:46; Mark 13:1–37; Luke 21:5–36
Thursday	Last Supper  Betrayed and arrested	Matt 26:20–30; Mark 14:17–26; Luke 22:14–30 Matt 26:47–56; Mark 14:43–52; Luke 22:47–53; John 18:2–12
Friday	Tried by Annas and Caiaphas Tried by Sanhedrin Tried by Pilate, Herod, Pilate Crucified and buried	Matt 26:57–75; Mark 14:53–72; Luke 22:54–65; John 18:13–27 Matt 27:1; Mark 15:1; Luke 22:66 Matt 27:2–30; Mark 15:2–19; Luke 23:1–25; John 18:28–19:16 Matt 27:31–60; Mark 15:20–46; Luke 23:26–54; John 19:16–42
Saturday	Dead in tomb
Sunday	Resurrected	Matt 28:1–15; Mark 16:1–8; Luke 24:1–35

Friday, Nisan 15. On the other hand, John states that the Jews who took Jesus to the Praetorium did not enter it “in order that they might not be defiled but might eat the Passover” (John 18:28). This signifies that Jesus was tried and crucified before the time these Jews celebrated the Passover. This is substantiated in John 19:14, where we read that Jesus’ trial and crucifixion were on the “day of preparation for the Passover,” not after the eating of the Passover. Hence, seemingly contrary to the synoptics, Jesus’ Last Supper (which occurred on a Thursday night) was not a Passover, and Jesus was tried and crucified on Friday, Nisan 14, just before the celebration of the Passover. This is confirmed by Paul when he declares that “Christ, our Passover lamb, has been sacrificed” (1 Cor 5:7), as well as by the Gospel of Peter which states that Jesus was delivered to the people “on the day before the Unleavened Bread, their feast,”<sup>122</sup> and by the Babylonian Talmud, which probably refers to Jesus when it says: “On the eve of the Passover, Yeshu (MS M adds “the Nazarean”) was hanged.”<sup>123</sup> Therefore, the synoptic gospels see Jesus celebrating the Last Supper as a Passover meal on Thursday, Nisan 14, with the trial and crucifixion on Friday, Nisan 15; in John, the Last Supper, celebrated on Thursday, Nisan 13, was not a Passover meal, with the trial and crucifixion on Friday, Nisan 14. This means that Jesus was crucified at the same time as the Paschal lambs were slaughtered.

There have been many attempts to resolve these differences. Some have conjectured that the Last Supper was not the Passover meal, and thus there is no conflict between the synoptic gospels and the Gospel of John.<sup>124</sup> However, Jeremias, with other scholars, lists the following

---

<sup>122</sup> Gospel of Peter 3.

<sup>123</sup> b. Sanh. 43a.

<sup>124</sup> Maurice Goguel, The Life of Jesus, trans. Olive Wyon (London: George Allen & Unwin, 1933), 429–437; Théo Preiss, Life in Christ, trans. Harold Knight, SBT 13 (London: SCM Press, 1957), 81–99; Ethelbert Stauffer, Jesus and His Story, trans. Dorothea M. Barton (London: SCM Press, 1960), 93–98; cf. Robert F. O’Toole, “Last Supper,” in ABD, vol. 4 (New York: Doubleday, 1992), 235–237. Some think it may have been something similar to Passover but without the Passover lamb, since it was the day before the official Passover: cf. Vincent Taylor, The Gospel according to St. Mark, 2nd ed. (London: Macmillan, 1966), 664–667; F. F. Bruce, New Testament History (Garden City, NY: Doubleday & Company, 1969), 182–183; R. T. France, “Chronological Aspects of ‘Gospel Harmony,’” Vox Evangelica 16 (1986): 43–54; Baruch M. Bokser, “Was the Last Supper a Passover Seder?” Bible Review 3 (1987): 24–33; Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God, 555–559.

arguments for the Last Supper being a Passover meal.<sup>125</sup> (1) The synoptic gospels explicitly state that the Last Supper was a Passover (Matt 26:2, 17, 18, 19; Mark 14:1, 12, 14, 16; Luke 22:1, 7, 8, 13, 15). (2) It took place, as required by the Law (Deut 16:7), within the gates of Jerusalem even though the city was very crowded at the time. (3) The Upper Room was made available without difficulty, in keeping with the Passover custom. (4) The Last Supper was eaten at night (Matt 26:20; Mark 14:17; John 13:30; 1 Cor 11:23). (5) Jesus limited himself to the twelve, rather than eating with the large circle of his followers (which corresponds to the Passover custom). (6) A reclining posture at the table was for special occasions only. (7) The meal was eaten in Levitical purity (John 13:10), which is not required for regular meals. (8) Jesus broke the bread during the course of the meal (Matt 26:26; Mark 14:22; Luke 22:19) rather than at the beginning of the meal, as was customary. (9) The drink was red wine, which was used only on special occasions; normally, water was drunk. (10) Some of the disciples thought that Judas had left to purchase items for the feast (John 13:29); this would not have been necessary if the Last Supper took place the day before the Passover, since he would have had the whole of the next day (Nisan 14) available for this purpose. (11) Some of the disciples thought that Judas had left to give something to the poor, which was customary on Passover night (John 13:29). (12) The Last Supper ends with the singing of hymns, which would have been the second half of the Passover hallel (Pss 114 [or 115]–118). (13) Jesus did not return to Bethany, which was outside Jerusalem's city limit, but went to spend the night on the Mount of Olives, which was within the enlarged city limits, the required boundary for celebration of the Passover feast. (14) The interpretation of specific elements of the meal was a part of the Passover ritual. These fourteen arguments offer substantial evidence that the Last Supper was considered a Passover meal.

---

<sup>125</sup> Joachim Jeremias, The Eucharistic Words of Jesus, trans. Norman Perrin, 3rd ed. NTL (London: SCM Press, 1966), 41–56; A. J. B. Higgins, The Lord's Supper in the New Testament, SBT 6 (London: SCM Press, 1952), 20–23; Gustaf Dalman, Jesus-Jeshua: Studies in the Gospels, trans. Paul P. Levertoff (London: SPCK, 1929; reprint, New York: KTAV Publishing House, 1971), 106–132; I. Howard Marshall, Last Supper and Lord's Supper (Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1980), 55–66; David Wenham, "How Jesus Understood the Last Supper: A Parable of Action," Churchman 105 (1991): 246–260, esp. 249–255; Robin Routledge, "Passover and Last Supper," TynBul 53 (2002): 203–221.

The problem remains: if Jesus' Last Supper was the Passover meal, how could the Jews on the next morning say they had not eaten the Passover (John 18:28)? There have been many attempts to harmonize these accounts. First, some suggest that this does not refer to eating the Passover itself but to eating the upcoming meals in the seven-day Feast of Unleavened Bread (note Luke 22:1: "the Feast of Unleavened Bread, called the Passover").<sup>126</sup> But Morris gave a death blow to this theory by pointing out that although one may concede that τὸ πάσχα can refer to the Passover plus the Feast of Unleavened Bread (e.g., Luke 22:1; Acts 12:4; John 2:13; 6:4; 11:55; 18:39), it certainly cannot refer to the Feast of Unleavened Bread without the τὸ πάσχα, which is necessary to make this theory viable. There is no "evidence that the simple expression 'the Passover' was ever used for the second part of the combined feast when the main part had already been eaten. It was the Passover supper that was the high point. It was the supper which gave its name to the whole. That it was possible to extend the word Passover to include what remained after that supper had been eaten is one thing; that it could be used of that remainder by itself is quite another."<sup>127</sup>

Second, Jaubert proposed that Jesus' Last Supper was a Passover meal, but that following the Qumran calendar, he celebrated it on the Tuesday of the Passion Week; following the official calendar, he was

---

<sup>126</sup> Theodor Zahn, Introduction to the New Testament, trans. John Moore Trout et al., under the direction and supervision of Melancthon Williams Jacobus and Charles Snow Thayer, 3rd German ed., vol. 3 (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1909), 282–283, 296–298 n. 17; Charles C. Torrey, "In the Fourth Gospel the Last Supper was the Paschal Meal," JQR 42 (1952): 237–250; Norval Geldenhuys, Commentary on the Gospel of Luke, London: Marshall, Morgan & Scott, 1950), 649–670, esp. 661–663; Roger T. Beckwith, "Cautionary Notes on the Use of Calendars and Astronomy to Determine the Chronology of the Passion," in Chronos, Kairos, Christos: Nativity and Chronological Studies Presented to Jack Finegan, ed. Jerry Vardaman and Edwin M. Yamauchi (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1989), 204–205; idem, Calendar and Chronology, Jewish and Christian: Biblical, Intertestamental and Patristic Studies, AGJU 33 (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1996), 295–296; D. A. Carson, The Gospel according to John (Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1991), 589–590; Craig L. Blomberg, The Historical Reliability of John's Gospel: Issues and Commentary (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press; Leicester, England: Apollos, 2001), 238; Andreas Köstenberger, John, BECNT (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Academic, 2004), 524. For a good defense of this view, see Barry D. Smith, "The Chronology of the Last Supper," WTJ 53 (1991): 29–45.

<sup>127</sup> Leon Morris, The Gospel according to John, rev. ed., NICNT (Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1995), 689–690.

crucified on Friday when the Passover lambs were slaughtered.<sup>128</sup> However, there is no indication that Jesus was associated with or ministered to the Qumran community, and certainly there is no indication in the gospels to support the conclusion that Jesus ever followed a Qumran calendar.<sup>129</sup>

Third, Mulder suggests that Jesus and his disciples ate the Passover on Thursday night, Nisan 14, along with most of the Jews in Jerusalem, whereas the Sanhedrin and their servants postponed the eating of the Passover in order to make preparations for the arrest of Jesus. Accordingly, they could tell Pilate on Friday morning that they had not yet eaten the Passover (John 18:28), and they would proceed to eat it that Friday evening, Nisan 15.<sup>130</sup> In the Old Testament, it was permissible to postpone the celebration of the Passover if one had become unclean through contact with a dead body. In that case, Passover would be celebrated one month later (Num 9:1–14), not one day later. Although the “Sanhedrin” is not mentioned in this passage, the high priest Caiaphas is specifically mentioned: on this view, therefore, the high priest did not celebrate the Passover on Nisan 14! Also, the evangelist mentions the Pharisees and chief priests (John 18:3), who would have missed celebrating the Passover on Nisan 14. This is unlikely, and it seems that John would have mentioned that Caiaphas, members of the Sanhedrin, chief priests, and/or the Pharisees had not eaten the Passover.

Fourth, some scholars hold that the Jews in Jesus’ day celebrated the Passover on two consecutive days. Chwolson reasons that the Paschal lambs were slain “between the two evenings” (i.e., 3 to 5 p.m.) on Nisan 14 as commanded in the Old Testament (Exod 12:6; Lev 23:5; Num 9:3.5). Since Nisan 14 was a Friday in the year in which Jesus died, and since not all the Paschal lambs could be slain before the Sabbath (Nisan 15) had begun, they were slain on Thursday evening

<sup>128</sup> Annie Jaubert, The Date of the Last Supper, trans. Isaac Rafferty (Staten Island, NY: Alba House, 1965); cf. also Eugen Ruckstuhl, Chronology of the Last Days of Jesus, trans. Victor J. Drapela (New York: Desclée Company, Inc., 1965).

<sup>129</sup> For a critique of her view, see Josef Blinzler, “Qumran-Kalendar und Passion-chronologie,” ZNW 49 (1958): 238–251; George Ogg, review of La date de la Cène, by Mlle Jaubert, NovT 3 (1959): 149–160; J. T. Milik, Ten Years of Discovery in the Wilderness of Judaea, trans. J. Strugnell, SBT 26 (London: SCM Press, 1959), 112–113; Norman Walker, “Pauses in the Passion Story and Their Significance for Chronology,” NovT 6 (1963): 16–19; Jeremias, The Eucharistic Words of Jesus, 24–25.

<sup>130</sup> H. Mulder, “John xviii 28 and the Date of the Crucifixion,” in Miscellanea Neotestamentica, ed. T. Baarda, A. F. J. Klijn, and W. C. van Unnik, Supplements to Novum Testamentum 48 (Leiden: Brill, 1978), 87–105.

(Nisan 13). Because Ex 12:10 states that the Passover was to be eaten on the night the lamb was slain, the Pharisees had the Passover meal immediately (Nisan 13/14), while the Sadducees kept the lambs for twenty-four hours and then ate them at the usual time (i.e., Nisan 14/15). In the light of this, Jesus and his disciples would have celebrated the Passover with the Pharisees on Thursday night (Nisan 13/14), while the Jews mentioned in John 18:28 were Sadducees who would not have eaten the Passover until Friday night (Nisan 14/15).<sup>131</sup> The questions which arise from this theory are as follows: (1) Would not the Sadducees have obeyed Exod 12:10 and ate the Paschal lamb on the night it was slain? (2) Would Jesus have celebrated the Passover on Nisan 13/14, when the law specified Nisan 14/15? (3) Would Jesus have been able to eat it with unleavened bread, bearing in mind that the feast did not begin until the evening of Nisan 14/15? If not, this would have changed the whole character of the Passover ritual. (4) Does this take into account the evidence adduced by Jeremias that when Nisan 15 was a Sabbath, the Jews could slaughter the victims earlier in the afternoon?<sup>132</sup>

Modifying Chwolson's theory, Billerbeck suggests that there was a day's difference between the Boethusian/Sadducean party and the Pharisees.<sup>133</sup> He conjectures that the one-day difference resulted from counting the fifty days forward to Pentecost. Leviticus 23:11, 15–16 instructs the Israelites that the Feast of First-fruits occurs on the day after the Sabbath, and from that day they would count fifty days forward to Pentecost. The Pharisees interpreted the term "Sabbath" to mean "festival" (i.e., Passover) and counted from the day following the Passover regardless of what day it was in the week, whereas the Sadducees interpreted "Sabbath" literally and counted from the Sunday after

---

<sup>131</sup> D. Chwolson, Das letzte Passamahl Christi und der Tages seines Todes nach den in Übereinstimmung gebrachten Berichten der Synoptiker und des Evangelium Johannis nebst Schlusswort und Anhang, 2nd ed. (Leipzig: H. Haessel Verlag, 1908), 20–44; cf. M.-J. Lagrange, The Gospel of Jesus Christ, trans. by the Members of the English Dominican Province, vol. 2 (London: Burns, Oates & Washbourne, 1938), 193–196.

<sup>132</sup> Jeremias, The Eucharistic Words of Jesus, 23.

<sup>133</sup> Hermann L. Strack and Paul Billerbeck, Kommentar zum Neuen Testament aus Talmud und Midrasch, vol. 2 (München: C. H. Beck'sche Verlagsbuchhandlung, 1924), 812–853; cf. also W. M. Christie, "Did Christ Eat the Passover with His Disciples? Or, The Synoptic versus John's Gospel," ExpTim 43 (1932): 515–519; J. B. Segal, The Hebrew Passover from the Earliest Times to AD 70, London Oriental Studies 12 (London: Oxford University Press, 1963), 241–269; Marshall, Last Supper and Lord's Supper, 71–75.

the Passover.<sup>134</sup> Therefore, in the year Jesus died, the Boethusian/Sadducean party was anxious to have Nisan 16 fall on Sunday (so that both the Boethusian/Sadducean party and the Pharisees could celebrate the First-fruits and Pentecost on the same days), and the priestly calendar commission agreed to fix Nisan 1 so that Nisan 14 would be a Friday and Nisan 16 a Sunday. Consequently, the Feast of First-fruits would fall on a Sunday, then fifty days later Pentecost would also fall on a Sunday. However, the Pharisees reckoned Nisan 1 to have begun a day earlier, resulting in a compromise which meant that the Boethusian/Sadducean party celebrated Passover on Friday evening, Nisan 14, in line with the calendar commission, while the Pharisees, and with them Jesus and his disciples, celebrated it on Thursday evening (Nisan 14 according to Pharisaic reckoning).<sup>135</sup> Along similar lines, Dockx argues that although the Pharisees and Sadducees agreed on the calendar, the Galileans reckoned Nisan 1 one day earlier than the Judeans.<sup>136</sup> Thus, in the year Jesus died, there were two consecutive days for Passover. These two proposals have more merit than Chwolson's, in that both parties celebrated the Passover of Nisan 14/15, and that the Feast of First-fruits could be held by both parties. The main problem is that both are based on the conjecture that there was a debate over the commencement of the month of Nisan (i.e., how to fix Nisan 1) in the year Christ died.

Continuing the arguments for the celebration of Passover on two consecutive days, Pickl suggests that because there were too many lambs to be slaughtered on one day and not enough houses in Jerusalem for the pilgrims to eat the Passover meal, it was the custom of the Galileans to slay their lambs on Nisan 13, and the Feast of Unleavened Bread lasted eight days (instead of seven), whereas the Judeans celebrated on Nisan 14.<sup>137</sup> This makes good sense except for the fact (as

<sup>134</sup> m. Ag. 2:4; Mena. 10:3.

<sup>135</sup> Strack and Billerbeck, Kommentar zum Neuen Testament aus Talmud und Midrasch, 2:847–850; cf. also J. van Goudoever, Biblical Calendars, 2nd ed. (Leiden: Brill, 1961), 15–29.

<sup>136</sup> S. Dockx, Chronologies néotestamentaires et Vie de l'Église primitive: Recherches exégétiques, rev. ed. (Leuven: Peeters, 1984), 26–29.

<sup>137</sup> Josef Pickl, The Messiah, trans. Andrew Green (St. Louis: B. Herder Book Co., 1946), 120–122; cf. also David Instone-Brewer, "Jesus' Last Passover: The Synoptics and John," ExpTim 112 (2001): 122–123; idem, Feasts and Sabbaths, 2: Traditions of the Rabbis from the Era of the New Testament (Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, forthcoming); Maurice Casey, "The Date of the Passover Sacrifices and Mark 14:12," TynBul 48.2 (1997): 245–247.

Jeremias has pointed out) that Pickl's conjecture of the eight-day Feast of Unleavened Bread is based on a practice of the Diaspora "where the Jews celebrated all festivals one day longer than in Palestine."<sup>138</sup>

Fifth, throughout the years many theories have been put forward concerning different calendars that were used by the Jews over the centuries.<sup>139</sup> One problem concerns how a day was reckoned. Due to the limitation of space, only a summary can be given.<sup>140</sup> Certainly, there are many passages which indicate that the day was reckoned from sunset to sunset. There is the Feast of Unleavened Bread which runs from the evening of Nisan 14 to the evening of Nisan 21 (Exod 12:18) and the weekly Sabbath (Lev 23:32; Neh 13:19–20). At the times when there was a single day's ceremonial uncleanness, the day ended at the evening (e.g., Lev 11:25–32, 39, 40, 46; 14:46; 15:5–11, 16–23, 27; 17:15; 22:6; Deut 23:11). Another indication that a day began in the evening is the listing of the evening before the morning (e.g., Gen 1:5; Deut 1:33; 28:66; 1 Sam 25:16; 1 Kgs 8:29; Est 4:16; Is 27:3; 34:10; Jer 14:17; Mark 4:27; 5:5; Luke 2:37; Acts 20:37; 26:7). There are, on the other hand, many references which reckon the day from sunrise to sunrise. There is, for example, the listing of the day before the night (e.g., Gen 1:14, 16, 18; 8:22; Exod 10:13; 13:21, 22; 40:38; Lev 8:35; Num. 9:16; 11:32; Josh 1:8; Judg 19:9, 11; 1 Sam 19:24; 28:20; 1 Kgs 8:59; Neh 1:6; 4:9; Pss 1:2; 32:4 [LXX 31:4]; Isa 21:8; 38:12–13; 62:6; Jer 33:20, 25; Amos 5:8; Zech 14:7; Luke 18:7; 21:37; Acts 9:24; Rev 4:8; 7:15; 12:10; 14:11; 20:10). Also, when the expressions "the same day" or "the next day" are used, the context clearly indicates that the night belonged to the first day and was not the beginning of a new day (e.g., Gen 19:34;

<sup>138</sup> Jeremias, The Eucharistic Words of Jesus, 24.

<sup>139</sup> Julian Morgenstern, "The Three Calendars of Ancient Israel," HUCA 1 (1924): 13–78; idem, "Additional Notes on 'The Three Calendars of Ancient Israel,'" HUCA 3 (1926): 77–107; idem, "Supplementary Studies in the Calendars of Ancient Israel," HUCA 10 (1935): 1–148; Asher Finkel, The Pharisees and the Teacher of Nazareth. A Study of Their Background, Their Halachic and Midrashic Teachings, the Similarities and Differences, AGJU 4 (Leiden: Brill, 1964), 70–74; Finegan, Handbook of Biblical Chronology, 33–49.

<sup>140</sup> For a more detailed study, see Julian Morgenstern, "The Three Calendars of Ancient Israel," 15–28; P. J. Heawood, "The Beginning of the Jewish Day," JQR 36 (1945): 393–401; Solomon Zeitlin, "The Beginning of the Jewish Day during the Second Commonwealth," JQR 36 (1945): 403–414; Julian Morgenstern, "The Chanukkah Festival and the Calendar of Ancient Israel," HUCA 20 (1947): 34–40; H. R. Stroes, "Does the Day Begin in the Evening or Morning?" VT 16 (1966): 460–475; Roger T. Beckwith, "The Day, its Divisions and Its Limits in Biblical Thought," EvQ 43 (1971): 218–227; idem, Calendar and Chronology, 6–12.

1 Sam 19:11; Acts 4:3; 20:7, 11; 23:32).<sup>141</sup> The one passage in the New Testament that may more explicitly indicate a sunrise to sunrise reckoning is Matt 28:1, which states that the women came to the tomb “late on the Sabbath as it began to dawn towards the first day of the week.” This means that the new day began with sunrise. However, as Beckwith points out, this could be translated “after the Sabbath day, as it began to dawn on the first day of the week.”<sup>142</sup> With regard specifically to the Passover, there is a sunrise to sunrise reckoning in Deut 16:4, which states that nothing which is sacrificed on the evening of the first day shall remain overnight until morning. In conclusion, both reckonings were used, at times by the same author within the same book.

What about the Passover in Jesus’ time? As I have indicated above, the Passover could be reckoned either from sunset to sunset or from sunrise to sunrise. Generally, it is thought to have been reckoned from sunset to sunset. Yet Josephus, who followed the Pharisaic ways, states that the Paschal lamb had to be eaten during the night, with nothing left for the morning;<sup>143</sup> this seems to indicate a sunrise to sunrise reckoning. Then there is the Mishnah, which states that the Passover lamb must be eaten by midnight;<sup>144</sup> this seems to indicate that the new day began after sunset, viz. at sunrise.

As this discussion indicates, in Jesus’ time there were two systems of reckoning the day. This consideration appears the best explanation of the time of Jesus’ death, since it solves the disagreement between the synoptics and John by proposing that the Galileans used a different method of reckoning the Passover from the Judeans. The synoptic gospels, the Galileans, and the Pharisees used the sunrise to sunrise reckoning, whereas the Gospel of John and official Judaism (Sadducees) used the sunset to sunset reckoning.<sup>145</sup> Thus, according to the

<sup>141</sup> Cf. Beckwith, “The Day, its Divisions and Its Limits in Biblical Thought,” 224–225; idem, Calendar and Chronology, 4–6.

<sup>142</sup> Beckwith, “The Day, its Divisions and Its Limits in Biblical Thought,” 226; idem, Calendar and Chronology, 8.

<sup>143</sup> Josephus, Ant. 3.248.

<sup>144</sup> m. Pesa 10:9; Zebah 5:8.

<sup>145</sup> Julian Morgenstern, “The Calendar of the Book of Jubilees, its Origin and its Character,” VT 5 (1955): 64–65 n. 2; idem, “The Reckoning of the Day in the Gospels and Acts,” Crozer Quarterly 26 (1949): 232–240; G. R. Driver, “Two Problems in the New Testament,” JTS 16 (1965): 327–328, 330–331; Julian Morgenstern, Some Significant Antecedents of Christianity, StPB 10 (Leiden: Brill, 1966), 8–15; Finegan, Handbook of Biblical Chronology, 356–357.

synoptic gospels, the Last Supper was a Passover meal. Since the day was to be reckoned from sunrise, the Galileans, including Jesus and his disciples, had the Paschal lamb slaughtered in the late afternoon of Thursday, Nisan 14, and later that evening ate the Passover with unleavened bread.<sup>146</sup> On the other hand, the Judean Jews who calculated from sunset to sunset would slay the lamb on Friday afternoon, which marked the end of Nisan 14, and would eat the Passover lamb with the unleavened bread that night, Nisan 15. Thus, Jesus had eaten the Passover meal when his enemies, who had not yet celebrated the Passover, arrested him.

This interpretation eliminates the difficulties presented in John's Gospel. First, it makes sense of John 18:28, where the Jews did not want to enter the Praetorium so as not to be defiled, since later that day they would slay the lambs for those who reckoned from sunset to sunset. Second, John 19:14 makes sense, for this passage states that Jesus' trial and crucifixion were on the "day of preparation for the Passover," not after the eating of the Passover. Third, it fits well with John 19:36, which speaks of the fulfillment of the Old Testament (Ex 12:46; Num 9:12) when no bones of Jesus, the Passover Lamb, were broken. Following the trial and crucifixion, Jesus died at the same time as the Paschal lambs were slain in the temple precincts.

This view, then, not only does justice to the data of the synoptic gospels and the Gospel of John, but is also substantiated by the Mishnah. It was the custom of the Galileans to do no work on the day of the Passover, while the Judeans worked until midday.<sup>147</sup> Since the Galileans' day began at sunrise, they would do no work on the entire day of the Passover. On the other hand, the Judeans' day began at sunset, and they would work during the morning but not in the afternoon. Probably the Judeans ceased to work in the afternoon in deference to the Galileans who would be slaying their lambs at that time, Nisan 14. Hence, the order of events in Galilean reckoning would be as follows: (1) on the morning of Nisan 14 the Galileans would not work while the Judeans did work; (2) the Judeans would cease working by midday; and (3) the Galileans would slay their Paschal lambs that afternoon.

---

<sup>146</sup> In the New Testament, the first day of Unleavened Bread was Nisan 14 and not Nisan 15 (Matt 26:17 = Mark 14:1 = Luke 22:7); according to Beckwith, this was a later custom seen in the Mishnah (Pesa 1:1-5; 3:6; 5:4), since one prepared for the Feast of Unleavened Bread by removing all the leaven from one's house on Nisan 14 (Beckwith, "The Day, its Divisions and Its Limits in Biblical Thought," 222 n. 4; idem, Calendar and Chronology, 4 n. 5).

<sup>147</sup> m. Pesa 4:5.

The modern mind may wonder how the first-century Jews kept these variants distinct from one another, but those who have studied these problems see no real difficulty, because there is ample evidence of the simultaneous use of different calendars in Jesus' time. Stauffer states, "in Palestinian Judaism in the time of Jesus it is usual for the calendar of feasts to be calculated differently in different groups and regions—particularly in the calculation of the Passover."<sup>148</sup>

In conclusion, the proposed interpretation does justice to the data of the synoptic gospels, the Gospel of John, and the Mishnah. It can be charted as follows:

THURSDAY	Galilean Method Synoptic Reckoning Used by Jesus, his disciples, Pharisees	Judean Method John's Reckoning Used by official Judaism (Sadducees)	Midnight
			Sunrise
	Nisan 14
	3–5 p.m. Passover lamb slain
Last Supper		Nisan 14	Sunset
Jesus Arrested			Midnight
FRIDAY			Sunrise
6 a.m. Jesus before Pilate	Nisan 15
9 a.m. Crucifixion
12–3 p.m. Darkness
3 p.m. Jesus Died		3–5 p.m. Passover Lamb Slain
Jesus Buried
		Nisan 15	Sunset
			Midnight
SATURDAY

<sup>148</sup> Stauffer, Jesus and His Story, 95; cf. also Finkel, The Pharisees and the Teacher of Nazareth, 70–74; Beckwith, "The Day, its Divisions and Its Limits in Biblical Thought," 226–227; idem, Calendar and Chronology, 8–9; Finegan, Handbook of Biblical Chronology, 354–358.

4.2. The Year of Jesus' Death

Proposed years for Jesus' death vary from 21 CE to 36 CE. Eisler<sup>149</sup> and Vardaman<sup>150</sup> propose 21 CE; Meyer<sup>151</sup> and King<sup>152</sup> 27 CE; Winter<sup>153</sup> 28 CE; Turner<sup>154</sup> and Hölscher<sup>155</sup> 29 CE; Olmstead,<sup>156</sup> Blinzler,<sup>157</sup> Ruckstuhl,<sup>158</sup> Jeremias,<sup>159</sup> Dockx,<sup>160</sup> Doig,<sup>161</sup> Donfried,<sup>162</sup> and Meier<sup>163</sup>

<sup>149</sup> Robert Eisler, ΙΗΣΟΥΣ ΒΑΣΙΛΕΥΣ ΟΥ ΒΑΣΙΛΕΥΣΑΣ. Die messianische Unabhängigkeitsbewegung vom Auftreten Johannes des Täufers bis zum Untergang Jakobs des Gerichten nach den Neuerschlossenen Eroberung von Jerusalem des Flavius Josephus und den Christlichen Quellen, 2 vols. (Heidelberg: Carl Winters Universitätsbuchhandlung, 1929), 1:xxxiii, 2:165, 254–270, 423–529; and the English condensed version: idem, The Messiah Jesus and John the Baptist, trans. Alexander Haggerty Krappe (New York: Lincoln MacVeagh, The Dial Press, 1931), 16–20, 313, 363–370, 457–512.

<sup>150</sup> Jerry Vardaman, "Jesus' Life: A New Chronology," in Chronos, Kairos, Christos: Nativity and Chronological Studies Presented to Jack Finegan, ed. idem and Edwin M. Yamauchi (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1989), 55–82; idem, "A Provisional Chronology of the New Testament: Jesus through Paul's Early Years," in idem, ed., Chronos, Kairos, Christos II: Chronological, Nativity, and Religious Studies in Memory of Ray Summers (Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1998), 316.

<sup>151</sup> Eduard Meyer, Ursprung und Anfänge des Christentums, vol. 3 (Stuttgart and Berlin: J. G. Cotta'sche Buchhandlung Nachfolger, 1923), 171.

<sup>152</sup> Charles King, "The Outlines of New Testament Chronology," CQR 139 (1945): 145–147, 153.

<sup>153</sup> Paul Winter, On the Trial of Jesus, SJ 1 (Berlin: Walter de Gruyter & Co., 1961), 175 n.5.

<sup>154</sup> Cuthbert Hamilton Turner, "Chronology of the New Testament," in A Dictionary of the Bible, ed. James Hastings et al., vol. 1 (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1898), 411–415.

<sup>155</sup> Gustav Hölscher, "Die Hohenpriesterliste bei Josephus und die evangelische Chronologie," in Sitzungsberichte der Heidelberger Akademie der Wissenschaftlich-philosophisch-historischen Klasse 30 (Heidelberg: Carl Winters Universitätsverlag, 1940), 26.

<sup>156</sup> A. T. Olmstead, Jesus in the Light of History (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1942), 279–281.

<sup>157</sup> Josef Blinzler, The Trial of Jesus; the Jewish and Roman Proceedings against Jesus Christ Described and Assessed from the Oldest Accounts, trans. Isabel and Florence McHugh, 2nd ed. (Westminster, MD: Newman Press, 1959), 72–80; idem, Der Prozess Jesu, 101–108.

<sup>158</sup> Ruckstuhl, Chronology of the Last Days of Jesus, 1–12.

<sup>159</sup> Jeremias, The Eucharistic Words of Jesus, 236–241.

<sup>160</sup> S. Dockx, Chronologies néotestamentaires et Vie de l'Église primitive: Recherches exégétiques, rev. ed. (Leuven: Peeters, 1984), 21–29.

<sup>161</sup> Kenneth F. Doig, New Testament Chronology (San Francisco: EMText, 1991), 237–324.

<sup>162</sup> Karl P. Donfried, "Chronology: New Testament," in ABD, ed. David Noel Freedman et al., vol. 1 (New York: Doubleday, 1992), 1016.

<sup>163</sup> Meier, A Marginal Jew, 1:402, 407.

30 CE; Bammel<sup>164</sup> and Stauffer<sup>165</sup> 32 CE; Fotheringham,<sup>166</sup> Ogg,<sup>167</sup> Maier,<sup>168</sup> Reicke,<sup>169</sup> Hoehner,<sup>170</sup> Humphreys and Waddington,<sup>171</sup> and Finegan<sup>172</sup> 33 CE; and Keim,<sup>173</sup> Lake,<sup>174</sup> Schonfield,<sup>175</sup> and Kokkinos<sup>176</sup> 36 CE.

The year of Jesus' death can be narrowed down by means of several considerations.

4.2.1. The Officials of the Trial

There were three officials involved in the trial of Jesus which resulted in his death. First, Caiaphas, the high priest (Matt 26:3, 57; John 11:49–53; 18:13–14), began his office in 18 CE<sup>177</sup> and was deposed at the Passover of 37 CE.<sup>178</sup> Second, Pilate, the prefect of Judea, began his

<sup>164</sup> Ernst Bammel, "Φίλος τοῦ Καίσαρος," TLZ 57 (1952): 205–210.

<sup>165</sup> Stauffer, Jesus and His Story, 91–110.

<sup>166</sup> J. K. Fotheringham, "The Evidence of Astronomy and Technical Chronology for the Date of the Crucifixion," JTS 35 (1934): 142–162.

<sup>167</sup> Ogg, The Chronology of the Public Ministry of Jesus, 244–277.

<sup>168</sup> Paul L. Maier, "Sejanus, Pilate, and the Date of the Crucifixion," CH 37 (1968): 3–13; idem, "The Date of the Nativity and the Chronology of Jesus' Life," 124–126.

<sup>169</sup> Bo Reicke, The New Testament Era: The World of the Bible from 500 BC to AD 100, trans. David E. Green (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1968), 183–184.

<sup>170</sup> Hoehner, Herod Antipas, 171, 180–183; idem, Chronological Aspects of the Life of Christ, 95–114.

<sup>171</sup> Colin J. Humphreys and W. G. Waddington, "Dating the Crucifixion," Nature 306 (22 December 1983): 743–746; Colin J. Humphreys and W. Graeme Waddington, "The Date of the Crucifixion," Journal of the American Scientific Affiliation 37 (March 1985): 2–10; Colin J. Humphreys and W. G. Waddington, "Astronomy and the Date of the Crucifixion," in Chronos, Kairos, Christos: Nativity and Chronological Studies Presented to Jack Finegan, ed. Jerry Vardaman and Edwin M. Yamauchi (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1989), 165–181; Colin J. Humphreys and W. G. Waddington, "The Jewish Calendar, a Lunar Eclipse and the Date of Christ's Crucifixion," TynBul 43.2 (1992): 331–351.

<sup>172</sup> Finegan, Handbook of Biblical Chronology, 359–362.

<sup>173</sup> Theodor Keim, The History of Jesus of Nazareth, Freely Investigated in Its Connection with the National Life of Israel, and Related in Detail, trans. E. M. Geldart and Arthur Ransom, 6 vols. (London: Williams and Norgate), 1873–1883, 4:222–223 n. 2; 6:234–244.

<sup>174</sup> Kirsopp Lake, "The Date of Herod's Marriage with Herodias, and the Chronology of the Gospels," Exp 8.4 (1912): 462–477.

<sup>175</sup> Hugh J. Schonfield, The Jesus Party (New York: Macmillan Publishing Co., 1974), 46–47, 51–53, 305.

<sup>176</sup> Kokkinos, "Crucifixion in AD 36: The Keystone for Dating the Birth of Jesus," 133–153; idem, The Herodian Dynasty, 195–196 n. 82; 301, 383.

<sup>177</sup> Josephus, Ant. 18.35; Helen K. Bond, Caiaphas: Friend of Rome and Judge of Jesus? (Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox Press, 2004), 42–43, 147.

<sup>178</sup> Josephus, Ant. 4.90–95; Hoehner, Herod Antipas, 313–316; Bond, Caiaphas, 85–89, 147.

rule (Matt 27:2–26; Mark 15:1–15; Luke 23:1–25; John 18:28–19:16; Acts 3:13; 4:27; 13:28; 1 Tim 6:13) in 26 CE<sup>179</sup> and was deposed after ten years of rule in 36 CE.<sup>180</sup> Third, Herod Antipas was the tetrarch of Galilee and Perea (Luke 23:6–12) from 4 BCE<sup>181</sup> until 39 CE.<sup>182</sup> Christ's crucifixion occurred under Pilate's rule (26–36 CE); this would eliminate the date of 21 CE for the crucifixion.

4.2.2. The Contribution of Astronomy

Having concluded that Jesus was crucified on Friday, Nisan 14, we must now determine when Nisan 14 fell on that day within 26–36 CE. Studies indicate that the only possible years were 27, 30, 33, and 36.<sup>183</sup> Of these, 27 CE is the least likely astronomically, for it is probable that Nisan 14 fell on a Thursday rather than a Friday in that year. Also, in 36 CE Nisan 14 probably fell on Saturday, although some scholars argue that it fell on Friday. There are some who argue that in 30 CE, Nisan 14 may have fallen on a Thursday, but it is reasonably certain that it fell on a Friday.<sup>184</sup> Accordingly, the calculations of astronomers would limit the probable years of Jesus' crucifixion on Friday, Nisan 14 to the years 27, 30, 33, and 36, with 27 and 36 CE the more questionable of these possibilities.

---

<sup>179</sup> Josephus, Ant. 18.35; War 2.169; Hoehner, Herod Antipas, 172–173; Helen K. Bond, Pontius Pilate in History and Interpretation, SNTSMS 100 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998), 1.

<sup>180</sup> Josephus, Ant. 18.89; Hoehner, Herod Antipas, 174–175, 313–316.

<sup>181</sup> Josephus, Ant. 17.317–318; War 2.93–95; Hoehner, Herod Antipas, 33–39.

<sup>182</sup> Josephus, Ant. 18.252; cf. 256; 19.351; Hoehner, Herod Antipas, 260–263.

<sup>183</sup> This is deduced from a compilation of chronological tables in J. K. Fotheringham, "Astronomical Evidence for the Date of the Crucifixion," JTS 12 (1910): 122; Idem, "The Evidence of Astronomy and Technical Chronology for the Date of the Crucifixion," 162; Ogg, The Chronology of the Public Ministry of Jesus, 270; Parker and Dubberstein, Babylonian Chronology 626 BC–AD 75, 446; Jeremias, The Eucharistic Words of Jesus, 38; Herman H. Goldstine, New and Full Moons, 1001 BC to AD 1651 (Philadelphia: American Philosophical Society, 1973), 86–87; Humphreys and Waddington, "The Jewish Calendar, a Lunar Eclipse and the Date of Christ's Crucifixion," 335; cf. also George Ogg, "The Chronology of the Last Supper," in Historicity and Chronology in the New Testament, Theological Collections 6 (London: SPCK, 1965), 92–96.

<sup>184</sup> Jeremias, The Eucharistic Words of Jesus, 39–40.

4.2.3. The Ministry of Jesus

Luke 3:1–2 indicates that John the Baptist began his ministry in Tiberius' fifteenth year, viz. 28/29 CE, and that Jesus' ministry followed this. This makes the dating of Jesus' crucifixion to 27 CE not only questionable astronomically, but also impossible historically. This is confirmed in John 2:20, where at the first Passover of Jesus the Jews stated that the temple had stood for forty-six years, bringing us to the spring of 30 CE: April 3, 30. This would eliminate 27 CE as a date for Jesus' crucifixion. Furthermore, we can see that Luke 3:1 also makes impossible the other extreme, the dating of Jesus' crucifixion to 36 CE. There is no indication in the gospels that Jesus' ministry lasted six years. Earlier, we concluded that the length of his ministry was between three and a half and three and three-quarter years, thus ending before 36 CE. In addition, if the ministry of Jesus began in 29 CE, as we have established, and lasted between three and a half and three and three-quarter years, which allows for the three Passovers in John's Gospel (2:13; 6:4; 11:55), this would also eliminate 30 CE as a date for the crucifixion. Although many wish to maintain this date, it is acceptable only if Jesus' ministry lasted for one year. Thus, 33 CE seems to fit best, both astronomically and in terms of the time frame of the ministry of Jesus.

4.2.5. The Confirmation of History

Up to this point, it appears that 33 CE is the best date for the crucifixion. Interestingly, both secular and sacred history agree with this conclusion, and confirm it as the date with the best support in the evidence.

Pilate is portrayed by his contemporary Philo<sup>185</sup> and later by Josephus<sup>186</sup> as a greedy, inflexible, and cruel man who resorted to robbery and oppression, much like his portrayal in Luke 13:1 where he “mingled the blood of the Galileans with their sacrifices.” However, when he tries Jesus, Pilate is portrayed as one who was readily submissive to the pressures of the religious leaders, who were demanding that Jesus be handed over to them.

How does one explain such a change of attitude? It must be understood that Pilate was probably appointed prefect of Judea through the intervention of the equestrian Lucius Aelius Sejanus, a trusted friend of Tiberius. Sejanus was the prefect of the Praetorian Guard, and a dedicated anti-Semite who wanted to exterminate the Jewish race.<sup>187</sup>

<sup>185</sup> Philo, Legat. 301–302.

<sup>186</sup> Josephus, Ant. 18.55–59; War 2.167–177.

Apparently, Pilate emulated Sejanus' anti-Jewish attitude in Judea.<sup>188</sup> Almost immediately after his arrival in Judea in 26 or 27, he brought busts of Caesar attached to Roman standards into Jerusalem, probably next to the temple.<sup>189</sup> The Jews were so outraged by the introduction of these images that a delegation was sent to Caesarea. This led Pilate to back down, since he feared a national revolt on such a scale that not even Sejanus could cover his back. However, later in 29/30 CE Pilate issued offensive coins with a crosier symbolizing Emperor-worship, possibly for the purpose of indoctrination.<sup>190</sup> Later, he seized Qurban funds from the temple treasury to construct an aqueduct in Jerusalem. When the Jews protested, the Roman soldiers beat them, killing many.<sup>191</sup> In Luke 13:1, Jesus is told about Galileans "whose blood Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices." In this case, we do not know the details of what happened, but it is in keeping with the portrayal of Pilate in Josephus and Philo. It did, however, cause a strained relationship between Pilate and the Galilean tetrarch, Herod Antipas. This most likely occurred at one of the Jewish festivals, possibly the Passover of 32 CE, when many Galileans would have been in Jerusalem.

How could Pilate continue with all these insults without a protest by the Jews to the Roman government? This was not a problem as long as Sejanus was in full control in Rome. Complaints such as this, sent to Tiberius, would be destroyed by Sejanus before they reached island of Capri where Tiberius had resided since 26 or 27.<sup>192</sup> Sejanus was making every effort to increase his power, with the ambition of becoming emperor. In order to achieve this end, he even poisoned Tiberius' son Drusus in 23<sup>193</sup> and attempted to get rid of any other possible successors.<sup>194</sup> As Sejanus continued to rise in power, he was given more and

<sup>187</sup> Philo, Flacc. 1; Legat. 159–161.

<sup>188</sup> For further discussion of Pilate's rule, see Hoehner, Herod Antipas, 172–183; Bond, Pontius Pilate in History and Interpretation, 49–93.

<sup>189</sup> Josephus, Ant. 18.55–59; War 2.169–174; cf. Carl H. Kraeling, "The Episode of the Roman Standards at Jerusalem," HTR 35 (1942): 263–289.

<sup>190</sup> Ethelbert Stauffer, "Zur Münzprägung und Judenpolitik des Pontius Pilatus," La Nouvelle Clío 1.2 (1950): 495–514, esp. 506–508; idem, Jerusalem und Rom im Zeitalter Jesu Christi (Berne: Francke Verlag, 1957), 17, 134 n. 7.

<sup>191</sup> Josephus, War 2.175–177; Ant. 18.60–62.

<sup>192</sup> Tacitus, Ann. 4.41.

<sup>193</sup> Tacitus, Ann. 4.8; Suetonius, Tib. 62.1; Dio, 57.22.1–4.

<sup>194</sup> For a discussion of the bitter party struggles in Rome at that time, see Frank Burr Marsh, "Roman Parties in the Reign of Tiberius," AHR 31 (1926): 233–250;

more honor even to the extent that in 29 the Senate voted to observe his birthday publicly<sup>195</sup> and by 30 he was so influential that senators and other high officials looked upon him as if he were the emperor.<sup>196</sup> Finally, Tiberius became suspicious of his favorite minister, and proceeded with great cunning to overthrow this extremely powerful man without losing both his throne and his life.<sup>197</sup> He secretly appointed Navevius Cordus Sutorius Macro as prefect of the Praetorian Guard. This man tricked Sejanus by confirming a rumor that Tiberius was going to grant him the tribunicia potestas, supreme authority over civil affairs, as joint emperor with Tiberius. Sejanus, overjoyed with the announcement, rushed into the Senate to hear the letter from Tiberius, which, much to his horror, was a denouncement rather than a promotion. On that day, October 18, 31, Sejanus was accused of conspiracy, sentenced, and executed.<sup>198</sup>

This, no doubt, caused immediate tremors throughout the Empire, especially to those who were appointed through the intervention of Sejanus. In the past, Tiberius had been anti-Semitic (possibly under the influence of Sejanus), as can be seen in his expulsion of the Jews from Rome in 19 CE,<sup>199</sup> but now he became more favorable towards them. According to Philo, it now occurred to Tiberius that the charges brought against the Jews were unfounded, since they had been fabricated by Sejanus. Consequently, he ordered the governors (many of whom had probably been appointed through Sejanus' intervention) throughout the Empire not to persist in their negative treatment of the Jews.<sup>200</sup> This order certainly had its effect in Judea, for early in 32 Pilate stopped issuing coins that were offensive to the Jews.<sup>201</sup>

Philo records an incident in which Pilate had set up in the former palace of Herod the Great gold-coated shields bearing the name,

---

Robin Seager, Tiberius, 2nd ed. (Oxford: Blackwell Publishing, 2005, 151–188 (chapter on Sejanus).

<sup>195</sup> Dio, 58.2.7–8; Suetonius, Tib. 65.

<sup>196</sup> Dio, 58.4.1.

<sup>197</sup> For a discussion of the political intrigues between Tiberius and Sejanus, see Frank Burr Marsh, The Reign of Tiberius (London: Oxford University Press, 1931), 192–193; 304–310.

<sup>198</sup> Dio, 58.9–12; 65.14.1; Tacitus, Ann. 6.48; Suetonius, Tib. 61, 65; Josephus, Ant. 18.181–182.

<sup>199</sup> Josephus, Ant. 18.81–85; Suetonius, Tib. 36; Dio, 56.18.5a; Tacitus, Ann. 2.85.

<sup>200</sup> Philo, Legat. 159–161.

<sup>201</sup> E. Bammel, "Syrian Coinage and Pilate," JJS 2 (1951): 108–110.

not the image, of the emperor. When Pilate refused to hear the Jews' request to remove these, some prominent Jews, including the four sons of Herod, appealed to the Emperor Tiberius, who rebuked Pilate for his actions and ordered him to remove the shields immediately and have them taken to the temple of Augustus at Caesarea.<sup>202</sup>

There are three significant things about this incident. First, it is difficult to ascertain why the Jews were offended by these aniconic shields, unless the inscription may have had some religious significance in connection with the emperor or the imperial cult.<sup>203</sup> Second, one can only guess who the four sons of Herod were, but it is certain that Herod Antipas and Philip the Tetrarch were two of them. With regard to Herod Antipas it is important to remember that he too had been a friend of Sejanus<sup>204</sup> and was now determined to prove his loyalty to Tiberius. Third, although the time frame of this episode has been debated,<sup>205</sup> it must have occurred later in Pilate's administration and after Sejanus' death because: (1) this is implied by the reference to Pilate's fear of impeachment; (2) the Jewish embassy was able to report to Tiberius directly; (3) Tiberius' immediate order to remove the shields so as not to offend the Jews indicates the change of attitude towards the Jews which he displayed after Sejanus' death; and (4) the fact that Pilate and Antipas, both friends of Sejanus, were now opposing each other may also indicate that this event occurred after Sejanus' death. When Sejanus was in power Pilate had nothing to fear. Therefore, since the Herodian brothers had been present in Jerusalem, the incident of the shields probably occurred at a Jewish festival, possibly at Passover,<sup>206</sup> but more likely at the Feast of Tabernacles in 32.<sup>207</sup>

What motivated Pilate to set up the shields when his position was so precarious? It is possible that he wanted to dissociate himself from

---

<sup>202</sup> Philo, Legat. 299–305; cf. Paul L. Maier, "The Episode of the Golden Roman Shields at Jerusalem," HTR 62 (1969): 109–121.

<sup>203</sup> S. F. G. Brandon, Jesus and the Zealots: A Study of the Political Factor in Primitive Christianity (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1967), 74; Maier, "The Episode of the Golden Roman Shields at Jerusalem," 117; E. Mary Smallwood, The Jews under Roman Rule from Pompey to Diocletian: A Study in Political Relations, 2nd ed. (Leiden: Brill, 1981), 166.

<sup>204</sup> Josephus, Ant. 18.250.

<sup>205</sup> Cf. A.D. Doyle, "Pilate's Career and the Date of the Crucifixion," JTS 42 (1941): 190–193; Maier, "The Episode of the Golden Roman Shields at Jerusalem," 111–112.

<sup>206</sup> Doyle, "Pilate's Career and the Date of the Crucifixion," 192; Maier, "The Episode of the Golden Roman Shields at Jerusalem," 114.

<sup>207</sup> Hoehner, Herod Antipas, 180–181.

Sejanus and ingratiate himself with Tiberius by promoting adherence to the imperial cult. But this backfired. In fact, the Jews proclaimed that disrespect for the Jewish law brought no honor to Tiberius.<sup>208</sup> This gave Herod Antipas too an opportunity to dissociate himself from Sejanus and to gain the favor of Tiberius. Earlier, Herod Antipas had been at odds with Pilate when the latter had mingled the blood of the Galileans with their sacrifices (Luke 13:1). The incident of the shields gave Herod Antipas an opportunity to report Pilate's Sejanian anti-Semitic activity to Tiberius. The enmity between the two is mentioned in Luke 23:12.

With the death of Sejanus and the unsuccessful attempt by Pilate to ingratiate himself with Tiberius, Pilate was no longer stubborn or inflexible but had become compliant. This is exactly how the gospels portray him in the trial of Jesus. When the Jewish religious leaders brought Jesus to Pilate and accused him of encouraging the people to be insubordinate to the Roman government, Pilate found him not guilty of anything, and this made the Jewish leaders unhappy. When they responded that Jesus had stirred up people not only in Judea but also in Galilee, Pilate sent him to Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee, who was in Jerusalem for the Passover (Luke 23:1–7). According to Roman law, the accused was to be tried in the province in which the misdeeds were committed, rather than in his domicile, and this prompts the question why Pilate made this move. It appears to have been a diplomatic move to improve his relationship with Herod Antipas, attempting to smooth over the incident of the Galilean massacre (Luke 13:1) as well as the incident at the Feast of Tabernacles in 32 when he had offended both the Jews and Antipas by the setting up of votive shields in Jerusalem (Philo, Legat. 299–304). It was probably only recently that Pilate had received Tiberius' order to remove the shields, reminding him that he dare not make another blunder that would infuriate Tiberius. Having recently displayed misjudgment, he did not want another such incident which would give Antipas cause to make another strike against him. Pilate was anxious to appease, for he had nothing to lose and everything to gain. And this worked! Herod Antipas sent Jesus back to Pilate and they became friends from that day onward (Luke 23:8–12). Some have questioned Luke's portrayal of Antipas' trial of Jesus, because there is no progress in the trial. Naturally enough, there appears to be no progress in the trial because Antipas too was exercising caution, so that Pilate would have no excuse to complain to the Roman authorities of any wrongdoing on his part. Upon Jesus' return, Pilate continues to tell the religious leaders that neither he nor Herod Antipas had found any guilt regarding the charges of incitement to rebellion and thus that Jesus should be released. But pressure from the religious leaders and the threat of a riot finally persuaded Pilate to allow Jesus to be crucified (Luke 23:13–25; Matt 27:15–23; Mark 15:6–14). It is noteworthy, in Pilate's attempt to release Jesus, that the religious leaders cried out that if he released Jesus he was not a friend of Caesar (John 19:12). The reverse implication could easily have been that he was still a friend of Sejanus and/or friendly towards his policies. If, as is likely, Pilate had just received the order from Tiberius to remove the shields, the Jews would have learned only recently of their success and Pilate would have known all too well that he could not afford to quarrel with the emperor.

---

<sup>208</sup> Philo, Legat. 299, 301.

Considering all the data, only 33 makes sense as a date for the crucifixion. It fits well with the evidence from sacred and secular history. Pilate was inflexible and ruthless as long as his mentor Sejanus was in power. But at Jesus' trial in 33, he appears much more compliant. Pilate was a man with a broken backbone.

5. Conclusion

The birth, life, and death of Jesus can be charted as follows:

---

Jesus' birth	spring 5/4 BCE
Death of Herod the Great	March/April BCE
Jesus at the temple aged twelve	Passover, April 29, 8 CE
Commencement of John the Baptist's ministry	29 CE
Commencement of Jesus' ministry	summer/autumn 29 CE
Jesus' first Passover (John 2:13)	April 7, 30
Jesus' second Passover	April 25, 31
Jesus at the Feast of Tabernacles (John 5:1)	October 21–28, 31
Jesus' third Passover (John 6:4)	April 13/14, 32
Jesus at the Feast of Tabernacles (John 7:2, 10)	September 10–17, 32
Jesus at the Feast of Dedication (John 10:22–39)	December 18, 32
Jesus' death	Friday, April 3, 33
Jesus' resurrection	Sunday, April 5, 33
Jesus' ascension (Acts 1)	Thursday, May 14, 33
Day of Pentecost (Acts 2)	Sunday, May 24, 33

---

THE BIRTH OF JESUS

RICHARD T. FRANCE

Any scholarly study of the birth of Jesus these days is written in the shadow of R. E. Brown's magisterial work, The Birth of the Messiah (New York: Doubleday, 1977; reprint with supplement 1993), which will be referred to hereafter as Birth. Brown's meticulous presentation of the evidence and thorough coverage and assessment of the secondary literature up to 1992 still stands as the definitive work on the subject. The reader of the following article is referred for fuller discussion to Brown at all points, even where no explicit footnote reference is given.<sup>1</sup>

1. Sources of Information

All that we know specifically about the birth and childhood of Jesus (as opposed to the rich resources which Jewish and pagan sources offer for reconstructing the world in which it is set) derives from the first two chapters of Luke and the first two chapters of Matthew. We shall consider below the nature and value of these chapters as historical evidence, but the historian has no choice, in that these are the only documents from the first century CE which purport to tell us how Jesus was born, and no later reflections on the event offer any additional material which has been judged to be of historical value.

The only extant second-century document which focuses specifically on Jesus' birth<sup>2</sup> is the Protevangelium of James, which was in wide circulation by the third century and was highly influential in the growth of much later Christian tradition both in the elaboration of the stories of Jesus' birth and in particular in the development of the veneration of Mary (whose own birth and childhood are narrated as fully as the birth of Jesus himself). The Prot. Jas. was the inspiration for some of the nativity imagery which became conventional in Christian art and for some of the motifs found in medieval Christmas carols which are still sung today. Some of this work derives from the canonical gospel accounts,<sup>3</sup> but it covers other ground, in particular the stories of Mary and (to a lesser extent) Joseph prior to the birth of Jesus, as well as adding a great deal of circumstantial detail concerning Jesus' birth in a cave and the experiences of the midwife and of Salome. The sources for this additional material can only be guessed at, though some of it reflects Old Testament motifs relating to the births of special people. The evident interest in promoting the cult of Mary as ever-virgin,<sup>4</sup> and the author's lack of familiarity with Jewish culture, do not suggest a first-century Palestinian source.

---

<sup>1</sup> Apart from commentaries on the relevant chapters of Matthew and Luke, other specific treatments of the infancy narratives are not numerous. A more recent but much briefer and more popularly written study by E. D. Freed, The Stories of Jesus' Birth: A Critical Introduction (London & New York: T&T Clark, 2001) (hereafter Stories), does not interact extensively with recent secondary literature. A stimulating and highly individual study by R. A. Horsley, The Liberation of Christmas: The Infancy Narratives in Social Context (New York: Crossroad, 1989) (hereafter Liberation), provides a great deal of valuable historical information in the service of a determinedly socio-political reading of the stories.

<sup>2</sup> The Infancy Gospel of Thomas deals with the childhood of Jesus from the age of five, not with his birth—unless one counts his teacher's theological comment, "This child is not earth-born" (Inf. Gos. Thom. 7:2).

2. The Historical Value of the Gospel Accounts

Few other parts of the gospel narratives are so widely regarded as legendary.<sup>5</sup> A common basis for this view is the presence of supernatural features: divine revelations in dreams and through angels, a moving, guiding star, and birth without a human father. None of these features is essential to the basic story of the birth itself, but the fact that the evangelists record them as part of their narrative accounts makes many modern readers doubt whether what they are reading is factual history. But to conclude that what is outside normal experience must be

---

<sup>3</sup> Its conflationary method may be illustrated by the fact that Prot. Jas. 22.1–2 interprets the (Lukan) placing of the child in an ox-manger (the birth having taken place previously in a cave) as Mary's precaution when she heard of the (Matthean) slaughter of the children.

<sup>4</sup> This concern is also the most prominent feature of a much briefer account of the birth of Jesus in the Christian part of the Ascension of Isaiah (possibly second century CE), which is otherwise primarily based on Matthew. See Ascen. Isa. 11.1–16.

<sup>5</sup> R. A. Horsley, Liberation, 162–172, analyses and criticizes some attempts to explain the stories of the birth and infancy of Jesus as deriving from a relatively standard pattern of legends concerning the birth and preservation of heroes found in Hellenistic and other cultures. Cf. R. T. France, NovT 21 (1979): 98–99 for other examples and references.

legendary is to take an ideological step which must have significant consequences not only for these chapters but also for much of the rest of the biblical narrative, including in particular the stories of the miracles and the resurrection of Jesus. It is a philosophical rather than a strictly historical judgment (see further comments in section 7 below), and one which belongs peculiarly to Western post-Enlightenment culture. The questions it raises apply to much of the present work, not merely to events surrounding the birth of Jesus; see the discussion in G. Twelftree's article in this volume.

But there are other issues which arise more specifically in relation to the historicity of the birth and infancy narratives of the gospels. We shall consider: 1) the relation to external evidence; 2) the coherence of Matthew with Luke; and 3) the literary character of these chapters with special reference to their use of Old Testament motifs.<sup>6</sup>

2.1. The Relation to External Evidence

With regard to the central events recorded (the conception, birth and childhood of Jesus) there is, as noted above, simply no external historical evidence against which the narratives may be tested. Given both the limited records available for the history of Roman Palestine and the socially insignificant setting of the story of the birth of Jesus, it is hardly surprising that it finds no mention in extant non-Christian sources. But there are events which Matthew and Luke associate with the birth of Jesus which might be expected to find some corroboration elsewhere. In Matthew, these are the visit of the magi and the slaughter of the children in Bethlehem; in Luke, the census which brought Joseph and Mary to Bethlehem from Nazareth.

It is not difficult to show that the Matthean stories fit what is known of the historical setting. The celebrated visit of eastern magi to Rome to pay homage to Nero in 66 CE<sup>7</sup> is sometimes cited as an historical parallel to the story in Matt 2:1–12, though the circumstances are different and the diplomatic motivation of a courtesy visit to the Roman emperor is lacking in the Matthean story. But the astronomical interests and deductions of Mesopotamian magi are well documented, and a special interest in “the Westland” (Palestine) can be discerned in some Mesopotamian astrological texts.<sup>8</sup> However the peculiar behavior of the star may be explained in scientific terms,<sup>9</sup> it is entirely plausible that Mesopotamian magi would travel west in response to their reading of an unusual astronomical event.<sup>10</sup> A similar verdict is appropriate with regard to Herod’s violent response to the news of a rival “king of the Jews”; compared with his elimination of a series of potential rivals from within his own family, and the other atrocities which Josephus records for the last few years of his reign,<sup>11</sup> the elimination of a few babies in a small village<sup>12</sup> reads as a relatively modest expression of his well-documented paranoia.<sup>13</sup> The absence of these incidents from Josephus’ histories of the period, written nearly a century later, may be explained either by the nature of his sources (his consistent failure

---

<sup>6</sup> For a fuller discussion of what follows with specific reference to Matthew see R. T. France, "Scripture, Tradition and History in the Infancy Narratives of Matthew" in Gospel Perspectives 2, ed. R. T. France and D. Wenham (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1981), 239–266.

<sup>7</sup> Dio Cassius 63.1–7; Suetonius, Nero 13. The visitors were king Tiridates of Armenia and three local Parthian princes, and their homage to the emperor was motivated by their reading of the stars; Pliny, Nat. 30.6.16–17 calls them magi. For more detail see R. A. Horsley, Liberation, 56–57.

---

<sup>8</sup> See passages cited by W. C. Allen, The Gospel according to S. Matthew, ICC, 3rd ed. (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1912), 11.

<sup>9</sup> The most favored astronomical explanations are (a) a comet, (b) a nova or supernova, or (c) a planetary conjunction of Saturn and Jupiter in the constellation of Pisces. The various theories are set out by J. Finegan, Handbook of Biblical Chronology (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1964), 238–248; R. E. Brown, Birth, 171–173, 610–613. The required planetary conjunction took place in 7 BCE, and a prominent supernova (or was it a comet?) is reported in Chinese astronomical records for 5/4 BCE. The planetary conjunction theory is developed in great detail, with “photographs” of the night sky at a series of relevant dates, by the astronomer Konradin Ferrari d’Occhieppo, Der Stern der Weisen (Vienna and Munich: Herold, 1977); he concludes that Jupiter and Saturn “stood still” and pointed to Bethlehem on 12 November, 7 BCE. He has published a summary of his views in English in J. Vardaman & E. M. Yamauchi, eds., Chronos, Kairos, Christos: Festschrift J. Finegan (Winona Lake: Eisenbrauns, 1989), 41–53. It may well be that one (or more!) of these phenomena provided the initial spur to the journey of the magi, but none seems to explain fully the movement of the star as Matthew reports it, and it may be questioned how far we should expect to be able to provide a scientific explanation for a phenomenon related from the viewpoint of a pre-scientific story-teller.

<sup>10</sup> A well-documented study of the history of magi and of the influence of astrology in the ancient world by E. M. Yamauchi in Chronos, Kairos, Christos (see last note), 23–39 concludes “that we can best understand the story of the Magi in Matthew not as a literary creation but as based on a historical episode”.

<sup>11</sup> See the paragraph on Herod below in section 6.

<sup>12</sup> While later Christian tradition spoke of a massacre of thousands, estimates of the population of Bethlehem at the time are usually of less than a thousand, giving probably no more than 20 male children under the age of two.

<sup>13</sup> The historical credibility of the Bethlehem incident is explored by R. T. France, NovT 21 (1979): 98–120, especially 114–116.

to reflect the history and concerns of the early Christian movement is notable) or by the relatively trivial nature of the events themselves. The escape of Joseph and his family to Egypt (Matt 2:13–15) is of course a purely family event with no wider political implications, but the choice of Egypt as a refuge by someone in political danger in Palestine fits a recognized historical pattern.<sup>14</sup> Thus, even though no specific external attestation of the events associated with Jesus' birth by Matthew is either available or to be expected, the stories themselves ring true to what we know of the historical setting.

Luke's reference to a census (Luke 2:1–3) is in a rather different category, since it purports to record an empire-wide event which should surely be expected to be noted by Roman historians. There was a census in Judea (not "all the world") in 6 CE, when Quirinius was indeed governor of Syria, but that is too late for a birth "in the days of King Herod" (Luke 1:5), and a Roman census affecting Judea sounds improbable before 6 CE, when direct Roman rule was first imposed there; it was precisely the unprecedented nature of the 6 CE census which caused the revolt led by Judas of Galilee.<sup>15</sup> Various solutions have been proposed, but even when due allowance is made for our lack of information about Roman provincial administration in the area, many scholars conclude that Luke has got his dates (and the extent of the census) wrong.<sup>16</sup> Even if that is so, however, the census is not essential to Luke's story of Jesus' birth: its role is to explain how Joseph, a descendant of David living in Nazareth, came to be back in Bethlehem when Jesus was born, but other explanations for a visit to his family home may be imagined.

---

<sup>14</sup> Josephus, Ant. 12.387–388; 14.21; 15.45–46; War 7.409–410, 416; 2 Macc 5:8, and in Old Testament times 1 Kgs 11:17, 40; 2 Kgs 25:26; Jer 26:21; 42:13–44:30.

<sup>15</sup> Josephus, War 2.118.

<sup>16</sup> The issue is well surveyed by R. E. Brown, Birth, 547–556, 666–668; for a more cautiously conservative study see I. H. Marshall, The Gospel of Luke (Exeter: Paternoster, 1978), 99–104. See also the argument of R. A. Horsley, Liberation, 33–38, that Luke's interest in the census was not in the search for historical explanation but because of its symbolic value in representing the opposition between the new-born "savior" and the oppressive empire of the self-proclaimed "savior" Augustus, whose exploitative taxation policy was the basis of the census. Horsley therefore sees Luke as sitting light to historical accuracy, but using the census idea deliberately for its role in exposing the "political-economic-religious conflict" which Jesus' birth inaugurated.

2.2. The Coherence of Matthew with Luke

The remarkable fact about the nativity stories of Matthew and Luke is that their contents scarcely overlap at all. The traditional explanation for this is that Matthew's information derives ultimately from the reminiscences of Joseph, Luke's from those of Mary, and the remarkably consistent adoption of the viewpoint of the respective "source" in each gospel gives support to this proposal. Be that as it may, Matthew tells us nothing about the annunciation to Mary or indeed about the birth of Jesus itself beyond a passing reference in a subordinate clause of 1:25 and a participial phrase in 2:1, and the stories he tells of the surrounding and subsequent events of Jesus' childhood are all different from those recorded by Luke. Explicit agreement is limited to the following data: the betrothed couple called Mary and Joseph, the latter of Davidic descent, the conception by the Holy Spirit without human intercourse, the angelic revelation of the name Jesus, the birth in Bethlehem in the reign of Herod, and the upbringing in Nazareth. There is thus agreement on many of the basic data, but no mutual corroboration of the associated stories.

This lack of common ground means, of course, that there is little scope for contradiction. But a problem arises over the family home in Nazareth, which in Luke is where Mary and Joseph were already living, going to Bethlehem temporarily only at the time of Jesus' birth, whereas in Matthew Nazareth is first mentioned in 2:23, apparently as a new domicile after the escape from Judea. Matthew does not actually say where Joseph and Mary lived before the birth, but the reader would naturally assume that Bethlehem was their home, and it would fit that view that the family initially returned from Egypt to Judea, moving on to Galilee only as a matter of political necessity (2:21–22). Moreover, Luke 2:39 tells us that the family returned to Nazareth after the visit to Jerusalem in 2:22 which, from the ritual described, must have taken place when Jesus was forty days old; this hardly leaves room for the visit of the magi, the escape to Egypt for an unspecified period and the return after Herod's death, which all precede the arrival in Nazareth in Matthew 2. These discrepancies presumably arise from the dependence of each evangelist on a different source, without access to the data recorded by the other, so that Matthew is unaware of the Nazareth background and Luke of the threat from Herod and the refugee visit to Egypt. But to make this discrepancy the basis for doubting the historical value of the accounts as a whole is to require a degree of precision and completeness which is alien to much of biblical historiography; selectivity in the details mentioned, and a consequent compression in the chronology of what is recorded, are typical of the literature of the period. Neither evangelist purports to tell us all there is to tell, and their failure to explain their omissions in a pedantic footnote is hardly an adequate reason to reject the historical value of what they do record.

2.3. The Literary Character of the Infancy Chapters

It is not only the supernatural features of the stories (see above) which cause readers to suspect that these chapters are something other than simply factual reporting. Both Matthew 1–2 and Luke 1–2 stand apart from the gospels which they introduce as having a distinctive literary character. A striking feature in Luke 1–2 is the series of poetical utterances (Luke 1:46–55, 67–79; 2:14, 28–32) which strongly reflect the diction and motifs of Old Testament psalms and oracles,<sup>17</sup> and the whole of the narrative in which they are set is strongly colored by Old Testament motifs.<sup>18</sup> Equally prominent in Matthew is the presence in these two chapters of no less than five of the eleven generally-recognized “formula-quotations” of the gospel (1:22–23; 2:5–6, 15, 17–18, 23) so that the whole of the first two chapters with the exception of the opening genealogy appears to be narrated in order to display the fulfillment of Old Testament prophecy, while the genealogy itself is an extended demonstration of continuity with the history of God’s people in the Old Testament. Even where Matthew tells a story apparently for its own sake in the account of the magi in 2:1–12, the scripturally-

---

<sup>17</sup> The Semitic character of the Greek of Luke 1–2 as compared with the rest of the gospel has long been remarked on. An interesting study by S. C. Farris in Gospel Perspectives 2, ed. R. T. France and D. Wenham (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1981), 201–237 argues statistically that these chapters (as a whole, not just the hymns within them) are translated from a Semitic source rather than simply using a deliberately “biblical Greek” (see also the fuller study by Farris, The Hymns of Luke’s Infancy Narrative [Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1985]). For the character of the Lukan hymns as “songs of liberation” reflecting the socio-political aspirations of Israel under Roman rule see R. A. Horsley, Liberation, 107–123.

<sup>18</sup> Some of the possible Old Testament elements involved in these chapters of Luke are discussed by E. D. Freed, Stories, 83–90, 109–111.

informed reader will be aware that typological themes from the Old Testament underlie its narration.<sup>19</sup>

It is no problem historically that these chapters reflect the Jewish culture in which they are set, but the obvious desire to present the events surrounding Jesus' birth as foreshadowed in the Old Testament prompts the suspicion that the wish has been father to the thought. Surely an historical record of how Jesus was born does not need all this scriptural undergirding? But that is to prejudge the nature of the evangelists' enterprise. In the case of Matthew in particular, it is quite misleading to describe his first two chapters simply as a birth or infancy narrative, as if their sole purpose was to give us a newspaper-type report of how it happened. Rather, they present a theological introduction to the Messiah who will be the subject of the following narrative, in the form of a richly-textured meditation on the fulfillment of scripture. The question the historian needs to ask is whether such a genre of literature is a suitable place to look for historical data, whether the fulfillment claimed is based on real events or whether the "events" have been spun out of the Old Testament texts.

Discussion of this issue has sometimes been obscured by the use of the Jewish term "midrash", which has been popularly understood to denote an imaginative development from Old Testament texts resulting in the creation of new stories. This was always a misleading use of the rabbinic term "midrash", which means simply "interpretation" and may take many forms.<sup>20</sup> Evidence for the inventive creation of "history" from scriptural material by Jewish writers of the period, whether described as "midrash" or not, is in fact extremely scarce, particularly when the events purportedly recorded are as recent as those narrated by the evangelists.<sup>21</sup> Convincing Jewish parallels to the supposed creation of nativity stories out of Old Testament texts by Matthew and Luke are therefore lacking. But in any case the gospel writers must be judged by what they have in fact produced, not by imposing on them a supposed model (itself largely fallacious) from rabbinic literature. The issue has been raised especially with reference to Matthew's formula-quotations, and our discussion will be focused there.<sup>22</sup>

---

<sup>19</sup> Herod's attempt to destroy his rival recreates the attempt by Pharaoh to destroy the future deliverer of Israel (R. T. France, NovT 21 [1979]: 105–108). The star is often seen as an allusion to Num 24:17, and other allusions to the Balaam story are traced by R. E. Brown, Birth, 117, 190–196. The homage and gifts of the magi reflect Ps 72:10–11, 15 and Isa 60:5–6, and those passages in turn are based on the visit of the Queen of Sheba in 1 Kgs 10:1–13. See further M. Hengel and H. Merkel in Orientierung an Jesus: Festschrift J. Schmid, ed. P. Hoffman (Freiburg: Herder, 1973), 139–169.

<sup>20</sup> For the debate on the meaning of "midrash" see A. G. Wright, CBQ 28 (1966): 105–138, 417–457; R. Le Déaut, Int 25 (1971): 259–282; and (with special reference to Matthew 1–2) G. M. Soares Prabhu, The Formula-Quotations in the Infancy Narratives of Matthew, AnBib 63 (Rome: Biblical Institute Press, 1976), 12–16; R. E. Brown, Birth, 557–563 (supplemented by 577–579, 598–600).

Jewish midrash typically took as its starting point a passage or collection of passages from the Old Testament. The biblical text thus formed the organizing principle of the midrash. Matthew 1–2 (after the genealogy), on the other hand, is structured around a series of traditions concerning the origins and childhood travels of Jesus, to which a variety of scriptural material is added either by way of explicit citation (the “formula-quotations”) or by allusive wording in the way the stories are told. The specific texts cited in the formula-quotations have no apparent previous connection with each other. Most of them are not texts which would naturally suggest themselves to someone looking for messianic proof texts. The only one which has clear messianic relevance is Micah 5:2, cited in response to the question where the Messiah was to be born (2:5–6). But there is nothing inherently messianic about a young woman conceiving a child in the eighth century BCE (Isa 7:14; Matt 1:23), about Israel's exodus from Egypt (Hos 11:1; Matt 2:15), or about the exile of Rachel's children to Babylon (Jer 31:15; Matt 2:18), while the claimed “fulfillment” in 2:23 is so obscure that scholars are unable to agree what scriptural text or motif Matthew had in mind there.<sup>23</sup> The only plausible reason for Matthew's choosing such an improbable set of texts is that the traditions he was relating already contained specific features which called them to mind, viz. a

---

<sup>21</sup> This is the conclusion of a wide-ranging survey by R. T. France, “Jewish Historiography, Midrash and the Gospels”, in Gospel Perspectives 3, ed. R. T. France and D. Wenham (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1983), 99–127.

<sup>22</sup> The literary character of Matthew 1–2 in relation to the category of “midrash” is discussed by R. T. France in Gospel Perspectives 2 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1981), 243–255.

<sup>23</sup> There is no Old Testament text which says “He shall be called a Nazoraios”, and Nazareth is not mentioned in the Old Testament. Suggestions include a word-play on the Hebrew נֶצֶר, “branch”, in Isa 11:1; an allusion to Samson the Nazirite (Judg 13:7), or, in view of Nazareth's obscurity (cf. John 1:46), the prophetic theme (the introductory formula in this case refers unusually to “the prophets”, not to a specific prophet) of the unrecognized and despised Messiah (Isa 53:1–3 etc.); see R. T. France, NTS 27 (1980/81): 246–249.

“virgin” conception, a return from Egypt, the loss of children in Bethlehem, and Jesus’ home in the obscure village of Nazareth, for each of which Matthew then seeks a scriptural precedent. In order to make the chosen texts fit his stories he has had to indulge in some quite imaginative “exegesis”, involving some manipulation of the actual wording of the texts to fit their “fulfillment”, but the whole exercise would have been pointless unless the details of the stories were already there. What would have been the point of choosing such an obscure set of Old Testament texts and then using them as the basis for inventing stories which can be made to fit them only with the greatest ingenuity? And what would be the meaning of claiming that the texts were “fulfilled” in fictional events spun out of the texts themselves? The whole procedure makes sense only if the traditions were there first, and Matthew employed all his creative hermeneutical skill in finding texts to fit them.<sup>24</sup>

Once the texts have been chosen to fit the stories, it is natural that the stories are told in such a way as to highlight the relevance of the text, so that there is a mutual interaction: “the narrative tradition is the motive for the selection and shaping of the texts, but the texts have become the organizing principle for the narrative.”<sup>25</sup>

Another indication of the factual basis of the stories in Matthew 2 is their apologetic focus: they are designed, according to one widely accepted exegesis, to explain the inconvenient geographical origin of Jesus.<sup>26</sup> How was it possible for Jesus of Nazareth to be the Messiah who, as everyone knew, must come from Bethlehem (John 7:41–42)? Chapter 2 therefore traces the geographical movements which took him from his correctly messianic birthplace in Bethlehem to his subsequent domicile in Nazareth, with each stage prompted by divine communications by angels and dreams, and each successive geographical move backed up by a formula-quotation mentioning a geographical location (Bethlehem, Egypt, Rama, Nazareth). This elaborate geographical

---

<sup>24</sup> For the nuances Matthew may have intended his quotations to convey, and the means by which he has drawn them out, see R. T. France, “The Formula-Quotations of Matthew 2 and the Problem of Communication”, NTS 27 (1980/81): 233–251.

<sup>25</sup> Ibid., 237, summarizing the discussion on 234–237.

<sup>26</sup> This paragraph follows the argument of K. Stendahl in Judentum, Urchristentum, Kirche: Festschrift J. Jeremias, ed. W. Eltester (Berlin: Töpelmann, 1960), 94–105, reprinted in The Interpretation of Matthew, ed. G. N. Stanton, 2nd ed., (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1995), 69–80. Stendahl’s argument is further developed by R. T. France, NTS 27 (1980/81): 237–240.

apologetic presupposes an awkward fact to be explained: Jesus came from the wrong place. One does not invent inconvenient facts in order to defend them.<sup>27</sup>

These considerations suggest that the historian, while fully recognizing the theological creativity and the rich scriptural background which has shaped the telling of these stories by Matthew and Luke, has good grounds for assuming that the incidents recorded derive from the traditions of the events themselves as experienced respectively by Joseph and Mary, rather than simply from the imagination of the evangelists or of those from whom they received the stories.

3. The Date

The rough period of Jesus' birth may be deduced by working back from the period of Pilate's prefecture (26–36 CE) and Caiaphas' high-priesthood (18–36 CE) on the basis of Luke's statement that Jesus was "about thirty years old" when he began his public ministry (Luke 3:23), but Luke's wording is deliberately imprecise and there is no firm indication of either the length of Jesus' ministry or the year of his death (30 and 33 CE are most commonly suggested for the latter).<sup>28</sup> A more promising pointer is Matthew's statement that Jesus was born while Herod the Great was king (Matt 2:1 etc.), together with Luke's dating of the conception of John the Baptist (which preceded that of Jesus by six months, Luke 1:36) also during Herod's reign (Luke 1:5). Since it is generally agreed on the basis of Josephus' evidence that Herod died in 4 BCE,<sup>29</sup> Jesus' birth must precede that date. A date shortly before

---

<sup>27</sup> A similar consideration applies to Matthew's first chapter. A genealogy which leads down to Joseph fits oddly with a narrative which says that Jesus was not Joseph's biological son (as Matt 1:16 is at pains to point out; see below n. 50). Matthew therefore has to explain in 1:18–25 how Joseph "son of David" was persuaded to accept and name (i.e., formally adopt) Jesus as his son. There would be no need for such an apologetic if it was believed that Joseph really was Jesus' father.

<sup>28</sup> It is probable that Nisan 14 fell on a Friday in these years, as the "Johannine" dating of the Last Supper requires; see J. Finegan, Handbook of Biblical Chronology (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1964), 292–296; G. Ogg, in Historicity and Chronology in the NT, ed. D. E. Nineham et al. (London: SPCK, 1965), 92–96; contra J. Jeremias, The Eucharistic Words of Jesus (ET) (London: SCM, 1966), 36–41. On the reasons for preferring the "Johannine" chronology see R. T. France, Vox Evangelica 16 (1986): 47–54.

<sup>29</sup> Schürer 1.326–328 (n. 165); T. D. Barnes, JTS 19 (1968): 204–209; J. van Bruggen in Miscellanea Neotestamentica, ed. T. Baarda et al., vol. 2, SNT 48 (Leiden: Brill,

4 BCE is supported also by the fact that the paranoia of Herod as described in Matthew 2:1–18 fits what is known of his uneasy and violent final years (see section 6 below). Matthew links the return from Egypt with Herod's death (Matt 2:19–21), and while he gives no specific time-scale for the visit of the magi and the escape to Egypt or the length of the stay there, it seems likely that he envisages this as all occurring during Jesus' infancy (see above, section 2.2, for how these data relate to Luke's account).

There is no agreement about what specific astronomical phenomenon is described in Matt 2:2, 9 (see n. 9 above), and in any case we do not know how long the magi spent on their journey, nor how soon after the birth they arrived.<sup>30</sup> The supernova (or comet?) of 5/4 BCE or the planetary conjunction of 7 BCE would fit roughly with the general period indicated by the link with Herod's death, but we cannot define the date more closely. We can be no more definite than to say that Jesus was born some time between about 7 and 4 BCE, and probably toward the end of that period.

The traditional date of 25 December in the Western church is first attested in the fourth century, and was probably chosen for ideological reasons (in opposition to the "birth date" of the Sun in Roman religion). The only feature of the Lucan account which might give any clue to the time of year is that shepherds were spending the night out in the fields with their flocks, which is sometimes asserted to have been the case normally from about March to November, making the traditional date of Christmas perhaps the least likely from an historical point of view; but there is little clear evidence or agreement on this point.

---

1978), 1–15. E. L. Martin, The Birth of Christ Recalculated! (Pasadena: Foundation for Biblical Research, 1978), has suggested a revised date of 1 BCE for Herod's death, and so dates Jesus' birth late in 2 BCE. Martin's proposals have not been widely supported. A more recent volume, J. Vardaman & E. M. Yamauchi, eds., Chronos, Kairos, Christos (see n. 9), contains articles which present the arguments for, respectively, 1 BCE (E. L. Martin, 85–92) and 4 BCE (H. W. Hoehner, 101–111) for Herod's death.

<sup>30</sup> Herod's targeting of children "two years old or under" does not mean that Jesus was supposed to be two years old at the time; it is a rough-and-ready guide for soldiers to ensure that no young infant was missed.

4. The Place

Matthew and Luke agree that Jesus was born in Bethlehem, the traditional home of David; it was a small village in Judea a few miles south of Jerusalem. The tradition of a birth in Bethlehem has been doubted on the basis that Jesus as an adult was always known as Jesus of Nazareth, and that Luke clearly understands that the family home was in Nazareth before as well as after Jesus' birth. Since there are historical problems surrounding the Roman census which Luke uses to explain how the family came to be temporarily in Bethlehem at the time of the birth (see above section 2.1), it is suggested that the whole Bethlehem tradition is a later apologetic invention to overcome the problem that the Messiah was expected to come from Bethlehem, not from an obscure Galilean village. We have noted this issue in section 2.3 above in relation to the apologetic function of Matthew 2. Matthew's apologetic presupposes that both the birth in Bethlehem and the residence in Nazareth were accepted data at the time he wrote, and his apparent unawareness of the family's earlier connection with Nazareth (see above section 2.2) would be hard to explain if it was remembered that Jesus was in fact born there. Given Joseph's Davidic lineage (on which both evangelists agree, Matt 1:1–16,20; Luke 1:27; 2:4; 3:23–31), it is hardly a matter for surprise that this expatriate descendant of David should return to his family home for a period. There thus seems to be inadequate reason to question the tradition of birth in Bethlehem which was established early enough to find its way into the independent sources used by Matthew and Luke, while a Judean location is presupposed also in the associated stories in both Matthew 2:1–18 and Luke 2:22–38.

5. The Social Setting

Christian tradition depicts the birth of Jesus as taking place in a context of social exclusion and squalor. This tradition is based on two statements in Luke 2:7, that the baby was placed in a manger, and that "there was no room for them in the inn". As early as the second century we find a tradition of birth in a "cave" (Prot. Jac. 18.1; Justin, Dial. 79), a tradition which persisted in the East, whereas in the West the location is more commonly assumed to be a stable. Thus Jesus is born not like most babies in a normal home, but excluded from human society. This traditional image is so firmly entrenched that it may seem foolhardy and even impious to question it, but in fact its basis in the wording of Luke 2:7 is very shaky. Luke mentions no cave or stable, but only a manger; and the unwelcoming “inn” results from a mis-translation.<sup>31</sup>

To take the “inn” first: when Luke wants to refer to a commercial lodging place he uses the appropriate Greek term πανδοχείον (Luke 10:34). But in Luke 2:7 he uses καταλύμα, which he will use again in 22:11 for the “upper room” of a private house where the Last Supper took place. It normally means a “lodging-place” or “guest-room”. It is unlikely that so small a village as Bethlehem would have had a commercial inn (let alone the sequence of unwelcoming hostelries depicted in some nativity plays!). The καταλύμα is therefore probably the guest-room of a private house. It is in any case culturally unthinkable that a visiting member of the family would be allowed, let alone required, to look for commercial accommodation if there were relatives still in the village. The problem was that in the home to which they were naturally invited either the guest-room (probably an upstairs room built onto the roof of a normal one-storey home, as in 2 Kgs 4:10) was too small to accommodate a childbirth, or there was someone else already occupying it.

An alternative place for the new-born baby was found in a “manger”. The modern Western reader assumes that since a manger implies livestock<sup>32</sup> it must be either in the open air or in a building separate from the human living quarters; hence the tradition of a “stable”. But a normal peasant home in ancient Palestine was a single large room, divided into two levels, with the family living on the upper level and the animals brought in at night into the lower part of the room. The mangers would probably be set along the edge of the living area where the animals could conveniently reach them from their lower floor.<sup>33</sup>

---

<sup>31</sup> The following argument derives from a detailed and culturally informed study by K. E. Bailey, “The Manger and the Inn: The Cultural Background of Luke 2:7”, Near East School of Theology Review 2 (1979): 33–44, reprinted in Evangelical Review of Theology 4 (1980): 201–217. Cf. also H. Must, NTS 32 (1986): 136–143; and brief comments by J. Nolland, Luke 1–9:20 (Dallas: Word, 1989), 105–106.

<sup>32</sup> Luke mentions no animals; the ox and ass which have become a fixed element in Christmas imagery derive from Isa 1:3.

<sup>33</sup> M. Hengel, TDNT 9:51–52, correctly describes the normal location of mangers as known from Palestinian sources and archaeology, but then on p. 54 inexplicably says that “According to Lk. the child lies outside the human dwelling in an unusual place where there are only animals”!

The scene is thus as follows: Joseph's relatives were slightly more affluent than many of their neighbors in that they had been able to add a καταλύμα to their one-room house, but there were already other guests in the upstairs room, so Joseph and Mary stayed, and the baby was born, in the main living area of the house, where a manger provided a convenient and comfortable improvised cradle. It is consonant with this reading that Matthew mentions that the magi found the child in a "house" in Bethlehem (Matt 2:11), though of course their visit need not have been immediately after the birth.

On this reading, Jesus was not born in social exclusion, nor in any more squalid a setting than most people regarded as normal living conditions. Not in a cold, draughty, unwelcoming "stable" but in a warm if rather crowded family home. His cradle was unconventional, but not uncomfortable. The details of Bailey's reconstruction are of course debatable,<sup>34</sup> but it is based firmly on what Luke actually says, interpreted in relation not to a modern Western social environment but to what we know of normal life in the ancient Middle East, where privacy is not so much prized as in our Western culture, and a birth in such a bustling family setting, with the noise and the smells of family and animals, would be far preferable to our maternity hospitals. The setting of Jesus' birth, while it took place away from his parents' home, and in circumstances very far removed from a royal palace, was not unlike that of most other village children at the time.

The mention of a καταλύμα raises the possibility that Joseph's Bethlehem relatives may have been a little more affluent than most. Joseph himself was a "carpenter" (Matt 13:55): τέκτων is used for a "craftsman" in various materials, not merely a wood-worker, and probably denotes a more general building contractor,<sup>35</sup> which suggests that within the small village economy of Nazareth Joseph would have played an important role. The family setting into which Jesus was born seems therefore to belong to what we might call the “(lower?) middle-class”, neither among the rich and powerful nor at the bottom of the social scale. His birth in a normal family home suitably fits this social background.

---

<sup>34</sup> In particular, it may be questioned whether καταλύμα need mean a private guest-room rather than the communal "lodging-place" or khan (a shelter for travelers and their animals, sometimes referred to as a caravanserai, not an "inn" as we would understand it) which might be found in most villages (so J. L. Ottey, ExpTim 98 [1986/87] 71–73), though it is not clear how this would differ from what Luke describes as a πανδοχείον in 10:34. This would not, however, affect Bailey's argument about the normal location of a manger. And the cultural point that a visiting relative would never be allowed to seek shelter in a public khan remains a strong one. A private home would in any case provide a much more acceptable setting for childbirth; a khan would be very much a last resort in such circumstances.

<sup>35</sup> C. C. McCown, in Studies in Early Christianity, ed. S. J. Case (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1928), 173–189; P. H. Furfey, CBQ 17 (1955): 204–215.

6. Characters in the Story

6.1. Mary

It is generally agreed that the details of Mary’s parents (Joachim and Anna), birth and upbringing as described in Prot. Jas. 1–8 are unlikely to be based on any historical information; the influence of Old Testament stories of the birth and childhood of famous people is evident. Luke’s statement that Mary’s “relative” (Luke 1:36) Elizabeth was “of the daughters of Aaron” (Luke 1:5) suggests that Mary came from the tribe of Levi. The gospel accounts agree that at the time of Jesus’ birth Mary was betrothed, and that Jesus was her first child. Betrothal usually took place when the girl was aged about twelve or thirteen, followed by marriage about a year later,<sup>36</sup> so that the Mary of the birth narratives would probably be a young teenager.

6.2. Joseph

Outside the infancy narratives (and the Lukan genealogy, Luke 3:23) we find no mention of Joseph other than the conventional identification of Jesus as “son of Joseph” in Luke 4:22; John 1:45; 6:42. His failure to appear in the later stories (and the unexpected reference to Jesus as “son of Mary” in Mark 6:3) has been taken to indicate that he died before Jesus’ public ministry began (some time after the incident recorded in Luke 2:42–51, when Jesus was twelve). Later Christian tradition therefore depicts him as an old man already at the time of Jesus’ birth; as early as Prot. Jas. 8–9 he is also a widower with older sons, a significant move in the attempt to solve the problem of Jesus’ “brothers” in the light of a developing belief in Mary’s perpetual virginity.<sup>37</sup>

<sup>36</sup> J. Jeremias, Jerusalem in the Time of Jesus, ET (London: SCM, 1969), 364–368, describes the pattern of betrothal and marriage in first-century Judaism.

<sup>37</sup> The other second-century infancy gospel presupposes a similar scenario, since it presents Joseph’s son James as older than Jesus (Inf. Gos. Thom. 16).

The gospel narratives, however, give no hint of Joseph's age or of any previous family. If the four named brothers and indefinite number of sisters of Jesus mentioned in Mark 6:3 are taken in the natural sense, Joseph must have lived and produced children<sup>38</sup> for several years after Jesus was born. Joseph's importance for Matthew lies in his status as "son of David" (Matt 1:20; see above n. 27), which means that once he has been persuaded to accept Jesus formally as his son (Matt 1:19–25) Jesus is qualified to be the Messiah, "son of David", even though his mother was probably of a different tribe (see above). The genealogies of Joseph in Matt 1:2–16 and Luke 3:23–38, while differing substantially at other points,<sup>39</sup> agree on his Davidic lineage.

6.3. The Shepherds

It is in keeping with the song which Luke attributes to Mary in Luke 1:46–55 that the first witnesses of the birth are neither those in positions of religious leadership nor the rich and powerful, but local shepherds, ordinary poor peasants. Shepherding was not for the Jews, as it was for the Egyptians (Gen 46:34), a despised occupation.<sup>40</sup> Shepherds in the area around Bethlehem were likely to be raising the sheep needed for the temple sacrifices. The great king David had formerly been a shepherd outside Bethlehem, and shepherding features metaphorically in many Old Testament descriptions of the role of God in relation to his people and derivatively of the coming Messiah (notably in Micah 5:2, based on 2 Sam 5:2, the two texts combined in the “quotation” in Matt 2:6). Luke’s introduction of the shepherds thus combines an indication of the relatively lowly social setting of Jesus’ birth with a reminder of its theological significance.

<sup>38</sup> Matt 1:25 should probably be taken to mean that after Jesus' birth Joseph began normal sexual relations with Mary. Cf. also Luke 2:7, "her first-born son", which would normally imply that others were born later.

<sup>39</sup> See R. E. Brown, Birth, 84–94 (and 587–589), for the relationship between the two genealogies. Brown's conclusion that they are theological rather than simply factual documents needs to be balanced against the evidence, which he discusses on pp. 87–88, for ancient Jewish concern for genealogical records and the claims of Josephus that these could be traced back for many generations in the public registers (Josephus, Life 6; cf. Apion 1.28–36). A possible clue to the reason why Matthew and Luke produce a different set of names is the fact that Matthew's genealogy includes the actual kings of Judah from David to the exile and arranges its "generations" around the turning-points of the monarchy (1:17), suggesting that he is less concerned with biological parentage than with a putative throne-succession. See further Jeremias, Jerusalem, 275–297; M. D. Johnson, The Purpose of the Biblical Genealogies (Cambridge: CUP, 1969), 99–108.

<sup>40</sup> See, however, E. D. Freed, Stories, 137–139, for the observation that there were bad as well as good shepherds, and for some evidence for distrust of shepherds in Jewish and Greek society. R. A. Horsley, Liberation, 102–103, rightly points out however that derogatory references to shepherds in Jewish literature belong to a later period and do not represent general first-century opinion. Shepherds represent rather "the ordinary people", "simply part of the peasantry in ancient Palestinian society".

6.4. Simeon and Anna

Jesus’ presentation in the temple at the age of forty days (Luke 2:22–24) accords with standard ritual practice, but the two people whom Luke records as meeting him there are otherwise unknown. Luke’s surprisingly detailed description of Anna (2:36–37) suggests however that he had some source other than simply his own imagination. Both are old (probably: Luke does not say this of Simeon, but his readiness for death suggests it) and devout. Anna is recognized as a prophet; no formal office is attributed to Simeon (he is not said to be a priest, though later tradition has often assumed this). They represent the pious people of God, eagerly waiting for the fulfillment of his promises (2:25, 38).<sup>41</sup> Their recognition of the new-born Messiah is attributed to divine inspiration (“the Holy Spirit”, vv. 25–27; “a prophet”, v. 36).

6.5. The Magi

The first witnesses of the birth in Matthew’s account are very different from those recorded by Luke. While it is later tradition (based on Ps 72:10–11; Isa 60:3) that has made them “kings”, in Matthew’s narrative they are of sufficient status to be able to make a long journey, to have access to the Jewish king, and to bring expensive gifts. But they are also foreigners (from “the East”, probably Mesopotamia), and they follow a profession, astrology,<sup>42</sup> which was frowned on in orthodox <sup>42</sup> Accounts of magi indicate that their interests were wider than simply astronomy/astrology, including the interpretation of dreams and in some cases magic. See the article by E. M. Yamauchi cited at n. 9 above; more briefly G. Delling, TDNT 4:356–359. See also H. C. Kee, Medicine, Miracle and Magic in New Testament Times (Cambridge: CUP, 1986), 99–101, for the place of magic in the role of magi. E. D. Freed, Stories, 96–100, gives an account of magi which focuses on magic with surprisingly little reference to astrology.

<sup>41</sup> R. A. Horsley, Liberation, 63–68, discusses R. E. Brown’s presentation of Simeon and Anna as representatives of a special type of piety characteristic of “the Jewish Christian Anawim” and associated particularly with the temple (Birth, 452–453, 466–468; cf. 350–355, 361–365), but concludes that they represent not a sub-group within Israel but the oppressed people of Israel in general.

Judaism.<sup>43</sup> See above section 2.1 for the plausibility of such a visit, to which it might be added that a Jew inventing such a story would be unlikely to attribute such a dubious profession to his characters. The story of the magi is rich in typological motifs (see above n. 19), prominent among which is the theme of the homage of non-Israelites toward Israel and its king. The pericope thus adds a further dimension to the geographical interest of Matthew 2, as visitors from Mesopotamia come bearing gifts from Arabia.<sup>44</sup> The magi serve, then, in Matthew's narrative, as an early indication of the world-wide impact of the coming of the Messiah, who will bring salvation to Gentiles as well as to Jews.

6.6. Herod

King Herod, client king of Jewish Palestine under the Roman imperial authority 37–4 BCE, plays in Matthew's narrative a role comparable to that of Pharaoh in the story of Moses.<sup>45</sup> It is a role for which the historical Herod was well fitted.<sup>46</sup> According to Josephus, his defense of his throne against real or imagined rivals involved the execution of his predecessors Antigonus and Hyrcanus and large numbers of their supporters and relatives, as well as other members of the Hasmonean family who were directly related to him by marriage, his brother-in-law, his mother-in-law, and even his favorite wife, Mariamme. Other political opponents, and even their families with them, were also tortured and killed. Towards the end of his reign his paranoia increased, and we hear of three large groups of real or suspected conspirators who were killed during the years 7–4 BCE, in one case in specific response to a prediction that his dynasty was to lose the throne. Within the same years he even executed his three eldest sons, Alexander, Aristobulus and Antipater, as suspected conspirators.<sup>47</sup> So, if

---

<sup>43</sup> Popular Judaism, however, continued to be fascinated by magic and astrology; see P. S. Alexander in Schürer 3.342–379.

<sup>44</sup> See R. T. France, NTS 27 (1980/81): 238–240.

<sup>45</sup> The parallels (including those in post-biblical Jewish traditions about Moses, which significantly enhance the correspondence) are set out in R. T. France, NovT 21 (1979): 105–106.

<sup>46</sup> For a detailed account of the nature of Herod's reign showing how "the story in Matthew 2 comes to life vividly against the background of Herodian exploitation and tyranny" see R. A. Horsley, Liberation, 39–49.

<sup>47</sup> The incidents listed are narrated respectively (for the earlier period) in Josephus, Ant. 15.8–10; 15.172–178; 15.6, 260–266; 15.53–55; 15.247–251; 15.222–236; 15.284–290; and (for the years 7–4 BCE) in Josephus, Ant. 16.393–394; 17.42–44; 17.167 (with War 1.655; 16.392–394; 17.182–187.

Josephus is to be believed, at the likely time of Jesus' birth Herod was not one to hold back from eliminating those he regarded as a threat to his throne, and the enquiry of the magi as to the birth of a new "king of the Jews" was well calculated to provoke the violent and indiscriminate response we read of in Matt 2:16.<sup>48</sup>

7. Born of a Virgin

Some of the supernatural elements in the gospel birth narratives seem less central to the historical core of what happened: without the angels who announce, instruct and sing, and the star which moves and guides, the stories of what actually happened would still make sense, even if the motivation and decisions of some of the characters would need to be explained in other ways. But the central miracle of the story lies at the heart of what both Matthew and Luke have to tell, the conception of Jesus without a human father.<sup>49</sup> Luke spells this out in the dialogue between Mary and the angel in 1:31–38, which includes the repeated inference that the child so born will be the "Son of God" (1:32, 35). The way Matthew concludes his genealogy (1:16)<sup>50</sup> presupposes that Joseph was not Jesus' biological father, and Matt 1:18–25 is devoted to explaining Joseph's response to a pregnancy for which he knows he was not responsible. The point is sufficiently important to Matthew to be made the subject of the first of his formula-quotations in 1:22–23.

<sup>48</sup> See the assessment of Herod's mental state at the time by A. Schalit, König Herodes (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1969), 648–649, n. 11. Also S. Perowne, The Life and Times of Herod the Great (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1956), 172.

<sup>49</sup> Modern debates about the physical possibility and genetic implications of parthenogenesis are of course outside the perspective of the biblical writers, for whom miracle was a category sufficiently comprehensive to be accepted irrespective of physical normality.

<sup>50</sup> All MSS and versions of this verse agree in making it explicit that Joseph was not Jesus' father ("of whom" is unambiguously feminine), with the one exception of the Sinaitic Syriac which famously reads "Joseph, to whom was betrothed Mary the virgin, begot Jesus". The fact that this version mentions Mary as "betrothed" to Joseph and as "virgin" shows that the translator/scribe was aware of the story that follows, and his use of the verb "beget" for Joseph is therefore more likely due to unthinking repetition of the set formula of the rest of the genealogy than to a deliberate desire to assert Joseph's physical fatherhood; see B. M. Metzger, A Textual Commentary on the Greek New Testament (London/New York: United Bible Societies, 1971), 2–7. The other Syriac texts do not follow the Sinaitic reading, and the Greek text is not in doubt; the most significant variation is the reading of some Old Latin and a few Greek MSS, "to whom being betrothed the virgin Mary gave birth to [using the verb γεννώω which normally, and throughout vv. 2–16, applies to the father's act of "begetting"] Jesus...", a patent attempt to underline further the supernatural conception of Jesus. This variant is close to the wording of the Sinaitic Syriac, and may have been its source.

It is sometimes suggested that it was the text of Isa 7:14 which gave rise to the idea of a virgin conception. In section 2.3 above we saw reason to question the view that Matthew's nativity stories might have been spun out of the texts which are then quoted as "fulfilled" in the events. In Matthew 1:22–23, with its use of the LXX term παρθένος, "virgin",<sup>51</sup> this might seem more plausible, but two factors urge caution. The first is the fact that Isa 7:14 is set in a passage which speaks of events in the immediate future of the prophet's own time, so that this text does not immediately suggest itself as a basis for interpreting the birth of a Messiah more than seven centuries later. The second is that Matthew is not slavishly tied to the Greek text of the LXX, especially in his formula-quotations, and is clearly aware of other textual traditions, so that it is unlikely that he would be unaware that while the LXX term means "virgin," Isaiah's Hebrew word עַלְמָה, even though not the usual term for a child-bearing woman, does not in itself demand the sense "virgin" (for which the normal Hebrew term would be בְּתוּלָה).<sup>52</sup> Isa 7:14 was not therefore in itself an obvious text to bring into an account of the origin of the Messiah. It was only when a tradition of a virgin conception was already established that its relevance, especially in its LXX form, would be readily perceived.<sup>53</sup>

It is well known that outside the birth narratives of Luke and Matthew there is no clear indication of this tradition in the rest of the New Testament, though hints have been found in the title "son of Mary"

<sup>51</sup> Like the English "maiden", παρθένος is sometimes found (especially in earlier Greek) with the meaning simply "girl", without reference to her sexual condition, but by the Hellenistic period this usage is rarely attested; see R. G. Bratcher, BT 9 (1958): 112–116. The later Greek versions of the Old Testament (Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion), produced after the Christian use of this text had become known, use νεᾶνις ("young woman") in place of παρθένος here, probably because the more specific meaning of παρθένος had become an apologetic embarrassment in Jewish-Christian polemics.

<sup>52</sup> A detailed study by R. G. Bratcher, BT 9 (1958): 98–105, concludes that עַלְמָה (which occurs only seven times in the Hebrew Old Testament) "refers to a sexually mature young woman, capable of having sexual intercourse, without specifying whether or not she has had it."

<sup>53</sup> Note that Luke 1:31 also probably alludes to Isa 7:14 in speaking of Mary's supernatural conception. On the reasons for Matthew's choice of this text, and the hermeneutical basis for his treating it as a messianic prophecy, see comments on Matt 1:23 in R. T. France, The Gospel of Matthew, New International Commentary on the New Testament (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2007), 55–58.

in Mark 6:3 and in Paul's phrase "his [God's] son, born of a woman" in Gal 4:4. The ubiquitous title "Son of God" used for Jesus does not in itself demand such a biological explanation, though it is of course consonant with it. Perhaps more significant is the well-attested Jewish polemic, going back at least to the second century,<sup>54</sup> which alleged that Jesus was born outside wedlock, and even named his father as a Roman soldier called Pantera; an indication of a similar polemic in the first century has been found in the jibe "We are not illegitimate children" (John 8:41).

The lack of direct attestation of the tradition outside the birth narratives can be taken in two ways. It may be taken as evidence that Matthew and Luke simply made it up; in that case they would appear to have done so independently, in itself quite a remarkable coincidence.<sup>55</sup> But the silence of the rest of the New Testament may conversely be taken as indicating that this was not a theological dogma of the early church, so that there was no constraint on the evangelists to provide it with a narrative basis—in other words that Matthew and Luke included it not because they needed to, but because this was the tradition they had received. The indirect indications of such a tradition mentioned above would support the latter alternative. Beyond that a historian cannot expect to go, and in the end the decision as to whether the tradition of a virgin conception should be given historical credence is likely to be made on philosophical grounds of what may reasonably be believed rather than on strictly historical grounds.<sup>56</sup>

---

<sup>54</sup> Origen, Contra Celsum 1.32. For the rabbinic evidence see R. E. Brown, Birth, 534–542; more briefly R. T. France, The Evidence for Jesus (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1986), 36–39.

<sup>55</sup> The traditional "Q" explanation for agreements between Matthew and Luke cannot explain their agreement on this point: no one believes in a Q birth narrative! The ways in which Matthew and Luke respectively speak of a virgin conception show no literary connections; like the rest of the infancy narratives, they appear to reflect quite independent sources. Even those who hold that Luke drew his common material directly from Matthew (or vice versa) are hard pressed to find any plausible literary link at this point.

<sup>56</sup> R. E. Brown discusses the issue "Historically, was Jesus conceived without a human father?" with his usual careful balance, with full bibliography, in Birth, 517–533 (based on his fuller study, The Virginal Conception and Bodily Resurrection of Jesus [New York: Paulist Press, 1973]), with supplementary comment on 697–712.

THE DEATH OF JESUS

JOEL B. GREEN

That Jesus was “crucified under Pontius Pilate,” as the Creed affirms, is historically the most stable datum we have concerning Jesus, but questions remain. Over the last three decades, scholarly study of Jesus’ crucifixion shifted from concern over who killed Jesus, to the question why Jesus was put to death on a Roman cross.<sup>1</sup> How does the crucifixion of Jesus make sense within the story of his life, and within the world in which he lived? Today, the litmus test for any representation of the historical Jesus is whether such an account can make sense of why Jesus was executed on a Roman cross as “King of the Jews.” That is, contemporary attempts to tell the story of Jesus’ life must weave together as a single cloth the manner of his life and the character of his death. After reviewing evidence supporting the historicity of Jesus’ crucifixion, I will situate the crucifixion of Jesus within three interwoven stories: the story of imperial Rome, the story of Israel, and the story of Jesus’ life and ministry, to which we have access primarily by means of the Gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John.

1. “Crucified under Pontius Pilate”

Multiple strands of evidence—from Christian, Jewish, and Roman sources—undergird the claim that among the data available to us regarding Jesus of Nazareth, none is more incontrovertible than his execution on a Roman cross by order of Pontius Pilate.

---

<sup>1</sup> The 2004 release of Mel Gibson’s The Passion of the Christ re-excited discussion around the question of responsibility for Jesus’ death—cf. e.g., G. Jeffrey MacDonald, “Scholars Still Debate Who Crucified Jesus,” Christian Century (9 March 2004): 15–16; Jon Meacham, “Who Killed Jesus?,” Newsweek 143.7 (16 February 2004): 44–53; Tim Callahan, “Who Really Killed Jesus?,” Skeptic 11.1 (2004): 87–90. However, such debates in the popular press have only rehearsed long-held views among scholars.

1.1. New Testament Evidence

The New Testament materials testify to Jesus' crucifixion with passion narratives noted for their length and detail, with references to the crucifixion especially in the speeches in Acts, and through snippets of information scattered throughout the letters and the Apocalypse. Although some scholars today take the second-century Gospel of Peter as an independent witness to the death of Jesus,<sup>2</sup> most have concluded that this Gospel was dependent on one or more of the New Testament gospels as sources and thus provides little if anything by way of independent witness.<sup>3</sup>

Scholars who have explored the origin of the passion narrative in recent decades have tended to posit a very early account or accounts that were expanded into the narratives of Jesus' suffering and death known to us in the New Testament gospels. Most analysis has focused on the traditional quality of the material shared by the Gospels of Mark and John, which are taken to be independent of one another as literary sources,<sup>4</sup> or has simply argued in favor of a pre-Markan passion narrative;<sup>5</sup> other study has suggested that the passion account in Luke 22–23 builds both on Mark 14–15 and on a non-Markan passion tradition.<sup>6</sup> Such research does not prove the historicity of Jesus' cruci-

---

<sup>2</sup> This is creatively argued in John Dominic Crossan, The Cross That Spoke: The Origins of the Passion Narrative (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1988).

<sup>3</sup> Cf. e.g., Joel B. Green, "The Gospel of Peter: Source for a Pre-Canonical Passion Narrative?", ZNW 78 (1987): 293–301; John P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, vol. 1: The Roots of the Problem and the Person, ABRL (New York: Doubleday, 1991), 116–118; Raymond E. Brown, The Death of the Messiah: From Gethsemane to the Grave: A Commentary on the Passion Narratives in the Four Gospels, 2 vols., ABRL (New York: Doubleday, 1994), 2:1317–1349.

<sup>4</sup> E.g., Till Arend Mohr, Markus- und Johannespassion: Redaktions- und traditions-geschichtliche Untersuchung der Markinischen und Johanneischen Passionstradition, ATANT 70 (Zürich: Theologischer Verlag Zürich, 1982); Matti Myllykoski, Die letzten Tage Jesu: Markus und Johannes, ihre Traditionen und die historische Frage, 2 vols., Suomalaisen Tiedeakatemia Toimituksia, Annales Academiae Scientiarum Fennicae B/256 and B/272 (Helsinki: Suomalainen Tiedeakatemia, 1991/1994); Wolfgang Reinbold, Der älteste Bericht über den Tod Jesu: Literarische Analyse und historische Kritik der Passionsdarstellungen der Evangelien, BZNW 69 (Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 1994).

<sup>5</sup> E.g., Adela Yarbro Collins, The Beginning of the Gospel: Probing of Mark in Context (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992), ch. 4.

<sup>6</sup> E.g., Vincent Taylor, The Passion Narrative of St. Luke: A Critical and Historical Examination, ed. Owen E. Evans, SNTSMS 19 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1972); Joel B. Green, The Death of Jesus: Tradition and Interpretation in the Passion Narrative, WUNT 2.33 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1988), 24–104. Marion L. Soards argued on source-critical grounds that Luke 22:1–71 represents Luke's

fixion, of course, but the cumulative effect of these studies is to press backward the potential existence of narrative accounts of Jesus' passion from the time of the writing of the gospels (60's–90's CE) to the dawning years of the Christian movement. How far backward in time? Most scholars are unwilling to speculate, but some who have studied the origins of the passion narrative go so far as to locate an archetypal account in the years before 40 CE.<sup>7</sup> What motivated the early development of a narrative representation of Jesus' suffering and death? Again, viewpoints differ, but coalesce generally around the pressing need to make sense within and for communities of Jesus' followers of what was unavoidably certain—namely, that he who was proclaimed as Christ and worshiped as Lord was the same person who had been crucified on a Roman cross.<sup>8</sup>

Literarily, of course, the earliest New Testament witnesses to the crucifixion of Jesus would be the Pauline epistles, where references to the cross are strategically located,<sup>9</sup> and remarks in shorthand can recall accounts of episodes related to Jesus' passion (e.g., 1 Cor 11:23–25; Gal 3:1; cf. 1 Tim 6:13). This is the apostle who presents “Christ crucified” as the embodiment of the gospel (1 Cor 1:23) and for whom the expression “word of the cross” (1 Cor 1:18) can serve as its virtual stand-in. Within the Pauline corpus, the earliest witness to Jesus' death is likely the formulaic tradition Paul cites and endorses in 1 Cor 15:3–5: “For I handed on to you... what I in turn had received: Christ died for our sins in accordance with the Scriptures....” Several features redaction of Markan parallels, allowing for very little in the way of “special Lukan material” (The Passion according to Luke: The Special Material of Luke 22, JSNTSup 14 [Sheffield: JSOT, 1987]), whereas Étienne Trocmé concluded that Luke's account of Jesus' passion is independent of the Gospel of Mark (The Passion as Liturgy: A Study in the Origin of the Passion Narratives in the Four Gospels [London: SCM, 1983]).

---

<sup>7</sup> E.g., Trocmé, Passion as Liturgy; Rudolf Pesch, “Die Überlieferung der Passion Jesu,” in Rückgrate nach Jesus: Zur Methodik und Bedeutung der Frage nach dem historischen Jesus, ed. Karl Kertelge (Freiburg: Herder, 1974), 148–173; idem, “Der Schluß der vormarkinische Passionsgeschichte und des Markusevangeliums: Mk 15,42–16:8,” in L'Évangile selon Marc: Tradition et Rédaction, ed. M. Sabbe (Leuven: Leuven University Press, 1974), 365–409; idem, Das Markusevangelium, vol. 2, 3rd ed., HTKNT 2 (Freiburg: Herder, 1984), 1–27.

<sup>8</sup> Trocmé (Passion as Liturgy) and Green (Death of Jesus) both argue in terms of a liturgical Sitz im Leben. Ellen Bradshaw Aitken develops a more specific concern with the ritual reenactment of Jesus' passion (Jesus' Death in Early Christian Memory: The Poetics of the Passion, NTOA 53 [Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2004]).

<sup>9</sup> Σταυρός—1 Cor 1:17–18; Gal 5:11; 6:12, 14; Phil 2:8; 3:18; Col 1:20; 2:14; cf. Eph 2:16. Σταυρώω—1 Cor 1:13, 23; 2:2, 8; 2 Cor 13:4; Gal 3:1; 5:24; 6:14. Ξυλόν—Gal 3:13.

of this formulation indicate the presence of earlier material, including the deployment of terminology associated with the transmission of tradition (παρελάβετε... παρέδωκα... παρέλαβον) and the fourfold repetition of ὅτι, marking the opening of the quotation and each of its members. As is widely recognized, this expression of “the word of the cross” reflects earlier hellenistic-Jewish-Christian tradition.<sup>10</sup>

The crucifixion of Jesus has a central role to play in the Pauline materials, but also in other epistolary texts, 1 Peter and Hebrews not least among them, as well as in the Apocalypse.<sup>11</sup> To these sources in the New Testament we should also add the speeches in Acts, where Jesus’ execution is a presupposition shared by speaker and audience (e.g., 2:23, 36; 3:14–15; 5:30; 13:28) and παθεῖν τὸν χριστόν is a kerygmatic summary (e.g., 3:18; 17:3). From the standpoint of the developing tradition, however, the echoes of Deut 21:22–23 in Acts, Galatians, and 1 Peter are of special interest:

Deut 21:22–23: “When someone is convicted of a crime punishable by death and is executed, and you hang him on a tree, his corpse must not remain all night upon the tree; you shall bury him that same day, for anyone hung on a tree is under God’s curse...”

Acts 5:30: “The God of our ancestors raised up Jesus, whom you had killed by hanging him on a tree.”

Acts 10:39: “They put him to death by hanging him on a tree...”

Acts 13:29: “When they had carried out everything that was written about him, they took him down from the tree and laid him in a tomb.”

Gal 3:13: “Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law by becoming a curse for us—for it is written, ‘Cursed is everyone who hangs on a tree’...”

1 Pet 2:24: “He himself bore our sins in his body on the tree...”

This repeated reference to the death of Jesus on a tree (ξύλον), rather than a cross (σταυρός), urges consideration of the formative influence of the LXX of Deut 21 on early Christian reflection on the death of

<sup>10</sup> See the earlier work of Eduard Lohse, Märtyrer und Gottesknecht: Untersuchungen zur urchristlichen Verkündigung vom Sühntod Jesu Christi, FRLANT 64, 2nd ed. (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1963), 113–116, 147–149; Hans Conzelmann, 1 Corinthians: A Commentary on the First Epistle to the Corinthians, Hermeneia (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1975), 251–254; more recently, Anthony C. Thiselton, The First Epistle to the Corinthians, NIGTC (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2000), 1188–1189.

<sup>11</sup> See more fully, Morna D. Hooker, Not Ashamed of the Gospel: New Testament Interpretations of the Death of Christ (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1994); John T. Carroll and Joel B. Green, The Death of Jesus in Early Christianity (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1995).

Jesus.<sup>12</sup> That persons hung on a tree are thus designated as “cursed” might have suggested the need to avoid any hint of Deut 21; the testimony of these New Testament texts suggests the opposite, however. Rather than deny the shame attending the form of Jesus’ execution, his followers seemed actually to embrace it—that is, to acknowledge it so as to subject it to a different hermeneutic. The cross, rather than evidence of Jesus’ rejection, is actually the signature of the God whose purpose is realized in the atoning death of his Anointed One (Galatians, 1 Peter), in whose economy rejection is antecedent to divine exaltation (Acts).

The New Testament evidence supporting the historicity of the crucifixion of Jesus is far more plentiful than these brief remarks, but enough has been said to demonstrate that the memory of the nature of Jesus’ death was from the very beginning not only pervasive but also penetrated with reflection on its significance. Indeed, the mere memory of the cross is itself evidence of its importance for those first disciples. We might anticipate that early Christians would provide testimony to the crucifixion of their Savior, and so may find more impressive the evidence available to us from outside the Christian movement.

1.2. Jewish and Roman Evidence

Within the first century, extra-biblical evidence is found in the writings of the Jewish historian Josephus, in the Testimonium Flavianum, the paragraph concerning Jesus in Josephus Ant. 18.63–64. Because this text speaks unabashedly of Jesus’ status as Messiah and of his resurrection, and even queries whether Jesus can rightly be regarded as a mere human being, this paragraph in Josephus has long been under suspicion as a Christian interpolation. It now seems more likely that an original reference to Jesus in Josephus’ work has been embellished than that the whole is entirely the result of Christian tampering. If one removes the explicitly Christian material, one is left with the following:

At this time there appeared Jesus, a wise man, for he was a doer of astounding deeds, a teacher of people who receive the truth gladly. He won a following both among many Jews and among many of Greek origin. When Pilate, because of an accusation made by our leaders, condemned him to the cross, those who had loved him previously did not cease to do so. Up until this very day the tribe of Christians (named after him) has not died out.

---

<sup>12</sup> Cf. Max Wilcox, “‘Upon the Tree’—Deut 21:22–23 in the New Testament,” JBL 96 (1977): 85–99.

According to this emendation of the text,<sup>13</sup> Josephus wrote of Jesus' crucifixion, and with only one or two alternatives in translation, Josephus' perspective could be characterized as more neutral or even hostile. Instead of "won a following," for example, we might read "led astray" (ἐπάγομαι; cf. Josephus War 7.164; Ant. 17.327), and those persons "who receive the truth gladly" might be regarded as simpletons.<sup>14</sup> What was the nature of the indictment brought against him? Josephus does not tell us explicitly, though we might find clues in what he has written. Thus, "astounding deeds" refers to Jesus' status as a miracle worker and healer, Josephus underscores in this short paragraph the popularity Jesus enjoyed, and he makes clear that Jesus ran afoul of the Jewish elite in Jerusalem ("our leaders"). These statements cohere well with the gospel records and may be useful in framing a picture of the reasons behind Jesus' death.

Early in the second century CE, the Roman historian Tacitus speaks of Jesus' execution as well. Writing of the persecution of Christians in Rome under Nero, Tacitus notes in his Annals that "Christians" take their name from "Christ, who, during the reign of Tiberius, had been executed by the procurator Pontius Pilate" (15.44).<sup>15</sup> A sample of crude graffiti cartoon, which probably dates from the early second century, portrays a young man worshipping a donkey-headed human figure on a cross. The Greek caption mocks, "Alexamenos worships [his] god"; this may well be the oldest depiction of "Christ crucified." Lucian of Samosata (born ca. 120 CE) wrote a sneering account of a person who had converted to and then rejected Christian faith. Therein, he speaks of "the man who was crucified in Palestine because he introduced this new cult into the world,” and describes Christians as “worshipping the crucified sophist” (The Passing of Peregrinus). Clearly, the crucifixion of Jesus, sheer folly from a Gentile perspective (μορψία, cf. 1 Cor 1:18, 23), was seized upon by those antagonistic toward Christians and the Christian message so as to discredit their claims regarding Jesus. As the second-century Christian apologist Justin Martyr remarks, “They say that our madness consists in the fact that we put a crucified man in second place after the unchangeable and eternal God, the creator of the world” (First Apology 13.4).

<sup>13</sup> Cf. John P. Meier, "Jesus in Josephus: A Modest Proposal," CBQ 52 (1990): 76–103; idem, A Marginal Jew, 1:56–69. On the problem of the Testimonium Flavianum, see the survey and bibliography in Craig A. Evans, "Jesus in Non-Christian Sources," in Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluations of the State of Current Research, ed. Bruce Chilton and Craig A. Evans, NTTS 19 (Leiden: Brill, 1994), 443–478, at 466–474.

<sup>14</sup> See Graham N. Stanton, "Jesus of Nazareth: A Magician and a False Prophet Who Deceived God's People?," in Jesus of Nazareth: Lord and Christ: Essays on the Historical Jesus and New Testament Christology, ed. Joel B. Green and Max Turner (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1995), 164–180, at 169–171.

<sup>15</sup> Of course, identification of Pilate as "procurator" is an anachronism, consistent with imperial organization in Tacitus' own day; Pilate was praefectus rather than procurator of Judea.

1.3. The Nature of Crucifixion

What do we know about the manner of Jesus’ execution? On this, the evidence is far more ambiguous than is generally realized and popularly portrayed. Literary sensibilities in Roman antiquity did not promote graphic descriptions of the act of crucifixion.<sup>16</sup> As Cicero remarked in his defense of a Roman senator, “But the executioner, the veiling of the head and the very word ‘cross’ should be far removed not only from the person of a Roman citizen but from his thoughts, his eyes and his ears. For it is not only the actual occurrence of these things or the endurance of them, but liability to them, the expectation, indeed the very mention of them, that is unworthy of a Roman citizen and a free man.”<sup>17</sup> Even the gospels are singularly reserved at this point. Reporting simply, “They crucified him” (Mark 15:24; Luke 23:33; John 19:18), they are devoid of the sort of detail that apparently belonged to the shared cultural encyclopedia of the evangelists and their first readers.

Literary evidence outside of the gospels makes it clear that, when it came to the act of crucifixion, the Romans were slaves to no standard technique. In describing the siege of Jerusalem by the Roman army, for example, Josephus reports that “the soldiers out of rage and hatred amused themselves by nailing their prisoners in different positions” (War 5.449–451). Elsewhere we learn that victims of crucifixion might be fixed to the cross with nails or with ropes.<sup>18</sup> They might be fixed to the stake in order to die, or impaled after death for public display.

---

<sup>16</sup> Martin Hengel, Crucifixion: In the Ancient World and the Folly of the Message of the Cross (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977), 38, 77–81. This is (over-)emphasized in Werner H. Kelber, The Oral and the Written Gospel: The Hermeneutics of Speaking and Writing in the Synoptic Tradition, Mark, Paul, and Q (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983), 193–194.

<sup>17</sup> Cicero, Rab. Perd. 16; trans. Hengel, Crucifixion, 42.

Nor can we turn to archeological evidence for detailed assistance. To date, the bones of only one victim of crucifixion have been unearthed. This is not surprising when it is remembered that the crucified were generally left on their crosses as carrion for the birds in order to provide a public and gruesome reminder of the fate of those who opposed imperial rule.<sup>19</sup> Even if they were granted burial, the nature of their execution would have precluded the sort of proper burial that would provide today's physical anthropologists with evidence of crucifixion. The remains of the crucified man from Giv'at ha-Mivtar, found in 1968 in an ossuary (bone box) in northern Jerusalem, suggest that his wrists were tied to the crossbeam, and that he was made to straddle the upright beam with a single nail driven through the heel bones of one foot, through the vertical beam, and into the other.<sup>20</sup>

In spite of the paucity and ambiguity of the evidence, Martin Hengel suggests a summary sketch of the Roman procedure of crucifixion. Crucifixion included a flogging beforehand, with victims generally made to carry their own crossbeams to the location of their execution, where they were bound or nailed to the cross with arms extended, raised up, and perhaps seated on a small wooden peg (a sedile).<sup>21</sup> As we have seen with reference to Josephus' eyewitness account, however, this procedure was subject to wild variation.

Roman practices were guided by their interest in the deterrent value of crucifixion. Quintilian (ca. 35–90's CE) observed that, "whenever we crucify the guilty, the most crowded roads are chosen, where most people can see and be moved by this fear. For penalties relate not so much to retribution as to their exemplary effect" (Decl. 274). Indeed,

---

<sup>18</sup> According to John 20:25; Acts 2:23; Col 2:14; Gos. Pet. 6:21; Justin Dial. 97, Jesus was nailed to the cross.

<sup>19</sup> Tacitus observes that legally condemned persons were precluded from burial (Ann. 6.29; cf. Josephus Ant. 5.44; 4.202), though Philo notes that, on the eve of a festive occasion, the crucified were removed from their crosses and handed over to relatives for burial (Flacc. 10.83–84).

<sup>20</sup> Joseph Zias and Eliezer Sekeles, "The Crucified Man from Giv'at ha-Mivtar: A Reappraisal," IEJ 35 (1985): 22–27. The original excavation is reported in V. Tzaferis, "Jewish Tombs at and near Giv'at ha-Mivtar, Jerusalem," IEJ 20 (1970): 18–32. Tzaferis dates this crucifixion to the period between the start of the first century CE and just before the outbreak of the Jewish revolt.

<sup>21</sup> Hengel, Crucifixion, 22–32.

variation in the manner of how victims were affixed to the cross would have served not only as sadistic entertainment, but also the need to leave the victim alive as long as possible for maximum deterrent effect.

In the context of any discussion of the material aspects of crucifixion it is important to remember that Rome did not embrace crucifixion as its method of choice for execution on account of the overwhelming physical pain it caused. This lack of interest in torturous pain is emphasized by contrasting accounts of crucifixion with the portrait of heinous suffering memorialized in the martyr-tale of 2 Macc 6:18–7:42, in which seven brothers and their mother serially experienced scalping, dismemberment, and their bodies thrown into heated pans for frying. Here the descriptive language of bodily punishment and extreme torture is fitting. On the other hand, the act of crucifixion resulted in little blood loss and death came slowly, as the body succumbed to shock.<sup>22</sup> This form of capital punishment was savage and heinous, but for reasons other than bodily torture. In the honor-and-shame based culture of Greco-Roman antiquity, bodily torture was not the worst sort of injury. Seneca speaks to the horrors of death by crucifixion:

Can anyone be found who would prefer wasting away in pain dying limb by limb, or letting out his life drop by drop, rather than expiring once for all? Can any man be found willing to be fastened to the accursed tree, long sickly, already deformed, swelling with ugly weals on shoulders and chest, and drawing the breath of life amid long drawn-out agony? He would have many excuses for dying even before mounting the cross.<sup>23</sup>

But these are not the horrors of agonizing pain. Indeed, even in the martyr-tale of 2 Macc 6–7, the emphasis falls on dying with nobility, with honor, rather than experiencing the shame of rejecting one's ancestral faith. More than pan-frying or dismemberment, then, crucifixion brought with it the pain of humiliation. In their depiction of the ordeal Jesus endured in the hours before crucifixion and during the time of his hanging on the cross, the gospel records themselves make this clear—focusing as they do on the myriad attempts to dishonor

---

<sup>22</sup> The often-repeated view that crucifixion resulted in death by asphyxiation is no longer tenable, at least in cases where the executed was fixed to the cross with arms outspread—see F. T. Zugibe, “Death by Crucifixion,” Canadian Society of Forensic Science 17 (1983): 1–13.

<sup>23</sup> Seneca, Lucil. 101; trans. Hengel, Crucifixion, 31–32.

Jesus: spitting on him (Matt 26:67; 27:30; Mark 14:65; 15:19), striking him on the face and head (Matt 26:67; Mark 14:65; Luke 22:63), ridiculing him (Matt 27:29, 31, 41; Mark 15:20, 31), insulting him (Matt 27:44; Mark 15:32, 34; Luke 22:65), and derisively mocking him (Mark 15:16–20, 29–32; Luke 22:65; 23:11, 35–37); he even suffers the humiliation of having been abandoned by his closest friends. Executed publicly, situated at a major crossroads or on a well-trafficked artery, devoid of clothing, denied burial, and left to be eaten by birds and beasts, victims of crucifixion were subject to optimal, unmitigated, vicious ridicule.

Rome did not expose its own citizens to this form of heinous punishment, but reserved crucifixion above all for those who resisted imperial rule.<sup>24</sup> That this is true in the case of Jesus is evident from the announcement of Jesus' offense, the inscription on the cross: "The King of the Jews," which Gerhard Schneider takes as "the historically unimpeachable point of departure" in an examination of the charge brought against Jesus.<sup>25</sup> Clearly, the titulus was a stable ingredient of the passion tradition, with few variances<sup>26</sup>:

οὗτος ἐστὶν Ἰησοῦς ὁ βασιλεὺς τῶν Ἰουδαίων (Matt 27:37)
 ὁ βασιλεὺς τῶν Ἰουδαίων (Mark 15:26)
 ὁ βασιλεὺς τῶν Ἰουδαίων οὗτος (Luke 23:38)
 Ἰησοῦς ὁ Ναζωραῖος ὁ βασιλεὺς τῶν Ἰουδαίων (John 19:19)

It will not do to explain either the appearance of this charge or its persistence in the tradition by appeal to custom, as though inscriptions of this kind were affixed to the cross in Roman crucifixions as a matter of course. Various means were employed for informing the public of the indictment brought against the condemned, but an inscription fixed to the cross itself is hardly expected.<sup>27</sup> Another argument in

<sup>24</sup> This is now well-documented in Hengel, Crucifixion; H.-W. Kuhn, "Die Kreuzesstrafe während der frühen Kaiserzeit: Ihre Wirklichkeit und Wertung in der Umwelt des Urchristentums," ANRW II 25.1 (1982): 648–793, at 706–718.

<sup>25</sup> Gerhard Schneider, "The Political Charge against Jesus (Luke 23:2)," in Jesus and the Politics of His Day, ed. Ernst Bammel and C. F. D. Moule (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984), 403–414, at 404.

<sup>26</sup> Cf. Gos. Pet 10; t. Sanh. 9:7.

<sup>27</sup> Suetonius, Caligula 32: "by carrying a sign ahead of him, on which the reason for his penalty was written"; Suetonius, Domitian 10: "They hung a sign around the offender's neck with the inscription..."; Dio Cassius, 54.3.6–7: "...with an inscription giving the reason for the death penalty." See A. E. Harvey, Jesus and the Constraints of History (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1982), 13–14; Ernst Bammel, "The titulus," in support of the historicity of the titulus is its Roman perspective—“king of the Jews,” a title regularly used of Herod the Great in Josephus.<sup>28</sup> (At the same time, what was first reported as a matter of public record has become in the passion narratives ironic proclamation.) It is true that Jesus is not identified as a ληστής, an “insurrectionist” (cf. Matt 26:55; 27:38, 44), but the claim to kingship would be sufficient to serve as a threat to the emperor: “Anyone who makes himself king opposes Caesar” (John 19:12).<sup>29</sup> We may conclude that the inscription announcing his capital offense marks Jesus as a pretender to the throne and thus represents first a Roman (and not a Christian) point of view: Let the cruel execution of Jesus of Nazareth be a lesson to the Jewish population, that Rome will not tolerate any attempt to incite the people to rebellion.

In short, that Jesus was crucified immediately places him historically in the story of Roman rule as a character regarded as antagonistic, even a threat, to the Empire. In this regard, it is hardly coincidental that Josephus documents the rise of Jewish revolutionary movements beginning at the turn of the era (e.g., Ant. 17.278–285; 17.271–276, 285; War 2.55–56), and the landscape of Roman-Jewish relations is dotted with skirmishes and war until the Romans did “annihilate, exterminate, and eradicate” them from the land (Dio Cassius 59.13.3).

Historical events are remembered from the standpoint of those who know the future of past forces and who weave them into narratives driven by this question: What led to this outcome? How did we get to this place? Having sketched some of the historical data concerning the crucifixion of Jesus, we are left with the conundrum: What could Jesus have done that would lead to the outcome of his crucifixion as an actual or potential adversary of Rome?

2. The Death of Jesus: A Tale of Three Narratives

In his examination of Jesus and the Constraints of History, A. E. Harvey characterizes our problem in this way: “Jesus was crucified as an actual idem and C. F. D. Moule, eds., Jesus and the Politics of His Day (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984) 353–364.

---

<sup>28</sup> Mark Antony made Herod “king of the Jews” (Josephus War 1.282).

<sup>29</sup> Observe the use of βασιλεύς for “emperor,” e.g., in 1 Pet 2:13, 17; cf. LSJ 309.

or potential enemy of the Roman authority,” but “the portrait of Jesus, as it is presented to us not only in the gospels but throughout the New Testament, is utterly irreconcilable with this explanation of his death.”<sup>30</sup> Overlooking the generally apolitical canvass on which much New Testament scholarship has tended to paint not only Jesus but the New Testament documents more broadly, a tendency that Harvey aptly illustrates,<sup>31</sup> the fact remains that the death of Jesus on a Roman cross is an event in search of an explanation and a nonpolitical explanation simply will not do. If we know that death on a Roman cross was indeed the nature of his demise, how, we must ask, did he find himself thus incriminated and sentenced as a threat to the throne?

Those who have sought to address this conundrum typically begin with a problematic assumption, for the holy grail for which they go in search is generally the (single) rationale that explains this horrible turn of events. But events find their meaning through the narratives by which they are told; hence, in seeking to make sense of the purpose served by Jesus’ crucifixion we must account for multiple narratives and, therefore, the possibility, even probability, that his execution served multiple agenda. In what follows, I will explore the motivations for and the meaning of Jesus’ death from three perspectives: that represented by the Jewish leadership in Jerusalem, the viewpoint of the Empire and its representatives, and the understanding of Jesus himself. As will become evident shortly, these three categories are not so discrete as my characterization might imply, but organizing relevant considerations in this way will remind us that multiple human characters or groups were required to bring about Jesus’ death, that his execution served multiple aims, and that the one event, Jesus’ crucifixion, could be comprehended in distinct ways.

---

<sup>30</sup> Harvey, Jesus and the Constraints of History, 14.

<sup>31</sup> This is in part a reaction to the argument that Jesus was a Zealot (in recent times, by S. G. F. Brandon, The Trial of Jesus of Nazareth [New York: Stein and Day, 1968], though see Ernst Bammel, “The Revolution Theory from Reimarus to Brandon,” in Jesus and the Politics of His Day, ed. idem and C. F. D. Moule [Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984], 11–68), but is due more generally to the modern compartmentalization of religion and politics. For an antidote to such an approach, see Richard A. Horsley, “The Death of Jesus,” in Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluations of the State of Current Research, ed. Bruce Chilton and Craig A. Evans, NTTS 19 (Leiden: Brill, 1994), 395–422.

2.1. Jesus' Death and the Roman Empire

In his justly celebrated monograph on Writing History, Paul Veyne develops the importance of “plot” in the narrative representation of historical events, particularly its role in shaping our understanding of those events. By way of illustration, he introduces the death of Jesus, “a mere anecdote in the reign of Tiberius...soon to be transformed into a gigantic event”:

A historian who died at the end of the reign of Tiberius most probably would not have mentioned the passion of Christ; the only plot in which he could have placed it was the political and religious agitation of the Jewish people in which Christ would have played, as he wrote of it, and as He still plays for us, the part of a mere figure in the crowd—it is in the history of Christianity that Christ has the main part. The significance of His passion has not changed with time; it is we who change plots when we pass from Jewish to Christian history. Everything is historic, but there are only partial histories.<sup>32</sup>

Large numbers of Jews were crucified under the Jewish king and high priest Alexander Jannaeus (107–76 BCE), remembered for his crucifixion of 800 Pharisees (Josephus Ant. 13.380; War 1.97; 4QpNah 3–4 I, 7), as well as by Rome during periods of significant unrest leading up to the Jewish revolt and the fall of Jerusalem in 70 CE; additionally, from time to time, agents of Roman rule in Judea condemned individuals to death by crucifixion. Jesus was just one among many to have suffered death in this fashion. Working within the historical story-line available to this imagined Roman historian, can we make sense of Jesus’ death on a Roman cross? Can we find evidence to support a portrait of Jesus that reaches its finale here, in the execution of Jesus for sedition against Rome?

That the Romans were involved in the legal proceedings concerning Jesus and were responsible for pronouncing the death sentence is undeniable, whatever one makes of the role of the Jerusalem sanhedrin. The memory of Jannaeus notwithstanding, crucifixion was not a Jewish practice, so that if Jesus had been sentenced to death by the sanhedrin we might have expected, say, an account of stoning or beheading. More to the point, however, in the Roman provinces, the power of capital punishment was held by the Romans; John’s report of the words of the sanhedrin to Pilate possesses historical verisimilitude on this point: "We are not allowed to execute anyone" (18:31).<sup>33</sup>

---

<sup>32</sup> Paul Veyne, Writing History: Essay on Epistemology (Middletown, Connecticut: Wesleyan University Press, 1984), 42.

Roman rulers were charged with taking whatever steps were necessary to maintain the "peace of Rome," so the most straightforward way to account for the problem Jesus posed Rome is by reflecting on the potential of Jesus' popularity with the crowds. Pilate's interest would surely have been piqued upon hearing these words concerning Jesus from the Jewish Council: "He stirs up the people by teaching throughout all Judea..." (Luke 23:5). Add to this the teeming masses present in Jerusalem for Passover and Unleavened Bread, the scene of the triumphal entry, and Jesus' prophetic action in the temple, and it is easy to see how Jesus might have been regarded as a threat to public order. It is worth noting, though, that Jesus was on a collision course with Roman interests long before his arrival in Jerusalem. Though relatively unknown in the Roman world, he propagated a worldview that ran counter to official Roman ideology, and he encouraged others to do the same. If the followers can be charged with "turning the world upside down," "acting contrary to the decrees of the emperor," and "saying that there is another king named Jesus" (Acts 17:6-7), how much more the leader? Indeed, the juxtaposition of the dominion of Caesar and that of Jesus comes into focus in two key texts:

Luke 23:2: "We found this man perverting our nation, forbidding us to pay taxes to the emperor, and saying that he himself is the Messiah, a king."

John 11:47-48: "Therefore, the chief priests and the Pharisees called a meeting of the sanhedrin, and said, 'What are we to do? This man performs many signs. If we allow him to continue like this, everyone will believe in him, and the Romans will come and overrun both our [holy] place and our nation.'"

Neither Rome's efforts at colonization nor its projection and maintenance of imperial rule were simple acts of accumulation and acquisition. Rather, these were supported and inspired by impressive ideological formations that included notions that certain territories and people require domination. Institutions like the Roman Empire are built on, belong to, and actively perpetuate a worldview that is self-legitimizing. Such life-centering institutions come to believe and cultivate the belief that “this is the way God/the gods would have it.” As a consequence, we must rid ourselves of the idea that Rome had political interests while the Jews had religious ones. Politics and religion cohabited the same space; political infractions were inherently moral and religious, and vice versa.

---

<sup>33</sup> See Klaus W. Müller, "Möglichkeit und Vollzug jüdischer Kapitalgerichtsbarkeit im Prozess gegen Jesus von Nazaret," in Der Prozess gegen Jesus, ed. Karl Kertelge, QD 112 (Freiburg: Herder, 1988), 41-83.

With reference to Jesus and Rome, potential religio-political concerns come into focus best with regard to conflicting attitudes toward the household. As Cicero put it, the household was regarded as “the seed-bed of the state” (On Duties 1.53–55); the orderliness of household relations was both a model for and the basis of order within the empire, with persons assigned a precise place in a vast network of orders, classes, tribes, and centuries. At the head of the house stood the paterfamilias, the patriarch of an extended family, with networks of overlapping obligations proceeding from him to others of the household, and with one household mapped in relationship to others in a vast hierarchical web governed by status and social obligation. The empire itself was envisioned as a great household, with the emperor the “father of the fatherland,” the benefactor or patron of all. Relations of reciprocity thus bound slaves to masters, sons to fathers, household to household, all to Caesar, and Caesar to the gods who had favored him.

Against such an ordering of the world, Jesus’ message stands in stark contrast. On the one hand, we find evidence in the gospel narratives of “business as usual” among Jesus’ followers, as they vie for places of honor. Who is the greatest? Jesus’ response to this sort of posturing for social position was to place before his disciples a little child (e.g., Mark 9:33–37). Serve these most vulnerable persons, these of lowest status, with honor; the dominion of God belongs to such persons. Here is a far-reaching inversion of Roman ideology. On the other hand, in the context of a world carefully managed by a system of reciprocity and patronage, Jesus insisted that people give without expectation of return. The household of Rome was built on social norms in which the giving of gifts (whether goods and services or invitations to banquets) brought with it expectations of reciprocity. Here was a systemic segregation of those of relative status from the dispossessed, since the latter were incapable either of advancing the social status of the former or even of returning the favor of an invitation to hospitality. Jesus set forth for his audiences an alternative Father, and a household not characterized by concerns with debt and obligation. Services were to be performed and gifts given to others as though they were family, “without expectation of return.” Such practices, if widespread, could only subvert the Roman world order. If Jesus were able to recruit adherents to this alternative, what then?

If Rome had reason to concern itself with the political risk posed by Jesus’ mission and message, this is not to say that it was from early on aware of such a threat, and the gospel records provide little by way of suggesting that such scenarios as these were recognized for their peril. Instead, Roman interests were piqued in a more direct way by the charges brought against Jesus by the Jerusalem leadership.

2.2. Jesus’ Death and the Jerusalem Elite

From Jewish perspectives, the possible infractions associated with Jesus are several. 11QTemple LXIV, 6–13 designates those who betray Israel to a foreign power as deserving of the penalty of “hanging on a tree” (Deut 21:22–23), and blasphemy was long regarded as an infraction punishable by death. Regarding the first point, we may recall that John reports Caiaphas’ decision regarding the execution of Jesus; if Jesus were allowed to continue his public ministry, Rome would destroy the temple and the nation (11:47–53). Regarding the latter, both Mark and Matthew have it that Jesus was found guilty of blasphemy (Matt 26:59–68; Mark 14:55–65). E. P. Sanders finds these accounts inaccurate, his strongest allegation being that of missed opportunity. Whereas speaking and acting against the temple might have led to a charge of blasphemy, this indictment comes, rather, after Jesus’ statement, “(From now on) you will see the Son of man seated at the right hand of Power and coming with (on) the clouds of heaven” (Matt 26:64; Mark 14:62; cf. Luke 22:69). Such a claim, though, is “unblasphemous,” according to Sanders.<sup>34</sup> However, Darrell Bock has shown that blasphemy in Second Temple Judaism might involve either word or deed, and that special sensitivity attached to the temple. Jesus’ reference to the Son of Man seated at God’s right hand, then, could easily have been taken as a claim on Jesus’ part that he was able to enter directly into God's presence and share in his rule—a blasphemous claim, indeed.<sup>35</sup>

---

<sup>34</sup> E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (London: SCM, 1985), 297–298.

Graham Stanton and August Strobel have made a strong case that Jesus had to be eliminated as a religious deceiver, or magician, and false prophet.<sup>36</sup> This is suggested by the evaluation of Jesus as a deceiver in Matt 27:63 and John 7:11, but even more so in the allegations brought against Jesus in Luke 23—namely, that he “perverts our nation/the people” (vv. 2, 14). The reference to “perverting” constitutes a formal allegation against Jesus as a false prophet, rooted in Deut 13 and 17; in fact, using the same verb (δυστρέφω), Luke recounts in Acts 13:6–8 that “a Jewish false prophet...tried to turn the proconsul away from the faith.” We have already noted the correlation of Jesus as miracle-worker with his “leading the people astray” in Josephus. To this can be added rabbinic traditions describing Jesus as a magician who deceived and led Israel astray (b. Sanh. 107b; cf. b. Shabb. 104b), and the more pointed reference in b. Sanh. 43a: “He is going forth to be stoned because he has practiced sorcery and enticed and led Israel astray.” Along a similar vein, writing in the mid-second century CE, Justin Martyr observes that, although Jesus' miracles of healing should have elicited recognition of him as Messiah, some drew the opposite conclusion: “they said it was a display of magic art, for they even dared to say that he was a magician and a deceiver of the people” (Dialogue 69.7; cf. Deut 13:5). These diverse testimonies lead to the same conclusion: that Jesus was charged as a deceiver and false prophet. Theissen and Merz complain that such an allegation is missing from our earliest sources, which they apparently identify with the Markan material, and claim that the indictment against Jesus as a false prophet who leads the people astray originated from a later time when Jews and Christians had parted ways, when Jews could have seen Jesus as someone who had indeed led his followers to separate from the Torah.<sup>37</sup> But, even if we allow the debatable assumption that the explicit indictment in Luke 23:1–5 is late,<sup>38</sup> this is not quite true, since before the Jewish council Jesus was mocked as a false prophet and subjected to the sort of abuse that is the fate of the prophets (Mark 14:65; Luke 22:63–65).

---

<sup>35</sup> Darrell L. Bock, “The Son of Man Seated at God's Right Hand and the Debate over Jesus' ‘Blasphemy,’” in Jesus of Nazareth: Lord and Christ: Essays on the Historical Jesus and New Testament Christology, ed. Joel B. Green and Max Turner (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1995), 181–191. See more fully, idem, Blasphemy and Exaltation in Judaism: The Charge against Jesus in Mark 14:53–65, WUNT 2.106 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1998).

<sup>36</sup> Stanton, “Jesus of Nazareth: A Magician and a False Prophet”; August Strobel, Die Stunde der Wahrheit: Untersuchungen zum Strafverfahren gegen Jesus, WUNT 21 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1980). On the hostile characterization of Jesus as a magician, see Morton Smith, Jesus the Magician (New York: Harper & Row, 1978).

The proximate basis for Jesus' arrest and trial, though, is more likely to be rooted in the combination of triumphal entry and prophetic action in the temple. Jesus' relationship to the temple is of particular interest, since the temple-charge—that Jesus claimed that he would destroy the temple and rebuild another, not made with human hands—appears in the trial before the sanhedrin as recounted by Matthew and Mark and is otherwise well-established in the tradition.<sup>39</sup> “Rebuilding the temple” is a task allocated to the messiah in one significant strand of eschatological expectation concerned with the restoration of Israel,<sup>40</sup> and this only underscores the political stakes of Jesus' action in the temple upon entering Jerusalem (Matt 21:12–13; Mark 11:15–17; Luke 19:45–46; John 2:13–16). Taken on its own, the temple-act could have been overlooked, but when this act is comprehended within this eschatological framework and in tandem with the popular support evident in the triumphal entry and continuing throughout the time of Jesus' teaching in the Jerusalem temple, too much was at risk.<sup>41</sup>

As the gospel narratives have it, three stable elements characterize the period of Jesus' Jerusalem ministry: Jesus' interaction with various representatives of the Jerusalem elite, the omnipresence of “the people”

---

<sup>37</sup> Gerd Theissen and Annette Merz, The Historical Jesus: A Comprehensive Guide (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1998), 463.

<sup>38</sup> I have argued that Luke 23:2, 4–5 derive from a narrative tradition other than Mark (Green, Death of Jesus, 77–79).

<sup>39</sup> Matt 26:61; Mark 14:58; cf. Mark 15:29; John 2:19; Acts 6:14; Gos. Thom. 71.

<sup>40</sup> Cf. 2 Sam 7:5–16; Zech 6:12–13; Tg. Neb. Zech 6:12–13; Tg. Neb. Isa 53:5; 1 Enoch 90.28–29; 4 Ezra 10.27; 4QFlor I, 1–13; Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 77–90; Green, Death of Jesus, 277–281.

<sup>41</sup> Paula Fredrickson wonders, then, how Jesus could have been charged with sedition and crucified without Rome's having also rounded up his followers for similar action (From Jesus to Christ: The Origins of the New Testament Images of Jesus [New Haven: Yale University Press, 1988], e.g., 110–111). Three aspects of the passion tradition may be of interest here. The gospels have it that, upon Jesus' entry into Jerusalem, his disciples are increasingly absent from his side and, indeed, are implicated in heightened obtuseness; instead, Jesus is surrounded by the nameless crowds; and, upon his arrest, Jesus' disciples abandon him. If Roman interest in Jesus is narrowly focused on events subsequent to Jesus' entry into Jerusalem, then identifying Jesus as a leader of a seditious band, rather than a suspicious leader of the people more generally, may have fallen outside their ken.

who look favorably on Jesus' teaching, and the persistent setting of the whole in relation to the temple. Because of the religious, political, and economic centrality of the temple in Jewish ideology, this is crucial. This is the sacred space that embodies and propagates the order of the world, and provides the axial point around which socio-religious life is aligned. If in his prophetic action in the temple, Jesus anticipates the demise of the temple system, if in a series of encounters with those groups associated with the temple Jesus finds himself in conflict on key issues related to scriptural interpretation and faithful praxis, if he claims divine sanction and authority for himself and his message, and if Jesus forecasts calamity and destruction as the old world order is overtaken by the new, has he not thus subverted the authority of the Jewish elite who have been divinely entrusted with the mediation of God's ways, who speak for God, who collect tithes and maintain the temple treasury, who handle holy things? In other words, Jesus ran afoul of the Jerusalem elite because he proclaimed by word and deed a vision of God's rule that ran counter to that of the Jewish leadership in Jerusalem, and it cost him his life.

Note: This is not a conflict between Jesus and Judaism, but a conflict within Judaism. When high worship and high politics are inseparable, as they were in the world view emanating from the Jerusalem temple, then the pivotal question is: Who speaks for God? If Jesus' message questions at its core the legitimacy of the Jerusalem authority, then Jesus must be marginalized; he must be shamed publicly by Jerusalem leaders who disparage his authority base or ridicule his vision of God's purpose and the nature of Israel's redemption. Failing this, if he gains a following, if the leadership finds its own position faltering before the people, then he must be silenced, permanently.

It is here that Jewish and Roman narratives are most intertwined, since political exigencies required close collaboration between the Jerusalem leadership and the agents of the emperor in matters related to social agitation. We can illustrate by returning to Luke 23:1-5:

Then the assembly rose as a body and brought Jesus before Pilate. They began to accuse him, saying, "We found this man perverting our nation, forbidding us to pay taxes to the emperor, and saying that he himself is the Messiah, a king." ... "He stirs up the people by teaching throughout all Judea, from Galilee where he began even to this place." (NRSV)

The repetition of the allegation, "This man/He perverts our nation/the people" in vv. 23:2, 14, and the variant, "He stirs up the people" (v. 5), suggest that the formal allegation brought against Jesus is actually one charge—"leading astray"—which is then elaborated by two other claims: forbidding the payment of taxes to Caesar and claiming to be a Messiah, a king. From within the story of Israel, "leading astray" would characterize Jesus' ministry as treasonous against the way of the Lord, as the work of a false prophet; in Pilate's hearing, though, "leading the people astray" and "stirring up the people" would have signaled rebellion and civil unrest.

What happens next is an ingenious move on the part of the Jewish assembly, who proceed to give substance to their indictment by interpreting for Pilate two aspects of Jesus' earlier teaching. (1) The question of paying tribute to Caesar had been raised in Luke 20:20–26, and the sanhedrin represents Jesus as having taught non-payment of tribute as a general policy. Of course, failure to pay the annual tribute was tantamount to disavowal of Roman rule. But Jesus had in fact sidestepped any straightforward, Yes/No answer to the question. For him, imperial demands are relativized by the prior claims of the kingdom of God so that, when these claims come into conflict, one must choose the dominion one will serve. In assuming the non-negotiable legitimacy of Caesar's claim, the Jewish council, which historically was a partner with the Empire in collecting the tribute, failed to acknowledge the priority of God's dominion. (2) Although the Jewish leadership is unwilling to grant Jesus the status of Messiah, they represent Jesus as apparently having admitted that he is the Lord's Anointed One (Luke 22:66–70), and so find here a clever means for allowing Jesus to incriminate himself. Since "Messiah" is terminology more at home in a Jewish context, they translate for Pilate, using the language of "kingship." But a claim to be a king in opposition to Caesar is seditious (cf. Acts 17:7).

We do not need to argue for the historicity of each detail of Luke's presentation to grasp two basic points. First, the crimes with which Jesus is charged cannot be relegated to religious categories, pure and simple. Religion and society and politics are all of a piece. Second, Roman and Jewish eyes and ears could see and hear quite different things in Jesus' deeds and words, and, in the end, these two streams of interpretation arrive at the confluence of one outcome: Jesus' capital sentencing. As Peter Stuhlmacher summarizes: "Jesus had to die because he made too many enemies who opposed his messianic ministry."<sup>42</sup>

---

<sup>42</sup> Peter Stuhlmacher, Jesus of Nazareth—Christ of Faith (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1993), 55.

2.3. Jesus and His Death

If Jesus' crucifixion is explicable within the plot-lines of an imperial- or Jerusalem-oriented narrative, can the same be said of the story of Jesus' own life and mission? The possibility that Jesus contemplated his own violent death opens the door to reflection on what meaning he might have allotted it, and this possibility is supported by a virtual phalanx of considerations:

- From early on in his public life, Jesus met with opposition and his ministry was enveloped in conflict; to what end might this hostility lead?
- Jesus' relative and predecessor, John, lost his life at the hands of Herod Antipas, ruler of Galilee and Peraea; would this not have served as a warning to Jesus?
- The tradition runs deep and wide that Jesus was regarded and regarded himself in prophetic terms (e.g., Matt 11:9; 14:5; 21:11, 46; Mark 6:4; Luke 7:16; Luke 13:33; 22:64; 24:19; John 4:19; 6:14; 7:40; 9:17), but the fate of all the prophets is rejection and death (e.g., Neh 9:26; Jer 2:30; Jub. 1.12).
- Jesus repeatedly predicts the suffering of his followers (e.g., Mark 8:34–38; 10:38–39; 14:27–28; Matt 10:25; Luke 21:12–16); would their suffering not presume his own?
- In addition to the explicit predictions of Jesus' suffering and death (e.g., Mark 8:31; 9:31; 10:33–34), the gospels witness numerous indirect sayings, and in a variety of forms (parables, pronouncement stories, narrative episodes, aphorisms, etc.), through which Jesus anticipates a violent end.<sup>43</sup>

We may take as axiomatic, then, that Jesus anticipated his death; in the charged environment of Roman Palestine how could he not have done so? To admit this is to open the door to its corollary—namely, the probability that he reflected on its significance and did so in a way that intimately related it to his mission to redeem the people of God. By this I mean that Jesus was no masochist looking for an opportunity to suffer and die, but saw that his absolute commitment to the purpose of God might lead, in the context of “this adulterous and wicked generation” (Mark 8:38), to his death. This, he discerns and embraces in prayer on the night of his arrest, was the cup given him by God (Mark 14:32–42; Luke 22:39–46).

---

<sup>43</sup> E.g., Mark 2:20; 9:12–13; 10:38, 45; 12:1–12. See Sydney T. Page, "The Authenticity of the Ransom Logion (Mark 10:45b)," in Gospel Perspectives, 1: Studies of History and Tradition in the Four Gospels, ed. R. T. France and David Wenham (Sheffield: JSOT, 1980) 137–161, at 144; Green, Death of Jesus, 148–154; Scot McKnight, "Jesus and His Death: Some Recent Scholarship," CurBS 9 (2001): 185–228, at 201–203. On the tradition history of the passion and resurrection predictions, see Hans F. Bayer, Jesus' Predictions of Vindication and Resurrection, WUNT 2.20 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1986).

His mission as this is known to us in the gospels is directed toward revitalizing Israel as the people of God. Pursuing this aim compelled him to proclaim the intervention of God’s rule and to embody the ethics of this kingdom, and this brought him into conflict with the conveyers of Roman and Jewish ideologies and practices. From this perspective, we may regard nothing of significance in Jesus’ practices as irrelevant to his execution; everything—his interpretation of Israel’s Scriptures, his practices of prayer and worship, his astounding choice of table companions, his crossing of the boundaries of clean and unclean, his engagement with children, his miracles of healing and exorcism—leads to the cross. Calling twelve disciples as representative of restored Israel, weaving the hopes of New Exodus and the eschatological era into his ministries of word and deed, speaking of the fulfillment of God’s promises to Israel, his prophetic action at the temple in anticipation of a temple not made by human hands—in all of these ways and more, Jesus countered the present world order and maintained that God was at work in his person and mission. This led him to a form of execution emblematic of a way of life that rejected the value of public opinion in the determination of status before God, and inspired interpretations of his death that accorded privilege to the redemptive power of righteous suffering. The way was opened for Jesus’ followers to accord positive value to his shameful death, and thus to learn to associate in meaningful ways what would otherwise have been only a clash of contradictory images: Jesus’ heinous suffering and his messianic status.

This also means that Jesus was able to gather together Israel’s history and hopes and from them forge a view of himself as the one through whose suffering Israel, and through Israel the nations, would experience redemption. That is, in elucidating the significance of his looming death, Jesus pushed backward into Israel’s history and embraced Israel’s expectations for deliverance. At the table on his last night with his followers, at a meal pregnant with the imagery of Passover and exodus, he intimated that the new exodus, God’s decisive act of deliverance, was coming to fruition in his death, the climax of his mission.

Moreover, he developed the meaning of his death in language and images grounded in the constitution of Israel as the covenant people of God (Exod 24:8), the conclusion of the exile (see Zech 9:9–11), and the hope of a new covenant (Jer 31:31–33), so as to mark his death as the inaugural event of covenant renewal. How could Jesus contemplate such thoughts? Taken together with his prophetic action in the temple, the symbolic actions at the table of Jesus' last meal with his disciples signify the disestablishment of the old ordering of Israel's life and, by means of God's great act of deliverance in his sacrificial death, the establishment of a new basis of Israel's life before God.<sup>44</sup>

Where might Jesus have gone for resources to construct such a view? Attempts to find in Israel's history a "suffering messiah" figure have proven fruitless, but this does not preclude the possibility that Jesus could have pioneered this combination of images. Given what we know of Jesus, the issue is not whether we can allow for innovation on his part. We must ask instead whether the raw materials for innovation were at hand, and this is easy to answer in the affirmative.

- The tradition of the suffering of God's messengers, the prophets: The presumed destiny of divine prophets was consistently that of rejection and death, and it is not coincidental that Jesus both identified himself in prophetic terms and presaged his solidarity with the prophets in their having been spurned and killed (see above). Importantly, within the prophetic tradition, rejection by those to whom the prophet was sent did not invalidate the prophet or the message.
- The tradition of the suffering righteous: Again, it is not coincidental that the synoptic gospels portray the death of Jesus in terms that reflect the influence of the pattern of the suffering righteous one. The materials drawn from the Psalms of the suffering righteous are everywhere to be found on the terrain of the gospel passion narratives. For example:<sup>45</sup>

---

<sup>44</sup> I mean thus to underscore the significance of the Last Supper as a point of entry into Jesus' self-understanding of his death even if its importance has been variously assessed—e.g., Joachim Jeremias, The Eucharistic Words of Jesus (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1966); Rudolf Pesch, Das Abendmahl und Jesu Todesverständnis, QD 80 (Freiburg: Herder, 1978); I. Howard Marshall, Last Supper and Lord's Supper (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1980); and Bruce Chilton, Rabbi Jesus: An Intimate Biography (New York: Doubleday, 2000).

Gospels		Psalms
Matt 26:3–4	gathered together and took counsel to kill	31:14 LXX
Mark 14:1//Matt 26:4	to kill by cunning	10:7–8
Mark 14:8//John 13:18	the one eating with me	41:9 LXX
Mark 14:61; 15:5; Luke 23:9	silence before accusers	38:13–14
Matt 27:34	offered gall	69:21 LXX
Mark 15:24	division of garments	22:18 LXX
Mark 15:29	mockery, head wagging	22:7 LXX
Matt 27:43	“He trusts in God. Let God deliver him!”	22:8
Mark 15:34	cry of abandonment	22:1 LXX

- Suffering and the new age: Significant strands of Second Temple Jewish literature hold the promise that the restoration of Israel as a people was related fundamentally to Israel’s reconciliation to God and that Israel’s deliverance would come by means of great suffering (already in Israel’s Scriptures—e.g., Isa 25:17–18; 66:7–8; Dan 7; 12:1–2; cf. Testament of Moses 5–10; Jub. 23.22–31; 1 QH III).<sup>46</sup>
- Redemptive suffering: Finally, the notion that the suffering of one person might have redemptive benefit for the people has good precedent. One thinks immediately of the interpretive development of the Servant-figure of Isa 52:13–53:12 in the centuries after the exile.<sup>47</sup> Such a view extends traditional sacrificial terminology concerned with the pouring out of life, grounded in the divine economy whereby the substitution of animal life for human life had efficacy in the restoration of right relations with God (cf. Lev 4–5). Broken relations between God and humanity are addressed through both mediation and substitution, and, as the echoes of both Lev 4

<sup>45</sup> See more fully, Joel Marcus, “The Old Testament and the Death of Jesus: The Role of Scripture in the Gospel Passion Narratives,” in The Death of Jesus in Early Christianity, ed. John T. Carroll and Joel B. Green (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1995), 204–233, esp. 206–209.

<sup>46</sup> See the survey in Dale C. Allison Jr., The End of the Ages Has Come: An Early Interpretation of the Passion and Resurrection of Jesus (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985), 5–25.

<sup>47</sup> For the fecundity of the Isaianic tradition, see George W. E. Nickelsburg Jr., Resurrection, Immortality, and Eternal Life in Intertestamental Judaism, HTS 26 (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1972).

(“guilt offering”) and Lev 16 (“scapegoat”) in Isa 53:10, 12 portend, the servant of Yahweh fulfills these roles. The innovative appropriation of the sacrificial system to a human being as a sin-offering is then developed further in texts related to the Maccabean martyrs (2 Macc 7:32–33, 37–38; 4 Macc 6:28–29; 17:22). Interpretations of this nature were available to Jesus and within Jesus’ world irrespective of whether one goes on to conclude that Jesus made explicit use of Isaiah 53 in utterances concerning his impending death.

Several conclusions can be drawn from this line of evidence. First, it is foolish to seek the one or even primary background text in Israel’s Scriptures that might have informed early interpretation of Jesus’ death, whether by Jesus himself or his followers. A redemptive interpretation of Jesus’ death does not depend on one image, one scriptural text, or one particular cord of Jewish tradition. In fact, if anything, the line of influence should be reversed: The death of Jesus becomes a hermeneutical starting-point for reading the whole of the Scriptures. This, at least, is suggested by such texts as we find in Luke (“Was it not necessary that the Messiah should suffer these things and then enter into his glory?” Then beginning with Moses and all the prophets, he interpreted to them the things about himself in all the scriptures” [24:26–27]) and Paul (“Christ died for our sins in accordance with the scriptures” [1 Cor 15:3]). Second, to speak of Jesus’ death as “redemptive” is primarily to make an eschatological statement and only then to make a claim about its atoning significance. This assertion does not so much downplay the atonement as locate it more fully within the larger mural of God’s work in the advent of Jesus. Third, the seeds are so many and the ground of interpretation so fertile that it is both virtually impossible to segregate Jesus’ understanding of his death from the view of his followers and ill-advised to speculate how far down the interpretive path Jesus himself had gone. We may perceive creativity and innovation on Jesus’ part in drawing together material stamped with the divine purpose and with suffering and repulsive death, while leaving room for those interpretations to flower and for others to spring up among Jesus’ followers.

3. Conclusion

Jesus’ death, however secure from the standpoint of strict historicity, was capable of myriad interpretations. This is not because the basic “facts” elude us but because there were so many different ways to construe those facts—or, we might say, different locations from which to make sense of them. The temple elite and the agents of Rome, for example, both stood over against Jesus, but, pursuing different interests, they saw in his execution the resolution to different problems. Jesus had his own view of things, too, of course, and it will not do to cast him as the victim in this great drama. Marcus Borg is right to recognize Jesus as “one who provocatively challenged the ethos of his day. He was killed because he sought, in the name and power of the Spirit, the transformation of his own culture. He issued a call for a relationship with God that would lead to a new ethos and thus a new politics.”<sup>48</sup> Jesus’ execution on a Roman cross served Jesus’ own mission.

The Jewish elite must have regarded Jesus’ ignominious demise as proof that he was no spokesperson for God—just as the two disciples on the path to Emmaus about whom Luke writes found in Jesus’ crucifixion a confusing puzzle and apparent denial of their hopes that he would redeem Israel (24:19–21). Jesus’ followers would find in Jesus’ resurrection proof of a different sort, a validation of the message and ministry of Jesus, and then of the nature and significance of his death.

---

<sup>48</sup> Marcus Borg, Jesus: A New Vision (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1987), 183–184.

THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS

PHEME PERKINS

1. Resurrection as Kerygma

The earliest evidence for that claim that God raised Jesus from the dead occurs in the Pauline epistles. Such formulaic expressions as 1 Thess 1:9–10, “...how you turned to God from idols to serve the living and true God and to await his Son from heaven, whom he raised from the dead, Jesus who saves us from the wrath to come,” or Rom 1:3–4, “concerning his Son who was from the seed of David according to the flesh, designated Son of God in power according to the Spirit of Holiness from the resurrection of the dead, Jesus Christ our Lord,” serve as linguistic codes for the gospel. These phrases reflect common Christian speech patterns, not peculiarly Pauline theologoumena.<sup>1</sup> Thess 1:10 reflects a common pattern in Jewish texts. Resurrection belongs to the scenario of divine judgment. Dan 12:1–3 indicates that some circles of “the pious” held such views in the second century BCE.<sup>2</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> See Abraham J. Malherbe, The Letters to the Thessalonians, AB 32B (New York: Doubleday, 2000), 120–122. Malherbe points out that the summary reflects the faith his audience now holds, not necessarily a news capsule of Paul’s preaching. Paul employs this form to focus attention on God as subject of a chronological series of actions (132). For a detailed analysis of tradition and redaction in Rom 1:3–4, see Joseph A. Fitzmyer (Romans, AB 33 [New York: Doubleday, 1993], 229–230, 233–237). Fitzmyer points out that the expression by a spirit of holiness reflects a phrase common in the Old Testament (e.g., Isa 63:10–11; Ps 51:13) and in Qumran texts (e.g., 1 QS IV, 21; VIII, 16) that is differently translated in the LXX and in Paul’s speech patterns. Therefore, the formula probably originated among Aramaic speaking Palestinian believers (236).

<sup>2</sup> John J. Collins, Daniel (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993), 390–398; Alan F. Segal, Life After Death. A History of the Afterlife in the Religions of the West (New York: Doubleday, 2004), 262–265; N.T. Wright, The Resurrection of the Son of God (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2003), 109–138; Émile Puech, La Croyance des Esséniens en la vie future: Immortalité, Résurrection, Vie éternelle? Histoire d’une croyance dans le judaïsme ancien. I. La résurrection des morts et le contexte scripturaire. II. Les données Qumraniennes et classiques, Études bibliques Nouvelle série N° 21 (Paris: J. Gabalda et C<sup>ie</sup> [Librarie LeCoffre]: 1993), 82–85. Puech rejects the view that belief in bodily resurrection emerged as a response to persecution and martyrdom during the Maccabean period, since he assigns the earliest Enoch traditions which include resurrection of the righteous to the third century BCE (316–317).

Paul himself prefers bi-partite expressions referring to death on the cross and resurrection since his kerygma highlights the triumph of God's wisdom and power over the absurdity of the cross (1 Cor 1:18–25; 2:2).<sup>3</sup> He can describe justification as faith in the God “who raised Jesus our Lord from the dead, who was handed over for our trespasses and raised for our justification” (Rom 4:24–25).<sup>4</sup> Such expressions provide important evidence for the historian as well as the theologian. They indicate that the events at the end of Jesus' life, death on the cross, resurrection and exaltation in anticipation of a role in divine judgment, were central to the earliest kerygma. Jesus' teaching, whether remembered under the rubric of philosopher-sage or considered the activity of apocalyptic prophet and reformer, did not carry the day of itself.<sup>5</sup> Paul's own visionary encounter with the risen Son of God was sufficient to transform a violent persecutor into an apostle (Gal 1:13–16).<sup>6</sup> Jesus' earliest followers in Palestine claimed that one of their own contemporaries was alive with God, not in the intermediate state of the other righteous dead. Since he had died on a cross, Jesus could not be said to have been taken up bodily as another Enoch, Elijah or

---

<sup>3</sup> Fitzmyer, Romans, 230.

<sup>4</sup> Fitzmyer points out that while the Greek Fathers saw the resurrection of Jesus as the cause of humanity's justification, the Latin tradition came to focus solely on the atoning death of Christ. Consequently, the resurrection becomes merely a confirmation of what has been claimed about the death. However, Fitzmyer finds exceptions to this reductionist trend in Augustine (Sermones 236.1; PL 38.1120) and Aquinas (In ep. Ad Romanos 4.3; S.T. III 56.2 ad 4; Fitzmyer, Romans, 389–390).

<sup>5</sup> To understand the crucifixion of Jesus, one cannot easily make sense of a “wrong place, wrong time” death due to misguided Roman violence. Jesus' own ministry engaged existing expectations for God's coming intervention in human affairs to rescue the faithful ones from domination by evil powers. Jesus probably did self-identify as God's chosen one, tasked with initiating such a transformation. See the discussion of the contrary theories that produce a Christology free, non-apocalyptic sage in Larry W. Hurtado, Lord, Jesus Christ. Devotion to Jesus in Earliest Christianity (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2003), 53–64, 213–257. Hurtado points out the fallacy in scholarly reconstructions which claim to get back to earlier Christian beliefs of the 30's and 40's by dismissing Pauline evidence. They are predicated on an unexamined assumption that Paul got it wrong or infected Christianity with a mythical depiction of Christ antithetical to the life and teaching of Jesus himself (81–93).

<sup>6</sup> Hurtado (Lord, 83, 96) points out that these basic Christological views probably reflect the positions Paul had opposed as a persecutor. J. Louis Martyn (Galatians AB 33A [New York: Doubleday, 1997], 162) sees in Gal 3:13 the kind of argument Paul once employed against the emerging Christian movement, “venerating as though he were God's Messiah a man who had been crucified as a criminal, and who therefore stood under the curse of God's Law.”

Moses. The historian rightly asks after the basis for such an extraordinary affirmation.<sup>7</sup>

Birger Gerhardsson points to the most developed formula in Paul, 1 Cor 15:3b–8a, as evidence for Christ's resurrection.<sup>8</sup> Both the degradation of Jesus' death on a cross and the condemnation of his teaching by religious authorities should have been sufficient to squelch any messianic expectations attached to his person.<sup>9</sup> Jesus' followers would have required strong arguments to support their case. The Passion Narratives depict Jesus' trial and death in such a way as to elicit the verdict of "not guilty".<sup>10</sup> The evangelists employ four lines of argument in support of their affirmation that the Jesus who was crucified is God's messiah raised from the dead: (1) witnesses who saw and spoke with him; (2) the disappearance of his body from the tomb;<sup>11</sup> (3) recasting the narrative of these events so that they were clearly anticipated in the Scriptures;<sup>12</sup> (4) references to Jesus' own predictions that he would be executed and then raised from the dead. Only the tomb story fails to appear in the 1 Cor 15:3–8 traditions. Was it unknown in the earliest period? The "was buried" phrase assumes formal internment rather than a body left to rot in public view or tossed into a mass grave by <sup>7</sup> Segal points out that a simple understanding of Jesus' death as martyrdom would not distinguish him from John, the Baptist, whose own return may have been expected. He posits some form of religious experience of Jesus understood fulfillment of such prophecies as Dan 7:9–14 and 12:3 to be the best historical construction of these events (Lord, 387–396).

---

<sup>8</sup> Birger Gerhardsson, "Evidence for Christ's Resurrection According to Paul: 1 Cor 15:1–11," in Neotestamentica et Philonica. Studies in Honor of Peder Borgen, ed. David E. Aune, Torrey Seland, and Jarl Henning (Leiden: Brill, 2003), 73–91.

<sup>9</sup> Without the religious condemnation, Jesus' death might be perceived as that of a righteous martyr (Gerhardsson, "Evidence," 74).

<sup>10</sup> See Raymond E. Brown, The Death of the Messiah. From Gethsemane to the Grave (New York: Doubleday, 1993). The kerygmatic and theological orientation of the passion narratives does not mean that they are without value as historical evidence for what happened to Jesus of Nazareth (14–24).

<sup>11</sup> In principle this fact could have been checked by anyone, though the appeal to women as primary witnesses weakens the value of such reports for an ancient audience (Gerhardsson, "Evidence," 77).

<sup>12</sup> Coherence with ancient prophecies or Scripture was a powerful line of reasoning in antiquity where such arguments were sought to explain events or confirm the emergence of a new political regime. Contemporary readers generally undervalue the weight of such an appeal (Gerhardsson, "Evidence," 77). For a detailed discussion of the Old Testament background to the Passion Narratives see Brown (Death, 1445–1467).

the execution squad.<sup>13</sup> It also underlines the fact that Jesus had really died.<sup>14</sup>

The formula lists items in chronological sequence. The evidence underlying “death for our sins” and “resurrection on the third day” as according to the Scriptures never appears. The focus rests upon the witness list. In addition to Paul himself, others could also attest to having seen the Lord.<sup>15</sup> Paul considers his own vision to be of the same type as these earlier witnesses (1 Cor 15:9–10). What sort of seeing is involved? Gerhardsson concurs with the view that Jesus appeared from heaven.<sup>16</sup> Such an affirmation leaves the twenty-first-century reader in a bind. The bodily translation from and to heaven which could be attributed to divine power in the first-century hardly fits the cosmos described by modern astrophysics and biology. We may agree that a first-century respondent would have said that the risen Jesus was a bodily entity, not a disembodied, immortal soul or the sort of visionary entity encountered in dreams or in waking visions as a ghost. We may also agree that an informant would say that remains of Jesus’ corpse could not be present in a grave or dispersed as unburied body parts.

Paul does not provide reasons for skepticism concerning resurrection of the dead at Corinth (1 Cor 15:12, 19), though the subsequent argument focuses on the resurrection of the faithful at the last judg-

---

<sup>13</sup> J. Dominic Crossan (Who Killed Jesus? [New York: HarperCollins, 1995], 160–188) insists that the burial of Jesus is apologetic fiction on the part of Jesus’ disciples to erase the disgrace of Jesus as unburied or desecrated corpse.

<sup>14</sup> Gerhardsson, “Evidence,” 82. Since crucifixion victims might remain alive for an extended period, Mark takes care to have the death confirmed prior to Pilate’s releasing the body for burial (Mark 15:44–45; Brown, Death, 1220–1222) while John has the soldiers see to it that all three are dead prior to Joseph’s request for the body of Jesus (John 19:31–33; Brown, Death, 1173–1177). John’s version assumes that there had been a general request not to have corpses defile the up-coming holy days, so all three had to have died and been buried prior to sundown.

<sup>15</sup> Neither James nor Paul was a disciple when they saw the Lord though both had been engaged with Jesus or his followers. Gerhardsson assumes that Paul is inviting those who are skeptical about resurrection to consult living witnesses (“Evidence,” 88). As a rhetorical ploy such a confirmation might be asserted. However Greek-speaking believers in Corinth can hardly query Aramaic-speaking witnesses from Palestine over two decades after the events in question. Therefore, the only accessible witness remains Paul himself.

<sup>16</sup> Gerhardsson, “Evidence,” 84–87. The heavenly mode of appearance remains characteristic of the gospel resurrection narratives. Jesus does not remain fixed in the human spatio-temporal world but appears and disappears at will, even despite such obstacles as locked doors (John 20:19).

ment, not that of Jesus. Presumably, they had received the kerygma without inferring that believers are to be transformed into the image of the risen Christ. Since the end-time resurrection and transformation of the righteous is more securely rooted in Jewish apocalyptic texts than an anticipatory resurrection and exaltation of a crucified human being, the cognitive disconnect suggests that “resurrection of Jesus” did not always carry with it the same connotations even in the first century CE.

2. Hermeneutics and History

The explosion of historical-criticism over the past century has been fueled both by expanding resources for “data” in the form of texts and artifacts and by a methodological focus on reconstructing a plausible first-century communication context. Both message and reception have to cohere with other speech-acts from the period. Exegetes acknowledge the inherent difficulties in inferring what is intended and conveyed from the written text. Nevertheless, as Raymond Brown points out in his treatment of the Passion Narratives, “comprehensibility by the ancient audience should play a role in our interpretive judgments.”<sup>17</sup> Brown acknowledges that such judgments require considerable argument, presentation and analysis of comparable material, and, in the end, “best estimate” judgments on the part of individual scholars.

Most twenty-first-century audiences have different expectations. The media outlets which produce “history” film, TV and glossy books allege that it is possible to transport the viewer back to the events themselves. All the gaps, the analogous interpretations, and the gaping holes in information disappear.<sup>18</sup> John Gaddis has challenged the “time machine” view of historical understanding from the perspective of both the historian and the original participants. Even a historian who investigates events within his or her own life-time can never provide a complete representation of what occurred or the motivations of the various actors. From the other side, those persons directly involved in the events are engaged in the minutiae of immediate experience. They may have less comprehension of what their actions will mean in a large-scale framework than the historian of a later time.<sup>19</sup>

---

<sup>17</sup> See Brown, Death, 8–9.

<sup>18</sup> See Peter Richardson’s informative account of what it took to recreate Galilean village life for a television special. In the process, historians and archaeologists discovered new unanswered questions in their own imaginative constructs (Building Jewish in the Roman East [Waco: Baylor University, 2004], 39–53).

History, Gaddis argues, operates within much the same logical framework as geology or paleontology. Certain remains from the past are there to be analyzed. If they can be discerned as part of a pattern that suggests a connection, then one must come up with an account of how they got that way. The “how” will require assumptions about processes which have been observed operating in other, analogous situations.<sup>20</sup> Just as there can be no single correct map of a region, so there may be diverse accounts of the same events. A map has to fit reality within the context of the use for which it is intended. It cannot replicate all the details of topography without losing its value.<sup>21</sup> At the same time the map must contain all relevant relationships. Elements omitted because users are presumed familiar with them will baffle the neophyte, as any driver faced with a rotary or round-about for the first time can attest.

Gaddis points out that instead of map-making historians produce narratives that are no less dependent upon one’s ability to fit details into patterns that involve varying degrees of abstraction.<sup>22</sup> The modern perception of geologic time and cosmology have unseated the traditional view that God has established an underlying order which determines the affairs of nations. For better or worse, human beings living through history bear full responsibility for what happens.<sup>23</sup> Within the past century, historians have come to discern micro-level processes behind the macro-events of a grand historical narrative.<sup>24</sup>

Consider the following. There is considerable evidence in Roman sources that would tell against the assertion “he was buried” especially for persons considered opponents of the Roman order. Emperors pro-

---

<sup>19</sup> John Lewis Gaddis, The Landscape of History. How Historians Map the Past (New York: Oxford, 2002), 3–4.

<sup>20</sup> Gaddis, Landscape, 40–49. Gaddis distinguishes between those sciences which confirm by replicating results in a laboratory and those which have “virtual replicability”. Only imagination and thought experiment can test a given scenario (43).

<sup>21</sup> Ibid., 33–34.

<sup>22</sup> Ibid., 15–19. He also points out the value of imaginative simultaneity in the process. Historical imagination transcends the constraints of being in only one time and place (24).

<sup>23</sup> Ibid., 6–7.

<sup>24</sup> Ibid., 25.

hibited burial for rebel soldiers (Suetonius, Augustus 13.1–2) or persons condemned of treason (Tiberius according to Tacitus, Annals 6.29). Soldiers were to keep family members from removing bodies of the crucified for burial (Petronius, Satyricon 111–12). The crucified were to be eaten by birds (Horace, Epistles 1.16.48). Yet Jewish sensibilities differed. They might agree that a criminal is not to be accorded honorable burial but confined to a common grave set aside for that purpose (m. Sanhedrin 6:5). Josephus insists that even those who had been crucified would be buried before sunset (War 4.317; Antiquities 5.44).<sup>25</sup> In addition to such literary evidence, one must consider the secondary burial of a crucified man found in a first century cemetery at Giv'at ha-Mivtar. Since Yehahanan's ossuary was placed next to that of Simon, builder of the temple, one must presume that his family was able to secure an honorable burial in this case.<sup>26</sup> Mark 6:29 assumes that John the Baptist's disciples retrieved his body for burial in a tomb.<sup>27</sup>

An historian who begins with the premise that a Roman prefect would not show consideration for the likes of Jesus or the two bandits crucified with him but would seek to make them an object lesson for the large crowds must judge the burial traditions fabricated. She or he must explain why and how the stories came into circulation. Another historian might even agree that the burial stories found in the gospels have been embellished in the retelling so that Jesus' burial appears that of an honored figure, not a criminal.<sup>28</sup> However, the antiquity of the kerygmatic affirmation, "he was buried", coupled with the possibility that Jewish religious sensibilities required a different practice, suggest

---

<sup>25</sup> Brown, Death, 1207–1211.

<sup>26</sup> Brown, Death, 1210. The much publicized ossuary inscribed as belonging to "James, the brother of Jesus" (see Richardson, Building, 309–324) would be further evidence for proper burial of a person executed for blasphemy by Jewish authorities (Josephus, Antiquities 20.199). However, the Israel Antiquity Authority considers its inscription to be a modern forgery.

<sup>27</sup> In drawing up a collection of parallels between the Baptist's execution and that of Jesus in Mark's Gospel, Joel Marcus (Mark 1–8, AB 27 [New York: Doubleday, 1999], 404) remarks, "Each...is ignominiously executed and buried (6:27–29; cf. 15:16–47)." He fails to note the difference between an "honorable" burial by disciples and Jesus' burial by a pious stranger. The other evangelists convert Joseph of Arimathea into an admirer or secret disciple of Jesus.

<sup>28</sup> John's Gospel introduces an additional Jewish teacher, Nicodemus, with enough spices for a royal embalming (John 19:39) and even endows Jesus with a new "garden tomb" removing any possible suspicion that Jesus might have been put in a place reserved for criminals.

an alternative. John 19:31 provides a motivation for the removal of all three bodies, viz. concern for the ritual purity of the city and its pilgrims during the up-coming feast. Religious authorities had secured an agreement with Pilate concerning all three.<sup>29</sup>

So far burial appears just as credible as exposure and non-burial. It also requires fewer explanatory hypotheses to fill out the “how that happened” with the type of account one finds in the gospel traditions. Of course, as Brown rightly observes, another set of historical judgments belong to the mix, those concerning Pilate’s character, attitude toward Jews in general, and his relationship to Jewish religious leaders in particular. Brown has argued that Pilate’s reputation as cruel, malicious and out to bait the Jewish populace is over-played.<sup>30</sup> Pilate would have had no difficulty complying with a request to honor Jewish religious sensibilities in this instance.

Given the possibility of constructing an historically plausible account for Jesus’ burial even though he died on a cross, the only reason to challenge the tradition on that point lies in its association with the resurrection. The gospel narratives hardly provide eye-witness or contemporary evidence. Matthew, Luke and John were composed at least a half-century after the events narrated. Mark, a decade earlier, knows that the Jerusalem in which his story is set has been ravaged by war.<sup>31</sup>

---

<sup>29</sup> Brown (Death, 1230) suggests that at a pre-gospel stage of the tradition Joseph represented the Jewish authorities in making the request that the bodies be disposed of prior to the Sabbath.

<sup>30</sup> Brown (Death, 693–705). Brown suggests that Pilate’s actions against a crowd of Samaritans headed for Mt. Gerizim where a prophet was promising to uncover Moses’ hidden vessels (Josephus, Antiquities 18.85–89), which resulted in Pilate’s removal from office, was instigated by Caiaphas, who lost the high priesthood at the same time (703–704).

<sup>31</sup> Mark 13:1–2, a dominical logion predicting the Temple’s destruction either had been or shortly would be dramatically fulfilled. For examples of similar predictions from Jewish sources see Craig A. Evans (Mark 8:27–16:20, WBC 34B [Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 2001], 296–297). Because Mark 13:2 employs biblical language to announce the destruction of the Temple (e.g., 2 Sam 17:13 LXX; Mic 3:12) and does not refer to Titus’ torching the city (Josephus, War 6.249–253), Evans concludes that this oracle was not an ex eventu prophecy composed by the evangelist just after the fall of the city but an authentic prophecy of Jesus (Mark, 298–299). Mark 13:3–13 depict the chaos of religious and social order in the aftermath of the Temple’s destruction (so Evans, Mark, 303–304). Those exegetes who tie Mark to the Christian community in Rome see in Mark 13:9–13 an allusion to the persecution under Nero (R. Pesch, Das Markusevangelium II, HTKNT 2 [1996], 288). Whether Mark was writing in Rome or in Syro-Palestine makes no difference to his audience’s awareness of the destruction of Jerusalem. The imperial triumph and subsequent celebration of the conquest on civic monuments in Rome would have kept these events in the public eye at Rome.

Brown concludes that the other gospels are dependent upon the same tradition which underlies Mark's burial account.<sup>32</sup> Similarly, Mark 16:1–8 represents a single narrative tradition underlying the various accounts of how some of Jesus' women followers discovered the body missing on the morning after the Sabbath.<sup>33</sup> An audience aware of the destruction in Jerusalem would know that such a tomb could no longer be found or visited.

Historical analysis suggests that the actual tomb employed by Joseph was neither new nor his own but a common tomb area either devoted to criminals or foreigners who died without resources for burial in Jerusalem.<sup>34</sup> The evangelists emphasize the distinctiveness of Jesus' tomb in order to assure listeners that the women were able to distinguish it from others.<sup>35</sup> Luke 24:12 reports that Peter checked the women's report about the condition of the tomb and was left puzzled.<sup>36</sup> John's gospel has developed this notice into an elaborate scene involving Peter and the Beloved Disciple (John 20:3–10). It too ends inconclusively despite the evangelist's need to affirm belief in the case of the Beloved Disciple in verse 8.

Those who prefer to see the tomb stories as narrative reflections on figures from ancient mythology or hero legends<sup>37</sup> in which the body

<sup>32</sup> Brown, Death, 1211.

<sup>33</sup> David Aune proposes an inversion of the tradition concerning Jesus' burial and resurrection in the symbolic story of the two unburied witnesses of Rev 11:8–11 (see David E. Aune, Revelation 6–16, WBC 52B [Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 1998], 617–622). Despite lying unburied in public view, the defiled corpses of the two martyrs are raised up after three days when God gives them the spirit of life. This scene provides an imaginative recreation of the moment of resurrection similar to Ezek 37:10 (the phrase "spirit of life" occurs in Ezek 37:5 LXX; Aune, Revelation 6–16, 623). A stunned crowd witnesses this resurrection, quite unlike the gospel narratives.

<sup>34</sup> Segal, Life, 445; Evans, Mark, 520. Tobit's piety consists in retrieving and burying bodies of fellow exiles that have been tossed out by their Assyrian captors (Tob 1:17–18).

<sup>35</sup> Brown, Death, 1206.

<sup>36</sup> Some manuscripts omit verse 12 so that the section concludes with the statement that the apostles did not believe what the women had told them (v. 11). Since the better manuscripts include verse 12, Fitzmyer agrees that it should be retained (Luke X–XIV, 1547). He understands the final phrase, "wondering about what had happened," as Luke's addition to traditional material (1548).

<sup>37</sup> For a detailed discussion of such traditions as the narrative background to Luke's retelling of the traditional resurrection stories in Luke 24, see Sjef van Tilborg and Patrick Chatelion Counet (Jesus' Appearances and Disappearances in Luke 24, Biblical Interpretation Series 45 [Leiden: Brill, 2000], 193–234). They suggest that a reader acculturated to such traditions would understand Luke-Acts to be the explanation of how a new hero cult focused on Jesus of Nazareth had come to be. Both his divine goes missing because it has been assumed into heaven,<sup>38</sup> must account for the narrative restraint of the gospel narratives.<sup>39</sup> Acknowledgment of the obvious explanation for a missing body, theft, in both John (20:2.15b) and Matthew (27:11–15) indicates an awareness that resurrection was not the most credible explanation for a missing corpse. Without revelatory events, whether visions of angelic messengers or encounters with Jesus himself, even Jesus' own disciples would not have made the connection.<sup>40</sup> Matthew remarks that in his day Jews believe a counter-story that Jesus' own disciples had stolen the body (28:13–15). His elaborate narrative of a tomb guarded by soldiers addresses such suspicions. However, as Brown points out, there is little evidence for an historical core in the account.<sup>41</sup> The Jewish counter-story was directed at an established part of the Christian kerygma, that the disappearance of his body confirms Jesus' resurrection. As Davies and Allison point out, opponents of Christianity could agree that Jesus was alive in the intermediate state typical of all the dead.<sup>42</sup> They might even consider it plausible that he communicated with his followers. Whether Jesus belonged among the righteous or the wicked at the final judgment might be up for debate. What would not be plausible from a non-Christian, Jewish perspective is the resurrection claim itself.<sup>43</sup> Adding such apocalyptic details to his narrative as the earth-

---

birth and resurrection as ascent to the heavens where he received divine status would be critical to such a legend (243–248). They point out that the apologetic value of such a depiction could cut both ways. Celsus used the similarities to insist that Christians should believe the stories of the pagan gods (205–207; C. Celsum 3.22–33).

<sup>38</sup> The most ubiquitous stories in the Greek-speaking world involved heroes who mounted to heaven and are resident there as astral constellations such as Hercules, Orion, Castor and Pollux, and Perseus (Segal, Life, 218–219). Bruce Malina and John Pilch (A Social-Science Commentary on the Book of Revelation [Louisville, KY: Westminster, 2000]) interpret all the heavenly symbolism of Rev against this astronomical background.

<sup>39</sup> As should be evident, those scholars who attempt to insert the second-century Gos. Peter traditions into a discussion of the first century are forced to argue against the developmental tendencies in the narratives. See Brown's analysis of the Gos. Peter material concerning the passion (Death, 1189–1191, 1232–1234, 1317–1349).

<sup>40</sup> So Wright, Resurrection, 628–629, 686–688; for a detailed treatment of Matthew's story about the guard posted at the tomb (Matt 28:2–4, 11–15) and the parallel in Gos. Peter (9:35–11:49) see Brown (Death, 1294–1313).

<sup>41</sup> Brown, Death, 1304, 1309–1313.

<sup>42</sup> E.g. 1 Enoch 22.9–10; 46:6; 4 Ezra 7.77–96; See Michael Stone (Fourth Ezra [Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990], 238–240).

<sup>43</sup> W.D. Davies and Dale C. Allison, The Gospel According to St. Matthew. III: Matthew XIX–XXVIII (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1997), 670–673. They agree with Brown that the guard story is not to be considered historical.

quake, the angel of the Lord coming down from heaven (Matt 28:2) and the emergence of other “righteous dead” from their tombs (Matt 27:52–53) allows Matthew to confirm the established conviction that resurrection is closely correlated with God’s coming in judgment.<sup>44</sup>

3. History, Hermeneutics and Visions

Once again the question of Jesus’ resurrection comes back to the witness list. Jesus appears to followers as well as to James, his brother, and some years later to Paul. The character of that experience persuades them all that God has indeed raised Jesus from among the dead. Jesus is now enthroned with God in heaven. To what extent are such claims amenable to historical inquiry? We lack first person descriptions from the witnesses themselves. Although Peter’s vision of the Lord was evidently the first by a male disciple and foundational for others, no first-century CE narrative exists.<sup>45</sup> Paul grounds his apostolic authority over the Corinthians by appeal to his vision of the Lord in 1 Cor 9:1, “Am I not an apostle? Have I not seen our Lord Jesus?”<sup>46</sup> Both Cephas and the “brothers of the Lord” are mentioned in verse 5. This rhetorical juxtaposition suggests that their visions of the Lord were not simply evidence for the kerygma. Under some circumstances such a vision

---

<sup>44</sup> Davies and Allison, Matthew XIX–XXVIII, 673: “When the Messiah enters into suffering and death and then is raised to new life amidst signs and wonders, he plays out in his own life the eschatological scenario. The end of Jesus is the end of the world in miniature.”

<sup>45</sup> The formula in 1 Cor 15:5a puts Cephas first in the list. Mark 16:7a has the angel send the women with a message for “his disciples and Peter”. Luke 24:34 has the assembled followers of Jesus greet the news of those on the Emmaus road with one of their own, “the Lord is risen and has appeared to Peter”: perhaps a bit of literary closure to the second unit in Luke 24. The first section concluded with Peter’s bewilderment upon confirming the women’s report. The evangelist does not explain where or when Peter gained his insight. Fitzmyer (Luke X–XXIV, 1541) suggests that Luke introduced Peter as subject into a tradition that “some of them” visiting the tomb (found in Luke 24:24).

<sup>46</sup> Anthony C. Thiselton (The First Epistle to the Corinthians, NIGNT [Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2000], 666–669) cautions against reading this statement as a simple claim to power to dictate the opinions and actions of others. For Paul, an apostle is called to live out the self-negating life of the crucified who is the subject of his preaching. He has been forced by the conflict over diverse apostles in Corinth to include evidence for his authority to make decisions in such practical matters as whether or under what circumstances a person may eat meat from an idol sacrifice (668–669).

might also authenticate particular forms of leadership among Christians.<sup>47</sup>

Most appearance narratives in the gospels incorporate some word of commissioning. Women at the tomb must take a message to Jesus' disciples (Mark 16:7; Matt 28:7, 10; John 20:17b).<sup>48</sup> The disciples or the remaining Eleven are instructed to spread the gospel (Matt 28:16–20; Luke 24:47–48; John 20:21–23). Or, in the case of John 21:15–19, Peter is to care for the flock which belongs to Jesus. The miraculous catch of John 20:1–14 may also symbolize the missionary spread of the gospel, though its symbolism is unclear.<sup>49</sup> Only the Emmaus story (Luke 24:13–33) and Jesus' second meal appearance to resolve Thomas' doubt (John 20:24–29) lack an element of other-directed commissioning. Yet each points forward to the time in which the risen Lord will no longer be available to his followers in a visionary mode. Though Thomas correctly confesses that Jesus is to be identified with the Father, the final beatitude is reserved for those who have believed without seeing (v. 29). The Emmaus story concludes by inviting readers to discern the risen Lord present in the communal meal celebration (vv. 28–31). Thus the appearance narratives supply the scenario which kerygmatic formulae such as 1 Cor 15:3–5 seem to require. Free-floating stories of <sup>47</sup> "Having seen the Lord" did not retain its place as a sine qua non for traveling apostles. Paul's conflict with the "false apostles" of 2 Cor 10–13 establishes Paul's authority in the Lord without such an appeal. Paul's activities build up the community in the sphere of work assigned by the Lord (2 Cor 10:8, 12–18; see Margaret Thrall, The Second Epistle to the Corinthians II: VIII–XIII [Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 2000], 623–625, 635, 645–647). His conformity to the cruciform pattern established by Christ's suffering far exceeds any claim that his opponents can put forward (2 Cor 11:22–33; Thrall, 722–723). When Paul does allude to his visionary experiences (2 Cor 12:1–6), he does not indicate their content and immediately counters with further evidence of apostolic suffering, a God-given check on the spiritual danger of such extraordinary revelations (2 Cor 12:7–10). Thrall (773) suggests that Paul alludes to his visions because the Corinthians have intimated that he was deficient in that crucial criterion of apostleship. However, 1 Cor 9:1 and 15:9–10 suggest that they may have acquired such expectations from Paul himself.

---

<sup>48</sup> Luke has recast the angels' words to the women to invoke another apologetic motif, the correspondence between what happened to Jesus and his own prior prediction of crucifixion at the hands of sinners and resurrection (24:6–7).

<sup>49</sup> If John 21:1–14 has been built on the framework of a variant to the miraculous catch in Luke 5:1–11, then its mission connotations are evident. If the unbroken net of verse 11 is read in the context of the schism which the Johannine epistles indicate had divided Johannine believers, then the story along with the Petrine commission might be read as a plea to heal that situation. Raymond Brown (The Gospel According to John XIII–XXI, AB 29A [New York: Doubleday, 1970], 1087) thinks that the fishing story may have preserved elements of the missing account of Jesus' first appearance to Peter.

the women at the tomb, of Jesus' appearance at a meal, or his sudden manifestation in divine glory in a familiar gathering place probably served as the basis for the written versions found in the gospels.

All suggestions about the pre-gospel accounts of disciples encountering the risen Jesus remain highly speculative. The gospel accounts taken as a group pose a number of difficulties that defy harmonization. Once the control of Mark's master-narrative is left behind, each evangelist created his own geographical and chronological setting. When and where did Jesus begin appearing? To women near the tomb on Easter morning, so Matt 28:9–10 and John 20:11–18. To various disciples toward the evening as in Emmaus (Luke 24:13–33) as well as somewhere to Peter (Luke 24:34, not recounted) as well as to the group assembled for the evening meal (Luke 24:36–49). Or only to the disciples gathered behind closed and locked doors, first on Easter and then a week later (so John 20:19–29). Or did Jesus' male disciples only begin to have visions of the risen Lord at some indefinite time after returning to Galilee from the Passover feast as Mark 16:7, Matt 28:16–28 and John 21:1–14 would have us conclude? The editor of John 21 has patched in his Galilean traditions with verses 1 and 14 but did not resolve the conflict between this return to fishing and Jesus' commission in the prior story.<sup>50</sup>

Luke presumes that Jesus' disciples never returned to Galilee. He attributes their continuous presence in Jerusalem from Passover to the subsequent feast of Pentecost to an explicit command of the risen Lord (Luke 24:49) which they promptly obey (vv. 52b–53). This focus fits Luke's emphasis on Jerusalem as the focal point for Jesus' life and death and the point from which the gospel will radiate until Paul arrives in Rome at the conclusion to Acts.<sup>51</sup> Paul indicates that a church centered in Jerusalem and its environs with Peter as its central figure existed within a year or so of Jesus' death (Gal 1:13–20). We have no information about how this group of Galileans came to relocate in Jerusalem or its vicinity. That a prophetic word or revelation of the Lord might have been responsible is coherent with general appeals to prophecy and dreams in antiquity.<sup>52</sup> However, Luke's conclusion that they remained in the city encountering the risen Lord for forty days until his definitive ascension into heaven (Acts 1:3–11) and then remained gathered as a model community waiting for the Spirit at Pentecost seems to be based on nothing more secure than his own fitting together of scattered traditions.<sup>53</sup>

<sup>50</sup> See Brown, John XIII–XXI, 1091.

<sup>51</sup> Fitzmyer, Luke X–XXIV, 1580–1582.

<sup>52</sup> Matthew employs the genre of dream instructions to move characters around in his infancy narrative. Immediate compliance with such divine direction serves as an indication of Joseph's righteousness (Matt 1:18–25; 2:13–15, 19–23) and the Magi's wisdom in interpreting divine signs (Matt 2:12).

The Galilean appearance traditions appear too well established in diverse traditions to be dismissed. John's account of Jesus' appearance to answer Thomas a week after Easter (John 20:26) plausibly assumes that the disciples remained in Jerusalem through the duration of the Passover festival. They would have returned to Galilee with other pilgrims from the region and remained there until Pentecost. What transpired? John 21:2–3 presumes that they had returned to the occupations that they had before becoming Jesus' disciples. Perhaps some further experiences in Jerusalem at Pentecost led Peter and others to relocate there. We have no clues. Nor do we have any that would indicate how long a period is covered by the visions of 1 Cor 15:4–8. Each appearance narrative is presented as though its recipients executed the commission given immediately afterwards. Only the abruptly truncated ending to Mark's gospel in which the frightened women flee without telling anyone breaks the pattern (Mark 16:8a)—and they have not seen the Lord, only an angel. Ancient scribes familiar with the appearance story genre soon provided Mark with what was felt to be a more suitable ending.<sup>54</sup>

Perhaps the short ending of Mark echoes an historical fact that even the revelations and appearances central to the kerygma initially were the source of further confusion. It may have taken weeks or even months before Jesus' disciples regrouped and began preaching. Only the foreshortened narrative style employed by the evangelists gives one the sense that one or two appearances on Easter enabled Jesus' disciples to grasp what was going on. Or more precisely, to consolidate the conceptual and linguistic expression for their unexpected experiences of Jesus alive in divine glory as resurrection. Both Luke and John hint at such a process of reformulation and new understanding. Luke embeds in each of his three scenes instructions to remember Jesus' words to interpret

---

<sup>53</sup> Whether Luke intends a deliberate counter to the Galilean traditions or is reflecting an independent tradition which held that it was wrong to leave Jerusalem cannot be determined (see C.K. Barrett, The Acts of the Apostles I: Acts I–XIV [Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1994], 72–73). The place list in Acts 1:8 stops at Samaria, omitting Galilee entirely even though verse 11 refers to the Eleven as Galileans (Barrett, 80, 83). The simplest solution is to assume that the traditions which Luke has to hand in composing his second volume do not contain any indications of a Galilean mission despite the double missionary dispatch referred to in Luke's Gospel (Luke 9:1–6, from Mark 6:7–13; Luke 10:1–12, the sending out of the 70/72, from Luke's special material).

<sup>54</sup> See Evans, Mark, 540–551.

Scripture as referring to him (Luke 24:6b–8, 25–26, 44–47). John situates the emergence of new understanding in the indefinite period after Jesus' departure when the Paraclete will come in his stead (John 14:25–26; 16:12–14).<sup>55</sup>

One must resist the impact of both the narrative structure of the gospels and the annual liturgical cycle on the imagination. Easter visions of the Lord were not immediately self-interpreting or the solution to the bafflement, fear and confusion of Jesus' disciples. One must even admit that the scraps of geographical data attached to appearance stories could be independent of the narrative chronology established by the evangelists. The formula in 1 Cor 15:3–5 links "on the third day" to "was raised", not to the timing of the various visions listed. If "was buried" codes for a more extensive tomb tradition, the "third day" might refer only to the discovery that Jesus' body was gone or to the women's visions. Both establish a "when" for Jesus' resurrection. Mark 16:7, Matt 28:16–17 and possibly the tradition underlying John 21:1–14 all suggest that appearances began in Galilee. If one allows for completion of the Passover period and travel time back to Galilee, Peter and the remaining members of Jesus' inner circle of male disciples may not have "seen the Lord" until almost two weeks after his death.

---

<sup>55</sup> Paul's brief reference to his own experience includes an immediate withdrawal into Arabia (Gal 1:17). Though the rhetorical function of the biographical narrative is to underline Paul's independence from the Jerusalem apostles (Martyn, Galatians, 169–70), his initial move may not have been to evangelize non-Jews, i.e., to fulfill his divine commission as apostle. On the basis of his furtive exit from Damascus (2 Cor 11:32–33), Martyn hypothesizes that Paul commenced preaching activities which Nabatean authorities found to be socially disruptive (170; similarly, Jerome Murphy-O'Connor, Paul. A Critical Life [Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1996], 81–85). Stories of divine calling often emphasize the immediacy with which persons respond as in the case of those whom Jesus summons to be his disciples (e.g., Mark 1:14–20; 2:13–14). Since Paul must counter opponents' claims that he has diverged from the authority of the Jerusalem apostles to whom he owes his apostleship, he intends his audience to infer that his gospel and calling were like that of the Hebrew prophets, directly from God (v. 15 echoes Jer 1:5 and Isa 49:1–6). However the rhetorical necessity of a conflict over evangelizing non-Jews some fifteen or more years later may not provide the most accurate picture of what happened at the time. As other scholars have suggested, Paul's initial withdrawal from Jerusalem (and Damascus) may have been for more prosaic reasons. He wished to steer clear of his former associates and Jewish religious authorities as much as the leaders of the group he had been persecuting. He also required time to sort out this experience of the Lord (see Richard N. Longenecker, Galatians, WBC 41 [Dallas: Word, 1990], 30).

4. Forging a Lexicon

As we have suggested, the initial experiences of the risen Jesus did not carry the well-formed story line that we find in gospel narratives a half century on. Paul's own remarks about his experience oscillate between what might be construed as "inner" vision of Jesus enthroned with God (Gal 1:16; 2 Cor 12:1–5) and external seeing of Jesus embodied as risen (1 Cor 9:1; 15:8).<sup>56</sup> One must be careful not to import our modern perceptions of the cosmos into ancient texts. Alan Segal rightly insists that since the heavens were endowed with a kind of body, there was no incongruity in presenting appearances of Jesus that are not confined by the laws of physics:

The ancient world had fewer presuppositions about physical possibilities in nature, especially when the point of the story was that God's handiwork was being made miraculously manifest... We understand that Jesus could be physically present if certain counterfactual, science fiction claims are accepted. The writers of the Gospel simply had different counterfactual assumptions about the physical world. They wanted to stress the miracle that Jesus was a real body who miraculously appeared in a locked room.<sup>57</sup>

Acknowledging the difference between what counts as "physical world" in ancient and modern perspective does not resolve the historian's dilemma. The question "what happened" is not adequately answered by simply reporting what the fictive time-traveler might learn from participants. Contemporary theologians continue to argue over what sort of event the resurrection of Jesus is: (1) an event in the psychological and social experience of Jesus' followers; (2) an historical event like any other with the proviso that God's power is active in human affairs; or (3) an "eschatological" event which involves a theological claim about God's intention for the world and creation itself.<sup>58</sup>

---

<sup>56</sup> One should not press the distinction between the two forms of expression, as Betz rightly points out (H.D. Betz, Galatians [Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979], 71).

<sup>57</sup> Segal, Life, 457.

<sup>58</sup> See George Hunsinger, "The daybreak of the new creation: Christ's resurrection in recent theology," Scottish Journal of Theology 57 (2004): 163–181.

We cannot enter into this theological problematic here. Without a theological hermeneutic, historical reconstruction cannot discern the transcendent. Since ancient understandings of the historical process often assumed that divine causality is necessary to discovering the truth of human events, one cannot simply translate first-century judgments concerning reality into modern discourse.<sup>59</sup> Alan Segal points out that much contemporary thinking on these issues lacks sensitivity to two central phenomena: (1) social movements in which religion, not politics or economics, constitutes the language;<sup>60</sup> (2) religiously interpreted states of consciousness.<sup>61</sup> Individuals learn the language and even contents appropriate to such states:

Combined with that experience is whatever content is available in the culture for explaining such intense, mystical experiences. If the adept has been studying the texts of previous journeys in a specific mystic, apocalyptic, or shamanic tradition, chances are that the content of the experience will confirm the tradition.<sup>62</sup>

All levels of the tradition refer to non-ordinary elements in experiences of the risen Jesus. Religious interpretation is key to making sense of the events in question.

Elements of confusion and uncertainty such as Paul's confrontation with Corinthian skepticism in 1 Cor 15, the women fleeing in Mark 16:8, or the Thomas episode in John 20:24–29 suggest problems with the lexicon. Jewish apocalyptic texts in which we find much of the resurrection imagery contemporary with the New Testament may have been penned for circles of adepts who cultivated such religious experiences.<sup>63</sup> Paul presents himself as such a visionary in 2 Cor 12:1–5.<sup>64</sup> Segal points out that while Paul shares with his Jewish contemporaries an uncertainty about whether or not the heavenly journey involves a bodily translation of the seer into the heavens, modern sci-

---

<sup>59</sup> See Hunsinger's trenchant criticism of N.T. Wright for ignoring the hermeneutical problematic involved in his claims about reality ("Daybreak," 170–171).

<sup>60</sup> See Segal (Life, 314–315) on oppression, deprivation and the danger of disconfirming religious views as the factors which produce martyrdom.

<sup>61</sup> Ibid., 323–333. Segal acknowledges modern research on the neurological basis for such states as mystic union with the divine, near death experiences or heavenly ascent (333–336).

<sup>62</sup> Ibid., 335.

<sup>63</sup> Segal (Life, 333–336) proposes that the seers who produced Dan 7–12, 1 Enoch or 4 Ezra carried their Scriptural study of texts such as Ezekiel into the experience of dream visions.

<sup>64</sup> Thrall, II Corinthians: VIII–XIII, 775–797; Segal, Life, 407–421.

ence compels us to describe what occurred as a vision or trance.<sup>65</sup> Whether Paul's visions were all subsequent to his initial vision of Jesus as Lord or had been part of his earlier Jewish training we cannot say. Segal thinks that Paul was already involved in Jewish mystical practices prior to his conversion.<sup>66</sup>

The lexicon of meanings which Paul associates with resurrection derive from Dan 12:1–3 and the vision of a human figure ascending to God's throne in Dan 7:13–14. As a consequence of his vision of the risen Lord, Paul recognizes that God's apocalyptic plan of salvation is in process. He reaffirms the scenario with Jesus as agent of judgment (e.g., 1 Thess 1:10; 4:13–18). Believers will be transformed into the likeness of the risen Jesus, the spiritual Adam, when they are raised on the last day (1 Cor 15:20–55). Paul assumes, as do other Jewish sources, that risen persons are transformed bodies.<sup>67</sup> He does not operate with the concept of a separable soul to which personal and spiritual identity is attached.<sup>68</sup> As a consequence of his willingness to suffer in his bodily afflictions the death of Jesus (2 Cor 4:8–10), Paul also anticipates the reward of the martyred few, "who lead many to knowledge" in Dan 12:2–3, viz. transformation into angelic glory.<sup>69</sup>

Paul's letters show him to be a sophisticated and eloquent user of the apocalyptic lexicon which associates suffering, divine judgment, resurrection, and transformation of God's righteous ones into heavenly glory. The piece of the traditional lexicon which appears to be of no interest to Paul involves the intermediate state of the dead and the

---

<sup>65</sup> "The question of whether a heavenly journey could take place in or out of the body may be settled for us by assuming that this was an ecstatic journey... When a heavenly journey is described literally, the cause may be literary convention or the belief of the voyager; but when reconstructing the actual experience, only one type can pass modern standards of credibility" (Segal, Life, 411).

<sup>66</sup> Ibid., 410.

<sup>67</sup> Bodies are summoned from the earth in which they sleep (4 Ezra 7.32–34; 1 Enoch 51.15–16; 103.3; 108.11–15; 2 Bar 42.8). See Richard Bauckham, The Fate of the Dead. Studies on Jewish and Christian Apocalypses, SuppNovT XLIII (Leiden: Brill, 1998), 269–288. Bauckham points to the close link between 1 Cor 15:35, "How do the dead rise? With what sort of body do they come?" and the two-step scenario of 2 Bar 50:2 where the dead first rise in the form they had when alive so that they can be recognized. Then the righteous are transformed in glory (283).

<sup>68</sup> Wright, Resurrection, 230.

<sup>69</sup> Segal, Life, 412.

punishment to be meted out to the wicked.<sup>70</sup> He takes it for granted that such persons, including those who persecute Christians, will suffer divine punishment (e.g., 1 Thess 2:14–16; Rom 12:18–21). The questions Paul confronts in 1 Thess 4:13–18 and 1 Cor 15 suggest that Paul’s language was not always intelligible to his audience. They did not possess the metaphorical or conceptual framework to associate the fate of the Christian dead with the glory of the risen Lord.

Stripped of its links to divine judgment, final defeat of evil, transformation of the righteous into the divine image (or glory) and new creation, the semantic range of resurrection is considerably reduced. Paul’s Gentile converts may have heard “God raised Jesus” in the kerugma as equivalent to the apothēōsis of a semi-divine hero figure. Segal poses a similar question about the resurrection narratives in the gospels. In part, their fixation on the empty tomb and the physicality of Jesus’ resurrection is a narrative requirement.<sup>71</sup> But in the process of externalizing the story of Jesus, the gospels lose Paul’s emphasis on a visionary, transforming experience of God’s presence in Christ. Those who wrote and used the gospels a quarter century after Paul had a completely different understanding. Segal comments:

For him [Paul], Jesus’ resurrected body was a spiritual body (soma pneumatikon). But for the evangelists, Jesus’ resurrected body was a literal, physical body revived. This exactly correlates with the approach of apostolic succession, which is not based on visions of Christ... so much as personal testimony of those most trustworthy men who had witnessed the events of Jesus’ life.<sup>72</sup>

Segal heightens the gulf between the gospels and the Pauline tradition by adopting two positions which our analysis has dismissed: (1) that Paul either did not know or “did not like” the empty tomb tradition;<sup>73</sup> (2) that there is no middle ground which unites Paul’s “spiritual body” language and the mysterious bodily appearances of Jesus.<sup>74</sup>

---

<sup>70</sup> Puech (La Croyance I, 314) observes that Paul focuses on conforming his life to the suffering of Christ as a condition of participating in Christ’s resurrection and urges believers to do the same (e.g., Phil 3:11–4:1). He is not interested in what happens to the wicked.

<sup>71</sup> Segal, Life, 444.

<sup>72</sup> Ibid., 442.

<sup>73</sup> Ibid., 446.

<sup>74</sup> Ibid., 451, 461.

Does Paul's visionary language provide our only historical template for the earliest Christian affirmations, as Segal concludes? The key, he suggests, lies in the early Christian identification of Jesus with the heavenly figure "like a Son of Man" in Dan 7:13–14.<sup>75</sup> Resurrection as exaltation to God's throne combined with this text enabled the earliest believers to perceive Jesus as God's messiah despite the crucifixion. Son of Man sayings attributed to Jesus himself appear in three contexts: (1) to affirm divine backing for actions challenged as offensive to God (e.g., Mark 2:10, 28); (2) in predictions of his impending death and resurrection (Mark 8:31; 9:31; 10:33–34), and (3) in sayings that refer to future judgment (Mark 8:38; 13:26). Jesus quotes a composite of Dan 7:13 and Ps 110:1 in response to the High Priest's question about his messianic identity in Mark 14:62. Although the topic continues to be hotly debated, some scholars hold that Jesus himself used allusions to Dan 7:13–14 in anticipation of divine vindication for his own ministry.<sup>76</sup> He presumed that the coming Son of Man would be an angelic being, not himself. After the resurrection Christians identified Jesus as this heavenly Son of Man as the visions of Rev 1:7 and 1:18 demonstrate.<sup>77</sup>

If Jesus' own preaching and enactment of God's reign breaking into human experience was grounded in the imagery of an apocalyptic defeat of evil and renewal of creation, as I would argue it was,<sup>78</sup> then resurrection as vindication of God's righteous probably belonged to his lexicon. However, Dan 12:2–3 does not figure in the tradition of Jesus' sayings.<sup>79</sup> The resurrection/vindication assumed in the logion

---

<sup>75</sup> Segal, Life, 448. Segal admits that Paul never uses the expression, a linguistic divergence which he attributes to Paul's grammatical sophistication. He knew that the Greek phrase is nonsensical as a rendering of the Aramaic (426). Segal seeks to demonstrate that Paul was familiar with a Christological use of the Dan 7:13–14 text by arguing that the following passages are dependent upon it: Gal 2:20, a paraphrase that substitutes "Son of God" for the logion in Mark 10:45; in 1 Cor 15:25–28 where v. 27 echoes Ps 8:6, Segal argues that subjection of all things to the rule of Christ until the Son turns all things over to God depends upon Daniel.

<sup>76</sup> See the extensive treatment by Adela Collins in John J. Collins, Daniel (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993) 90–105.

<sup>77</sup> A. Collins in Daniel, 105.

<sup>78</sup> See John P. Meier, A Marginal Jew. Rethinking the Historical Jesus, 2: Mentor, Message, and Miracles (New York: Doubleday, 1994), 291–397.

<sup>79</sup> Almost all echoes of Dan 12 are found in Rev, so A. Collins (Daniel, 110–111). Collins reintroduces the influence of the text by asserting that it somehow underlies the centrality of resurrection in the New Testament (112). However, the centrality of resurrection is more likely a reflection of the kerygma concerning Jesus' death and resurrection.

urging indifference to those who can only kill the body (Matt 10:28–31//Luke 12:4–7) could take the form of the martyr's confidence in 2 Macc 7:9–29.<sup>80</sup> God's creative power is sufficient to endow the faithful martyrs with a new gift of bodily life. Van Henten observes that eschatological reward does not figure as a motive for martyrdom. The martyrs exhibit absolute loyalty to God, strict adherence to Torah, and the intent to serve as a model for others by enduring a gruesome death rather than capitulate.<sup>81</sup> Similarly, Jesus may have had little to say on the eschatological rewards question as he sought to establish new understandings of what single-hearted fidelity to God's rule entailed.

We would suggest that Jesus' followers probably had a much less sophisticated lexicon of apocalyptic hopes than those schooled in such visionary traditions. Jesus' own use of an image from Dan 7:13–14 indicates an audience familiar with judgment scenes that involved angelic figures. Scholars who have studied epitaphs from first century Galilee and Judea conclude that there was a vaguely defined belief in the afterlife.<sup>82</sup> It included resurrection, judgment and reward for the just. When Jesus' sayings mention "treasure in heaven" (e.g., Matt 6:19–21//Luke 12:33–34; Mark 10:21), he draws on common conceptions of reward and punishment.<sup>83</sup> For such an audience, resurrection imagined as emptying the tombs or giving life to those who sleep in the earth is a more normal mode of thought than a visionary journey toward the divine. When Jesus promises his followers that they will drink wine together in the Kingdom (Mark 14:25), they would anticipate a banquet with the messiah. The location of this banquet was indeterminate. For many, resurrection and new creation suggested an earthly fellowship between the messiah and the righteous.<sup>84</sup> Nothing in

<sup>80</sup> Wright, Resurrection, 431.

<sup>81</sup> Jan Willem van Henten, The Maccabees as Saviors of the Jewish Race. A Study of 2 and 4 Maccabees, SupJSJ 57 (Leiden: Brill, 1997), 125.

<sup>82</sup> Jon Davies, Death, Burial and Rebirth in the Religions of Antiquity (London: Routledge, 1999), 111; Puech, La Croissance I, 190.

<sup>83</sup> One finds speculative accounts of the "treasuries" in which souls are sorted prior to the final judgment in apocalyptic traditions (e.g., 1 Enoch 22.9–10; 4 Ezra 7.77–96). Michael Stone (Fourth Ezra [Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990], 238) notes that the elaborate description of the intermediate fate of souls in 4 Ezra is unique in ancient Jewish literature. Puech (La Croissance I, 321) sees these developments as an unwillingness to leave the wicked and righteous in the same state prior to judgment. Consequently, the judgment appears to make punishments or blessings already in effect permanent.

<sup>84</sup> As in 4 Ezra 7.28–29. Richard Bauckham (Revelation, 49) understands the language of new creation in Revelation to refer to the renewal of this creation, not its replacement.

this relatively simple lexicon provides for the irruption of a single resurrected person into the time line prior to the end-time.<sup>85</sup> The only mode by which a human person might enter God's presence would have required a bodily assumption into heaven as in the case of Elijah. The brute facts of Jesus' death and burial ruled that possibility out. The crowd is said to have confronted Jesus with that image at the cross (Mark 15:36//Matt 27:49).<sup>86</sup> On the assumption that these elements are a good approximation of the conceptual repertoire that Jesus' disciples brought to the events in question, they are unlikely to interpret their experiences of the risen Lord in the same way that Paul does.

5. Conclusion

Religiously interpreted experiences are inextricably entwined with the cultural vocabulary available to participants. As we have seen, our sources do not permit a clear reconstruction of the events that underlie the later narratives. Some scholars insist that the only "real event(s)" were visions like Paul's. Jesus is not among the dead awaiting the coming eschatological judge. He is enthroned at God's right hand and will return as judge from there (as in Acts 3:13–21). No one was concerned about the tomb or the bodily reality of Jesus. The powerful visionary experiences now replicated in the case of numbers of other believers are sufficient to persuade. A half century later, there are no living witnesses. Those who must believe without seeing (John 20:29) require the kind of narrative that will show the truth of the message Christians preach, as Luke says of his gospel (Luke 1:1–4). The accounts of the empty tomb, the revealing angel, and Jesus' encounters with various followers serve that purpose.

As we have suggested, scholars who insist that the disciples used resurrection to refer to visions of the exalted Jesus have to explain why the narratives concerning the tomb and resurrection appearances have the shape they do. How did the incoherent jumble of locations and times come into existence? They were circulating independently prior to being set down in the gospels. Therefore we prefer to imagine a somewhat different sequence of events behind these traditions. Although crucifixion victims were left to rot elsewhere under Roman rule, Jewish piety and ritual sensibilities changed the rules of the game in Jerusalem. The priestly religious officials implicated in turning Jesus over to Roman execution may have requested that executions cease and the corpses be disposed of prior to the feast. Since burial of victims in a tomb provided for criminals was customary, the women disciples had reason to wait and see what would happen. Joseph acted out of Jewish piety and used a common tomb. The original burial is rapid and minimal, designed to meet ritual requirements, not to honor the deceased.

---

<sup>85</sup> Wright, Resurrection, 205.

<sup>86</sup> See Brown, Death, 1062–1063.

After the Sabbath, the women returned to find the tomb empty. They may have had a vision of an angel or even Jesus. Or they may have fled in fear because they assumed that robbers had broken in and stolen the corpse. Whether or not they brought male disciples back to check is insignificant. Insignificant Galileans are in no position to press inquiries into the whereabouts of their leader, executed as a criminal by Rome and condemned as a blasphemer by religious authorities. Because the tomb in question did not belong to Jesus alone, or even to a disciple, it could not be a focus of veneration. Nor could those hostile to the Christians disprove the claim that Jesus was raised by pointing to a tomb with a corpse in it. Even if the women, Peter and some others began having visions of Jesus on the same day, they might not have used the term “resurrection”, since the end of the world had not come. The rest of the world including the Temple and its rituals were going on as usual.

Once the Passover was over they all returned to Galilee and to the lives that had been interrupted by Jesus a year or so earlier. Perhaps they lived with a heightened eschatological expectation. They may even have anticipated that Jesus had been caught up to heaven and was about to return as the mysterious Son of Man about which he had spoken.<sup>87</sup> Visions continued and Jesus’ disciples picked up the habits of preaching (and perhaps healing) that they had learned from Jesus during his life. As they tried to explain what had happened to Jesus, the convergence of their vivid visionary experiences of Jesus and the missing body led the disciples to speak of Jesus having been raised. We do not know how long the appearances of the Lord lasted. If the male disciples did not see the Lord until they had returned to Galilee, then the Jerusalem traditions either occurred later, around Pentecost (?), or were relocated there. John's Gospel shifts back and forth between Galilee and Judea. Luke's has a focus on Jerusalem as the center from which salvation is to radiate out. Within a year or two Jesus' disciples have left Galilee to preach the crucified and risen Jesus as God's messiah in Jerusalem.

---

<sup>87</sup> Though the word to the disciples that Jesus would see them again in Galilee found in Mark 14:28 and 16:7 apparently refers to the earlier resurrection predictions in Mark’s Gospel, the saying may have originated as a parousia saying.

FAMILY, FRIENDS, AND FOES

JOEL B. GREEN

1. Introduction

The particulars of Jesus' ministry are worked out in the context of his relationships with others: his family of origin, those whom he called as disciples, the crowds of nameless persons, the sick, those who monitor his behavior, and many more. Moreover, that we know anything at all of Jesus is due to the persons with whom he interacted, those whom he gathered to himself and those who were attracted to him, whether for good or ill. Who were these people?

Even to raise the question is to become immediately entangled in a briar patch of prickly problems of method. The notion of "family," for example, is a culture-conditioned one. From the perspective of the twenty-first century West, we might think in terms of "the nuclear family," a description which itself is susceptible to varying definitions. In the Roman world, "family" might refer to blood relations and relations by marriage, as well as to extended kin relations inclusive of persons unrelated by the traditional ties of blood or marriage. Israel, too, was the home of households defined by blood and marriage, together with others who lived within the household boundaries for protection and contributed to its livelihood.<sup>1</sup> With an eye to issues of composition and function, Santiago Guijarro sketches a typology of four types of "families" in the area of Jesus' home base, first-century Galilee: large families, multiple families, nucleated families, and scattered families.<sup>2</sup> According to the synoptic gospels, however, Jesus operates with his own definitions: "Who is my mother, and who are my brothers? And pointing to his disciples, he said, ‘Here are my mother and my brothers! For whoever does the will of my Father in heaven is my brother and sister and mother’” (Matt 12:48–50). What might it mean, then, for us to pursue an interest in Jesus’ “family”?

---

<sup>1</sup> See Beryl Rawson, ed., The Family in Ancient Rome: New Perspectives (Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1986); Leo G. Perdue et al., Families in Ancient Israel, The Family, Religion, and Culture (Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox, 1997); Carolyn Osiek and David L. Balch, Families in the New Testament World: Households and House Churches, The Family, Religion, and Culture (Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox, 1997).

<sup>2</sup> Santiago Guijarro, "The Family in First-Century Galilee," in Constructing Early Christian Families: Family as Social Reality and Metaphor, ed. Halvor Moxnes (London: Routledge, 1997), 42–65.

To speak of “friends” is to enter a similar minefield. The notion of “friend,” lexicalized by the word φίλος (philos, “friend”), has an esteemed history in the ancient worlds of Greece and Rome, and is important for our understanding of kinship, status, and economic relations.<sup>3</sup> Among the gospels, however, φίλος is relatively rare, appearing only once in Matthew, 15 times in Luke, and six times in John; and even more rarely of Jesus as “friend” or as having “friends” (Matt 11:19; Luke 7:34; 12:4; John 11:11; 15:13–15). Clearly, attention to this term will not carry us very far in our investigation of Jesus’ social relationships.

A third dilemma focuses on the difficulty of identifying Jesus’ foes. My concern here is the ease with which we stereotype those who opposed Jesus’ mission, failing to notice that in some instances their concerns overlapped with Jesus’ own, to account for nuanced and sometimes even shifting loyalties among those with whom Jesus’ held social relationships, and generally to appreciate the depth and texture of the characters with whom Jesus interacts in the context of his ministry. Our unfortunate tendency is sometimes to transform these flesh-and-blood persons and diverse people-groups into cardboard personages, with the result that we demonize the Pharisees, for example, while at the same time valorizing those comprising Jesus’ inner circle. In doing so, it is true, we are helped along by the gospel writers themselves, whose portraits, while more nuanced than we sometimes allow, more often than not are somewhat one-sided and mono-dimensional in their presentations of persons and groups. The untrained eye might therefore overlook, for example, the significant camaraderie that must have existed between Jesus and the Pharisees in order for him to have been found so often in their homes and at their tables. The significance of sharing a meal at table, after all, included but extended beyond the satiation of hunger as a ritual of companionship, and Pharisees in particular committed themselves to maintaining ritual purity in their households and among their eating companions. To those Pharisees whose invitation lists included this itinerant from Nazareth (cf. Luke 7:36; 14:1), Jesus must have seemed, however temporarily, a person of “clean hands” (see Mark 7:3–4; Luke 11:37–38). By way of analogy, is it not significant that in the Acts of the Apostles, the leading witness of the resurrection, Paul, is simultaneously a Pharisee and a follower of Jesus, and Pharisees share with Jesus’ followers “the hope of the resurrection,” even if it is also true that even those Pharisees who are believers prove capable of misconstruing the gospel (e.g., Acts 23:6–8; 15:1–12)?

---

<sup>3</sup> Cf., e.g., David Konstan, Friendship in the Classical World (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997); John T. Fitzgerald, ed., Greco-Roman Perspectives on Friendship, SBLRBS 34 (Atlanta: Scholars, 1997).

Nor can we overlook that even Jesus’ closest followers demonstrate a capacity to misunderstand the character of his mission and, however unwittingly, to oppose him (e.g., Mark 8:33). In the end, his disciples betray (Judas), deny (Peter), and desert him. Are Jesus’ followers friends or foes? The line between these two categories is porous and meanders.

We face problems of category, then, in our investigation of Jesus’ social relationships. We face a prickly problem of another sort as well—namely, a question of sources. Because we are interested in the historical Jesus and not simply how, say, the Gospel of Matthew, portrays Jesus’ parents or the Herodians, the problem of sources entangles us in three ways: first, the paucity of sources for some persons of concern; second, the inherently perspectival character of all of our sources;<sup>4</sup> and, third, the simple reality that, in those instances where we have the benefit of multiple sources, we sometimes have also the blight of conflicting accounts. Our hope is not in our finding or generating an unbiased study of the persons in question, as though we could determine and present “who they really were.” Indeed, our interest in their relationships with Jesus already biases our approach, limiting the scope of our investigation and pressing us toward character sketches that make sense of what we know of Jesus’ mission and influence.

My sketch of these methodological issues serves not to deter us from our agenda but as an important warning about the nature of our work. We must be open to nuance, aware of the broad strokes with which we are necessarily able to paint, and attentive to the fluidity of our categories.

---

<sup>4</sup> Since this statement is widely accepted, it is unclear why reconstructions of historical personages often accord privilege to non-biblical sources—as in the case of Helen K. Bond, Pontius Pilate in History and Interpretation, SNTSMS 100 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998); idem, Caiaphas: Friend of Rome and Judge of Jesus? (Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox, 2004). Is it any less true of Josephus or Philo when compared to Mark or Luke that such persons function in their accounts as “literary figures” serving the author’s political (and other) interests?

2. Jesus and His Family

Perhaps on account of the relative paucity of information on the subject in our sources, speculation regarding the relatives of Jesus has proliferated through the centuries. The near-silence of the New Testament gospels regarding Jesus' childhood apparently served as an open invitation to fill in the gaps with material otherwise more at home in mythology surrounding the children of the gods.<sup>5</sup> In the case of Jesus' siblings, scholarly and ecclesial interest is sometimes aroused due to theological concerns grounded in claims of Mary's perpetual virginity (so that the brothers and sisters mentioned, e.g., in Mark 3:31–35; 6:3, would have been Joseph's children by a previous marriage [Prot. Jas. 9.2] or cousins, rather than blood relatives). The general lack of attention given to Jesus' household of origin in the gospels is not so much a void waiting to be filled, however, as it is itself worthy of consideration. We cannot explain away the void of information regarding Jesus' family and early home life with an appeal to the ancient conventions of genre. It is true that biographical writing in the Greco-Roman world was not guided by modern interests in developmental psychology, and hence placed little emphasis on childhood, focusing instead on the public "life" (bios) of the individual in question. As the second-century Infancy Gospel of Thomas illustrates with its portrait of Jesus as a rather impish child, precocious in interactions with his teachers, and endowed with extraordinary powers, however, Roman sensibilities did not as a matter of course preclude all literary interest in youth. Instead, one of the assumptions of great persons in antiquity was that they possessed in childhood the qualities of greatness for which they were known as adults, and this assumption could be demonstrated in narrative accounts. What is more, between them, our New Testament sources do bring to light certain considerations worthy of attention—Jesus' lineage, for example, the remarkable circumstances surrounding his birth to Mary and Joseph, his kinship with John the Baptist, and his presentation at the temple at age 12. Less noticeable but all the more remarkable, then, is the rhetorical consequence of so little narrative attention to Jesus' childhood and youth. To a startling degree, he is a person without a home.

---

<sup>5</sup> See Oscar Cullmann, "Infancy Gospels," in New Testament Apocrypha, Edgar Hennecke; ed. Wilhelm Schneemelcher, 2 vols. (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1963), 1:363–417.

2.1. Jesus, Son of David

Jesus' identity within the ancestral family of David is secure in the New Testament. He is of the lineage of David (Matt 1:1–17; Luke 3:23–38); born in Bethlehem, “the city of David” (Luke 2:4, 11); born into the household of or adopted by Joseph, “of the house and lineage of David” (Matt 1:20–25; Luke 2:4); is heir to the Davidic dynasty (Luke 1:32–33; cf. 2 Sam 7:10–16); is named “Son of David” by those in need (e.g., Matt 9:27; 15:22; 20:31; Mark 10:46–52); and enters Jerusalem as Son of David (Mark 11:1–11). For Paul, Christ Jesus “was descended from David” (Rom 1:3; cf. 2 Tim 2:8). These texts emphasize not that Jesus was a son of David, one among many, but his identity as the Son of David, the “righteous branch” who would fulfill his role as God's agent of the restoration of God's people (e.g., Jer 23:5–8; Zech 3:9–10; 6:12–15; Hag 2:21–22; cf. Rev 5:5; 22:16), the eschatological ruler who would eliminate oppression and gather to himself a holy people (Pss. Sol. 17–18). Jesus' understanding of his Davidic descent surfaces in Mark 12:35–37 (Matt 26:41–46; Luke 20:41–44). Here, while teaching in the temple, Jesus refers to himself implicitly as the Messiah through whom the kingdom of God is brought near.<sup>6</sup>

In lineage- or descent-based status systems, ancestral references, whether lengthy genealogies (e.g., Matt 1:1–17 and Luke 3:23–38) or fragmentary (e.g., Luke 1:69), perform the important role of locating persons on the map of kinship. They mark inherited status. Depending on the honor of one's family heritage, ancestral references might provide legitimation for one's mission in the world or forbid even the possibility of honorable achievement. Although we find in the Gospel of Mark evidence against Jesus' honor on the basis of family connections (Mark 6:2–3), his location in the family of David and his identity as the fulfillment of God's promise to David is crucial to the story of Jesus of Nazareth.

---

<sup>6</sup> See the brief discussion in Richard Bauckham, Jude and the Relatives of Jesus in the Early Church (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1990), 365–367.

2.2. Relatives of Jesus

Concerning Jesus' parents, Joseph and Mary, little is known. Joseph is a member of the household of David (Luke 1:27), though one of relatively low status, living apart from the ancestral land (Luke 2:4), a carpenter in an economically impoverished region (Matt 13:55), regarded in Matthew's account as a man of integrity, obedience, and faith (Matt 1:18–25; 2:13–21). The complete silence of the gospels regarding his father once Jesus' public ministry has begun is often and best explained by the likelihood that Joseph was already dead by this time. Mary, on the other hand, is present throughout Jesus' public ministry, survives her son, and is portrayed in Acts as one of the early followers of Jesus (Acts 1:12–14). Though present in Matthew's birth narrative, Mary neither acts nor speaks, but is continuously "with" Jesus (Matt 2:11, 13, 14, 20, 21), highlighting the degree to which her life and fate are intertwined with that of her child.

In Luke's Gospel, we first meet Mary as a resident of Nazareth of Galilee, a young woman, perhaps 14 years old, betrothed to Joseph (1:26–27). She is also known for her kinship to Elizabeth, mother of John the Baptist (1:36). Her devout faith is celebrated in Luke's Gospel, where she and Joseph are able to provide only the sacrifice reserved for the poor (that is, turtledoves rather than sheep, 2:24; cf. Lev 12:8). Luke's opening chapters portray Mary as a person intimate with the Scriptures of Israel, able to interweave images and language from Israel's Scriptures in order to celebrate and give definition to the mighty and merciful activity of God in bringing his covenant to fruition in Jesus. Along with Joseph, she is presented as one who is guided in God's purpose by Torah and whose devotion to Torah is unambiguous. Moreover, as her response to Gabriel ("Here am I, the servant of the Lord. Let it be with me in accordance with your word" [1:38]) demonstrates, she is a model of discipleship. It is nonetheless true that Mary herself does not appear to grasp fully the significance of what God is doing, but gives herself to mulling over the meaning of these things; indeed, at one point she fails altogether to comprehend the consequence of Jesus' filial relationship with God (cf. 2:19, 48–50, 51). This is a reminder that Mary's importance in the story of Jesus goes beyond her role in child-bearing; rather, she is esteemed as one who hears and obeys the word of God (see 11:27–28; 8:19–21). For Luke, Mary hears and reflects on the divine word, embraces that word positively, and even proclaims the word in the fashion of a prophet

(1:26–38, 46–55; 2:19, 51). This anticipates Luke’s final testimonial to Mary, Acts 1:14, where she is explicitly counted within the community of Jesus’ faithful disciples.

Although she is never named in the Gospel of John, Mary appears as Jesus’ mother in two scenes, the wedding at Cana (2:1–12) and at Jesus’ crucifixion (19:25–27). The interaction between Jesus and his mother at the wedding celebration has confounded interpreters who question its coherence or wonder at Jesus’ apparent rudeness to his mother. The account itself gives no reason to attribute hostility to Jesus in his response to his mother; instead, with its emphasis on Jesus’ “hour,” the narrative urges the view that their conversation is designed to raise early on the question of Jesus’ aims. Mary’s appearance in this scene also testifies to Jesus’ humanity as one with a physical, earthly family. Jesus’ references to his mother from the cross highlight again his humanity and remind John’s readers that this “hour” is his reason for coming, about which Jesus had spoken at Cana.<sup>7</sup>

A smattering of texts refers to Jesus’ brothers (Matt 12:46–49; 13:55; Luke 8:19–20; John 2:12; 7:3, 10) or brothers and sisters (Mark 4:31–32; 6:3; Matt 13:56); his brothers are named as “James and Joses and Judas and Simon” (Mark 6:3) or “James and Joseph and Simon and Judas” (Matt 13:55). In addition, at the cross, Mary is identified as “mother of James the Less and Joses” (Mark 15:40) or “mother of James and Joseph” (Matt 27:5); at the burial as “mother of Joses” (Mark 15:47); and at the empty tomb as “mother of James” (Mark 16:1; Luke 24:10).<sup>8</sup> James, “the brother of the Lord” (Gal 1:19), assumes leadership of the Jerusalem church (cf. Acts 12:17; 15:13; 21:18). He is known to the Jewish historian Josephus as “James, the brother of Jesus, who was called the Christ” (Ant. 20.200), and regarded by Eusebius as Jerusalem’s first “bishop” (Hist. eccl. 2.23.1). Two letters that appear among the General Epistles in the New Testament are attributed to Jesus’ brothers,

---

<sup>7</sup> Regarding Mary, see more fully, Beverly Roberts Gaventa, Mary: Glimpses of the Mother of Jesus (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995).

<sup>8</sup> For an insightful assessment of the importance of Jesus’ relatives in the early church, see Bauckham, Jude and the Relatives of Jesus, to which should be added, for the sake of completeness, his monograph on James: Wisdom of James, Disciple of Jesus the Sage, New Testament Readings (London: Routledge, 1999). For a recent assessment of the relationship of these “brothers and sisters,” concluding that they were in fact Jesus’ siblings, see John P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, 1: The Roots of the Problem and the Person, ABRL (New York: Doubleday, 1991), 318–332.

James and Jude. Interestingly, both James and Jude claim to be the servant of Jesus and not a brother (Jas 1:1: “servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ”; Jude 1: “servant of Jesus Christ and brother of James”)—reminding us that, in the Jesus-movement, familial status is determined in relation to the word of God rather than on the basis of blood lines.

John the Baptist was both a relative of Jesus and, in some sense, his teacher. Our identification of the nature of their familial ties turns on the relationship of Elizabeth and Mary (Luke 1:36), but we receive little help here. Συγγενίς (sungenis) connotes nothing more certain than “kinswoman.” More significant is that Jesus submitted to John’s baptism, thus identifying himself with the major themes of his movement: the eschatological coming of God and the concomitant urgency of repentance and a faithful life. Jesus’ baptism by John, too, marked Jesus’ experience of messianic vocation.

2.3. Without a Home

Even though our sources provide us with scant detail regarding Jesus’ family, what we have presents a complex portrait. First, we have brief reminiscences the inclusion of which seems to serve no apparent agenda other than the preservation of historical memory or to provide an anchor point for later developments in the movement. Why else would the evangelists list the names of Jesus’ brothers? Second, we grasp the pivotal importance of Jesus’ ancestry. He is a descendant of David and this “family name” is the primary contribution Jesus’ father, Joseph, brings to the story of Jesus. Third, members of Jesus’ family—specifically, his mother Mary and his more distant kin John—play significant roles. Mary is noteworthy for her exemplary response to God’s redemptive intervention and her ongoing faithfulness, while John is identified as the herald of the Messiah, more than a prophet (Matt 11:9; Luke 7:26), the most esteemed within the human family (Matt 11:11; Luke 7:28). Yet, fourth, it is obvious that what particularly distinguishes Mary and John within the gospel narratives is not their familial relations with Jesus as family is normally judged. Conventional family ties are rendered problematic in at least three groups of texts: (1) the exchange between Mary and the boy Jesus, contrasting her identification of herself and Joseph as Jesus’ mother and father with Jesus’ identification of God as his father (Luke 2:48–49); (2) the attempt on the part of Jesus’ mother and brothers to “restrain him,” thinking him out of his mind (Mark 3:21);<sup>9</sup> and (3) repeated reports or directives indicating that relationships determined by blood are either mitigated in their importance or altogether eclipsed by relationships determined by faithful responsiveness to the gospel (e.g., Mark 1:16–20; 10:28–30; Luke 9:57–62; 11:27–28; 12:51–53; 14:26; 18:28–30).<sup>10</sup>

The enigma of the category of “family” reaches its apex in Jesus’ explicit recognition of his social location outside of normal family relations. This is illustrated in Jesus’ acknowledgment that, as a prophet, it is only to be expected that an appearance in his hometown should be the occasion of dishonor and rejection (Luke 4:24). As troublemakers of the conventional, prophets almost by definition occupied the further reaches of acceptable society. Mark’s account presses the motif of rejection even further, extending it from Jesus’ “hometown” to include also Jesus’ “kin” and even his own “household” (Mark 6:4). Even more stark is Jesus’ claim in Luke 9:57–58: “Foxes have holes, and birds of the air have nests; but the Son of Man has no place to lay his head.” Jesus thus declares himself completely dependent on the generous hospitality of others; apart from it, he is homeless.

3. Friends

From the onset of Jesus’ public ministry, he was surrounded by followers. Indeed, one of the characteristic features of his ministry was the calling and development of disciples.

According to three of our New Testament gospels, Jesus’ first public act was the calling of disciples (Matt 4:18–22; Mark 1:16–20; John 1:35–51; cf. Luke 5:1–11). Along the way, other followers are mentioned, both named and anonymous (e.g., Luke 7:36–8:3). The list of disciples is extraordinary for its inclusiveness: fishermen (e.g., Mark 1:16–20), a self-proclaimed “sinner” (Luke 5:8), a toll collector (e.g., Matt 9:9–13), and both men and women (e.g., Luke 8:1–3). The disciples are “with” Jesus (e.g., Mark 3:14; Luke 6:17; 7:11). They are the special recipients of his teaching (e.g., Mark 4:33–34; 10:23–45; 11:12–26; 13:1–37). Some are instructed for and sent on a mission that is an extension of his own (e.g., Mark 6:7–13, 30; Matt 9:35–11:1; Luke 9:1–10; 10:1–12). At least in part, the call to discipleship is a call to “catch people” (Luke 5:10; cf. Mark 1:17). In the end, Jesus’ commissions those whom he has chosen to propagate his ministry to all nations (Matt 28:16–20; Luke 24:49; Acts 1:8).

<sup>9</sup> The implicit subject of the verbs in Mark 3:21 (οἱ παρ’ αὐτοῦ) is provided in v. 31 (“his mother and his brothers”) and v. 32 (“your mother and your brothers and your sisters”).

<sup>10</sup> See Stephen C. Barton, Discipleship and Family Ties in Mark and Matthew, SNTSMS 80 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994).

In the gospels, we also come across disciples of John the Baptist (e.g., Matt 9:14; Mark 6:29; Luke 7:18–20; 11:1; John 4:1) and disciples of the Pharisees (e.g., Mark 2:18; Matt 22:16). John’s disciples embraced his teaching regarding the coming of God’s kingdom, demonstrating their commitment in such characteristic behaviors as fasting and prayer (Matt 3:7–10; Mark 2:18; Luke 11:1). According to the Gospel of John, some of Jesus’ earliest followers had first been disciples of John (1:35–37). This is perhaps only to be expected, since both John and Jesus were eschatological prophets proclaiming the arrival of the kingdom of God, and since John identified Jesus as the “coming one” (John 1:25–51; cf. Mark 1:7–8; cf. Luke 7:18–23). Nevertheless, some continued their loyalty to John after his arrest and death at the hands of Herod—carrying out John’s requests, burying him, and, apparently, maintaining themselves as a kind of John-sect characterized negatively by Jesus’ disciples, since these followers of John failed to recognize that Jesus was the Messiah whose coming John had anticipated (see Luke 3:15–17; Acts 18:25–26; 19:1–7; John 1:6–8, 15, 19–28; 3:25–30). Little is said of the disciples of the Pharisees, apart from their practice of fasting, though we should assume that they adhered to beliefs associated with the Pharisees and attached themselves to Pharisees for training.

These parallels demonstrate that Jesus was not unique in attracting followers. We know of other precursors in Israel’s past, for example in the circles associated with the prophets (e.g., 1 Sam 19:20–24; 2 Kgs 4:1.38; 9:1; Isa 8:16). A closer analogy would be the calling of Elisha by Elijah (1 Kgs 19:19–21), a call narrative echoed in Luke 9:57–62 (cf. Matt 8:18–22). Additionally, in the wider Greco-Roman world, the term “disciple” (μαθητής, “learner,” “pupil”) could describe an adherent to a teacher or a learner attached to a master. However, it would be anachronistic to imagine that, in Jesus’ day, there were discipleship models any more formal or institutionalized than the presence of rabbis, most of whom would have been Pharisees, recognized for their understanding of the Torah, who attracted groups of disciples for purposes of learning and interpreting Torah (cf. “the tradition of the elders” in Mark 7:1–15).

Jesus himself was addressed as “Rabbi” (ῥαββί; e.g., Mark 9:5; John 9:2; cf. ῥαββουνί, “my master,” in Mark 10:51; John 20:16) or “Teacher” (διδάσκαλος), suggesting that the relationship between Jesus and his followers should be understood according to the Pharisaic (rabbinic) analogy. The similarity breaks down on some points, however. For example, whereas in the usual scenario a would-be disciple would approach a rabbi with a request to study under his tutelage, the gospels have it that Jesus typically initiated the master-disciple relationship (e.g., Mark 1:16–20; 2:13–14; John 1:43; 6:70; 15:16). What is more, in doing so, Jesus used language that recalls those biblical scenes in which God called individuals, prophets, as messengers of his word. We find other models in the gospels as well—namely, potential followers approach Jesus, who tests their resolve (Matt 8:19–22; Luke 9:57–62), and introductions to Jesus mediated by others (John 1:40–42, 44–46). Furthermore, adherence to Jesus as rabbi included learning how to interpret Torah, but this was only one aspect of the commitment. This is signaled in the language of Jesus’ appointment of certain disciples as apostles: “And he appointed twelve, whom he also named apostles, to be with him, and to be sent out to proclaim the message, and to have authority to cast out demons” (Mark 3:14–15). The two primary aspects of this call are “to be with him” and “to be sent out,” with the other two phrases, “to proclaim” and “to have authority” modifying the nature of their being sent. As the gospel accounts make clear, being “with Jesus” entails companionship, to be sure, but also sharing in his success and failure, his acceptance and rejection, and identifying with and being shaped by his life and mission. This includes abandoning the security of vocation, possessions, and home, even repudiating family ties and responsibilities, on the model of Jesus’ abandonment of home in favor of complete dependence on God (e.g., Luke 9:57–62). Accordingly, discipleship involves “following” him (ἀκολουθέω), parsed in these terms: “If any want to become my followers, let them deny themselves and take up their cross and follow me” (Mark 8:34). Evidently, the model and criterion for faithful discipleship was the service-oriented self-abandonment of Jesus’ own demise, his death on the cross (see Mark 10:35–45).<sup>11</sup>

In addition, whereas Jesus’ peers among the rabbis focused their instruction on their followers, Jesus extended his teaching to wider and wider circles—teaching the masses in the presence of the disciples, and teaching the disciples in the presence of the crowds, even when those crowds included Jesus’ own antagonists. In this way, Jesus’ ministry was like a sower who went out to sow, casting his seed indiscriminately (e.g., Mark 4:1–20). Finally, disciples more generally aimed to achieve an expertise in Torah in order themselves to become teachers of the law. Jesus, on the other hand, explicitly forbade such ambitions (Matt 23:8). His followers would not replace him as much as serve as his agents in mission (cf. Mark 6:7–13; Luke 10:1–24; Acts). Whereas in the rabbinic model, then, a disciple would associate with the master for a limited period, perhaps even moving among teachers, discipleship with Jesus was to be an exclusive and permanent arrangement. Clearly, Jesus was a rabbi, but more than a rabbi. He was an eschatological prophet and messianic deliverer—though not the sort whose aims would be vested in stirring up the masses for revolution (cf. Acts 5:36–37; 21:38).

---

<sup>11</sup> See Larry W. Hurtado, “Jesus’ Death as Paradigmatic in the New Testament,” SJT 57 (2004): 413–433.

3.1. Jesus and the Twelve

From the wider group of his followers, Jesus chose twelve (Mark 3:13–19; Luke 6:13), often called apostles and sometimes simply “disciples.” Although some scholars have doubted the historicity of this number, it is not only fixed in the gospels, but finds expression in 1 Cor 15:5; Rev 21:14. Moreover, Acts 1:15–26 evidences the importance of having twelve apostles—even though, after his appointment as replacement for Judas Iscariot, Matthias never again enters Luke’s story (nor do the Twelve play any particular role as a subset of the disciples).<sup>12</sup> The historicity of the Twelve is also supported, ironically, by the lack of stability in the naming of the Twelve. In the synoptic gospels and Acts, we find these lists:

---

<sup>12</sup> See Arie W. Zwiep, Judas and the Choice of Matthias, WUNT 2.187 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2004).

MATT 10:2–4	MARK 3:16–19	LUKE 6:13–16	ACTS 1:13
Simon, called Peter	Simon, named Peter	Simon, named Peter	Peter
Andrew, brother of Peter	James, son of Zebedee	Andrew, brother of Peter	John
James, son of Zebedee	John, brother of James	James	James
John, brother of James	Andrew	John	Andrew
Philip	Philip	Philip	Philip
Bartholomew	Bartholomew	Bartholomew	Thomas
Thomas	Matthew	Matthew	Bartholomew
Matthew the toll collector	Thomas	Thomas	Matthew
James, son of Alphaeus	James, son of Alphaeus	James, son of Alphaeus	James, son of Alphaeus
Thaddaeus	Thaddaeus	Simon, called the Zealot	Simon the Zealot
Simon the Cananean	Simon the Cananean	Judas, son of James	Judas, son of James
Judas Iscariot the betrayer	Judas Iscariot the betrayer	Judas Iscariot the betrayer

It is not only that these lists witness different names among the Twelve, but that, with few exceptions, the order of the names is flexible, as though the status (with the obvious exceptions of Peter and Judas Iscariot) differed according to different tradents.

With regard to these catalogs, perhaps most interesting is a comparison of Luke 6 and Acts 1, since these come from the same author. In Luke's second list, Peter is known only by the name given him by Jesus; "Simon" is no longer needed (though cf. Luke 22:31; Acts 15:14). Andrew's identity is independent of his brother's. Judas Iscariot excepted, the two lists name the same persons, though transposing the order of some. Most importantly, John now appears second, an indication of the leadership role he will serve in the community (3:1, 3, 11; 4:13, 19; 8:14). James has been moved to the third position (see 12:2), but the others will appear only en masse (e.g., 2:14, 37, 43; 5:12, 18). Although the names appear in groups (do Peter, Philip, and James lead these divisions of four?), Luke does not develop the identity of subgroups, nor the character of any of the apostles apart from Peter and, to a much lesser degree, John and James. Nor does Luke express interest in specifying in what sense Simon is a “zealot”; elsewhere, Luke can characterize believers as “zealous for the law” (21:20) or “for God” (22:3); it is also possible that Simon was simply “a zealous person,” and there is no reason to imagine that he belonged to a party of “Zealots” identified by Josephus, whose existence prior to the 60’s CE is not at all clear. (Note that, when they are present in Acts, revolutionaries stand in contrast to Jesus’ followers—e.g., 5:34–39; 21:37–40.) Most conspicuous about the list in Acts is its provision of only eleven names. Judas Iscariot has been dropped in a deliberate strategy that raises the need to rectify this shortage (thus, Acts 1:15–26).

The choice of twelve was almost certainly motivated by the symbolism of the number: the twelve disciples represented the twelve tribes of Israel. Apparently, Jesus shared the expectation of the eschatological restoration of the twelve tribes (cf. Hos 11:11; 2 Macc 1:27; 2:18). Note that Matt 19:28; Luke 22:28–30 encourage a relationship between the number twelve and the end-time rule. In his choice of the Twelve, then, Jesus calls Israel to repentance in anticipation of the arrival of the kingdom of God.

3.2. The Women around Jesus

Among Jesus’ companions during his public ministry, women were certainly included. This is widely attested in the scenes of Jesus’ crucifixion. According to Mark’s Gospel, for example, “There were also women looking on from a distance; among them were Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James the younger and of Joses, and Salome. These used to follow him and provided for him when he was in Galilee; and there were many other women who had come up with him to Jerusalem” (15:40–41). Women, too, played a central role in the post-resurrection appearances, as a consequence of their arrival at the tomb to exercise their piety in preparing Jesus’ body in burial (e.g., Luke 24:1–23). Located as they are at the end of the gospels, these texts are somewhat surprising, since the gospels otherwise have little to say about the presence of women among those who itinerated with Jesus. The well-known exception to this silence is Luke 8:1–3, which speaks of those who traveled with Jesus “through cities and villages”: “The twelve were with him, as well as some women who had been cured of evil spirits and infirmities: Mary, called Magdalene, from whom seven demons had gone out, and Joanna, the wife of Herod’s steward Chuza, and Susanna, and many others, who provided for them out of their resources.” Even this explicit report is not without precedent, however, since it is otherwise amply attested that Jesus conducted his ministry among women—a ministry that included healing, exorcism, teaching; and, among those women, those with and without homes, with and without family (e.g., Luke 4:38–39; 7:11–17, 36–50; 8:40–56; 10:38–42)—some of whom, having been the recipients of restoration, would have been incorporated into the community being formed around Jesus (cf. Mark 10:29–30). Read together, these Markan and Lukan texts make clear that women were both the recipients of and benefactors for Jesus’ ministry (with his graciousness toward them mirrored in their graciousness toward him), that women modeled in their lives Jesus’ own practices of service, and that, like the apostles, women were “with” Jesus as his disciples.

3.3. Conclusion: Concentric Circles of Discipleship

Jesus’ mission, oriented broadly to the restoration of Israel, encompassed relations with a wide array of persons along a well-nuanced continuum measured in terms of the depth of one’s response to his message. Thinking in terms of a series of concentric circles, the outermost circle would have been occupied by the undifferentiated crowds that gathered as recipients of his ministry, and sometimes followed him by the thousands. He taught them, fed them, and healed them. Indeed, his popularity was undoubtedly measured in large part by his status as a healer. In a world in which only the wealthy could afford the care of a trained physician, village people were especially vulnerable to the abuse of charlatans who took what little money they had but provided little by way of a cure (e.g., Mark 5:26) with the result that agents of divine healing were all the more attractive. The crowds comprised potential disciples, but also potential opponents, since they could be swayed one way or the other. The innermost circle was the Twelve and, within this group, three disciples in particular: Peter, James, and John (e.g., Matt 17:1; Mark 5:37; 14:33). Working from the inside, the next circle would have included the seventy-two whom Jesus sent out, two by two (Luke 10:1–20); women, named and unnamed, including Mary Magdalene, Susanna, Mary and Martha, and Joanna. And next would be those about whom we know almost nothing, except that they qualified themselves as members of Jesus’ extended family as persons who both heard the word of God and did it (Luke 8:21), who were children of peace (Luke 10:5–7), persons (including Gentiles) who demonstrated faith (Luke 7:1–10) and love (Luke 7:36–50), who recognized Jesus as God’s Righteous One (Luke 23:40–43), and those whose discipleship was maintained secretly, at least for a time (John 19:38–39).

Of course, this image of concentric circles should not be pressed too far. The lines separating these groups are fuzzy and porous. For example, women, who are never mentioned among the circle of the Twelve, are present at Jesus’ crucifixion and, after the Sabbath, come to his place of burial, while, among this innermost circle, Peter denied Jesus, Judas betrayed him, and the rest deserted him. Conversely, some who belonged to groups more famous for their opposition to Jesus befriended him (John 7:50–51; Matt 27:57; Mark 15:43) or warned him of impending danger (Luke 13:31).

4. Foes

If the portrait of Jesus and his followers weaves its way through our understanding of Jesus and his mission, this is balanced with a narrative thread of a different, more ominous sort. We can trace the ebb and flow of his popularity among the masses, as well as the strengthening and periodic waning of the loyalty of his most prominent followers. Far more predictable is the gradual but unrelenting crescendo of hostile forces aligned against him, beginning already in Galilee, culminating in his arrest, trial, and execution on a Roman cross.

How could it be otherwise? After all, Jesus’ predecessor and kin, John, had first been imprisoned and then put to death by Herod Antipas, ruler of Galilee and Perea. If Jesus were to continue along the course set by John, of proclaiming and enacting the coming of God’s kingdom and drawing followers to his movement, how could Jesus’ fate be any different? Moreover, in Israel’s history, the fate of God’s prophets has been rejection and death at the hands of God’s own people (e.g., Neh 9:26; Jer 2:30). Given that, whatever else he might have been, Jesus was regarded by others and understood himself in prophetic terms (e.g., Matt 21:11, 46; Mark 6:4; Luke 4:16–30; 7:16; 13:33; 22:64; 24:19; John 4:19; 6:14; 7:40; 9:17), would he not similarly attract ill-will and violent action? Indeed, according to the gospels, Jesus himself anticipated his suffering and death at the hands of the Jerusalem leadership (elders, chief priests, and scribes) and the Gentiles (e.g., Mark 8:31; 9:31; 10:33–34). Reflecting backward over the whole of the gospels, and not only their passion accounts, we find that those aligned against Jesus included especially the Pharisees, scribes, Herodians, and Sadducees.<sup>13</sup>

4.1. Jesus and the Pharisees

Among the expressions of Judaism in the Second Temple period, the Pharisaic movement is perhaps the most susceptible to misunderstanding by readers of the New Testament. This is due in part to the overt hostility between the Pharisees and the movement associated with Jesus. In the gospels, Pharisees are generally depicted in opposition to Jesus and his followers. They monitor his behavior, are critical of his words and deeds, and plan his demise. Conversely, Jesus warns his followers against the godless piety of the Pharisees, counters their traditions of instruction, and undermines their machinations for positions of honor. Misunderstanding is also possible due to the inordinate amount of interaction between Jesus and the Pharisees, according to the gospels, potentially giving rise to the mistaken impression that the Pharisees were numerous and/or were formally recognized as leaders within Judaism. Moreover, the heightened record of hostility between the Pharisees and Jesus can overshadow the degree to which Jesus' message and Pharisaic beliefs overlapped and, indeed, the degree to which they regarded him as one of their own—so much so that members of this group, known for its scruples around the choice of table companions, repeatedly share their tables with Jesus.<sup>14</sup>

Although some Pharisees would have belonged to the circle of professional scribes (see below), Pharisaism was a lay movement, with adherents drawn from all walks of life. Central to any portrait of the Pharisees is their concern with assiduous interpretation of Torah, debating and extending the traditions of interpretation they had inherited. This does not make them a “religious” group, pure and simple, since any vision for the life and future of the Jewish people would be necessarily social and political, as well as religious. Theirs was a reform movement, and they competed with other movements within Judaism for adherents and influence. The evidence suggests that their interpretations and practices focused on full tithing, the proper observance of Sabbath, and the application of ritual purity, more generally associated with the temple, to daily life, including the preparation and consumption of food. Their concern for holiness in these areas expressed itself in relative segregation from others—not withdrawal from society at large, but separation from those who did not exercise their level of scrupulousness. In effect, concerns for holiness at the table extended from what they ate to the holiness of the persons with whom they ate, contributing to their reputation for maintaining an exclusive table fellowship. Pharisees were also known for their belief in the resurrection.

---

<sup>13</sup> For fuller treatment, see, e.g., John P. Meier, A Marginal Jew, 3: Companions and Competitors, ABRL (New York: Doubleday, 2001), Part Two; and the older, but still useful Anthony J. Saldarini, Pharisees, Scribes and Sadducees in Palestinian Society: A Sociological Approach (Wilmington, DE: M. Glazier, 1988).

<sup>14</sup> In fact, it is precisely the similarity between Jesus and the Pharisees that helps to explain the hostility between them, as this is recorded in the gospels. This is because their similarities raised the stakes on determining what was distinctive, with the identity of one worked out to a significant degree in the negation of the other.

Jesus' proclamation of the kingdom of God shaped and colored the entirety of his mission and message, so it is easy to overlook the degree to which he shared Pharisaic beliefs and practices. They shared a belief in the resurrection, trained their disciples in acts of piety such as prayer, and embraced the ongoing authority of Torah, concerning themselves with its faithful appropriation. The similarity between Jesus and the Pharisees is evidenced above all in his repeated presence with them at the table, though it is also at the table that he most powerfully distinguished himself from Pharisaism. They apparently regarded him as one of their number, yet, in their presence at the table Jesus criticized their attitudes toward tithing, their segregating themselves from the marginal, and their interest in roles of privilege. He transgresses their interpretations of Torah with regard to keeping the Sabbath holy and to purity—not because he dismissed Torah but because he interpreted Torah differently, particularly with regard to the demarcation between purity and impurity. Instead of imagining that ritual impurity was a contagion, Jesus seems to have imagined that holiness of heart and life could be communicated among others. When Jesus denounced Pharisaic hypocrisy, he was characterizing them less as play-acting or disingenuous (as the Greeks would have understood "hypocrisy") and more as persons who misconstrue and nullify God's will by drafting Torah to serve their own interpretations.<sup>15</sup>

---

<sup>15</sup> For this broader understanding of "hypocrisy," see Job 34:30; 36:13; David E. Garland, The Intention of Matthew 23, NovT 52 (Leiden: Brill, 1979).

Though the Pharisees are typically aligned against Jesus and his movement, and are remembered to have conspired against him (e.g., Mark 3:6), the overall portrait is more ambivalent. He was a guest at their table, for example, and they warned Jesus against Herod's desire to put him to death (Luke 13:31). Paul was and remained a Pharisee, and, in Acts, Christianity and Pharisaism shared a common hope in Israel's restoration (Acts 23:6–8; 26:5–7). Though in the gospels they are often singularly aligned against Jesus during his Galilee ministry, Pharisees are virtually absent from the gospel accounts of his days in Jerusalem and play no role in his passion.<sup>16</sup>

4.2. Jesus and the Scribes

“Scribe” in antiquity might refer to a wide range of roles up and down the social, political, and educational ladder—much like the modern-day term “secretary,” which refers as easily to a typist as to a chief executive officer of an organization or a governmental official at the cabinet level.<sup>17</sup> The gospels tend to use the term with a more narrow referent, however. “Scribes” are legal experts, teachers of the law, both guardians and purveyors of the traditions of interpretation of Torah, generally associated with Jerusalem, and almost universally opposed to Jesus. Matthew may hint at a more positive assessment of the scribal role and of individual scribes (e.g., Matt 8:19; 13:52; 23:34; cf. Mark 8:11–13; 12:28–34), but even in Matthew's Gospel scribes, as a group, are implicated in disputes with Jesus and in the move against Jesus that led to his crucifixion (e.g., Matt 15:1; 16:21; 21:15–16; 26:57). And in Matt 23 Jesus rails against the scribes, together with the Pharisees, for their hypocrisy. According to Mark 1:22, the essential difference between Jesus and the scribes is the manner of his teaching. Those gathered in the Capernaum synagogue “. . . were astounded at his teaching, for he taught them as one having authority, and not as the scribes.” Rather than deliberately setting his instruction within the great stream of interpretation tradition, Jesus' instruction had a charismatic hue, comprising speech acts in which he seemed to speak directly on God's behalf, using images and axioms whose logic did not require the verification of tradition, framed in reference to Scripture directly and not as mediated through authoritative traditions of interpretation, and, at least in part, validated through his ministry of healing and other miracles (cf. Mark 1:27; 6:2).

---

<sup>16</sup> The exceptions are John 18:3 (the Pharisees are said to have joined the chief priests in sending out a police to join the posse in Jesus' arrest), and Matt 27:62–66 (after Jesus' death, the Pharisees join the chief priests in ensuring that Jesus' tomb is secured).

<sup>17</sup> Saldarini, Pharisees, 242.

4.3. Jesus and the Herodians

Almost nothing is known of the Herodians, but must be gleaned from the name itself. Herodiani denotes “those who ally themselves with Herod.” Since “Herod” can represent the Herodian dynasty, which ruled the area of Palestine from 50 BCE to around CE 100, the term might refer more broadly to those who supported one of the Herods or the dynastic regime. Herodians appear in the gospels at two points.<sup>18</sup> In Mark 3:6, in the context of Jesus’ healing on the Sabbath, they are aligned with the Pharisees in a conspiracy how to destroy Jesus. In Mark 12:13 (Matt 22:16), they appear again with the Pharisees, now in an attempt to entrap Jesus with the question, “Is it lawful to pay taxes to the emperor, or not?” Political reverberations emanate from both texts—from the first on account of the need to involve the reigning Herod (presumably Herod Antipas, who bore responsibility for John’s decapitation) in a decision for capital punishment, and from the second on account of the ramifications of paying, or refusing to pay, tribute to Caesar. That the servants of Herod were not universally antagonistic toward Jesus is indicated by the presence of “Joanna, the wife of Herod’s steward Chuza” among Jesus’ followers (Luke 8:3) and, later, of “Manaen, a member of the court of Herod the ruler” among the prophets and teachers of the church at Antioch (Acts 13:1).

4.4. Jesus and the Sadducees

The Sadducees are mentioned explicitly only 14 times in the New Testament, but their hand is felt in the events leading to Jesus’ passion. Our sources are consistent in noting the antagonism between the Pharisees and Sadducees. Certainly, they differed with regard to belief in the resurrection and afterlife, a point on which Pharisees and Christians would have been allied against the Sadducees (e.g., Mark 12:18–27; Acts 23:1–10; Josephus, War 2.163–165; Ant. 18.14, 16). In the gospels and Acts, the Sadducees are proximally associated with Jerusalem, and especially with the temple, from which they garnered their authority and status. Although the Jerusalem Council, or Sanhedrin, would have included both Pharisees and Sadducees (as Luke notes in Acts 23:6–7), in the passion accounts of the New Testament gospels, the Sanhedrin is represented by the Sadducees, whose numbers would have been drawn from the families of the chief priests and Jerusalem aristocrats (cf. Acts 4:1–2; 5:17; Josephus Ant. 13.297–298; 18.16–17). Accordingly, they would have heard any statement against the Temple, whether by Jesus or Stephen (Acts 6:8–8:2), as a direct challenge.

---

<sup>18</sup> See also Mark 8:15 where “the yeast of Herod” appears in tandem with “the yeast of the Pharisees.”

5. Conclusion

As with any person, so Jesus' identity is worked out significantly in the context of his social relationships—his family, friends, and foes. What is startling about the relationships we have surveyed is their multi-textured character. Family is redefined. Jesus' closest associates are slow to grasp the nature of his mission and the nature of his identity before God. As for his enemies, although as character groups they are aligned against him, taken individually members of these groups are capable of a more positive valuation of and association with Jesus. From the standpoint of discipleship with Jesus, this is important insofar as it underscores the potential of any of his followers, past and present, to find themselves allied with his enemies. Hence, Jesus' words ring down through the ages, setting parameters around his understanding of family in terms of hearing and putting into practice the will of God (e.g., Luke 8:18, 21), and urging his followers to be on the lookout for the tendencies resident in every person to embrace beliefs and behaviors more at home with his enemies than with his friends (e.g., Matt 6:1; Mark 12:38; Luke 12:1).

THE LANGUAGE(S) JESUS SPOKE

STANLEY E. PORTER

1. Introduction

There are three major questions that may be posed in regard to the language or languages that Jesus may have spoken: What are the languages that Jesus could have spoken? What is the New Testament evidence regarding the languages that he spoke? And what, from a linguistic perspective, can we say regarding the languages that Jesus may have spoken? Numerous articles and books have recently recounted and discussed the various types of evidence available to make estimates regarding the likelihood that Jesus may or may not have spoken any given language. Most of this research presents itself in terms of documenting the types of material remains, such as inscriptions, papyri, and other documentary and literary evidence available. I myself have presented and discussed such evidence on previous occasions.<sup>1</sup> Rather than rehearse this evidence again, in this article I wish to place the question of the language or languages that Jesus may have spoken within a number of larger contexts implicated by the questions posed above. These contexts include the possible languages that Jesus could have spoken as a Jew of first-century Galilee and Palestine, the New Testament evidence regarding the languages that he spoke, and linguistic considerations regarding the languages that Jesus may have spoken. Before these tasks can be addressed, however, a number of useful preliminary definitions should be offered.

---

<sup>1</sup> See, e.g., S. E. Porter, "Jesus and the Use of Greek in Galilee," in Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluating the State of Current Research, ed. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans, NTTS 19 (Leiden: Brill, 1994), 123–154; idem, The Criteria for Authenticity in Historical-Jesus Research: Previous Discussion and New Proposals, JSNTSup 191 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000), esp. 126–180; and idem, "Greek Language," in New Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible, ed. K. D. Sakenfeld, vol. 2: D-H (Nashville: Abingdon Press, 2007), 673–681, among a number of sources. Pertinent bibliography is cited in these sources, as well as in my chapter in volume 1 of this series on Greek Language Criteria.

2. Preliminary Definitions

To facilitate the ensuing discussion, it is useful to recognize the complexity of language acquisition and production, especially in a multilingual context such as that of the Greco-Roman world.<sup>2</sup> As a result, it is worth differentiating several sets of terms.

The first set of terms attempts to characterize language acquisition and production by means of various times of acquisition and types of competence. One set of terms involves diachronic categories, such as first language acquisition versus second or subsequent language acquisition. This is sometimes also described in relation to primary or secondary language facility. This set of categories does not necessarily say anything about language competence, but about the order and age of acquisition, and the possible attrition of a first language.<sup>3</sup> Thus, one might well say that a person born in Rome in the first century might have first language acquisition of Latin if the person was a citizen of an eminent family and second language acquisition of Greek, and be fully bilingual. Government officials may well have had such linguistic competence, such as Pilate. Another set of terms involves synchronic categories. This involves distinguishing between active or productive versus passive or receptive multilingualism. This type of linguistic competence constitutes variable points along a cline or continuum, rather than constituting a dichotomy. Active multilingualism means that the speaker has the ability to understand and to express himself or herself in a given language, but passive multilingualism means that the speaker is able to understand but not to express herself or himself in that language (the question of how well one expresses oneself might be further parsed, if necessary).<sup>4</sup>

---

<sup>2</sup> See B. Spolsky, "Bilingualism," in Linguistics: The Cambridge Survey. IV. Language: The Socio-Cultural Context, ed. F. J. Newmeyer (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988), 100–118.

<sup>3</sup> On these and related issues, see P. Fletcher and M. Garman, eds., Language Acquisition: Studies in First Language Development, 2nd ed. (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1986); W. Klein, Second Language Acquisition, CTL (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1986); K. Hyltenstam and L. K. Obler, eds., Bilingualism across the Lifespan: Aspects of Acquisition, Maturity, and Loss (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989); H. W. Seliger and R. M. Vago, eds., First Language Attrition (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991).

<sup>4</sup> See H. Baetens Beardsmore, Bilingualism: Basic Principles, 2nd ed. Multilingual Matters 1 (Clevedon: Multilingual Matters, 1986) 1–42; cf. F. Grosjean, Life with Two Languages: An Introduction to Bilingualism (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University

A second term that needs to be defined is lingua franca. There has been some misunderstanding of this term in recent discussion. A lingua franca is defined as follows: "Where a mixed speech community uses a natural language as a convenient general medium it is known as a lingua franca..."<sup>5</sup> Note that it is a natural language, such as was Greek, used in a multilingual or mixed speech community so as to constitute a common medium.<sup>6</sup> It is well established, and will not be argued further here, that Greek was the lingua franca of the Greco-Roman world, and especially of the eastern Mediterranean and Roman east.<sup>7</sup>

A third term is that of prestige language.<sup>8</sup> A variety of sociolinguistic factors, such as power, economics, social hierarchy, and education, push toward one variety of language constituting the prestige language. In the environment of Alexandrian multilingualism, the prestige language would have been koine Greek, the lingua franca of the dominant economic, political and educational powers, first the Greek rulers and then the Romans, and it would have been the first language especially of those in positions of institutional control, as well as of others with important social positions. In the multilingual environment of Palestine, the prestige language (while still koine Greek, the lingua franca) was probably a second language for many more people than in Egypt.<sup>9</sup>

---

Press, 1982); J. F. Hamers and M. H. A. Blanc, Bilinguality and Bilingualism (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989).

<sup>5</sup> B. Comrie, "Languages of the World: Who Speaks What," in An Encyclopaedia of Language, N. E. Collinge (London: Routledge, 1992), 956–983, here 982. Comrie notes that Latin has often served as a lingua franca (hence the use of Latin for the terminology), such as in the medieval church.

<sup>6</sup> M. Casey, "In Which Language Did Jesus Teach?" ExpTim 108.11 (1997): 326–328, here 326; idem, Aramaic Sources of Mark's Gospel, SNTSMS 102 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998), 78, contends that Aramaic was the "lingua franca of Israel." No one is denying that Aramaic was a first language for many, probably most, Jews born in Palestine, but this fails to fit the definition above.

<sup>7</sup> See G. Horrocks, Greek: A History of the Language and its Speakers (London: Longmans, 1997), 72.

<sup>8</sup> See E. Haugen, "Problems of Bilingualism," Lingua 12 (1950): 271–290, esp. 278; R. Hudson, Sociolinguistics, 2nd ed., CTL (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996), 30–34; W. Downes, Language and Society, 2nd ed. (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998), 185–196. Cf. S. E. Porter, Verbal Aspect in the Greek of the New Testament, with Reference to Tense and Mood, SBG 1 (New York: Lang, 1989), 154–155.

<sup>9</sup> A number of scholars have been confused on the issue of prestige language. Hebrew may have been the prestige language in relation to Aramaic, but Greek was the prestige language of Palestine in relation to the Semitic languages, Aramaic included. See Porter, Criteria, 175.

Therefore, asking the question of the languages spoken by Jesus involves potentially a complex of issues. He may have had first language active ability in one language, but active or passive abilities in a number of second or subsequent languages. The question of which languages Jesus spoke seems to imply a moderately active competence, that is, more than passive competence such as would be indicated by being able to understand a spoken language, yet not necessarily as much competence as would be required to actively and regularly teach in the language, although this might be the result indicated (to say nothing of whether Jesus could write or not).<sup>10</sup>

3. The Possible Languages that Jesus May have Spoken

The world in which Jesus lived was one of linguistic diversity. Discussion of the languages of Jesus typically attempts to limit the number of languages by only examining a limited number of possibilities: Aramaic ostensibly because he was Jewish, Hebrew possibly because he was Jewish, perhaps Greek because he lived in Roman-controlled Palestine, and Latin because of Roman occupation.<sup>11</sup> This characterization typically overlooks the full range of possible languages with which Jesus would have come into contact—even if it is unlikely that he would have spoken them.

This linguistic diversity is revealed both synchronically and diachronically. In terms of synchrony, there were numerous local languages that were possibly available for Jesus to speak.<sup>12</sup> Many if not most of these were Afro-Asiatic languages that were spoken in the northeast of Africa, across Palestine and into Arabia.<sup>13</sup> The Afro-

---

<sup>10</sup> There has been a variety of opinion on whether Jesus could write. On the basis of his being a teacher, and in the light of his indicated reading competence, it is plausible that he could write. This is not the place to explore this topic.

<sup>11</sup> See, e.g., most studies, including the excellent one by J. A. Fitzmyer, “The Languages of Palestine in the First Century AD,” originally published in CBQ 32 (1970): 501–531; repr. in The Language of the New Testament: Classic Essays, ed. S. E. Porter, JSNTSup 60 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1991), 126–162. In terms of the title of his essay, Fitzmyer is probably correct to restrict his article to the four languages.

<sup>12</sup> Jerusalem was a world-city and attracted people from all over the Mediterranean world, as Acts 2 indicates. I am not discussing all the possible languages that would have come to Palestine, but the ones in contact with Palestine with which Jesus could have come into contact.

<sup>13</sup> See, e.g., A. Sáenz-Badillos, A History of the Hebrew Language, trans. J. Elwolde (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993), 25–27; M. Hadas-Lebel, Histoire de

Asiatic language family can be divided into a number of subgroups and subbranches. In ancient times, these included the Egyptian language, written with Demotic characters (and which later under Christian influence was developed into Coptic).<sup>14</sup> The Semitic subgroup of languages would have been the most widespread in Palestine and the surrounding areas. Many of these languages would have been regional varieties of Aramaic, which resulted once the influence of the Persian Empire had been curtailed in the fourth century BCE. Examples of Aramaic dialects would include Palestinian Aramaic spoken in Palestine,<sup>15</sup> and Nabataean spoken in the Nabataean region that stretched from east of the Jordan to the Negev.<sup>16</sup> Hebrew, if it were a spoken language of the time (see below), would also have been one of these Semitic languages. Besides the Afro-Asiatic languages, there would have been several languages from the Indo-European family that may have been spoken by Jesus as well, in particular the koine Greek of the first century and Latin. There were of course other possible languages throughout the Roman Empire of the first century, but these would have constituted the major languages that Jesus may have spoken on the basis of contact with native speakers.

On the basis of his contact through living and travel, there are six possible languages that Jesus may have spoken: Palestinian Aramaic, Hebrew, koine Greek, Latin, Ancient Egyptian and Nabataean. Jesus is not recorded as having passed through or spent any time in Nabataea, and so it is unlikely he spoke Nabataean, though it was a possibility. If the account of Jesus traveling to Egypt is to be taken seriously (see Matt 2:13–21), there is the possibility that Jesus would have at least come into passive contact with speakers of ancient Egyptian, over the course of what would have been at most two years in Egypt. However, the Jewish community in Egypt would have had Greek or Aramaic as la langue Hébraïque: Des origines à l'époque de la Mishna (Paris: Peeters, 1995), esp. 8–9, 12–21; K. Katzner, The Languages of the World, 3rd ed. (London: Routledge, 2002), 7, 27–28; cf. Comrie, “Languages of the World,” esp. 958–959, 973.

---

<sup>14</sup> Katzner, Languages, 158–159.

<sup>15</sup> See L. T. Stuckenbruck, “An Approach to the New Testament through Aramaic Sources: The Recent Methodological Debate,” JSP 8 (1991): 3–29; cf. J. A. Fitzmyer, “The Phases of the Aramaic Language,” in his A Wandering Aramean: Collected Aramaic Essays, SBLMS 25 (Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1979), 57–84.

<sup>16</sup> See G. W. Bowersock, Roman Arabia (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1983), 12–27, 59–75, 90–109. Nabataean has now been found in some of the Nahal Hever documents.

its first language,<sup>17</sup> and so Jesus' learning Egyptian would have been unlikely. There is little doubt that Jesus heard Latin on numerous occasions, as it was used by those in authority in the Roman Empire, but again it would have been a passive use as he would not have needed it for any regular communication. The question regarding Hebrew (see below) is whether Hebrew was a ritual language, or whether it was an active language. In any case, as a Jewish man with religious interests there is at least the opportunity for Jesus to have learned Hebrew. On the basis of what has been noted above, Jesus no doubt had active contact with users of Greek and Aramaic, with the likelihood that Aramaic was the first language of his home.

4. New Testament Evidence for the Languages that Jesus Spoke

The evidence from the New Testament regarding languages that Jesus spoke provides a variety of direct and indirect evidence, as well as what might best be called inferential evidence. There are no direct statements regarding Jesus' knowledge of language in the gospels, so far as I can tell.

4.1. Direct Evidence

Direct evidence involves an episode or episodes in the New Testament in which Jesus is depicted as either actively using or passively understanding a given language. There is direct evidence of various kinds that Jesus actively used Greek, Aramaic and Hebrew.

---

<sup>17</sup> For Aramaic Egyptian evidence, see Fitzmyer, Wandering Aramean, passim; for Greek Egyptian Jewish evidence, besides documentary papyri and translation of the Old Greek Bible (Septuagint), see V. Tcherikover, Hellenistic Civilization and the Jews, trans. S. Applebaum (New York: Atheneum, 1975 [1959]), 347, who states that "Jews outside Palestine spoke, wrote, and generally thought in Greek," citing evidence including Philo, Conf. Ling. 129, who refers to Greek as "our language" (524–525). It is worth noting that the vast majority of Jews who lived in the Greco-Roman world lived outside of Palestine and Greek was their first language, whether they learned Aramaic or Hebrew as a second language or not. See S. E. Porter, "The Greek of the Jews and Early Christians: The Language of the People," in In Search of Philip R. Davies: Whose Festschrift is it Anyway?, ed. D. Burns and J. Rogerson (London: T&T Clark, forthcoming).

4.1.1. Greek

All four of the gospels are written in Greek. Papias says that there were logia of Matthew in a Semitic language (according to Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.39.16), but scholars on this point are undecided what this passage means and how it relates to our canonical Gospels.<sup>18</sup> The extant literary evidence is that the gospels as we know them were in Greek from the earliest records that we have. This means that Jesus is clearly depicted in the Gospels as speaking and understanding Greek in virtually all of his conversations. This means that he is recorded as speaking in Greek with his closest associates, such as the disciples and other close followers, his opponents such as the Pharisees and other religious leaders, those he encounters in the everyday routine of life, extraordinary people that he encounters, and religious and civic authorities. On the basis of this appearing to be an unrealistic possibility, earlier scholarship at one time posited that the gospels must have been translated documents out of the Semitic language that Jesus spoke on all such occasions.<sup>19</sup> However, no such earlier documents have been discovered. More to the point, however, even many who hold to Jesus primarily speaking a Semitic language do not take the gospels as translated documents but as literary documents in Greek.<sup>20</sup>

4.1.2. Aramaic

The direct evidence for Jesus speaking Aramaic consists of a number of instances where Jesus is recorded as citing a few words in Aramaic. Sometimes these are phrases, but sometimes they are simply individual words (see section 5 for lists of the words). It is worth noting that in every instance where Jesus is reported as using an Aramaic phrase (Mark 5:41; 7:23; 15:34//Matt 27:46), a translation of the Aramaic is offered by the author. This does not necessarily have relevance to whether Jesus used Aramaic, but may well indicate that the author believed that the audience would not understand Aramaic without a translational gloss.

---

<sup>18</sup> For options, see L. M. McDonald and S. E. Porter, Early Christianity and its Sacred Literature (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2000), 297–298.

<sup>19</sup> See my chapter in this set of volumes on Greek Language Criteria for a recent survey of this evidence.

<sup>20</sup> See, e.g., M. Black, An Aramaic Approach to the Gospels and Acts, 3rd ed. (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1967), 274.

4.1.3. Hebrew

Direct evidence regarding Jesus speaking Hebrew is very limited, and consists of his possibly speaking Hebrew when he calls out to God while on the cross: eloi, eloi, lama sabachthani (Mark 15:34; see discussion below). There is dispute among scholars over the language of this cry in the two New Testament passages.

Thus the direct evidence is strong that Jesus spoke Greek, because he is recorded as speaking Greek, while there is also direct evidence that he spoke some Aramaic and perhaps Hebrew.

4.2. Indirect Evidence

Indirect evidence consists of situations and circumstances, including conversational partners, where the evidence, while not directly evidencing the language used, would indirectly indicate that a particular language was spoken by Jesus. The indirect evidence is much more difficult to assess, because of the diachronic linguistic developments of the Jewish people. Even though the Jewish people spoke Hebrew when they went into exile in 586 BCE, when they emerged from exile after only a relatively short amount of time in 537 BCE, they spoke Aramaic, the lingua franca of the extensive Persian Empire. Those who resettled in Palestine continued widespread use of Aramaic. For those Jews who relocated to other places in the wider Mediterranean world, the evidence indicates that by the time of the first century CE the vast majority of the Jews of the Mediterranean world, and especially the vast majority living outside of Palestine, spoke Greek as a first language. As a result, the indirect evidence seems to indicate that Jesus spoke Greek, Aramaic and Hebrew, and possibly Latin.

4.2.1. Greek

In previous research, I have investigated contexts in which the various factors, such as conversationalists and subjects, may have indicated the use of Greek on a given occasion. These occasions include (others have been explored as well): John 12:20–28, Jesus' discussion with certain Greeks; Matt 8:5–13//John 4:46–54, Jesus' conversation with the centurion or commander; Luke 17:11–19, Jesus' conversation with a Samaritan leper; John 4:4–26, Jesus' conversation with the Samaritan woman; Mark 2:13–14//Matt 9:9//Luke 5:27–28, Jesus' calling of Levi/Matthew; Mark 7:25–30//Matt 15:21–28, Jesus' conversation with the Syrophenician or Canaanite woman; Mark 12:13–17//Matt 22:16–22//Luke 20:2–26, Jesus' conversation with the Pharisees and Herodi-ans regarding the Roman coin; Mark 8:27–30//Matt 16:13–20//Luke 9:18–22, Jesus’ conversation with his disciples near Caesarea Philippi; Mark 15:2–5//Matt 27:11–14//Luke 23:2–4//John 18:29–38, Jesus’ trial before Pilate.<sup>21</sup>

4.2.2. Aramaic

There is significant and noteworthy indirect evidence that Aramaic was spoken by Jesus on a number of occasions. Even though the vast majority of the Jews worldwide may have spoken Greek even as a first language, probably the numbers were larger who spoke Aramaic in Palestine as a first language. Nehemiah 8:8 indicates that when Nehemiah read the law to the Jewish people who had returned to Palestine from exile, they could not understand the sacred text in Hebrew, and he had to translate into their language, which would have been Aramaic (hence Targums were developed). Similarly, the Jewish people of Palestine in the first century, including the religious leaders—regardless of whatever other language they may or may not have known—continued to use Aramaic as their first language. Thus, when Jesus spoke with various Jewish people he encountered, such as the local Jewish population up to Jewish religious leaders—even though he is recorded as using Greek<sup>22</sup>—he would have used Aramaic.

4.2.3. Hebrew

The indirect evidence for continued use of Hebrew apart from religious contexts is not strong. Even though many of the Dead Sea Scrolls were written in Hebrew, this does not necessarily indicate the widespread use of Hebrew by the local population, or by Jesus. Nevertheless, it is still possible that there is indirect evidence that Jesus used Hebrew, especially when he was in a specifically liturgical context. One of these occasions may have been the episode in Luke 4:16–21 in the Nazareth synagogue, when he is handed the scroll of Isaiah to read. Jesus reads a passage that combines Isa 61:1 with Isa 58:6. The composite nature of his quotation may raise the question of whether Jesus was reading a paraphrase or even an Aramaic paraphrase, but the presumption would be that he read in Hebrew from the biblical scroll, perhaps interpreting it as he read.

<sup>21</sup> See Porter, Criteria, 141–164; idem, “Luke 17:11–19 and the Criteria for Authenticity Revisited,” JSHJ 1.2 (2003): 201–224.

<sup>22</sup> The exception would be those contexts noted above where the evidence indicates that Jesus used Greek.

4.2.4. Latin

Roman officials who were stationed throughout the Empire made virtually no attempt to become linguistically acclimatized, especially in a relative frontier posting such as Palestine. Instead, they carried on much of their local business by using the lingua franca of the Empire, Greek, and by using the official language, Latin, when official circumstances warranted it. As noted above, it is entirely possible and even most likely that Pilate spoke to Jesus (as well as the Jewish leaders) in Greek. However, Pilate knew Latin, and so the conversation between Jesus and Pilate provides the only possible indirect evidence that their conversation may have been in Latin. This evidence is weak.

4.3. Inferential Evidence

Inferential evidence is evidence where there is not either direct or indirect evidence, but where inferences can be drawn on the basis of the contexts presented in the gospels regarding the languages that Jesus may have spoken. The inferential evidence is that Jesus spoke Greek, Aramaic, and possibly Hebrew.

4.3.1. Greek

The inferential support for Jesus actively using Greek is severalfold. One is that the vast majority of Jews in the Mediterranean world used Greek as a first language, and if not as a first, as a second language. Another is that there were numerous Jews, even within Palestine, who used Greek, as is indicated by a range of evidence (e.g., Acts 6:1, which refers to Greek-speaking Jews;<sup>23</sup> the further evidence is summarized below in section 5). A third is that bilingualism, or perhaps better, multilingualism, was a much more widely accepted and understood phenomenon in the ancient world, especially among oppressed peoples in the midst of the Roman Empire, than we usually recognize. As a fourth, the nature of the trade that Jesus was involved in, and the trades of his closest companions, would have required that he have a level of communicative competence in Greek to sell his products to those who traded in the area, some of whom could have come from Decapolis cities. A fifth is that Jesus came from a region, the Galilee, where there was significant influence of Greek language use. A final argument is that Jesus encountered a number of situations, involving both people and circumstances, in which it is implausible to believe that he spoke with them in another language except Greek (see the indirect evidence above).

---

<sup>23</sup> See Porter, Criteria, 141 n. 33.

4.3.2. Aramaic

The inferential support for Jesus actively using Aramaic is also manifold in nature. One is that it is the language that one would have expected a Jew to use in first-century Palestine. A second is that Jesus was a religious teacher and so he was in constant contact with those who were most closely associated with the traditional Jewish establishment, one that especially wanted to maintain many of its cultural and religious characteristics, even in the face of near-overwhelming external cultural influence from Greco-Roman society. A third is that the nature of Jesus' discussions and those with whom he conducted these conversations in many, if not most, instances fits an Aramaic language context. For example, Jesus was known and widely recognized as a teacher of parables, and the parables that he used were often associated not with philosophical concepts but with situations in day-to-day life (e.g., sowing, managing land, etc.).<sup>24</sup> A fourth is that there are glimpses throughout the gospels, by means of the citations of Jesus speaking Aramaic, especially at crucial times (such as during a healing), that he regularly spoke Aramaic, even if the gospels are in Greek for a later Greek-speaking audience.

4.3.3. Hebrew

There is some inferential evidence that Jesus spoke Hebrew. While this evidence is not nearly as strong as it is for the active use of Greek and Aramaic, nevertheless, the arguments are worth recounting. One is that there are a select number of episodes where it makes more sense to infer that Jesus spoke Hebrew than it does any other language. These episodes would include some of his religious encounters (e.g., with the religious leaders, such as the Sanhedrin) and the episode in

---

<sup>24</sup> See, e.g., J. Jeremias, The Parables of Jesus, trans. S. H. Hooke (London: SCM Press, 1972), 21.

Luke 4 in the Nazareth synagogue, among possibly others. Another is that Hebrew was the traditional, historical and scriptural language of the Jewish people, and it is plausible that those who were intent upon preserving the essentials of Judaism, as Jesus claimed to be (Matt 5:17–19, where he uses an example from Semitic language features), would also be interested in preserving the traditional language of the Jewish people, especially in the face of Roman oppression. A third is that there is other evidence from outside of the gospels, such as the Dead Sea community, that indicates a plausible linguistic background, and possible widespread use, at least by one group, of Hebrew.

5. Linguistic Considerations Regarding the Languages that Jesus Spoke

Before entering into more detailed linguistic considerations regarding the languages that Jesus spoke, it is worth summarizing the material evidence for the use of the major languages: Greek, Aramaic, Hebrew and Latin.<sup>25</sup>

5.1. The Evidence

5.1.1. Greek

Scholars have long recognized the role that Greek played in Palestine, including among the indigenous Jewish population there, with recent scholarship often noting the potential multilingual environment. This is legitimated by the fact that Greek, on the basis of the conquests of Alexander the Great and the subsequent establishment of his Greek Empires, which the Romans usurped, was the lingua franca of the Roman Empire, and especially of the eastern portion of that Empire. This influence of Greek as a language of trade included both Galilee in the north and major cultural centers such as Jerusalem further to the south. The evidence for the widespread use of Greek, including the possibility that Greek was a language of Jesus, entails the following considerations. There is widespread and significant epigraphic, documentary and literary evidence of the use of Greek. This includes there being more Greek than other inscriptions in most significant regions of Palestine, with Greek inscriptions roughly equaling those in Aramaic in Jerusalem. Documentary evidence includes the many preserved papyrus documents from Egypt that arise out of similar linguistic contexts, finding correlation in the Bar Kokhba Greek epistolary evidence. The literary evidence includes original Jewish works composed in Greek (e.g., 1 Esdras, 2 Maccabees, Pseudo-Eupolemus, Eupolemus, Jason of Cyrene, and possibly some testamentary literature) or translated into Greek (e.g., 1 Maccabees, Esther, Song of Songs, Lamentations and Qoheleth) in Palestine. Further, the New Testament itself, as noted above, has been transmitted from its earliest documents in Greek.

---

<sup>25</sup> In what follows, I freely paraphrase material that I first presented in Porter, “Jesus and the Use of Greek in Galilee,” 123–129; idem, “Did Jesus Ever Teach in Greek?” repr. in Studies in the Greek New Testament, SBG 6 (New York: Lang, 1996), 139–171, esp. 140–144; idem, Criteria, 164–180. A fuller bibliography is included in those publications.

5.1.2. Aramaic

Scholars have long agreed—since at least the late nineteenth century—that Aramaic constituted the predominant first language of the indigenous Jewish population of Palestine, including Galilee, and hence the primary language of Jesus, in which he had active first-language competence. The direct evidence, as noted above, is not as strong for this position as some scholars would like to think; nevertheless, this hypothesis regarding Aramaic rests securely upon a number of established facts. These include the observation that, even though Greek clearly constituted the lingua franca of the Greco-Roman world of the first century, Greek in Palestine never fully replaced Aramaic, which had become the predominant Jewish language of Palestine since the return from the exile. The claim of Aramaic to be the predominant Jewish language, in terms of primary language usage by Jews, includes the following: Aramaic portions of the biblical writings of Daniel and Ezra and non-canonical 1 Enoch, a large amount of inscriptional evidence (some may be Hebrew, and most is proper names),<sup>26</sup> including ossuaries, and epistolary, papyrological and literary evidence (some late, however), both from Qumran and from other Judean Desert sites such as Murabba'at, Masada and Nahal Hever. The direct evidence for Jesus' use of Aramaic, as indicated above, includes Mark 5:41 with talitha koum, 7:34 with ephphatha,<sup>27</sup> and 15:34//Matt 27:46 with

<sup>26</sup> Fitzmyer, "Languages of Palestine," 149.

<sup>27</sup> See J. Jeremias, New Testament Theology, trans. J. Bowden (London: SCM Press, 1971), 7 n. 4, for an argument for this probably as Aramaic.

Aramaic used in Mark and possibly a composite Hebrew/Aramaic quotation used in Matthew,<sup>28</sup> for complete clauses (even if only one word in length), and a number of other Aramaic words: e.g., abba (Mark 14:36), amen (used 59 times in the gospels);<sup>29</sup> bar/bene (Matt 16:17; Mark 3:17), be'el (Matt 10:2; 12:27//Luke 11:19; but see below); gehinnam (Mark 9:43, 45, 47; Matt 5:22, 29–30; 10:28; 18:9; 23:15, 33; Luke 12:5); kepa (John 1:43); mamona (Matt 6:24; Luke 16:9, 11, 13); pasha (Mark 14:14//Matt 26:18//Luke 22:7; Matt 26:2; Luke 22:8, 15); reqa (Matt 5:22); sabbeta (Mark 3:4; Matt 12:5, 10–12); sata (Matt 13:33//Luke 13:21); satana (Mark 3:23, 26; 8:33; Matt 12:26; 16:23; Luke 10:18; 11:18; 13:16; 22:31).<sup>30</sup>

Throughout discussion regarding the strength of the Aramaic evidence, there have been some scholars who believed that Aramaic was in a period of decline in the two centuries on either side of the time of Jesus Christ. However, in the last fifty years or so, this theory has receded in the light of a plethora of important language-related discoveries that have confirmed the place of the Aramaic language within Palestine, and hence in Jesus' ambit.

5.1.3. Hebrew

By comparison to those who argue for the use of Aramaic by Jesus, there is a relatively small group of scholars that maintains that some form of Hebrew—either biblical or Mishnaic—was an important language in first-century Palestine and used actively by Jesus, possibly as a first and certainly as a second language. According to Birkeland, Jesus, being from the lower classes and not the elite, would have used Hebrew as opposed to Aramaic.<sup>31</sup> Segal, on the other hand, on the basis of the rabbinic writings, suggests that Mishnaic Hebrew was the predominant Jewish vernacular for Jews of all social levels from 400 BCE to the middle of the second century CE.<sup>32</sup> The evidence on which such conclusions as Segal's rest includes: the Hebrew Judean Desert documents, such as those from Qumran and the Bar Kokhba letters; a

<sup>28</sup> Jeremias, Theology, 5 n. 2.

<sup>29</sup> See Jeremias, Theology, 35–36.

<sup>30</sup> All of the above are taken from Jeremias, Theology, 5–6. I exclude proper names and place names. Some have suggested that “son of man” is Aramaic, or at least distinctly Semitic. This is questionable. See Porter, Criteria, 167–168 n. 113.

<sup>31</sup> H. Birkeland, The Language of Jesus (Oslo: Dybwad, 1954).

<sup>32</sup> M. H. Segal, A Grammar of Mishnaic Hebrew (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1927), 5–19.

small number of Hebrew inscriptions, including ossuaries; and numismatic and literary evidence, such as the writing of Ben Sira. Although Jesus is not recorded as reading anything aloud in Luke 4:16–30, the evidence may include at least part of what he uttered from the cross (see above), the use of amen (if this has not been taken over into Aramaic), ephphatha (Mark 7:34; probably taken over into Aramaic), korban (Mark 7:11), and zebul (Matt 10:25; 12:27//Luke 11:19), only the last two actually Hebrew.<sup>33</sup>

5.1.4. Latin

Though apparently Inchofer proposed in the seventeenth century that Jesus spoke Latin, this view has not been widely held.<sup>34</sup> The use of Latin has usually been attributed to the Roman officials who were placed in Palestine and elsewhere and who were functioning in an official capacity.<sup>35</sup> This would account for much of the official evidence for Latin use at the time, which consists of inscriptions such as for public declarations (including the trilingual titulus on the cross; see John 19:20, where this Latin term is used), and on buildings, aqueducts, tombstones, milestones, and legionary tiles. Nevertheless, there is some evidence to summarize regarding non-official uses of Latin in Palestine during this time,<sup>36</sup> some of which may indicate a possible use by Jesus. This evidence includes: some common inscriptional evidence, such as storage jars with Latin on them; and some documentary evidence, such as a fragment of Vergil found at Masada and Latinisms in some Bar Kokhba letters. There are also a number of Latin words used in the gospels. While some of these are easily dismissed regarding their significance (e.g., units of measure, coins, etc.), others have some significance. Such words include: census, custodia, praetorium, sudarium, and flagellium. Some of the Latin words appear in Greek texts for the

<sup>33</sup> Jeremias, Theology, 7.

<sup>34</sup> A. Schweitzer, The Quest for the Historical Jesus, trans. W. Montgomery (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1910), 270.

<sup>35</sup> Fitzmyer, "Languages of Palestine," 129. See 129–133 for evidence.

<sup>36</sup> See A. Millard, "Latin in First-Century Palestine," in Solving Riddles and Untying Knots: Biblical, Epigraphic and Semitic Studies in Honor of Jonas C. Greenfield, ed. Z. Zevit, S. Gitin and M. Sokoloff (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1995), 451–458; summarized in S. E. Porter, "Latin Language," in Dictionary of New Testament Background, ed. C. A. Evans and S. E. Porter (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2001), 630–631.

first time in the first century. However, few of these words are used by Jesus, only by the gospel writers.

5.2. The Analysis

A linguistic analysis of the evidence indicates that Aramaic was probably a first language for the majority of Jews born and living in Palestine, with the likelihood that Greek was a second language for many of them, with at least passive competence if not active competence. Latin may have been an active second language for a limited number in strategic positions, and a passive second language for others (e.g., some tax collectors or possible religious leaders). The evidence is significant and strong that Greek was a second language for many indigenous Jews in Palestine, and a first language for some of them, and especially for those who were born and reared outside of Palestine (whether Aramaic was a first language or not), an example of such a person being Paul the apostle (born outside of Palestine, with Greek as a first language, and probably Aramaic and Hebrew as second languages, though with active competence). For those born outside of Palestine Latin too could have been an active or, probably more likely, passive second language depending upon one's social, political and economic status. Hebrew appears to have been a second language for Jews from both within and outside of Palestine in a limited number of cases, especially those connected with the religious hierarchy (e.g., Pharisaism, or as liturgical leaders).

The answer to the question of where Jesus fits within this analysis appears to be that Jesus had active multilingual competence in at least Greek and Aramaic, and possibly Hebrew. As a native-born Jew in Galilee, and closely associated with maintaining Jewish tradition, he probably learned Aramaic in his home as a first language, and continued to use this language throughout his life, both for casual conversation and for formal teaching. The evidence also indicates, however, that "a knowledge of Greek can no longer be denied to Jesus."<sup>37</sup> In his business as a tradesman in Galilee, he would have needed to be able to converse in Greek. He probably acquired this as a second language but developed an active competency, certainly enough to converse with first-language Greek speakers, and possibly even to teach in Greek (e.g., Matt 4:25–7:23). This conclusion is supported by the direct and indirect evidence in that it fits completely with the evidence from the gospels themselves and the evidence from the early church. Jesus is depicted in the gospels as being able to converse with those from within Palestine and those from without, including such people as the Syrophoenician woman, the Samaritan woman and Pilate, among others. The early church does not seem to know of a message or teaching of Jesus that was not in its earliest form recorded in Greek.<sup>38</sup> As for his knowledge of Hebrew, this is more difficult to say. However, the evidence seems to indicate that he had at least some active knowledge of Hebrew, enough to read from a scriptural text. It is highly unlikely that Jesus had active competence in Latin, perhaps possible that he had passive competence, but most likely that he conversed with Pilate in Greek.

---

<sup>37</sup> H. D. Betz, "Wellhausen's Dictum 'Jesus was not a Christian, but a Jew' in Light of Present Scholarship," ST 45 (1991): 83-110; repr. in his Antike und Christentum: Gesammelte Aufsätze IV (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1998), 1-31, here 15.

6. Conclusion

The question of the languages that Jesus spoke raises a number of issues. These issues include matters of evidence and of method. Rather than simply summarizing and discussing the kinds of material evidence that have been treated elsewhere, in this essay I attempt to put this kind of evidence within a context of what linguistic situations would have been confronted by a Jewish man born in Palestine in the first century. By framing the analysis in this way, I believe that a number of questions have been opened up in terms of the kinds of evidence, the languages that need to be considered in such an analysis, the means by which such evidence is scrutinized, and the types of conclusions that can be substantiated. The multilingualism of the first century, including Palestine, indicates a much more complex linguistic scenario than is often presented, and points toward Jesus, along with many others of his time, having multilingual competence, including at least Aramaic and Greek.

---

<sup>38</sup> Betz, "Wellhausen's Dictum," 12–16.

THE SELF-UNDERSTANDING OF JESUS

MATTHIAS KREPLIN

When we look at the history of research, we see that two methodological approaches have been taken in studying the question of how Jesus understood himself.<sup>1</sup> On the one hand, some have attempted to show that Jesus expressed his self-understanding by using a title of sovereignty.<sup>2</sup> Our first question must therefore be whether Jesus chose to designate himself by means of a title, either one formed by earlier

---

<sup>1</sup> The following works are of fundamental importance for this subject, and will be referred to in subsequent footnotes only by brief titles: Jürgen Becker, Jesus von Nazareth (Berlin: Walter de Gruyter 1996). Hans Bietenhard, “Der Menschensohn”—ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου: Sprachliche und religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchungen zu einem Begriff der synoptischen Evangelien 1: Sprachlicher und religionsgeschichtlicher Teil, ANRW II 25.1 (1982): 265–350. Marcus J. Borg, Meeting Jesus Again for the First Time: The Historical Jesus and the Heart of Contemporary Faith (San Francisco: Harper 1996). Carsten Colpe, ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, ThWNT 8 (1969), cols. 403–481. Joachim Gnllka, Jesus von Nazareth: Botschaft und Geschichte (Freiburg: Herder, 3rd ed., 1993 [1st ed. 1990]). Ferdinand Hahn, Christologische Hoheitstitel: Ihre Geschichte im frühen Christentum, FRLANT 83 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht 1963). Marinus de Jonge, God’s Final Envoy: Early Christology and Jesus’ Own View of His Mission, Studying the Historical Jesus (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans 1998). Matthias Kreplin, Das Selbstverständnis Jesu: Hermeneutische und christologische Reflexion. Historisch-kritische Analyse, WUNT 2.141 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck 2001). Ragnar Leivestad, “Der apokalyptische Menschensohn ein theologisches Phantom,” ASTI 6 (1968): 49–105 [cited as Menschensohn]. Idem, Jesus—Messias—Menschensohn, ANRW II 25.1 (1982): 220–226 [cited as Messias]. Helmut Merklein, Jesu Botschaft von der Gottesherrschaft: Eine Skizze, SBS 111 (Stuttgart: Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1983). Mogens Müller, Der Ausdruck “Menschensohn” in den Evangelien: Voraussetzungen und Bedeutung, Acta theologica danica 17 (Leiden: Brill 1984). Ed Parish Sanders, The Historical Figure of Jesus (London: Allen Lane Penguin Press, 2nd ed., 1995 [1st ed. 1993]). Gerd Theissen and Annette Merz, Der historische Jesus. Ein Lehrbuch (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht 1996). Hans Weder, Gegenwart und Gottesherrschaft: Überlegungen zum Zeitverständnis bei Jesus und im frühen Christentum, Biblisch-theologische Studien 20 (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1993).

<sup>2</sup> Thus e.g., Joachim Jeremias, Neutestamentliche Theologie 1: Die Verkündigung Jesu, 2nd ed. (Berlin: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 1961), 239–241, and Peter Stuhlmacher, Biblische Theologie des Neuen Testaments (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht 1992), 107–125. Frequently, there is an apologetic interest in the background here: the post-East ascription to Jesus of the titles of sovereignty is to be legitimated by showing that Jesus himself used at least one of these titles as a self-designation.

tradition or one that he himself formed (Section 1); in this context, we must pay special attention to the vigorously debated question of the “Son of Man” (Section 2). On the other hand, independently of all titles, scholars have asked what claim is implicit in Jesus’ conduct and in his preaching, since this would indicate which role he regarded as his own (Section 3). These two paths lead to results which at first sight appear contradictory. The task of the concluding argumentation will be to show that this apparent contradiction is in reality deeply rooted in Jesus’ own self-understanding (Section 4).

1. Did Jesus Use One or More Traditional Titles in order to Express His Self-Understanding?

There has long been a broad consensus in the historical-critical research into the life of Jesus that he did not require others to address him as “Messiah” (Hebrew: מָשִׁיחַ; Aramaic: מְשִׁיחָא; Greek: ὁ χριστός),<sup>3</sup> “Son of David,”<sup>4</sup> or “king (of the Jews),” and that he did not designate himself in this way. When we look at the New Testament gospels—including John!—we see at once that almost all the verses in which these titles are attested fall into one of two categories: either these are clearly redactional passages, or else other persons ascribe these titles of sovereignty to Jesus. There are only a very few passages in which Jesus himself reacts positively to one of these messianic titles.<sup>5</sup> We must

<sup>3</sup> Cf. e.g., Borg, Meeting Jesus, 29; Ferdinand Hahn, EWNT 3, 1154. This thesis is confirmed by the fact that neither Q nor the Gospel of Thomas employs the title χριστός.

<sup>4</sup> Even if Jesus was of Davidic descent (this is discussed by Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 183–184), nothing indicates that he based a claim to be Messiah on this genealogy.

<sup>5</sup> These passages are the following:

First, at Luke 19:40 (specifically Lukan material), Jesus welcomes the messianic acclamation by the disciples when he enters Jerusalem. Obviously, however, this logion of Jesus depends on its link with the following prophecy about the future of Jerusalem (Luke 19:41–44), which must be regarded as a vaticinium ex eventu. This means that Luke 19:40 must be seen as a secondary construction.

Secondly, according to the tradition of the Gospel of Mark, when the high priest asks: “Are you the Christ, the Son of the Blessed?” Jesus replies: “I am; and you will see the Son of Man seated at the right hand of Power, and coming with the clouds of heaven” (Mark 14:61–62; on this, cf. Matt 26:63–64/Luke 22:67–70). It is however scarcely possible to demonstrate the authenticity of the high priest’s question and of Jesus’ reply; the same applies to the similar logia which are transmitted in Matthew and Luke. The high concentration of central Christological titles and theologoumena such as “Christ,” “Son of the Blessed,” “the coming of the Son of Man with the assume that they were all created after Easter. John 6:15 shows clearly that Jesus rejected the people's wish to make him king—and how could such a trait have entered the tradition, if Jesus had in fact described himself as Messiah or king of Israel?

“Son of God” as a title (various expressions are found in Hebrew and Aramaic; in Greek, we often find ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ) may or may not have been in use as early as the time of Jesus as a title of sovereignty,<sup>6</sup> at any rate, Jesus did not claim this for himself.<sup>7</sup> Here too, almost all the relevant passages involve ascriptions of this title to Jesus by others.<sup>8</sup> And it is likely that the absolute use of the term “the Son” (ὁ υἱὸς), to which the demonstrably secondary address of God as “my Father” corresponds, does not go back to Jesus, but originated after Easter.<sup>9</sup>

The thesis that Jesus understood himself as the embodiment of the pre-existent Wisdom (Hebrew: חֵכֶמָה; Greek: σοφία) is untenable.<sup>10</sup>

It is probable that the historical Jesus was occasionally addressed by the polite Jewish form of address “Lord” (Aramaic: רַבִּי; Greek:

---

clouds of heaven,” and “sitting at the right hand of God,” strongly suggests that this passage has been consciously shaped from a post-Easter perspective.

Thirdly, in his trial before Pilate (Mark 15:2/Matt 27:11/Luke 23:3/John 18:37), Pilate asks: “Are you the king of the Jews?” and Jesus replies ambiguously, “You say it” (σὺ λέγεις). This answer can be paraphrased in two ways. It can be understood as agreeing with Pilate's question: “As you say, that is indeed the case.” But it can also be understood as an evasive form of disagreement: “You say this, but my opinion is different.” This means that Jesus' ambiguous reply does not permit us to infer that he maintained before Pilate the claim to be the Messiah.

It is nevertheless significant that the two passages in which Jesus comes closest to making a claim to a messianic title come in the passion narrative. On this, cf. Section 4 below.

<sup>6</sup> On the disputed interpretation of the only pre-Christian attestation of a messianic significance of the title “Son of God” (4Q 246) which has been discovered up to now, cf. Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 491–492 and 527–528.

<sup>7</sup> Borg, Meeting Jesus Again, 29.

<sup>8</sup> Only two passages in the synoptics assert that Jesus himself called himself “Son of God”: viz. the reply of Jesus to the question of the high priest, “Are you the Christ, the Son of the Blessed?” (Mark 14:61/Matt 26:63/Luke 22:70), which is transmitted in Mark and is most likely inauthentic (cf. n. 4 above); and the account of the mockery of Jesus in Matthew's redaction (Matt 27:43).

<sup>9</sup> Thus Hahn, Hoheitstitel, 321–327, and Helmut Merklein, Die Gottesherrschaft als Handlungsprinzip: Untersuchung zur Ethik Jesu, Forschungen zur Bibel 34 (Würzburg: Echter Verlag, 2nd ed. 1981 [1st ed. 1978]), 89.

<sup>10</sup> This is given consideration by Borg, Meeting Jesus Again, 102. In the two passages which Borg adduces as evidence (Luke 11:49–50/Matt 23:34–35 and Luke 7:33–35/Matt 11:18–19), the expression σοφία does not refer unambiguously to Jesus. Cf. e.g., Hengel, Early Christology, 84 and 86.

κύριος); but it was only after Easter that this address acquired its Christological significance.<sup>11</sup> Similarly, it is likely that the title “prophet” (Hebrew: נָבִיא; Aramaic: נְבִיאָא; Greek: προφήτης) was applied to Jesus.<sup>12</sup> There is however no indication that Jesus identified himself with this title.<sup>13</sup> Finally, Jesus was frequently also addressed as “teacher” (Aramaic: רַבִּי or רַבּוּנִי; Greek διδάσκαλος), but there is no authentic passage in which Jesus demands that others address him in this way.<sup>14</sup>

Since therefore Jesus did not use any of these titles as a self-designation or insist upon being addressed with one of these titles,<sup>15</sup> it is scarcely possible to find any access to the self-understanding of the historical Jesus via these titles.

2. Jesus—the Son of Man

The debate about the expression “the Son of Man” has a different character. Scholars have discussed a large number of tradition-historical alternatives and interpretations of this phrase, but there is as yet no sign of any consensus.<sup>16</sup>

In the early Christian writings which have come down to us, without counting clear parallels, there are about fifty logia in which Jesus is called the Son of Man. With very few exceptions,<sup>17</sup> the concept is

<sup>11</sup> Thus Hahn, Hoheitstitel, 95.

<sup>12</sup> Cf. Mark 6:15/Luke 9:8; Mark 8:28/Matt 16:14/Luke 9:19. Clearly, Jesus was rumored to be John the Baptist, risen from the dead (cf. Mark 6:14.16/Matt 14:1f./Luke 9:7.9).

<sup>13</sup> Thus also Becker, Jesus, 267. In two probably authentic logia (Mark 6:4/Matt 13:57/Luke 4:24/John 4:44 and Matt 23:37/Luke 13:34), Jesus compares his own fate with that of the prophets. However, the third prophet-logion on the lips of Jesus (Luke 13:33) is probably a post-Easter creation (cf. François Bovon, EKKNT 3.2, 444). The two authentic prophet-logia do not however permit us to conclude that Jesus understood himself as a prophet in the Old Testament sense, or as the kind of eschatological prophet who was expected to come in the last days.

<sup>14</sup> Even John 13:13–14 shows that Jesus did not lay claim to the title of “teacher.”

<sup>15</sup> Thus e.g., also Becker, Jesus, 249 and 271; Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 480.

<sup>16</sup> Recent comprehensive presentations of the hypotheses that have been proposed with regard to the “Son of Man” problem and the scholarly discussion of these hypotheses can be found in Anton Vögtle, Die “Gretchenfrage” des Menschensohns. Bilanz und Perspektive, QD 152 (Freiburg: Herder 1994), 22–175; and Müller, Menschensohn (1984), 27–65, 157–167, and 219–244.

<sup>17</sup> The anarthrous concept υἱὸς ἀνθρώπου referring to the person of Jesus is found in early Christian literature only in the quotation from the Psalm at Heb 2:6, in the two visions Rev 1:13 and 4:14, and at John 5:27. In Heb 2:6, this concept serves to identify Jesus with the affirmations made in Ps 8; the author presupposes that Jesus always employed with two articles: ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου. In the Jesus tradition, this expression, which sounds strange in Greek, is found—with one exception<sup>18</sup>—only in logia which are attributed to Jesus himself. It is found in all the sources apart from the epistolary literature: in Q, Mark, the material specific to Matthew and to Luke, in John, and in the Gospel of Thomas.<sup>19</sup> The criterion of multiple attestation makes it impossible to dismiss all the “Son of Man” logia wholesale as post-Easter creations.<sup>20</sup> This phrase must therefore go back to the earthly Jesus himself.

The Greek expression ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου translates the “determinate”<sup>21</sup> Aramaic concept ܒܪ ܢܫܐ, which was frequently used in the same sense as the “indeterminate” concept ܒܪ ܢܫܐ. Historically speaking, the more original forms had an initial Aleph—ܒܪ ܢܫܐ or ܒܪ ܢܫܐ—and it is uncertain whether the shorter forms came into general use only in the second century of the Common Era, or (as is more probable) were already employed in the Galilean Aramaic dialect in the time of Jesus.<sup>22</sup> This Aramaic expression could be used in various senses. Initially, it was practically identical with ܢܫܐ, “the (individual) human being”; this basic meaning then led to its use as a generic concept designating “the human being (as such)”; finally, it is “the Son of Man.” In the visions in Revelation, the point (echoing Dan 7:13) is that Jesus looks like a human being. John 5:27 employs the anarthrous concept υἱὸς ἀνθρώπου wholly in the sense of a generic concept, in order to emphasize the humanity of Jesus which makes it possible for Jesus, the Son of God, to sit in judgment upon human beings. On this interpretation, cf. Kreplin, Selbstverständnis, 188–191.

---

<sup>18</sup> The exception is Acts 7:56, where the dying Stephen has a vision of the heavenly Son of Man. As at Heb 2:6, this passage presupposes that Jesus is “the Son of Man.”

<sup>19</sup> We could add to these the passage from the Gospel of the Hebrews which Jerome quotes at De viris illustribus 2; cf. also Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 2.23.13. However, even these two very late attestations display exactly the same linguistic usage as the early Christian sources.

<sup>20</sup> This position was maintained in the 1960’s by Philipp Vielhauer, “Jesus und der Menschensohn. Zur Diskussion mit H.E. Tödt und E. Schweizer,” ZTK 60 (1963): 133–177. More recently, it can also be found in Anton Vögtle, Die “Gretchenfrage” (n. 16 above).

<sup>21</sup> The distinction between “determinate” and “indeterminate” forms lies in the so-called emphaticus ending, which does not completely correspond to a definite article, but comes close to this: cf. Hans Bauer and Pontus Leander, Grammatik des Biblisch-Aramäischen (Hildesheim: Olms 1962), 84–85.

<sup>22</sup> On this, cf. Colpe, ThWNT VIII, col. 406; Bietenhard, Menschensohn, 272.

was also used in the indefinite senses as a substitute for indefinite pronouns such as “one,” “someone or other,” or “someone.”<sup>23</sup>

The Johannine logia<sup>24</sup> occupy a special place among the Son of Man logia in the gospel literature. Since they are marked by the independent theology of the Gospel of John and have no parallels in the other sources, the starting point for our analysis must be the synoptic Son of Man logia, some of which are attested multiply. It is customary to divide these synoptic Son of Man logia<sup>25</sup> into three thematic groups: the logia about the earthly activity of the Son of Man;<sup>26</sup> the logia about the suffering Son of Man;<sup>27</sup> and the logia about the eschatological activity of the Son of Man.<sup>28</sup>

Are logia from all three groups authentic logia of Jesus? Or do logia from one or two groups form the starting point for the genesis of those logia which were formed at a secondary stage? Does the stable

<sup>23</sup> Colpe, ThWNT 8, 405f., and Bietenhard, Menschensohn, 272.

<sup>24</sup> John 1:51; 3:13–15; 6:27; 6:53; 6:61–62; 8:28; 9:35–38; 12:23; 12:34; 13:31. The indeterminate use of the expression υἱὸς ἀνθρώπου at John 5:27 is not a Son of Man logion: cf. n. 16 above.

<sup>25</sup> The only Son of Man logion in the Gospel of Thomas (Gos. Thom 86) has a direct parallel in the synoptic gospels.

<sup>26</sup> This group includes:

- in Q: Luke 6:22/Matt 5:11; Luke 7:33–34/Matt 11:18–19; Luke 9:58/Matt 8:20/Gos. Thom 86; perhaps also Luke 11:30/Matt 12:40; Luke 12:10/Matt 12:31–32/(Mark 3:28–29).
- in Mark: Mark 2:10/Matt 9:6/Luke 5:24; Mark 2:28/Matt 12:8/Luke 6:5; Mark 10:45/Matt 20:28 (Luke 22:27).
- in the Matthean redaction: 16:13/(Mark 8:27).
- in the special Lukan material: 19:10.
- in the later textual tradition: Luke 9:55b and Matt 18:11 (these two passages are not found in the earliest manuscripts).

<sup>27</sup> This group includes:

- in Mark: Mark 8:31/Matt 16:21/Luke 9:22; Mark 9:9/Matt 17:9; Mark 9:12/Matt 17:12; Mark 9:31/Matt 17:22–23/Luke 9:44; Mark 10:33–34/Matt 20:18–19/Luke 18:31–33; Mark 14:21/Matt 26:24/Luke 22:22; Mark 14:41/Matt 26:45.
- in the Matthean redaction: 26:2.
- in the Lukan redaction or the special Lukan material: 17:25; 22:48; 24:7.

Since Q contains no predictions of future suffering which refer exclusively to the person of Jesus, it contains no logia about the suffering of the Son of Man.

<sup>28</sup> This group includes:

- in Q: Luke 12:8–9/(Matt 10:32–33); Luke 12:39–40/Matt 24:43–44; Luke 17:24/Matt 24:27; Luke 17:25.30/Matt 24:37.39;
- in Mark: Mark 13:26/Luke 21:27; Matt 24:30–31; Mark 14:62/Matt 26:64/Luke 22:69.
- in the Matthean redaction or the special Matthean material: Matt 10:23; 13:37.41; 16:28; 19:28; 25:13; 25:31.
- in the Lukan redaction or the special Lukan material: Luke 17:22; Luke 18:8b; Luke 21:36; Acts 7:56.

expression “the Son of Man” take up an established title, or was it formed by Jesus himself or by earliest Christianity? If the latter is the case, what is the substance of this expression? In order to clarify these questions, various hypotheses have been proposed, sometimes in combination with one another.

2.1 First Hypothesis: At the Outset Stands “Son of Man,” an Apocalyptic Title of Sovereignty

A whole generation of older German-speaking scholarship<sup>29</sup> assumed the existence of an apocalyptic expectation of the Son of Man, attested for the first time in the Book of Daniel. In Dan 7, the vision of the four beasts and the Son of Man is described and then interpreted. At the end of the account of the vision, we read:

(13) I saw in the night visions, and behold, with the clouds of heaven there came one like a son of man [כְּבָר אֲנָשׁ] and he came to the Ancient of Days and was presented before him. (14) And to him was given dominion and glory and kingdom, that all peoples, nations, and languages should serve him; his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom one that shall not be destroyed.

This vision is taken up in the Similitudes of the Ethiopic Book of Enoch (1 Enoch 36–71) and in the vision of the storm in 4 Ezra 13. For a long time, these apocalyptic texts were read as evidence of an expectation of the Son of Man which had taken on a definite form as early as the time of Jesus. Accordingly, the expression “the Son of Man” was understood as an established title of sovereignty for an eschatological judge or ruler, comparable to the title “Messiah,” and the Son of Man logia in the gospels were seen as referring to this apocalyptic expectation of salvation. And it can in fact be shown that at least some of the logia about the eschatological coming of the Son of Man contain allusions to Dan 7.<sup>30</sup>

<sup>29</sup> Following Rudolf Bultmann, the following have made important contributions to the development of this hypothesis: Heinz Eduard Tödt, Der Menschensohn in der synoptischen Überlieferung (Gütersloh: Gütersloher Verlag 1959); Hahn, Hoheitstitel, 1963; Colpe, ThWNT 8, 403–481; down to Anton Vögtle, Die “Gretchenfrage” and Becker, Jesus, 249–267.

<sup>30</sup> This applies at any rate to Mark 13:26/Matt 24:30/Luke 21:27 and to Mark 14:62/Matt 26:64/(Luke 22:69), which speak of his coming on the clouds (of heaven), and to Matt 25:31 and Mark 8:38/Matt 16:27/Luke 9:26, which announce his coming in glory. However, since the idea of the “coming of the Son of Man” is a very general notion, this conceptuality on its own does not entitle us to affirm that these logia lie on the line of tradition history which begins with Dan 7.

On the basis of these assumptions and observations, the logia about the eschatological activity of the Son of Man must necessarily have formed the starting point for the development of the tradition. Since Jesus' logia speak of the Son of Man only in the third person, most scholars argued that Jesus himself did not identify himself with the coming Son of Man, and that it was only the post-Easter community that took this step. The central piece of evidence for this thesis was the logion at Luke 12:7–8/Matt 10:32:

Every one who acknowledges me before human beings, the Son of Man also will acknowledge before the angels of God.

Scholars saw a distinction in this logion between Jesus and the Son of Man which contradicted the post-Easter identification between the two, and this was taken as proof of its authenticity. Similar logia about the eschatological coming of the Son of Man were ascribed in this manner to the earthly Jesus, but the logia about the present activity and the suffering of the Son of Man were all declared to be post-Easter creations, since these presupposed the identification between Jesus and the Son of Man.

This hypothesis enjoyed validity, at least in the German-speaking countries, for many decades, but it inevitably collapsed when ever weightier arguments were brought against the existence of an established Jewish "Son of Man" title.<sup>31</sup> First of all, it was clearly shown that the concept "Son of Man," which is employed in an indeterminate manner in Dan 7:13, is merely a generic concept used for the visionary description of the figure like a human being who is the antithesis of the preceding beasts: in other words, it is not employed as a title. A more exact analysis of the Similitudes in the Ethiopic Book of Enoch shows that although these texts identify the figure of one like a human being from Dan 7 with the Messiah, the figure is nowhere given the title "Son of Man."<sup>32</sup> The tradition of the rabbinic exegesis of Dan 7 runs completely parallel to this.<sup>33</sup> And this is confirmed when we look at the New Testament tradition: if an established title of “Son of Man” had indeed existed in the time of Jesus and of earliest Christianity, the identification of Jesus with this Son of Man would not have gone unchallenged in the Jewish environment, and we would surely find traces in the early Christian writings of the same kind of debate as was prompted by the application of other established titles to Jesus.<sup>34</sup> Besides this, it is more than a little surprising that early Christian literature contains no confessions of faith in Jesus as the Son of Man; nor do we find the kind of direct address (e.g., “O Jesus, Son of Man”) that we so frequently find for other titles of sovereignty. This means that an established “Son of Man” title existing in the apocalyptic tradition of Judaism at the time of Jesus is a phantom of historical scholarship.<sup>35</sup>

---

<sup>31</sup> Here, the following works are particularly important: Leivestad, Menschensohn; idem, Messias; Müller, Menschensohn. The arguments are summarized in Kreplin, Selbstverständnis, 88–102 and 104–108.

<sup>32</sup> We find three different expressions in 1 Enoch, all of which are usually translated "Son of Man." These three conceptions are only employed with references back to the detailed description of this figure. Similarly, 4 Ezra (probably written towards the end of the first century CE) continually refers with demonstrative pronouns and relative clauses back to the figure of the one like a human being, who is obviously unknown to the reader.

It follows that this independent expression “the Son of Man,” which is not attested anywhere else, was created by Jesus himself or by earliest Christianity. And this in turn means that a distinction between Jesus and the eschatological Son of Man who is to come cannot be posited at any stage of the development of the tradition. There can be no doubt that all the logia about the coming Son of Man refer to Jesus alone. But is this true of the logia about the present Son of Man?

2.2 Second Hypothesis: At the Outset Stands the Generic Use of the Expression “the Son of Man” by Jesus Himself

On the basis of the observation that the Aramaic expression  $\text{בְּרִי (א)נְשָׂא}$  can also be used generically and should then be translated “every human being” or “the human being as such,” Carsten Colpe elaborated the hypothesis that one basic starting point of the development of the tradition lies here. This hypothesis has recently been repristinated by J. D. Crossan.<sup>36</sup> The representatives of this hypothesis understand at

<sup>33</sup> The rabbis speak not of the “Son of Man,” but of the “man of the clouds”: cf. Strack and Billerbeck I, 486; Bietenhard, Menschensohn, 337.

<sup>34</sup> Cf. e.g., 1 Cor 1:23; Luke 24:26.46; Matt 27:39–43; John 7:26–27; 7:41–42; 7:52.

<sup>35</sup> Leivestad has the merit of being the first to assert this (1968). An increasing number of scholars agree with this position: e.g., de Jonge, Final Envoy, 88; Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 473.

<sup>36</sup> Colpe, ThWNT 8, 433–435, and John Dominic Crossan, The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (San Francisco: HarperCollins 1991).

most the following four logia about the present activity of the Son of Man in such a way that they speak not only about Jesus himself, but about the human person in general (and naturally, this includes Jesus):

Foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests; but the Son of Man has nowhere to lay his head (Q: Luke 9:58/Matt 8:20; cf. Gos. Thom 86).

In the narrative of the healing of the paralytic, the objection is raised: “Who can forgive sins, but God alone?” Jesus introduces his healing with the words: But that you may know that the Son of Man has authority on earth to forgive sins . . . (Mark 2:10; cf. Matt 9:6/Luke 5:24).<sup>37</sup>

The sabbath was made for the human person, not the human person for the sabbath; so the Son of Man is lord even of the sabbath (Mark 2:27–28; cf. Matt 12:8/Luke 6:5).

Every one who speaks a word against the Son of Man will be forgiven; but he who blasphemes against the Holy Spirit will not be forgiven (Luke 12:10—but cf. the other versions of this logion: Matt 12:31–32; Mark 3:28–29; Gos. Thom 44; Didache 11.7).

Another affirmation by Jesus, with a somewhat different use of  $\text{Ⲡⲱⲛ}(\text{ⲛ})$   $\text{Ⲓⲃ}$ , is considered as belonging to the same category:

For John came neither eating nor drinking, and they say, “He has a demon”; the Son of Man came [ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου—in the sense, “someone came”] eating and drinking, and they say, “Behold, a glutton and a drunkard [ἰδὸν ἄθροπος φάγος καὶ οἰνοπότης], a friend of tax collectors and sinners (Q: Matt 11:18–19/Luke 7:33–34).

Serious objections have been made to a generic interpretation of the expression “the Son of Man” in all five logia,<sup>38</sup> and these arguments have established the likelihood that here too, it refers exclusively to the person of Jesus. We need not repeat these objections in detail here, since another consideration shows how problematic this approach is. In other passages in the Jesus tradition, we likewise find a generic reference to the human person, either by means of the singular ὁ ἄνθρωπος<sup>39</sup> or the plural οἱ ἄνθρωποι,<sup>40</sup> or else by means of the

<sup>37</sup> Matthew’s redactional addition at 9:8 shows that at least he has understood this logion in a generic sense.

<sup>38</sup> On the discussion and the interpretation of the individual logia, cf. Müller, Menschensohn, and Kreplin, Selbstverständnis, ad each of these texts.

<sup>39</sup> E.g., Matt 8:9/Luke 7:8; Mark 7:15.17.20/Matt 15:11.18; Mark 8:36–37/Matt 16:26/Luke 9:25; Mark 10:9/Matt 19:6; Luke 11:24/Matt 12:43; Matt 10:35–36; Matt 12:12.

<sup>40</sup> E.g., Matt 9:8; Matt 12:31; Mark 12:30; Matt 21:25; Luke 20:4.

word ὄστυς or τίς.<sup>41</sup> With one exception, however,<sup>42</sup> we never find here the concept “Son of Man” or “sons of men.” There must therefore have been some special reason to employ the awkward ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου as the translation for a generically used Aramaic concept אַנְשָׁא(א) בְּרַ in these five logia, since a simple “the human person” or “human beings” or an indefinite pronoun would have sufficed. For Colpe, the background here is of course the Jewish title of sovereignty “the Son of Man,” which led the earliest Christians to choose a literal translation which is awkward in Greek, in order to document Jesus’ special claim to authority; but if we eliminate this presupposition, it becomes very difficult to explain the texts. Clearly, אַנְשָׁא(א) בְּרַ must have meant more on the lips of Jesus than “the human person as such” or “one” or “someone,” and ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου must be the translation of a special linguistic usage of Jesus which was different from customary speech.

2.3 Third Hypothesis: At the Outset Stands the Circumlocution “the Son of Man” Which a Speaker Could Use in Aramaic to Refer to Himself

The insight formulated at the close of the preceding section is also the decisive argument against the hypothesis first proposed by Geza Vermes, that the expression אַנְשָׁא(א) בְּרַ is a possible indirect self-reference in Aramaic, and thus a circumlocution for the personal pronoun “I.”<sup>43</sup> This form of speech was used in order to refer discreetly to one’s own self.

It is a matter of dispute whether the passages cited by Vermes genuinely offer evidence of the linguistic usage which he postulates.<sup>44</sup> But

<sup>41</sup> E.g., Mark 8:4; Mark 8:34/Matt 16:24/Luke 9:23; Mark 9:30; Mark 13:21/Matt 24:23; Luke 14:26; Matt 5:39,40,41.

<sup>42</sup> At Mark 3:28, we read of τοῖς υἱοῖς τῶν ἀνθρώπων. It is striking that this occurs in a context where Luke and Matthew present a logion with ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου (cf. Luke 12:10/Matt 12:31–32).

<sup>43</sup> Geza Vermes, Jesus the Jew (London: Collins 1973), 147–152.

<sup>44</sup> Ibid. He gives five examples of Aramaic texts in which the speaker refers to himself as אַנְשָׁא(א) בְּרַ or אַנְשָׁא(א) בְּרַ. In all these passages, we would have a meaningful sentence if we replaced this expression by the first-person singular pronoun. However, when we look more closely at the texts which Vermes cites, we see that אַנְשָׁא(א) בְּרַ could be understood generically or indefinitely in all these passages, which would then be read as general affirmations about the human person which are applied in the specific context to the one who is speaking. None of Vermes’ texts reproduces a statement which is to be applied exclusively to the speaker. This is the fundamental even if this usage was in fact common in Aramaic or in the Galilean dialect at the time of Jesus, Vermes cannot explain why then the simple personal pronoun was not used in the translation of Jesus' logia. Why was the cumbersome concept ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου chosen?

Nevertheless, this hypothesis draws our attention to one important observation: viz., that all the Son of Man logia can be transformed without any contextual problems into logia in which a personal pronoun is used instead of the phrase "the Son of Man."<sup>45</sup> In other words, the straightforward interchangeability between the personal pronoun and ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου can be demonstrated directly. Any sustainable solution to the problem of the Son of Man must bear this fact in mind.

2.4 Fourth Hypothesis: By Means of the Expression "the Son of Man," Jesus Himself Created a Concept Which Expressed his Own Eschatological Expectation

After scholars had accepted the insight that neither Jesus nor earliest Christianity could have had recourse to an established apocalyptic "Son of Man" title, it was proposed that Jesus himself, adopting the linguistic tradition of Dan 7, had employed the expression "the Son of Man" in order to express his own role in the eschatological fulfillment.<sup>46</sup> This would mean that a basic core of the logia about the coming of the Son of Man goes back to Jesus himself. Jesus did not employ this expression as a defined title which was linked to a clear expectadifference between the Aramaic examples presented by Vermes and the New Testament logia about the Son of Man, most of which refer exclusively to Jesus. For further criticism of Vermes' thesis, cf. also Joachim Jeremias, "Die älteste Schicht der Menschensohn-Logien," ZNW 58 (1967): 159–172, 165, and Leivestad, Messias, 246–247.

---

<sup>45</sup> On this, cf. also R. E. C. Formesyn, "Was there a Pronominal Connection for the Bar Nasha Self-Designation?," NovT 8 (1966): 1–35, at 27–28: "there is no single exception: all Son of Man titles are replaceable by a personal pronoun of the first person. Secondly, the fact that the title never occurs in the position of a predicate can be described in the same way: it does not occur where we cannot have the personal pronoun 'I,' 'me,' etc. As the personal pronoun is never a predicate (except in unusual cases) so we never find Son of Man as a predicate. As we can never have 'he is I,' or 'Jesus is I,' etc., so we never have 'he is the Son of Man,' or 'Jesus is the Son of Man.'"

<sup>46</sup> This thesis has been proposed recently e.g., by Hengel, Early Christology, 105; de Jonge, Final Envoy, 88; Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 476–480.

tion about the role he would play; he merely used it as a concept “laden with sovereign dignity.”<sup>47</sup>

This approach can accept that not only logia about the coming Son of Man, but also logia about the Son of Man who is active at present and who will suffer go back to Jesus, since he himself saw his present activity, his expected suffering, and his role in the eschatological fulfillment within one overarching context. The inherent unity of the Son of Man logia is derived, not from an already existing understanding of the concept “Son of Man,” but from Jesus’ own self-understanding.

Philipp Vielhauer has made an important objection here,<sup>48</sup> viz. that an eschatological expectation of the Son of Man would contradict Jesus’ proclamation of the rule of God which was to be accomplished in the future, since we find no eschatological mediator figure in the expectation of the kingdom of God. There are indeed a few traditions apart from the Son of Man logia which see Jesus in an eschatological role as judge or divine representative, but serious objections can be made to the authenticity of every one of these logia,<sup>49</sup> and they cannot be used to prove that Jesus envisaged a special role for himself in the eschatological fulfillment.

We can counter these objections by pointing to the striking parallels between Jesus’ proclamation of the future fulfillment of the rule of God and the Son of Man logia. In both traditions we hear of the suddenness of the end;<sup>50</sup> in both traditions we find a complementarity between something that can be experienced in the present and something that will be fulfilled or disclosed in the future.<sup>51</sup> It has also been argued that the motifs of “kingdom of God” and “Son of Man” were already linked in the apocalyptic tradition.<sup>52</sup> And finally, one cannot exclude the possibility that when Jesus proclaimed the kingdom of God and spoke the Son of Man logia, he juxtaposed two

<sup>47</sup> Thus Theissen and Merz, ibid., 480.

<sup>48</sup> Philipp Vielhauer, “Gottesreich und Menschensohn in der Verkündigung Jesu,” in idem, Aufsätze zum Neuen Testament, Tübingen 31 (1965): 55–91, and idem, “Jesus und der Menschensohn” (n. 20 above).

<sup>49</sup> Cf. Section 3.1 below, and Kreplin, Selbstverständnis Jesu, 209–211.

<sup>50</sup> In the Son of Man logia: Luke 12:39–40/Matt 24:43–44; Luke 17:24/Matt 24:27; Luke 17:26–29/Matt 24:37–41; Matt 25:13. Outside the Son of Man logia, e.g., Mark 13:33–37/Luke 12:36–38; Luke 12:41–46/Matt 24:42.45–51.

<sup>51</sup> Cf. Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 479.

<sup>52</sup> Thus Becker, Jesus, 112–116.

different groups of motifs, without explicitly declaring how they were related to each other.

Objections have also been made to the hypothesis that a basic core of the logia about the coming Son of Man goes back to the earthly Jesus himself. To begin with, many of these logia can be understood clearly only from the post-Easter perspective, in which Christians awaited the return of their Lord—but in a pre-Easter perspective, Jesus would have had to explain to his disciples how his present activity and his future return were related.<sup>53</sup> If however Jesus himself had created the concept “the Son of Man” to express both his present role and (above all) his future role, why then was this concept not included in the early Christian confessions of faith? Since Jesus clearly refused to accept other titles of sovereignty, would it not have been much more natural to take an expression of sovereignty which he himself had used and turn this into a title, rather than to have recourse to titles which Jesus himself had not employed?<sup>54</sup>

Gerd Theissen and Annette Merz, who have maintained this hypothesis in a recent publication, are themselves uncertain whether they have really solved the problem of the Son of Man.<sup>55</sup> If however this hypothesis proved correct, the Son of Man logia—especially those about the coming Son of Man—would offer an important access-route to Jesus’ self-understanding. If one rejects this hypothesis and thereby disputes the authenticity of the logia about the eschatological coming of the Son of Man, one must then explain the genesis of the secondary formation of these logia, since this could not have been motivated by an already existing apocalyptic “Son of Man” title.

---

<sup>53</sup> There are only two passages which establish a relationship between the present Son of Man and his future coming: Matt 13:36–43 and Luke 17:24–25. However, it is highly probable that these are secondary, or else shaped by the redaction of the gospels. It is indeed true that some of the logia about the suffering of the Son of Man already refer to the resurrection of Jesus (Mark 8:31/Matt 16:21/Luke 9:22; Mark 9:9/Matt 17:9; Mark 9:31/Matt 17:22–23/Luke 9:44; Mark 10:33–34/Matt 20:18–19/Luke 18:31–33), but many scholars regard these as post-Easter vaticinia ex eventu. And the prediction of the resurrection is not the same thing as a prediction of the parousia.

<sup>54</sup> It would also be necessary to explain why “Son of Man,” an expression of sovereignty which derived from Jesus himself, could disappear not only from early Christian linguistic usage, but also—and so soon—from other logia about the parousia which continued to be handed on (e.g., the “word of the Lord” at 1 Thess 4:15–17 with Mark 13:26–27/Matt 24:30–31 and Mark 8:38–39/Matt 16:27–28/Luke 9:26–27). How was it possible for this expression to be replaced by other titles of sovereignty?

<sup>55</sup> Cf. Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 477.

2.5 Fifth Hypothesis and Attempt at a Solution: Jesus Created the Name “the Son of Man” as an Indirect Self-designation

I believe that the best solution to the question of the Son of Man begins with the assumption that Jesus himself coined this expression as a name which he habitually employed to speak (indirectly) about himself.<sup>56</sup> Unlike a title, a name is not linked to concepts of specific roles. On the other hand, a symbolic name means more than a personal pronoun, since it evokes a number of associations.

This means that some of the logia about the present activity of the Son of Man, and perhaps also some basic forms of the logia about his suffering, must be acknowledged as authentic Jesus tradition; but the logia about the future activity of the Son of Man, almost all of which ascribe to him a specific role in the eschatological event, must be categorized as secondary.<sup>57</sup>

We find parallels in the Jesus tradition and in earliest Christianity both to the bestowal of names and to the indirect self-designation. There are several indications that Jesus bestowed names on his disciples, some of which were even translated into Greek.<sup>58</sup> As was frequently the case with personal names, such symbolic names were mostly employed with a definite article.<sup>59</sup> Similarly, it was possible in the Aramaic environment of Jesus to speak of oneself in the third person.<sup>60</sup> Besides this, we have other attestations of the possibility of

<sup>56</sup> This hypothesis was first elaborated by Leivestad, Menschensohn (1968). The hypothesis presented here, viz. that the expression “the Son of Man” is a name coined by Jesus as a self-designation, must be distinguished from the hypothesis presented in section 2.3 above, viz. that when Jesus designated himself in this way, he was employing a form of indirect self-reference which already existed as a possibility in Aramaic. If we regard Jesus’ indirect self-designation as “the Son of Man” as an expression which he himself coined, it is easy to understand why this expression had to be translated.

<sup>57</sup> An exception is the probably authentic logion about confessing and denying (Luke 12:8–9/Matt 10:32–33), in which Jesus is given only the role of a witness, not that of the judge in the eschatological judgment: see below (cf. also Kreplin, Selbstverständnis, 159–165).

<sup>58</sup> E.g., אֲנִי/Κηφῶς = Πέτρος and אֲנִי רִבְבִי/Βοανεργός = υἱὸς βρονηῆς. In the case of Peter, the Greek translation of the name coined by Jesus became the commonest personal name of the apostle. Clearly, the original meaning of the words was the decisive factor in the selection of the names of these persons.

<sup>59</sup> For example, the determinate form ὁ Πέτρος is commoner in the synoptic gospels than the indeterminate form.

<sup>60</sup> Bietenhard, Menschensohn, 280–302 and 307, presents a large number of instances of this kind of indirect self-designation. It was even possible in one and the same

using indirect speech about oneself in the authentic Jesus tradition,<sup>61</sup> in the self-designation of the Johannine Jesus as “the Son,” and in the passage where Paul speaks “like a fool” (2 Cor 12:2–5). These parallels in linguistic usage show that those who listened to Jesus and engaged in conversation with him would have had no difficulty in understanding him if he used the name “the Son of Man” as a self-designation.

The interchangeability between the personal pronoun and the expression “the Son of Man” which can be observed in Matthew shows that the evangelist understood this phrase as a name. A secondary logion created by Matthew proves this. In his redactional work, Matthew changes the Markan formulation “Who do people say that I am?” (Mark 8:27) into: “Who do people (οἱ ἄνθρωποι) say that the Son of Man (ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου) is?” (Matt 16:13); the change may be due to the play on words. If the concept of one particular role had been linked to the expression “the Son of Man,” this concept would have had to be formulated in the disciples’ answer. If the expression was meant generically, the disciples’ answer would necessarily speak of human beings in general. Naturally, however, the answer concerns the identity of Jesus—and this means that the expression “the Son of Man” is employed as a name. Not one of the Son of Man logia (even those handed down outside the synoptic tradition) can be adduced in support of the contrary position; none of them proves that the expression ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου was not understood as a name for Jesus.<sup>62</sup> The interchangeability between the personal pronoun and “the Son of Man” in Mark (Mark 14:41–42/Matt 26:45–46) and the dialogue with the man born blind after Jesus has healed him (John 9:35–38) demonstrate that other early Christian authors too understood the expression “the Son of Man” as a name. Thus, when the healed man asks who the sentence to refer to oneself as “I” and as “your servant,” “your handmaid,” “that man,” “that woman,” and similar expressions.

---

<sup>61</sup> Significant instances are the metaphor at Mark 2:19/Matt 9:15a/Luke 5:34 (“Can the wedding guests fast while the bridegroom is with them?”) and the words about the “son” in the parable of the wicked husbandmen (Mark 12:6–8/Matt 21:37–39/Luke 20:13–15), where Jesus speaks indirectly of himself by means of the characters in the parable.

<sup>62</sup> On this, cf. the individual exegesis of all the Son of Man logia in Kreplin, Selbstverständnis, 102–196. In the case of two logia, it might be worth considering whether they presuppose the concept of one specific role: Luke 17:26.30 and Luke 21:36. Even here, however, it is possible to understand the expression as a name.

Son of Man is, Jesus reply is a simple statement of identity: “You have seen him, and it is he who speaks to you” (John 9:36–37).

This hypothesis offers a satisfactory explanation of why בֶּרֶךְ (אֱ)נִשְׂאָא was translated into Greek by means of the cumbersome form ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, while at the same time the expression “the Son of Man” remained de facto interchangeable with a personal pronoun or with the name “Jesus” itself. It is also easy to see why it was impossible to coin a confessional formula such as “Jesus is the Son of Man”: this would have been little more than the declaration that two names were identical.

It is also difficult to conceive of the designation of Jesus with the name “the Son of Man” either in direct address by others or in narrative passages. This concept contains an element of lowliness, as the address of the prophet with בֶּרֶךְ אֱנִשְׂאָא in the Book of Ezekiel shows.<sup>63</sup> Thus means that there would have been a dismissive undertone if this concept had been employed in addressing Jesus or in a narrative passage about him. Far from being a title of sovereignty, it would have indicated lowliness.<sup>64</sup>

It is also easy to see why the Son of Man logia in the Gospel of John link completely different affirmations to the expression ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου from those we find in the synoptic tradition. All that unites the Son of Man logia in these two spheres of tradition is the basic fact about the expression “the Son of Man”: viz., that it was a name which Jesus himself employed as a self-designation in indirect speech.

This hypothesis does however require an explanation of how it was possible at a secondary stage for logia about the eschatological activity of the Son of Man to be formed. Several explanatory patterns play an important role here.

First, a number of logia still allow us to discern how the expression “the Son of Man” supplanted other concepts at a secondary stage. The king who utters sentence in the parable of the judgment of the world

<sup>63</sup> In the Book of Ezekiel, the prophet is addressed ninety-three times as בֶּרֶךְ אֱנִשְׂאָא, which is reinforced twenty-three times by אֱתִתָּה. Colpe, ThWNT 8, 409, says that this form of address expresses the “weakness and lowliness of the creature confronted by the glory of the God of Israel.”

<sup>64</sup> This concept was understood in this way at an early date in the ancient church. A designation of Jesus as “the Son of Man” was found offensive (cf. Barnabas 12.10); later on, it was seen as a reference to the incarnation (Ignatius, Eph. 20.2; Justin, Dial. 100.3).

(Matt 25:34.40) becomes the Son of Man who, echoing Dan 7:13–14, takes his seat for judgment. Against the background of the common post-Easter κύριος address, parables which spoke of the “lord” who would come (cf. e.g., Luke 13:25–28/Matt 25:10–11; Mark 13:33–37/Luke 12:35–38; Luke 12:47–48) could lead to the warning: “You do not know on what day your Lord is coming” (Matt 24:42), and finally, since “the Son of Man” was well known as a name of Jesus, to the phrase: “the coming of the Son of Man” (Matt 24:39). Similarly, the “day of the Lord” soon becomes the “day of our Lord Jesus Christ” (1 Cor 1:8; 5:4–5; 2 Cor 1:14) or the “day of Jesus Christ” (Phil 1:6; 2:16). It then becomes easy to speak of the “day of the Son of Man.” This process can be clearly recognized by means of a comparison of Luke 12:40/Matt 24:44 both with the context and with 1 Thess 5:2, 4; 2 Pet 3:10; Rev 3:3; 16:15.

Secondly, logia which speak of the fulfillment of the kingly rule of God lead to affirmations about the kingly rule of the Son of Man (Matt 13:37, 41; cf. Matt 16:28 with Mark 9:1/Luke 9:27; and cf. the addition in later manuscripts at Matt 25:13).

Thirdly, the logion about confessing and denying (Luke 12:8–9/Matt 10:32) originally envisaged Jesus, the Son of Man, in the role of witness at the eschatological judgment, giving testimony before the angels—a role that was ascribed to every righteous Jew and even to non-Jews (cf. Matt 12:41/Luke 11:31–32). This is therefore the only logion about the eschatological activity of the Son of Man which should be included among the authentic logia of Jesus. In the further course of tradition, with recourse to linguistic traditions from Dan 7:13–14, Jesus the witness becomes the Son of Man who exercises judgment (cf. Mark 8:38/Luke 9:26/Matt 16:27).

In all these trajectories between authentic logia of Jesus and secondary formations of the logia about the eschatological activity of the “Son of Man,” we must never forget the influence of learned scribal exegesis. Jesus’ words about the coming of the kingdom of God and his self-designation by means of the name “the Son of Man” must have suggested to learned exegetes in Palestinian Jewish Christianity, with their openness to apocalyptic, the identification of Jesus with the figure described in Dan 7:13–14. The formation of secondary Son of Man logia was also made easier by the fact that, as words about Jesus “the Son of Man,” they were grammatically indistinguishable from words which Jesus himself had spoken using the third person. On this hypothesis, therefore, the line which connects the use of the expression “the Son of Man” in Dan 7:13–14 to the Son of Man logia in the New Testament goes back, not to Jesus, but to learned apocalyptic exegetes in the post-Easter community.<sup>65</sup> The time of composition may be the epoch of apocalyptic interpretation and redaction of traditions about Jesus which probably occurred during the Caligula crisis in 40 CE.<sup>66</sup> This secondary exegetical identification of Jesus with the eschatological figure in Dan 7:13–14 (who was interpreted in messianic terms) may have received an impetus from the developing expectation of the parousia, which cannot be derived either from the preaching of the historical Jesus or from faith in his resurrection; the very close coupling of the expectation of the parousia with the name “the Son of Man” in the synoptic tradition argues in favor of this possibility.

Finally, we must discuss the logia about the suffering Son of Man. The insight that Jesus himself employed the expression “the Son of Man” as a name lends greater plausibility to the authenticity of simple basic predictions of his suffering which were expanded at a secondary stage by insertions and additions, for now there are no tensions between the affirmations made by these logia and any “Son of Man traditions.” If Jesus did indeed speak of himself as a sufferer—and a number of factors suggest that he did so—then it would in fact be probable that he employed the expression “the Son of Man” on such occasions, since the logia about the earthly activity of the Son of Man likewise often serve to present Jesus’ specific fate.

---

<sup>65</sup> Thus, all the logia with a more or less direct relationship to Dan 7:13 belong to the group of Son of Man logia which speak of the eschatological activity of the Son of Man and are to be regarded as secondary. We follow here the analysis by Müller, who demonstrates that all the Son of Man logia in which a direct or indirect reference to Dan 7 can be discerned “are speaking about the exaltation and return of Jesus. This use of the Danielic passage was demonstrated here even in the case of texts in which the expression ‘the Son of Man’ does not occur. Thus, it is not only this expression that indicates a link to Dan 7:13–14. Rather, such a relationship emerges above all from the contents of what is said. In other words, the expression ‘Son of Man’ can no longer be taken as a certain sign of the influence of the Danielic passage” (Müller, Menschensohn, 154).

<sup>66</sup> On the apocalyptic reworking of traditions about Jesus during the Caligula crisis in 40 CE, cf. Gerd Theissen, Lokalkolorit und Zeitgeschichte in den Evangelien: Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der synoptischen Tradition, NTOA 8 (Freiburg: Universitätsverlag 1989), 133–176.

Four motives may have led Jesus to choose this name as an indirect self-designation.

First, Jesus chose the expression “the Son of Man” as a cipher because of its mysterious character. This puzzling phrase was meant to protect him from being categorized in terms of already existing expectations, and to provoke the question: “Who is this Son of Man?” (cf. John 9:35).<sup>67</sup>

Secondly, by means of the indirect self-designation as “the Son of Man,” Jesus employed in an unusual manner a phrase which was customarily employed generically in Aramaic,<sup>68</sup> in order to deflect attention from one’s own person in the very act of saying something about oneself.<sup>69</sup> Unlike other generic forms of speech, however, the expression “the Son of Man” referred exclusively to Jesus.

Thirdly, Jesus used the expression “the Son of Man” with an implied allusion to the Book of Ezekiel, where the address  $\text{בְּנֵי אָדָם}$  emphasizes precisely the lowliness of the prophet vis-à-vis God, while at the same time highlighting the prominent role of the prophet as God’s messenger to humanity.<sup>70</sup>

Fourthly, Jesus had in mind the literal meaning of the expression “the Son of Man”: he wished to express in a hidden manner the fact

<sup>67</sup> Thus Eduard Schweizer, “Der Menschensohn: Zur eschatologischen Erwartung Jesu” (1959), in idem, Neotestamentica (Zürich: Zwingli 1963), 74–75; Volker Hampel, Menschensohn und historischer Jesus. Ein Rätselwort als Schlüssel zum messianischen Selbstverständnis Jesu (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchner 1990), 164; and Hengel, Early Christology, 80 and 387.

<sup>68</sup> One may compare the indirect self-designation as “one” in English or “man” in German. Cf. Bietenhard, Menschensohn, 302: “To speak of oneself in the third person singular expresses modesty and restraint. On the one hand, one is compelled to speak of oneself, i.e., to place one’s own person in the foreground; on the other hand, however, one finds this compulsion or necessity embarrassing or unpleasant, and this is why one endeavors to remove one’s person from the spotlight and to conceal it. One is compelled to move oneself into the front line, but one would prefer not to do so. Accordingly, this manner of speech expresses an ambivalent mood: both the emphasis and the withdrawal of one’s own person.”

<sup>69</sup> For similar interpretations, cf. Leivestad, Messias, 251–253; Müller, Menschensohn, 255–260; Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 477–480.

<sup>70</sup> Leivestad, Exit, 266–267, emphasizes the lowliness which is one component of the expression “the Son of Man.” This possibility is also discussed by Colpe, ThWNT 8, 409. The possible connection to the “Son of Man” address in Ezekiel does not mean that Jesus saw himself as a prophet like Ezekiel; Ezekiel does not seem to have played a central role for Jesus (cf. Leivestad, Menschensohn, 102).

that he understood himself as the true human being, the prototypical renewer of the human race.<sup>71</sup>

It is only on the basis of Jesus' self-understanding that we can decide to what extent these four motives played a role in the choice of the name "the Son of Man."<sup>72</sup> Since however the titles of sovereignty and the name "Son of Man" provide either no access or only an insufficient access to his self-understanding, we must choose another methodological route.

3. The Self-Understanding which Finds Expression in Jesus' Activity

Jesus worked in a sovereign and authoritative manner. This makes it possible to find an access route to his self-understanding by studying the role that Jesus adopted in his activity and claimed for himself in his proclamation.<sup>73</sup> This is not primarily a matter of identifying ready-made categories in terms of the sociology of religion into which we can then insert the figure of Jesus. Rather, we must ask what role Jesus adopted and claimed with regard to the kingdom of God which he proclaimed, which had already drawn near in the present and which awaited its fulfillment in the future.<sup>74</sup> There is, after all, a broad consensus in the historical-critical study of Jesus that the center of his activity was the proclamation of the rule of God which had drawn near in its eschatological power. We must therefore inquire into the relationship between Jesus' message and his person.<sup>75</sup>

---

<sup>71</sup> Thus Charles F. D. Moule, "Neglected Features in the Problem of the 'Son of Man,'" in Jesus und der Menschensohn: Festschrift Anton Vögtle, ed. Joachim Gnllka (Freiburg: Herder, 1975), 419–424; and Leivestad, Menschensohn, 102.

<sup>72</sup> The following reflections will show all that all four motives (and especially the last three) could have played a role here: cf. Kreplin, Selbstverständnis, 305–308.

<sup>73</sup> The question of the role that Jesus claimed and de facto adopted is more open, and permits more nuanced perceptions, than such questions as Jesus' consciousness of his mission, the authority of his mission, the consciousness of his authority, or the position that he occupied.

<sup>74</sup> On the concept of the divine rule which is presupposed here, with its present and future dimensions, cf. Kreplin, Selbstverständnis, 201–208.

<sup>75</sup> On this point, we should bear in mind that the Leben-Jesu investigations of the nineteenth century reached the negative conclusion that thanks to the process of collection and redaction which led to the composition of the surviving early Christian writings, it is no longer possible to reconstruct with methodological certainty any development in Jesus' self-understanding.

3.1 The Future Fulfillment of the Rule of God and the Person of Jesus

For the future, Jesus awaited the eschatological judgment and the fulfillment of the divine rule. Did he claim for himself any prominent role in these events, e.g., the role of the eschatological judge or the eschatological ruler?

As we have already seen, the logia about the coming Son of Man are probably secondary creations. This means that we must disregard the largest bloc of potential evidence that sees Jesus in the position of the eschatological judge or ruler.

In the case of those few logia which see Jesus explicitly or implicitly in the position of the eschatological ruler, it is clear that the tradition originally spoke of the judgment of God, and that the reference to the person of Jesus has entered the tradition only at a secondary stage.<sup>76</sup> It is even more significant that those logia about judgment which most likely go back to Jesus himself speak only of God as the eschatological judge.<sup>77</sup> “It remains very remarkable that the sayings dealing with God’s kingdom in the future do not mention a role for Jesus at the final breakthrough; all emphasis is on the final realization

---

<sup>76</sup> The following blocks of tradition are relevant here:

- The metaphors which speak of the judgment at Luke 13:25–28 implicitly understand Jesus as judge: this is made clear by the allusions to his activity in 13:26. It is however obvious that this allusion already presupposes the post-Easter praxis of the Lord’s Supper. We should therefore conclude that it has entered the tradition at a secondary stage.
- The clearly distinct parallel at Matt 7:21–23 likewise presupposes the praxis of the earliest Christian communities (various charisms are listed). It is only the introductory logion at Matt 7:21 that may be a development of the genuine logion of Jesus at Luke 6:46. This logion, however, refers to Jesus’ life on earth, not to an eschatological function as judge.
- Luke 13:35/Matt 23:39 is understood after Easter as a concealed reference to the parousia of Jesus. If however it is authentic, it does not make any explicit identification in the pre-Easter perspective between Jesus and the one who comes in the name of the Lord.
- Finally, the parable of the ten virgins (Matt 25:1–12), which has close linguistic links to Matt 7:21–23 and Luke 13:25–28 (cf. Matt 25:12), could be read as an allegorical expression of Jesus’ claim to the function of eschatological judge. However, this parable was probably formulated originally as a parable about the fulfillment of the rule of God, not as a parable about the parousia.

<sup>77</sup> Thus Mark 10:27/Matt 19:26/Luke 18:27; Mark 13:32/Matt 24:36; Matt 6:4.6.18; Matt 18:25; Luke 12:20–21; Luke 12:32; Luke 18:7–8 or in the form of the passivum divinum: Mark 9:43–48/Matt 18:8–9; Matt 10:15/Matt 11:22–24/Luke 10:12–15; Matt 24:40–41/Luke 17:34–35.

of God's sovereign rule."<sup>78</sup> The prediction at Mark 14:25/Matt 26:29/Luke 22:16,18, which most scholars regard as authentic, makes it clear that Jesus did not claim for himself any prominent role in the eschatological judgment and in the fully realized rule of God: "Amen I say to you, I shall not drink again of the fruit of the vine until that day when I drink it new in the kingdom of God." Here, Jesus sees himself as a participant in the heavenly meal, not as the giver of the feast or the bringer of salvation, and still less as judge.<sup>79</sup>

This means that all the individual traditions which see Jesus in the position of the eschatological judge originated after Easter. Similarly, the parables, metaphors, and other logia which speak of the rule of God which is realized after the judgment do not refer exclusively to the person of Jesus.<sup>80</sup> There is no evidence anywhere that Jesus believed he was entrusted with some particular role or task in the eschatological judgment<sup>81</sup> or in the fully accomplished kingdom of God.<sup>82</sup> Jesus did not envisage himself as exercising any function and carrying out any commission beyond his death.

---

<sup>78</sup> De Jonge, Final Envoy, 83; cf. also 65.

<sup>79</sup> A similar position is taken by Joachim Gnilka, EKKNT 2.2, 246–247; Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 233; and de Jonge, Final Envoy, 59 and 66–69. Matthew immediately makes good this Christological deficit (cf. Matt 26:29).

<sup>80</sup> Similarly, every reference to "the kingdom of Jesus" is secondary (cf. Matt 13:41; Matt 16:28; Matt 20:21/[Mark 10:37]; Luke 22:30). On this, cf. Wolfgang Wiefel, ThWNT 3, 372–373.

<sup>81</sup> Thus also Hans Conzelmann, "Das Selbstbewußtsein Jesu" (1963/1964), in idem, Theologie als Schriftauslegung: Aufsätze zum Neuen Testament (München: Kaiser 1975), 40; and de Jonge, Final Envoy, 85.

<sup>82</sup> Cf. Hans Conzelmann, "Das Selbstbewußtsein Jesu," 37. This accords with the fact that the idea of the kingdom of God is scarcely ever linked to messianic concepts in the Jewish tradition, since "the concept of the rule of God primarily means that Yahweh, whom Israel professes to be the only God, will eliminate everything that prevents people from professing him as the only Lord (king) and from calling on his name as the only authoritative name" (Merklein, Botschaft, 41). In the post-Easter situation, the gospels link the expectation of the rule of God with the profession that Jesus is the Messiah; but even so, we find a messianic or directly Christological idea of the rule of God only in a few secondary passages (cf. Merklein, ibid., 17). Finally, it is striking that in the letters of Paul too, "the parousia is never explicitly mentioned together with the kingdom of God" (de Jonge, Final Envoy, 73–74). Cf. also the affirmation by Theissen and Merz that Jesus had a "theocentric" expectation of the kingdom of God: Jesus, 251.

3.2 The Kingdom of God which has Drawn Near in the Present, and the Person of Jesus

Jesus is convinced that the eschatological rule of God is not only something that belongs wholly to the future. In terms of the history of religions, the special characteristic of his message is that this kingdom has already entered into the sphere of human experience today. Jesus was certain that the decisive eschatological turning point had already taken place.<sup>83</sup> The eschatological relationship to God, a life close to God, is possible even now, together with the certainty that one will enter into the fully realized rule of God in the future. Jesus does not see this eschatological relationship to God as simply a continuation of the covenant relationship which the people of God has enjoyed since ancient times; rather, it is based on a new, “eschatological act of election by God.”<sup>84</sup> The eschatological turning point which has taken place is also manifested in the fact that the “shining out” of the kingdom of God can be perceived already in the present.<sup>85</sup> And this is why Jesus (unlike apocalyptic) does not see the present time only as a period in which one must prove one’s worth. The present is already the age of salvation, in which the rule of God can be experienced in a genuine—albeit only fragmentary—manner.

3.2.1. Jesus as the One who Proclaims the Eschatological Relationship to God

With regard to the proclamation of the rule of God, which is understood as having drawn near in this way, Jesus’ role consists first of all in announcing to others, in the name of God, the eschatological relationship to God. The paradigmatic example of this role is the beatitude pronounced on the poor, the hungry, and those who weep

---

<sup>83</sup> Thus also de Jonge, Final Envoy, 44–58; Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 234–239; Weder, Gottesherrschaft, 43; J. Becker, Jesus, 124–154. In this connection, we should refer also to the logion “I saw Satan fall like lightning from heaven” (Luke 10:18), with its apocalyptic overtones: this speaks of an eschatological turning point that has really taken place, not of a future eschatological turning point that is only the object of hope.

<sup>84</sup> Merklein, Botschaft, 50, 52, 58, etc. On the relationship between the eschatological relationship to God and the covenant, cf. Kreplin, Selbstverständnis, 204–205.

<sup>85</sup> On the metaphor of “shining out (Aufblitzen),” cf. Weder, Gottesherrschaft, 53. This metaphor is preferable to that of the “irruption” or “breaking in” of the kingdom of God, which assumes a development of God’s rule from a small beginning until its full realization. Jesus awaits the full realization of the kingdom of God in one sudden act, not in an evolutionary process.

(Luke 6:20b–21). These words promise the rule of God to those who are fundamentally destitute both in this world and in relation to God.<sup>86</sup> Jesus' role can also be seen in his act of assuring others that their sins are forgiven: this is implicit in his action of welcoming tax collectors and sinners,<sup>87</sup> and was probably carried out explicitly in the forgiveness of sins.<sup>88</sup> Finally, the special role of Jesus can also be seen in his instruction to address God as "Abba,"<sup>89</sup> which presupposes an intimacy in the relationship to God which was hardly known until then.

Jesus' proclamation of the new relationship to God is not based on an overarching context from which it could be inferred by way of argumentation. Consequently, we find no attempt on Jesus' part to offer arguments in justification of his message that the rule of God has drawn near. This distinguishes Jesus from the Old Testament prophets, and probably also from John the Baptist.<sup>90</sup> This proclamation of the new relationship to God has its roots in Jesus' special awareness that God has resolved to bring about the eschatological salvation.<sup>91</sup> Accordingly, when he proclaims that the kingdom of God has drawn near, Jesus is claiming implicitly to stand in the place of God, i.e., to be the eschatological representative of God.<sup>92</sup>

When Jesus teaches his followers to address God as Father, he is making available to them the way in which he himself addresses God.

---

<sup>86</sup> On the interpretation of the beatitudes as the proclamation of the eschatological relationship to God, cf. Kreplin, Selbstverständnis, 212–24, and Merklein, Botschaft, 45–51.

<sup>87</sup> Cf. e.g., Mark 2:15–16/Matt 9:10–11/Luke 5:29; Mark 2:1–12/Matt 9:1–8/Luke 5:17–26; Luke 7:36–50; 15:1–2; 19:1–10. In part, these texts have probably been revised in the processes of transmission, and some may indeed have a redactional origin. Nevertheless, they should be read as a reminiscence of Jesus' dealings with sinners and tax collectors.

<sup>88</sup> Cf. Mark 2:5/Matt 9:2/Luke 5:20; Luke 7:48. Naturally, both these passages may be suspected of offering a legitimation of the post-Easter behavior of the community, which forgave sins in the name of Jesus; they would therefore be the creation of the community itself. On the other hand, it is striking that in the logia, Jesus does not himself forgive sins in the name of God, but only notes the forgiveness of sins which God has granted. The post-Easter community would surely have formulated this differently.

<sup>89</sup> Cf. Luke 11:2/Matt 6:9; Mark 14:36; Rom 8:15; Gal 4:6.

<sup>90</sup> The prophets could adduce the people's failure to satisfy the demands of the Torah as the reason why they preached judgment (cf. e.g., Jer 7:3–15). Their argumentation was certainly not accepted by all their contemporaries (cf. Jer 26), but they did attempt to make their message plausible through recourse to the tradition.

<sup>91</sup> Thus Nilka, Jesus, 156; Merklein, Botschaft, 59; Becker, Jesus, 349; Sanders, Jesus, 239.

<sup>92</sup> Thus also Merklein, Botschaft, 65. Sanders writes that Jesus "regarded himself as having full authority to speak and act on behalf of God": Jesus, 238.

Jesus can make available to others the new, eschatological relationship to God because he himself stands in this relationship. In other words, he not only represents God vis-à-vis human beings: he also represents the human being who has fully accepted the message about the kingdom of God which has drawn near. He himself lives the faith and the trust in God's closeness which he attempts to communicate to other people.

We can define more precisely the role which Jesus plays in the proclamation of the kingdom of God which has drawn near, when we examine how he saw himself in comparison to John the Baptist.<sup>93</sup> It is obvious that he esteemed the Baptist highly.<sup>94</sup> For example, he acknowledges the value of John's preaching about repentance without devaluing the Baptist in relation to his own person. Nevertheless, such formulations as "the law and the prophets until John" (Luke 16:16), "all the prophets and the law prophesied until John" (Matt 11:13), and the continuation of the logion about the Baptist: "But the one who is least in the kingdom of God is greater than he" (Matt 11:11b/Luke 7:28b) indicate that Jesus saw John as belonging to the salvation-historical epoch of promise, i.e., the period in which the rule of God was only announced prophetically,<sup>95</sup> whereas the period of Jesus is the period of fulfillment. "In Jesus' eyes, the Baptist really still belongs to the old age. He stands on the threshold immediately before the salvific turning point."<sup>96</sup> As the last and greatest of the prophets, he brings the period of the prophets to an end; this however means that the role he plays in relation to the kingdom of God is fundamentally different from that of Jesus. Jesus sees himself as the awaited eschatological representative of God. Whereas John the Baptist only announced this turning point as something still in the future, Jesus bears witness that it has already occurred. He thereby claims for himself a unique role which surpasses all the prophetic figures of the past, a role that eschatologically transcends all that went before.

---

<sup>93</sup> On this, cf. Kreplin, Selbstverständnis, 221–224.

<sup>94</sup> Cf. Matt 11:16–19/Luke 7:31–35 and Matt 11:7–9.11/Luke 7:24–26.28; cf. also Gos. Thom. 46.

<sup>95</sup> This judgment about the place of John in salvation history corresponds to the self-understanding of the Baptist himself. As far as our sources permit us to judge, he saw himself as the last preacher of repentance before the dawning of the rule of God (on this, cf. Gnllka, Jesus, 79–83). And this is one good reason for regarding this positioning of the Baptist in the history of salvation as an authentic logion of Jesus.

<sup>96</sup> Becker, Jesus, 98; similarly, Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 196.

3.2.2. God's Rule Shines Out in what Jesus Does

A number of logia express Jesus' claim that his period is the eschatological period of salvation. As soon as Jesus begins to work in public, the eschatological rule of God enters the experiential realm of human beings.<sup>97</sup> In a very special way, Jesus makes this claim about his healings and exorcisms (Luke 11:20/Matt 12:28): "If I drive out the demons with the finger of God (ἐν δακτύλῳ θεοῦ), then the rule of God has come upon you (ἔφθασεν ἐφ' ὑμᾶς). This means that God's rule can be directly experienced in healings and exorcisms.<sup>98</sup> Besides this, many of his parables which speak prima facie of the rule of God must also be understood as an implicit "explication of Jesus' conduct."<sup>99</sup> Jesus intends by means of these parables to help his hearers perceive his activity as a genuine experience of the rule of God.<sup>100</sup> He sees the healings and mighty deeds as real experiences of the rule of God in the present-day world, i.e., not merely as signs which point to the future kingdom. By acting thus on the commission and "in the place

---

<sup>97</sup> In this context, a number of logia are relevant. They were certainly revised to some extent after Easter, but their core probably goes back to Jesus.

- Luke 10:23-24/Matt 13:16-17: "Blessed are your eyes, for they see, and your ears, for they hear. Amen, I tell you: many prophets and kings longed to see what you see, and did not see it, and to hear what you hear, and did not hear it."
- Matt 11:2-6/Luke 7:18-23: "The blind receive their sight and the lame walk, lepers are cleansed and the deaf here, and the dead are raised up, and the poor have good news preached to them. And blessed is the one who takes no offense at me."
- Luke 17:21: When Jesus is asked about the coming of the kingdom of God, he replies: "The rule of God is ἐντὸς ὑμῶν."
- Mark 2:19a/Matt 9:15a/Luke 5:34 describes the period of Jesus' activity as the eschatological period of salvation: "Can the wedding guests fast while the bridegroom is with them?"
- Matt 11:12-13/Luke 16:16. This logion contains an affirmation about the rule of God which can be interpreted in two ways, either to mean: "The rule of God presses on with force, and those who have made up their minds grab it for themselves" (thus Gnilka, Jesus, 151; Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 235), or to mean: "The rule of God suffers violence, and the violent oppress it" (thus, with some reservations, Ulrich Luz, EKKNT 1.1, 176-177). Irrespective of which alternative one chooses, however, the logion expresses Jesus' evaluation of the present time as a period in which the rule of God has already become something that people can experience.

<sup>98</sup> Thus also Gnilka, Jesus, 136; Merkley, Botschaft, 71; and Sanders, Jesus, 168.

<sup>99</sup> Hans Weder, Die Gleichnisse Jesu als Metaphern: Traditions- und redaktionsgeschichtliche Analysen und Interpretationen, FRLANT 120 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht 1978), 168.

<sup>100</sup> On this, cf. Kreplin, Selbstverständnis, 234-236.

of God,<sup>101</sup> Jesus takes on the role of the eschatological representative of God when he performs his healings and his mighty deeds.

Jesus sees the eschatological turning point that brings salvation as an event that God himself has brought about. This is essentially something antecedent to Jesus' activity, since it is only this event that makes Jesus' activity possible. This means that Jesus does not himself bring about the eschatological revolution. It is not he who brings about the salvific turning point.<sup>102</sup> It is therefore inexact to call him "the one who brings in the rule of God" or the "inaugurator of the kingdom," since "it is not Jesus who brings the basileia, but the basileia that brings Jesus."<sup>103</sup>

In Jesus eyes, his message about the rule of God that has drawn near is rooted exclusively in God's salvific decision. Similarly, he sees the origin of his power to perform healings and mighty deeds as lying exclusively in the activity of God. It is God who is at work in these healings and mighty deeds, not some miraculous power belonging to Jesus. In other words, his power derives directly from his authorization by God. Jesus never claims to possess an ability of his own to make the rule of God an experiential reality; all he does is to "point" the finger of God in a specific direction.<sup>104</sup> And when he commissions his disciples to perform similar healings and mighty deeds, he makes it clear that he does not believe that God's activity is restricted to his own actions. This means that it is probably too much to say that "through him, the rule of God makes its way, inexorable and irrevocable, as the definitive event in which this rule is brought about."<sup>105</sup> On the other hand, it is insufficient to see Jesus only as the "witness" and "interpreter" of the divine action.

Faith plays a decisive role not only in the proclamation of the new relationship to God, but also in the healings and mighty deeds of Jesus—both as a reaction to what Jesus does and as a precondition for his mighty deeds and healings. This is not primarily a question of faith in Jesus, but rather of faith in the mighty power of God which

<sup>101</sup> Weder, Gottesherrschaft, 26.

<sup>102</sup> This sentence echoes the somewhat exaggerated formulation by Becker, Jesus, 274.

<sup>103</sup> Weder, Gottesherrschaft, 43, following Eberhard Jüngel. This is why Jesus does not see his own death as posing a threat to the realization of the rule of God (cf. Mark 14:25 and Becker, Jesus, 419).

<sup>104</sup> Cf. Weder, Gottesherrschaft, 26.

<sup>105</sup> Becker, Jesus, 274.

can be experienced in the present moment. A the logion about the power of faith, which is transmitted in several variants, shows that<sup>106</sup> Jesus himself seems to have regarded such a faith as a necessary precondition for carrying out his mighty deeds and healings; and this means that he not only takes on the role of God's eschatological representative vis-à-vis human beings when he performs these actions, but is at the same also the human being whose actions are wholly permeated by trust in the rule of God which has drawn near. And thus, precisely in his mighty deeds and miracles, Jesus represents the archetype of the human being who has totally accepted and committed himself to the message about the kingdom of God that has come near.

Jesus' special role comes even more clearly into view when we compare it with the role of his disciples. Jesus' relationship to his disciples is far different from comparable relationships in his milieu between a teacher and his pupils.<sup>107</sup> The rabbinic pupils themselves sought out their teachers and always retained the right to change to a different master, but Jesus with charismatic authority summons people to follow him,<sup>108</sup> and he sometimes even rejects persons who are willing to follow him.<sup>109</sup> He demands a total loyalty which goes to the very limits of ethically acceptable conduct and indeed to the surrender of one's own self.<sup>110</sup> The goal of a rabbinic pupil is to become a rabbi, but the disciples always remain in principle dependent on Jesus. From the very beginning of their discipleship, they are in principle subordinate to Jesus, and this specific relationship never changes.

Jesus summons men and women to follow him, in order that they can support him in his activity. The disciples' task consists in the

---

<sup>106</sup> Luke 17:6/Matt 17:20; Mark 11:23–24/Matt 21:21–22; cf. also Mark 9:24 and Mark 6:1–6/Matt 13:53–58.

<sup>107</sup> On what follows, cf. Martin Hengel, Nachfolge und Charisma: Eine exegetisch-religionsgeschichtliche Studie zu Mt 8,21f und Jesu Ruf in die Nachfolge (Berlin: Töpelmann 1968), 18–63; Gnllka, Jesus, 167–174; Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 198–199.

<sup>108</sup> Cf. Mark 1:16–20/Matt 4:18–22; Luke 5:1–11; Mark 2:13–14/Matt 9:9/Luke 5:27–28; Mark 10:21–22/Matt 19:21–22/Luke 18:22–23. These vocation narratives, as we read them today, are doubtless cast in an idealized and typical form, but they all still allow us to see the charismatic authority of Jesus.

<sup>109</sup> Cf. Mark 5:18–19/Luke 8:38–39; Luke 9:57–62/Matt 8:19–22.

<sup>110</sup> Cf. Matt 8:19–22/Luke 9:57–62; Luke 14:26–27/Matt 10:37–38; Luke 14:28–33; Mark 8:34–35/Matt 16:24–25/Luke 9:23–24.

proclamation of the rule of God which has drawn near (cf. Matt 10:7; Luke 9:2; 9:60; 10:9) as well as in exorcisms and healings (Mark 6:7/ Matt 10:1/Luke 9:1f.; Luke 10:9), as we see in the discourse in which he sends them out.<sup>111</sup> Jesus presupposes here that the rule of God will shine out in the preaching and healing activity of the disciples too. This however does not mean that the disciples become independent representatives of God: the relationship between Jesus and his disciples is defined by the basic relationship of discipleship even when he commissions them to work on their own. It is Jesus who commissions and empowers the disciples to engage in preaching; they then carry out his commission. And the disciples' certainty is rooted exclusively in Jesus' certainty that God is offering his people a new relationship to God and that God even now permits his rule to shine out in healings and mighty deeds. It is only via Jesus that the disciples have access to God's eschatological decision to grant salvation, and they experience their empowerment to perform healings and drive out the demons as an authority which Jesus grants them. Consequently, the disciples do not carry out a role of their own which would be similar to that of Jesus. They do however receive a share in his role.<sup>112</sup> Accordingly, in comparison to his disciples, Jesus' own relationship to the rule of God which has drawn near is an exclusive relationship.<sup>113</sup>

We should note a further point. Jesus not only gives his disciples a share in his role as the one who proclaims the rule of God which has drawn near, and commissions them to perform healings and exorcisms. He also expects that their lifestyle as disciples will be permeated by their commitment to the rule of God which has drawn near. The disciples must represent God vis-à-vis human beings with Jesus and in the name of Jesus; and they must follow him as the one whose life is based completely on trust in the rule of God which has drawn near.

---

<sup>111</sup> This discourse is transmitted in several variants; cf. Mark 6:7/Matt 10:1/Luke 9:1–2 and Matt 10:7–8/Luke 10:9. It is certain that secondary elements have entered the formulations of this discourse as we find them in the gospels, but it is very likely that Jesus commissioned his disciples too to perform healings and exorcisms. Recollections of this commission are preserved e.g., at Mark 9:18/Matt 17:16/Luke 9:40. Cf. also Gnllka, Jesus, 171; Martin Hengel, Nachfolge und Charisma, 82–89.

<sup>112</sup> Thus also Merklein, Botschaft, 66, and Gnllka, Jesus, 174. Cf. Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 200: "The women and men disciples share in Jesus' mission and authority."

<sup>113</sup> This is expressed substantially in Matt 10:24/Luke 6:40/John 13:16.

3.2.3. The Attitude to Jesus as a Criterion in the Future Judgment

Jesus takes it for granted that those who put their faith in his preaching, and thus welcome the fact that the rule of God has drawn near, have already gained access to the eschatological salvation. This can also be stated in negative terms: a considerable number of logia show that where people refuse to accept the preaching of Jesus, they exclude themselves from the rule of God which has drawn near.<sup>114</sup> To turn one's back on Jesus is to turn one's back on the rule of God, and thereby to lose the eschatological salvation.<sup>115</sup> This claim on the part of Jesus is the logical consequence of his claim to be the eschatological representative of God.

Jesus however nowhere claims that faith in him is the precondition for entry into the kingdom of God. He never says that only those who sympathize with his preaching—still less, only those who follow him—will receive the kingdom of God. The kingdom of God is open to others, even to people who do not know Jesus.<sup>116</sup> It is indeed true

<sup>114</sup> The following blocks of tradition are relevant here:

- The logion about confessing and denying, Luke 12:8-9/Matt 10:32-3: "Everyone who acknowledges me before human beings, the Son of Man also will acknowledge before the angels of God; but he who denies me before human beings will be denied before the angels of God."
- The logion about judgment, Luke 11:31-32/Matt 12:41-42: "The queen of the South will arise at the judgment with this men of this generation and condemn them; for she came from the ends of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon, and behold, something greater than Solomon is here. The men of Nineveh will arise at the judgment with this generation and condemn it; for they repented at the preaching of Jonah, and behold, something greater than Jonah is here."
- The cry of woe uttered against the Galilean towns Chorazin, Bethsaida, and Capernaum (Luke 10:13-15/Matt 11:21-24).
- The logion about discipleship, Mark 8:35/Luke 9:24/Matt 16:25 and Matt 10:39/Luke 17:33/John 12:25: "The one who seeks to save his life will lose it; but whoever loses his life for my sake, will find it."
- The beatitude at Matt 11:6/Luke 7:23, "Blessed is the one who takes no offense at me."
- The metaphor of the house built on sand or on rock which closes the Sermon on the Mount and the Sermon on the Plain (Luke 6:47-49/Matt 7:24-27).

Although questions arise about the authenticity of the individual logia, their sheer number certainly permits us to draw conclusions about Jesus' intention. John too has preserved this intention; his formulations are secondary, but they are substantially correct—cf. e.g., John 3:17-18; 3:36; 5:24; 12:46-48.

<sup>115</sup> Thus also Becker, Jesus, 58-59; Weder, Gottesherrschaft, 48 n. 79; Gnilka, Jesus, 149 and 158; Merklein, Botschaft, 36; Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 242-243.

<sup>116</sup> Cf. Luke 6:20/Matt 5:3; Matt 25:31-46—if the basic core of this text goes back to Jesus himself. The expression εἰσέρχεσθαι ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ τοῦ θεοῦ is usually not that the rule of God has drawn near in Jesus, but it cannot simply be identified with him: the rule of God is larger than Jesus. This is why Jesus also envisages an access to the rule of God which is not mediated via the personal relationship to his own person.

The structure of Jesus' claim that one's attitude to him decides salvation or damnation is not unique. We find the same structural claim in all the prophets. Unlike the Old Testament prophets, however, Jesus makes his claim in an eschatological context: he is the final and definitive representative of God.

3.2.4. The Eschatological Reconstitution of the People of God

Jesus addressed his message that the rule of God had drawn near not to the whole of humanity, but to the people of God, to Israel.<sup>117</sup> Jesus does not seek encounters with Gentiles, although he does not reject non-Jews in principle, when these approach him.<sup>118</sup> The occasional periods which he spends in areas where Gentiles live should be seen as attempts to withdraw; they are not motivated by the desire to preach.<sup>119</sup> "This does not mean that Jesus wishes to exclude the Gentiles from the coming salvation. It is probable that his ideas on this subject remained entirely in keeping with the prophetic expectation of the eschatological pilgrimage of the peoples to Zion" (cf. Isa 2:2–5; Mic 4:1–4).<sup>120</sup> The people of Israel provided the framework for Jesus' activity, which however implicitly included a universalistic tendency.<sup>121</sup> linked directly to the person of Jesus: Matt 5:20; Matt 7:21; Mark 9:43–47/Matt 18:8–9; Mark 10:14–15/Matt 18:3; Matt 19:14/Luke 18:16–17; (Matt 19:17); Mark 10:23–25/Matt 19:23–24/Luke 18:24–25; Matt 21:31–32.

---

<sup>117</sup> Historically speaking, this affirmation is virtually certain, since the mission of the post-Easter community to the Gentiles begins only after a number of painful stages in which they acquire the relevant insights: cf. also Matt 10:5–6; Matt 15:24; Mark 7:24–30/Matt 15:21–28.

<sup>118</sup> Cf. the traditions about the healing of the daughter of the Syro-Phoenician woman (Mark 7:24–30/Matt 15:21–28) and the healing of the servant of the officer in Capernaum (Matt 8:5–13/Luke 7:1–10). The core of these two traditions is certainly authentic.

<sup>119</sup> Cf. Mark 7:24/Matt 15:21.

<sup>120</sup> Merklein, Botschaft, 42. Cf. Becker, Jesus, 395–398; Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 233; and Sanders, Jesus, 192, who makes this point with greater caution. We should however note that Jesus never interprets this special position of the Jews in nationalistic-imperialistic terms, whereas there are Jewish traditions which interpret the pilgrimage of the peoples to Zion as the submission of the Gentiles (cf. e.g., Isa 49:22–23; 60:14; Psalms of Solomon 17.21–31).

<sup>121</sup> The reason for this universalistic tendency is that Jesus sees the eschatological turning point which brings salvation as based, not on the special election of Israel,

This turning to Israel as the people of God is also manifested in Jesus' founding of the group of the twelve.<sup>122</sup> The re-establishing of the people in twelve tribes was a stable element in the Jewish expectation of eschatological salvation, since it was envisaged that the end time would entail the reconstitution of the ideal past.<sup>123</sup> When Jesus posits the symbolic action of calling twelve men to hand on his message to the entire people of God, and perhaps even to be the symbolic representation of the eschatological people of God,<sup>124</sup> he is spelling out his claim that the eschatological turning point has already occurred and that the restitution of the people of God, which was expected for the end-time, is now possible. The re-established people of God of the eschaton becomes visible in the symbolic group of twelve. By calling the twelve, Jesus makes it clear that the eschatological reconstitution of the people of God is now beginning. However, he does not carry out a genuine separation of the true people of God from the false Israel: he leaves this for the full realization of the rule but exclusively on the grace and kindness of the Creator, which is expressed in the fact that Jesus occasionally portrays the Gentiles as exemplary figures who ought to be imitated by the members of his own people (Luke 10:30–35; Luke 11:31–32/Matt 12:41–42; Luke 7:9/Matt 8:10; Luke 13:28–30/Matt 8:11–12). Cf. also Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 246.

---

<sup>122</sup> Some scholars regard the group of the twelve as a body which came into being after Easter in order to direct the community; it is argued in support of this thesis that the twelve are not mentioned in Q and that, according to Acts 1:12–26, the twelve played a decisive role in the early post-Easter community. A weighty argument in favor of the pre-Easter founding of the twelve is the fact that Judas Iscariot is always mentioned as one of the twelve. What could be the point of making Judas a member of the twelve, if this is a post-Easter body projected back onto the time of Jesus? We should also mention that 1 Cor 15:5 already mentions “the twelve” among the witnesses to the resurrection. In discussing this problem, we should note that Luke was the first to designate the twelve as “apostles”; in Mark they are always simply called “the twelve.” On these problems, cf. the very detailed argumentation by Bédard Rigaux, “Die ‘Zwölf’ in Geschichte und Kerygma,” in Der historische Jesus und der kerygmatische Christus: Beiträge zum Christusverständnis in Forschung und Verkündigung, Helmut Ristow and Karl Matthiae (Berlin: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 2nd ed. 1961 [1st ed. 1960]), 469–482. The following scholars assume that Jesus founded the group of the twelve before Easter: Becker, Jesus, 32–33; Gnllka, Jesus, 187–188; Merklein, Botschaft, 42; Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 201.

<sup>123</sup> For textual evidence, cf. Gnllka, Jesus, 188–189.

<sup>124</sup> The synoptics agree in linking the vocation of the twelve with their commission to preach and to heal (cf. Mark 3:13–19/Matt 10:1–5/Luke 6:12–16). It is possible that they also function as representatives (Sanders, Jesus, 120 and 122). It is probably only at a later date that the idea arose that the twelve would be the leaders and rulers of the eschatological people of God (as in Matt 19:28/Luke 22:29–30. On this, cf. Gnllka, Jesus, 189).

of God. Jesus' claim to represent God in the eschatological age is also implicit in his symbolic calling of the twelve: for it is Jesus who appoints the twelve.

3.2.5. Jesus' Role when He Imparts His Directives

Jesus was not only the one who proclaimed that the rule of God had drawn near; he was also the exegete of God's will. According to the Jewish understanding, however, God's will is documented in Torah. We must therefore inquire at this point into Jesus' position vis-à-vis Torah.<sup>125</sup>

Jesus never denies in principle that the Torah is a valid communication of the will of God. Nevertheless, the consequence of his preaching is a relativization of Torah. To begin with, he implicitly calls its soteriological function into question: it is not through the observance of a Torah which must be expounded by means of refined casuistry that people will find access to the rule of God, but by accepting the gracious offer of God which is addressed to them in Jesus' message and by living in the nearness of the kingdom of God which he has given them as a gift. In this way, Jesus implicitly claims that his message is superior to Torah,<sup>126</sup> and he renders Torah and covenant obsolete as mediators of the gift of salvation.<sup>127</sup> Now, with his message, Jesus is the decisive mediator of salvation, and it is he who now makes possible in God's name a new access to salvation. Secondly, Jesus proclaims that this insight into the nearness of the rule of God gives a new, immediate access to the will of God. And this too "relativizes" Torah as "the sufficient and decisive communication of the will of God."<sup>128</sup> This new basis for knowledge of the will of God makes it possible for Jesus to proclaim God's will

---

<sup>125</sup> This question has given rise to vehement disagreements in the historical investigation of the life of Jesus. It is not possible to discuss it adequately in the framework of the present essay. For further details, cf. Kreplin, Selbstverständnis, 247–259.

<sup>126</sup> On this, cf. Sanders, Jesus, 237: "If the most important thing that people could do was to accept him, the importance of other demands was reduced, even though Jesus did not say that those demands were invalid."

<sup>127</sup> Thus also Becker, Jesus, 354. This is why the concept of "covenant" is found only once in the Jesus tradition, when he speaks of a "new covenant."

<sup>128</sup> Wolfgang Schrager, Ethik des Neuen Testaments, GNT 4 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht 1982), 63.

authoritatively and directly, without recourse to Torah.<sup>129</sup> His reception of Torah traditions sometimes intensifies these,<sup>130</sup> and sometimes plays them down<sup>131</sup>—but in each case, the reason is his own insight into the will of God. Jesus also deals with ethical questions which are not regulated in Torah.<sup>132</sup>

Although one cannot say that Jesus in effect abolished Torah, it would be equally wrong to see him as a “Jew who was faithful to the law” and merely offered his own particular exegesis of scripture,<sup>133</sup> since we must not overlook the fact that Jesus “displays an authority and a certainty about what God really wants—and these can be explained only in the context of his eschatological mission, or of his eschatological knowledge.”<sup>134</sup> This is why the role that Jesus claims for himself in the directives which he gives is not that of a rabbi who has studied the scriptures.<sup>135</sup> “He taught them like one who has ἐξουσία and not like the scribes.”<sup>136</sup> And this means that when he imparts his directives, Jesus also plays the role of God’s eschatological representative. “Jesus dares to demand obedience to God’s will as if he himself stood in the place of God.”<sup>137</sup> In view of the authority and power to which Jesus lays claim when he proclaims his teaching, it is all the more astonishing that he does not offer any legitimation even

---

<sup>129</sup> Accordingly, most of Jesus’ directives contain no argumentative recourse to Torah. Where he does refer to Torah, this often happens antithetically (cf. the antitheses of the Sermon on the Mount and Mark 10:2–9/Matt 19:3–9).

<sup>130</sup> It is above all social commandments such as the command to love one’s enemies or the prohibition of divorce that are intensified.

<sup>131</sup> It is above all cultic commandments such as the law of purity which are neutralized.

<sup>132</sup> E.g., the requirement that one put one’s trust in God’s care, or the summons to discipleship.

<sup>133</sup> Thus David Flusser, Jesus—in Selbstzeugnissen und Bilddokumenten, rororo-Biographien 140 (Reinbeck near Hamburg: Rowohlt, 1978 [1st ed. 1968], 44 and 71.

<sup>134</sup> Merklein, Botschaft, 100.

<sup>135</sup> Cf. Sanders, Jesus, 238: “His authority (in his own view and that of his followers) was not mediated by any human organisation, not even by scripture. A rabbi, or a teacher of the law, derived authority from studying and interpreting the Bible. Jesus doubtless did both, but it was not scriptural interpretation that gave him a claim on other people.” Thus also Becker, Jesus, 279 and 350; against Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 350. This is not contradicted by the fact that Jesus was initially perceived by outsiders as a rabbi and was also addressed as such.

<sup>136</sup> Mark 1:22/Matt 7:29/Luke 4:32; cf. John 7:46. This summary of Jesus’ activity is probably a post-Easter formulation, but it is a substantially correct description of Jesus.

<sup>137</sup> Ernst Fuchs, “Die Frage nach dem historischen Jesus,” ZTK 53 (1956): 210–229, esp. 219.

in this area of his preaching—and this shows that Jesus' position with regard to Torah and his directives are based exclusively on his own certainty about God.

Jesus' teaching must be considered from yet another perspective. It is not only the authoritative proclamation of the will of God; like the rest of his preaching, it helps make the rule of God a present reality. When Jesus' followers accept his word and love their enemies, forgive their debtors, renounce revenge, and welcome into their fellowship those who had been excluded, the rule of God shines out even now. And this means that when Jesus' disciples follow his directives, they themselves help to make God's rule a present reality. Jesus' disciples not only possessed his teaching as a source of orientation: it is clear that Jesus himself lived what he demanded of others. When he called others to follow him and thus challenged them to share in his own way of life, he implicitly presented himself as the paradigm of the human being who lives in accordance with the will of God.<sup>138</sup> When he imparted his directives, therefore, Jesus represented the human being “who lives wholly on the basis of the rule of God which has drawn near and commits himself to serve this rule. Jesus takes it completely for granted that there is an intimate connection” between his role as God's eschatological representative in relation to human beings in the directives which he gives, and his own existence in total confidence in the rule of God which has drawn near.<sup>139</sup>

3.2.6. Summary: The Role of Jesus in the Rule of God which has Drawn Near

We can now summarize these various aspects and make the following affirmations about the role which Jesus de facto took on and implicitly claimed in the eschatological rule of God, which had drawn near and was the object of his proclamation.

Jesus saw himself as the eschatological representative of God. His proclamation of the eschatological relationship to God and his ethical directives are rooted exclusively in his own certainty with regard to God. He claimed to be speaking and acting in the place of God. In this way, he took on the role of the one who proclaimed the rule of God. Unlike the prophets and John the Baptist, who had made similar claims, Jesus saw himself as the decisive eschatological messenger of God, with the task of proclaiming a qualitatively new decision by God to grant salvation.

<sup>138</sup> Thus also Becker, Jesus, 287.

<sup>139</sup> Ibid., 288.

Jesus not only proclaimed that the rule of God had drawn near. In his healings and exorcisms, and in his calling of the group of the twelve, he was already accomplishing in a fragmentary manner the rule of God which had drawn near. He himself is the instrument through which the rule of God is realized. In this respect, Jesus did not see himself as playing an exclusive rule: he gave his disciples the task of letting the rule of God shine out in their activity too. Nevertheless, the disciples acted as persons who were authorized and commissioned by Jesus, and they remained dependent on his certainty with regard to God.

Jesus not only takes on the role of God's eschatological representative vis-à-vis human beings. At the same time, he is also the human being who lives in the totality of his existence on the basis of the rule of God which has drawn near. He himself has the eschatological relationship to God which he makes available to others. He performs his mighty deeds and miracles on the basis of his faith in God's salvific nearness and lives in accordance with the will of God. Clearly, it is possible for Jesus to take on the role of God's eschatological representative only because he himself is the first one who hears and lives his own message. Jesus must therefore be seen also as the representative of the new eschatological existence. He is the one in whom the rule of God becomes a reality.

Did Jesus regard himself as the Messiah? When we consider the various articulations of the Jewish messianic expectation,<sup>140</sup> we see that the nuanced role which Jesus took on and claimed for himself with regard to the rule of God which had drawn near is not completely isomorphic with any of the various messianic concepts. On the other hand, the Jewish messianic expectation was so pluriform that Jesus' self-understanding could certainly have been perceived as messianic. He claimed a role which entailed a sovereignty and dignity that were undoubtedly on the same level as the various messianic expectations: Jesus saw himself as the eschatological representative of

---

<sup>140</sup> On this, cf. e.g., Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 464–467; Hengel, Early Christology, 32–41; Johannes Zimmermann, Messianische Texte aus Qumran: Königliche, priesterliche und prophetische Messiasvorstellungen in den Schriftfunden von Qumran, WUNT 2.104 (Tübingen: Mohr and Siebeck 1998).

God. He perceived a qualitative difference between himself and all the other messengers of God in the past. He understood himself as the definitive and decisive representative of God. And thus we can say that “Jesus had a messianic self-understanding, but without the title ‘Messiah’.”<sup>141</sup>

4. The Contradiction in Jesus’ Activity, and its Explanation<sup>142</sup>

Jesus had a messianic self-understanding, but he did not lay claim to any messianic title. In other respects too, he was very reserved about his own person.

For example, he employed the passivum divinum to speak of his own activity,<sup>143</sup> or else spoke only indirectly of himself by means of formulations such as: “Something greater than Solomon/Jonah is here.”<sup>144</sup> Formulations such as: “Many prophets longed to see what you see”<sup>145</sup> and “The rule of God is ἐν τὸς ὑμῶν”<sup>146</sup> leave the reference to his own person puzzlingly open. This indirect way of speaking about his person and his activity was also a basic trait of Jesus’ parables, which are to be understood as a theological explication of his activity.<sup>147</sup> Jesus’ person remained mysterious. He refused to legitimate his claim in any way. He did not tell any story about an experience of being called, nor did he describe any visions and heavenly voices. He did not employ the classical prophetic formulae which the prophets had used to identify their message as the word of God. He also refused the demands to authenticate himself by means of a miracle.<sup>148</sup> When challenged to show his legitimation, he answers evasively.<sup>149</sup> He never justifies his proclamation by speaking explicitly

<sup>141</sup> Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 468.

<sup>142</sup> On this entire section, cf. Kreplin, Selbstverständnis, 272–302.

<sup>143</sup> Matt 11:2–6/Luke 7:18–23.

<sup>144</sup> Luke 11:31–32/Matt 12:41–42.

<sup>145</sup> Luke 10:23–24/Matt 13:16–17.

<sup>146</sup> Luke 17:21.

<sup>147</sup> Cf. e.g., Mark 2:19a/Matt 9:15a/Luke 5:34. On this, cf. also Hans Weder, Gleichnisse, 95.

<sup>148</sup> Mark 8:11–12/Matt 16:1.4/Luke 11:16; Matt 12:38–39/Luke 11:29; cf. also John 2:18–22; 6:30. It is clear that a prophet was expected to work authenticating miracles (cf. the various examples in Rudolf Meyer, ThWNT 6, 827). Mark 2:1–12/Matt 9:1–18/Luke 5:17–26 is not an authenticating miracle, since it is only the Son of Man logion, inserted secondarily at Mark 2:10, that makes this narrative a miracle of this kind.

<sup>149</sup> Mark 11:27–33/Matt 21:23–27/Luke 20:1–8.

of the status of his own person. In several stories of healing,<sup>150</sup> Jesus refuses to place too much emphasis on his own abilities as healer and exorcist, and sends away the healed person with the words: “Your faith has saved you.”<sup>151</sup> Instead of accepting the acknowledgment and veneration of his person after the healings, Jesus employs these words to withdraw his own person from the spotlight. He points instead to the faith of the person who has been healed and to the activity of God. In keeping with this, the surviving accounts never tell us that Jesus turned his healings to his own profit: we never hear of financial payments or of gifts. On the contrary, the tradition remembers Jesus as withdrawing from the crowd after healings and miracles. He did not permit his own person to be celebrated.<sup>152</sup> These observations are reinforced by two other strands of tradition, which hand on words of Jesus that are probably authentic. When the rich man asks him about eternal life, genuflecting before him and addressing him as διδάσκαλε ἀγαθέ, Jesus replies: “Why do you call me ‘good’? No one is good but God alone!”<sup>153</sup> And he coldly rejects the indirect glorification of his own person through the beatitude pronounced on his mother, replying with an antithetical beatitude: “Blessed rather are those who hear the word of God and keep it.”<sup>154</sup>

---

<sup>150</sup> Mark 5:34/Matt 9:22/Luke 8:48; Mark 10:52/Luke 18:42; Luke 17:19 (probably secondary here); cf. also Luke 7:50; Matt 8:10.13/Luke 7:9; Mark 2:5/Matt 9:2/Luke 5:20; Mark 9:23/Matt 17:20/Luke 17:6; Matt 15:28 (/Mark 7:29); Mark 5:36/Luke 8:50. Against these passages, cf. Matt 9:28–29, which however is redactional. In this context, the narrative of the healing of the woman with the flow of blood is paradigmatic (Mark 5:24–34/Matt 9:20–22/Luke 8:42b–48). It is precisely the special character of Jesus’ person that makes her healing possible (cf. Mark 5:30/Luke 8:46, “power went forth from him”—unlike Matthew, who derives the healing from Jesus’ word); but the closing words, “Your faith has made you well,” transpose the cause of the healing from Jesus’ power to the faith of the woman.

<sup>151</sup> These words of farewell are not to be understood—as probably happened after Easter (cf. Matt 9:28–29)—to mean: “Your faith in me has helped you.” Rather, they meant: “Your faith that God is at work has helped you—it is not I who helped you.” In individual cases, it is difficult to determine which traits in the tradition of the narratives of healing are authentic, but it is very difficult to imagine that an element which reduces Jesus’ own share in the healings could have penetrated these stories after Easter. It is more probable that the reserve on Jesus’ part which is expressed in these words was a striking aspect of his behavior when he performed healings, and that this was clearly remembered after Easter; this is why this trait could make its way even into narratives of healing which were created only at a secondary stage.

<sup>152</sup> E.g., Mark 1:32–38/Luke 4:38–43; John 6:15; cf. also John 2:24.

<sup>153</sup> Mark 10:17–18/Luke 18:18–19.

<sup>154</sup> Luke 11:27–28; cf. Gos. Thom. 79.

To sum up: Jesus not only refused to claim the veneration of his own person, sovereignty and honor, he also refused to describe (still less, to define) the role which he took on before God and human beings. He refused to answer the question: “Who is this Jesus?,” or indeed to let this question be discussed—since such a discussion could have created the preconditions for veneration by others or for a claim on his part to sovereignty and honor.<sup>155</sup>

Many scholars have attempted to explain this reserve by Jesus ab extra, so to speak.<sup>156</sup> For example, it has been suggested that Jesus had strategic motives.<sup>157</sup> He could not use any already existing messianic title of sovereignty, because this would have risked immediate and massive sanctions, calling his entire public ministry into question. Didactic motives have also been suggested. Jesus did not want to supply people with a comfortable formula for their orthodoxy; or else he did not want to make the understanding of his message dependent on the antecedent acknowledgment of his person. It has also been suggested that Jesus employed no title of sovereignty because the special role which he played was not envisaged in the eschatological expectation of his contemporaries. Another theory claims that Jesus understood himself as the messias designatus who as yet lived in concealment, awaiting the future day when God would reveal him in power. Finally, the attempt has been made to demonstrate that Jesus was so reserved about his own person because it was only in this way that he could correspond to particular messianic expectations.

These hypotheses may help to make plausible some aspects of his reserve, but none of these proposed explanations can tell us why Jesus completely refused to give any explicit account of his self-understanding. It is indeed true that nuanced explanations would have prevented him from being interpreted in incorrect categories, at least

---

<sup>155</sup> This is not contradicted by the emphatic “I” of Jesus in the antitheses, in which Jesus is contrasting his own authority to other traditions. Not even here does he offer any explanation of his own authority, or speak explicitly of his own person. The emphasis on his “I” is thus generated by the competition with other authorities. A comparable instance is the ἐγώ which is inserted at a secondary stage in Luke 11:20/ Matt 12:28.

<sup>156</sup> For details of these positions, cf. Kreplin, Selbstverständnis, 276–284.

<sup>157</sup> Ben F. Meyer thinks along these lines, in a very nuanced manner: “Jesus’ Ministry and Self-Understanding,” in Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluations of the State of Current Research, ed. Bruce Chilton and Craig A. Evans, NTTS 19 (Leiden: Brill, 1994), 337–352.

by his followers; this would have helped from the outset to ward off a misunderstanding. If however these explanatory models were correct, Jesus would actually have been obliged to cultivate the private instruction of his disciples, in order to help them acquire a full understanding of his person and his role. Clearly, however, he did not do so.

This is why an explanation for this reserve on Jesus' part can be found only ab infra, so to speak, as the logical consequence of his own preaching. Jesus' reserve about his own person must be understood here as one dimension of his paradigmatic existence, which was entirely marked by the fact that the rule of God had drawn near. We can recognize three motifs which make Jesus' reserve absolutely essential, given his eschatological ethos. These motifs overlap to some extent.

First, the rule of God is a gift that cannot be merited, but only received.<sup>158</sup> When confronted with the rule of God, all human ideas about rank and dignity collapse.<sup>159</sup> Now that the rule of God has drawn near, anyone who appeals to some special status that is higher than other people is failing to display the correct attitude vis-à-vis God's kingdom.<sup>160</sup> And it is precisely in my conduct vis-à-vis my fellow human beings that I reveal the attitude I take to God and to the rule of God which he has inaugurated. If Jesus had disclosed his own self-understanding and thereby explicitly claimed an exalted status for himself, he would no longer have been the man whose existence was wholly orientated to the rule of God that has drawn near. Instead, he would have created a distance between himself and his fellow human beings—a distance that would have diametrically contradicted his own preaching.

Secondly, as the concept itself affirms, the "rule of God" means the exclusive sovereignty of God and thereby the end of human sovereignty over other human beings.<sup>161</sup> Honor and glorification will belong to God alone.<sup>162</sup> Now that the rule of God has drawn near, it is impossible to lay claim to sovereignty, superiority, power, or even merely some special honor. The only mode of conduct which is possible now is that of service, which endeavors to shatter the existing

<sup>158</sup> Mark 10:15/Luke 18:17/Matt 18:3; Luke 17:7–10; Luke 6:20–21.

<sup>159</sup> Mark 10:31/Matt 19:30/Matt 20:16/Luke 13:30.

<sup>160</sup> Luke 18:9–14; Matt 20:1–15; Luke 15:25–32.

<sup>161</sup> Mark 10:42–44/Matt 20:25–27/Luke 18:25–27.

<sup>162</sup> Matt 6:9–10/Luke 11:2.

structure of superiority/inferiority by means of the voluntary acceptance of subordination. Human existence in the context of the rule of God which has drawn near means serving. Jesus himself saw his own activity as an exemplary realization of this ethos of service: "The Son of Man did not come in order that he might be served, but in order to serve."<sup>163</sup> This would have been contradicted by a claim to an exalted position.

Thirdly, since the future accomplishment of the rule of God will bring honor to one's person, it is not necessary to seek recognition, honor, and respect in the present day.<sup>164</sup> This is shown by the exhortation to lay up treasures in heaven.<sup>165</sup> One who trusts the message that the kingdom of God has drawn near need not expect to be honored in the present time: he can wait for the future fulfillment of God's rule, in which the dignity of his own person will be revealed. Jesus saw the present time as completely determined by the fulfillment of the rule of God, which would certainly take place in the future. It follows that he was able—and indeed, obliged—to renounce any glorification of his own person in the present time.

These three arguments make it clear that Jesus' renunciation of an exalted status, of sovereignty, and of any claim to the veneration and acknowledgment of his own person is a consequence of his message that the rule of God has already drawn near. If Jesus wished to remain faithful to his commission as the eschatological representative of God—which entailed leading a life totally oriented to the rule of God which had drawn near—then he was obliged to draw as little attention as possible to his own person and to say as little as possible about his self-understanding. Jesus was obliged to say nothing about his own role precisely in his dealings with the disciples: for if he had offered a clear definition of the exalted status which he undoubtedly possessed in the group of disciples, he would have been justifying a claim to this status. Every presentation of his self-understanding, whether to outsiders or to disciples, would have laid the basis for various kinds of veneration and for the ascription to him of sovereignty and lordship. Precisely because Jesus understood himself as

---

<sup>163</sup> Mark 10:45/Matt 20:28 and Luke 22:27.

<sup>164</sup> Cf. Luke 12:16–21; Luke 14:12–14; Luke 6:32–35/cf. Matt 5:46; Matt 6:1–8, 16–18.

<sup>165</sup> Matt 6:19–21/Luke 12:33–34; Mark 10:21/Matt 19:21/Luke 18:22.

God's eschatological representative, he was obliged as far as possible to leave unresolved the question of his own identity. He could not speak about his self-understanding.

If this analysis is correct, it was Jesus himself who shrouded his person in mystery, and the Markan conception of the messianic secret goes back at least in part to Jesus himself. We must therefore conclude that the injunction to the disciples to keep silence, which is formulated in very general terms—"And he commanded them not to speak to anyone about him" (Mark)—has an authentic core.<sup>166</sup>

If this analysis is correct, we must also assume that, as the tradition relates,<sup>167</sup> Jesus testified in the interrogation before the Sanhedrin and possibly also in the interrogation before Pilate to his self-understanding as God's eschatological representative, and thereby laid claim to the messianic dignity. This was because Jesus encountered the question about his self-understanding in a completely different context here than during his public ministry. In the interrogation(s), the explication of his self-understanding did not mean that he was claiming sovereignty, power, and honor. Rather, it intensified the risk that he would suffer violence. Silence here would be an attempt to save his own life by refusing to make the admission demanded of him. This agrees with the fact—attested by the probably historical inscription on the cross and the dominance of the title "King of the Jews" in the passion narrative—that Jesus was executed as a messianic pretender. And this helps explain how the title of Messiah could become the central Christological concept so soon after Easter, and why it was used at an early date as a name for Jesus: since he himself had admitted to being the Messiah, his disciples could understand the resurrection of Jesus as God's confirmation of this messianic status, and then proclaim him as the Christ.

I close this essay with a theological judgment—not an historical judgment. When the earliest Christians ascribed the title of Messiah to Jesus, they were recognizing and confirming the role in which

---

<sup>166</sup> Matt 16:20 and Luke 9:21 immediately tone down this commandment to keep silence, even in its general application.

<sup>167</sup> Mark 14:61–62/Matt 26:63–64/Luke 22:67–70; Mark 15:2/Matt 27:11/Luke 23:3/John 18:33.37—although the traditional formulations of the questions addressed to Jesus and his answers certainly bear the marks of post-Easter conceptions.

Jesus had seen himself. And they were obliged to call Jesus “Messiah” for exactly the same reason that had obliged Jesus to refuse this title before Easter. Accordingly, the pre-Easter messianic secret and the post-Easter messianic confession do not amount to an historical discontinuity. They are two sides of the same coin.<sup>168</sup>

---

<sup>168</sup> English translation: Brian McNeil.

THE MESSAGE OF JESUS I: MIRACLES, CONTINUING CONTROVERSIES

GRAHAM H. TWELFTREE

Controversies surrounding the miracles of Jesus have ebbed and flowed over the last two or more centuries.<sup>1</sup> Dating from the last two decades of the twentieth century, “A Renaissance in Jesus Studies”<sup>2</sup> has involved a renewed interest in the miracles of Jesus. It is not that there has been an accent on the miracle traditions.<sup>3</sup> Rather, the problem of miracle has returned to center stage as one of the dividing lines in present-day Jesus research.<sup>4</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> For histories of the study of the miracles of Jesus see, e.g., B. L. Blackburn, “The Miracles of Jesus,” in Studying the Historical Jesus, ed. B. D. Chilton and C. A. Evans (Leiden: Brill, 1994), 353–394; W. Kahl, New Testament Miracle Stories in their Religious-Historical Setting (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1994), 13–36; G. H. Twelftree, “The History of Miracles in the History of Jesus,” in The Face of New Testament Studies: A Survey of Recent Research, ed. S. McKnight and G. Osborne (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker and Leicester: InterVarsity, 2004), 191–208; G. H. Twelftree, “Miracle Story,” in Encyclopedia of the Historical Jesus, ed. Craig A. Evans (New York and London: Routledge, 2008), 416–420. I record my thanks to Jami Simon, Catherine W. Wait and especially Eric Eve for reading and commenting on an earlier draft of this chapter and to the staff of Löhe Memorial Library (Australian Lutheran College, Adelaide) for their hospitality.

<sup>2</sup> M. J. Borg, “A Renaissance in Jesus Studies,” TToday 45 (1988–89): 280–292. For a survey of the literature see B. Witherington, The Jesus Quest (Carlisle, UK: Paternoster, 1997). It remains debatable as to whether or not this is a continuation of the second quest or is to be called a third quest and, if so, when the third quest might have begun. See W. R. Telford, “Major Trends and Interpretive Issues in the Study of Jesus,” in Studying the Historical Jesus, ed. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans (Leiden: Brill, 1994), 33–74.

<sup>3</sup> Contrary to B. B. Scott, “From Reimarus to Crossan: Stages in a Quest,” CurBS 2 (1994): 253–280, at 272, and N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God (London: SPCK, 1996), 186. Indeed, J. D. Crossan, L. T. Johnson and W. H. Kelber, The Jesus Controversy (Harrisburg, PA: TPI, 1999), 51, 72, 83, 114, only make passing reference to the miracles, and the subject does not feature in Telford, “Trends” or in D. S. du Toit, “Redefining Jesus: Current Trends in Jesus Research,” in Jesus, Mark and Q, ed. M. Labahn and A. Schmidt (London and New York: T&T Clark, 2001), 82–124.

<sup>4</sup> E.g., J. P. Meier, “Dividing Lines in Jesus Research Today. Through Dialectical Negation to a Positive Sketch,” Int 50 (1996): 355–372, deals with: the question of sources, the Q document, the eschatology of Jesus’ proclamation, Jesus as Messiah, institutional elements from the historical Jesus, and the miracles of Jesus. Cf. W. Barnes Tatum, In Quest of Jesus, rev. and enl. ed. (Nashville, TN: Abingdon, 1999), Part Three.

That is, the miracles are being treated more carefully than at any time since the beginning of the scientific study of Jesus.<sup>5</sup> This interest has arisen for a number of reasons: because of the failure to show that miracles originated outside the Jesus tradition;<sup>6</sup> the increased confidence in the historical reliability of the gospel traditions;<sup>7</sup> the increased interest in and knowledge of the milieu in which Jesus lived;<sup>8</sup> the use of social-scientific methods broadening ways of understanding miracles;<sup>9</sup> methodological prudence in not being too hasty in judging what is historically not possible;<sup>10</sup> the general sensitivity <sup>5</sup> On this paragraph see also, and those cited by, Twelftree, "The History of Miracles," 207. See also the discussion by Blackburn, "Miracles," 353–394 and J. P. Meier, "The Present State of the 'Third Quest' for the Historical Jesus: Loss and Gain," Biblica 80 (1999): 477–483, esp. 479 nn. 46–48, who cites D. E. Aune, "Magic in Early Christianity," ANRW II. 23.2 (1980): 1507–1557; G. Theissen, Miracle Stories in the Early Christian Tradition (Edinburgh, UK: T&T Clark, 1983); E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (London: SCM, 1985); J. D. Crossan, The Historical Jesus (San Francisco: Harper-Collins, 1991); G. H. Twelftree, Jesus the Exorcist (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr and Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1993); Kahl, Miracle Stories; S. L. Davies, Jesus the Healer (London: SCM, 1995); H. C. Kee, Miracle in the Early Christian World (New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1983). See also Meier, Marginal, 2:509–1038; G. H. Twelftree, Jesus the Miracle Worker (Downers Grove: IVP, 1999) and E. Eve, The Jewish Context of Jesus' Miracles, JSNTSup 231 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 2002).

---

<sup>6</sup> Twelftree, Miracle Worker, 281–330, esp. 330, though see, e.g., J. Becker, Jesus of Nazareth (New York and Berlin: de Gruyter, 1998), 172, who says that we cannot exclude the possibility that "on occasion a non-Christian legend about an itinerant miracle worker was retold from a Christian point of view."

<sup>7</sup> Evans, "Research," 14–15.

<sup>8</sup> See the review by J. H. Charlesworth, "The Historical Jesus in Light of Writings Contemporaneous with Him" ANRW II 25.1 (1982): 451–476 and his Jesus Within Judaism (London: SPCK, 1988).

<sup>9</sup> See, e.g., Crossan, Jesus, esp. chapter 13; Davies, Healer; J. J. Pilch, Healing in the New Testament (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 2000).

<sup>10</sup> So Wright, Victory, 189; cf. Meyer, Aims, 99–104. This prudence arises from (1) an increasingly rigorous philosophical and theological defense of the possibility of miracles. See, e.g., R. F. Holland, "The Miraculous," American Philosophical Quarterly 2 (1965): 43–51; R. Swinburne, The Concept of Miracle (London: Macmillan, 1970); R. C. Wallace, "Hume, Flew and the Miraculous," Philosophical Quarterly 20 (1970): 230–243; R. Swinburne, ed., Miracles (New York: Macmillan and London: Collier Macmillan, 1989); J. Houston, Reported Miracles (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994). Also (2), even if there was a "renaissance of belief in the miraculous"—Theissen, Miracle, 274—there is a recognition that the miracle traditions have not arisen in an entirely credulous world. See, e.g., F. G. Downing, "Access to Other Cultures, Past and Present (on the Myth of the Cultural Gap)," Modern Churchman 21 (1977–78): 28–42; J. Barton, "Reflections on Cultural Relativism," Theology 82 (1979): 191–199; E. P. Sanders, The Historical Figure of Jesus (London: Penguin, 1993), 143; Becker, Jesus, 175; G. N. Stanton, "Message and Miracles," in Cambridge and sophistication in historical methods;<sup>11</sup> and the participation of Roman Catholic, Jewish and evangelical scholars in Jesus research.<sup>12</sup> Nevertheless, controversies continue. Beginning with a broad question that is commanding some attention, this chapter identifies and seeks to elucidate the debates which now surround the study of the miracles of Jesus.<sup>13</sup>

1. How Important are the Miracles?

Although there are important dissenters,<sup>14</sup> the view of Adolf Schlatter (1852–1938), that it is fruitless to search for a miracle-free Jesus tradition,<sup>15</sup> is in the ascendancy. Thus it is now generally agreed that the historical Jesus can be credited with performing miracles of some kind.<sup>16</sup> However, there is no consensus on the question of the importance of the miracles for Jesus; how much time he spent performing wonders and, at another level, how significant they are for understanding his mission and, perhaps, his self-consciousness.

There are those who are agreed that Jesus was a miracle worker yet give the miracles only minimal place and significance. For example, though Markus Bockmuehl suggests Jesus explicitly understood his healings and exorcisms as inaugurating the kingdom of God, the miracles or miracle traditions are not mentioned in his summary of Jesus.<sup>17</sup> For Marcus Borg the miracles are somewhat more important.

---

Companion to Jesus, ed. M. Bockmuehl (Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2001), 66.

<sup>11</sup> See the discussion by Telford, "Trends," 49–51.

<sup>12</sup> Meier, "Present State," 461–464.

<sup>13</sup> This chapter develops and extends Twelftree, "History."

<sup>14</sup> See the discussion by M. A. Powell, Jesus as a Figure of History (Louisville, KY: WJK, 1998), 178–179 and, e.g., Becker, Jesus, 171–172 and B. L. Mack, A Myth of Innocence (Philadelphia, PA: Fortress, 1988), 215: "The earliest miracle stories were not reports of the miracle-working activity of Jesus." The dissent is more considerable in relation to the nature miracles. See also Blackburn, "Miracles," 369 n. 71 citing Aune, Borg, Bornkamm, Bultmann, Charlesworth, Fuller, Gnilka, Harvey, and Pesch.

<sup>15</sup> A. Schlatter, The History of the Christ (1921; ET, Grand Rapids, MI: Baker, 1997), 174.

<sup>16</sup> Aune, "Magic," 1524 n. 76; Blackburn, "Miracles," 392. Cf. G. Maier, "Zur Neutestamentlichen Wunderexegese im 19. und 20. Jahrhundert," in The Miracles of Jesus, Gospel Perspectives, ed. D. Wenham and C. Blomberg, vol. 6 (Sheffield: JSOT, 1986), 49–87.

<sup>17</sup> M. Bockmuehl, This Jesus (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1994), 164–167. See also J. D. G. Dunn, "Jesus for Today," TToday 52 (1995–96): 66–74 who does not mention miracles. Though, more recently in Jesus Remembered (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans,

In a seventy-five-second (171 words) presentation, Borg was invited to present on NBC's Today Show on Good Friday 1995 a summary of the pre-Easter Jesus. In what he calls a five-stroke sketch of the pre-Easter Jesus, Borg set out that he was a Spirit person, a healer, a wisdom teacher, a social prophet, and the initiator of a movement.<sup>18</sup> Borg also says that during his lifetime Jesus was known primarily as a healer and exorcist.<sup>19</sup> Then, not only does John P. Meier devote a great deal of attention to the miracles of Jesus, he also perceives that it is the explosive convergence and mutual reinforcement of the usually distinct activities of prophet, gatherer of Israel, teacher, as well as healer and exorcist and raiser of the dead, that makes Jesus stand out.<sup>20</sup>

Over against those who see the miracles as not particularly significant—and also even beyond those who see the miracles as important—a case can be made that Jesus' miracles are the interpretive key or of fundamental significance in reconstructing his life.<sup>21</sup> That we should consider taking the miracles as the interpretive key for the historical Jesus is the suggestion of Morton Smith (1915–91).<sup>22</sup>

To begin with, the fundamental importance of the miracles of Jesus can be seen by taking into account the following points. (1) Even though the gospel traditions available to us do not allow for any precision on the matter, Jesus' miracle working appears to loom large in the historically reliable data so that it is reasonable to conclude that miracle working dominated the activity of Jesus before Easter.<sup>23</sup> (2) In some traditions Jesus was remembered as primarily a miracle worker. First, assuming him to be a powerful healer, Jesus' name was used by 2003), Dunn has devoted 29 (667–696) of the 800 plus pages to Jesus as “A Doer of Extraordinary Deeds.”

---

<sup>18</sup> M. J. Borg, ed., Jesus at 2000 (Boulder, CO and Oxford, UK: Westview/HarperCollins, 1997), 10–11.

<sup>19</sup> M. Borg, Jesus: A New Vision (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1987), 60. See also M. J. Borg, “The Historian, the Christian, and Jesus,” TToday 52 (1995–96): 8–10.

<sup>20</sup> J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew, 3 vols. (New York: Doubleday, 1991, 1994, 2002), 2:1039–1047; Meier, “Present State,” 477–483.

<sup>21</sup> For a more detailed argument see G. H. Twelftree, “The Miracles of Jesus: Marginal or Mainstream?” JSHJ 1 (2003): 104–124.

<sup>22</sup> M. Smith, Jesus the Magician (London: Gollancz, 1978). For other possible starting points for the life of the historical Jesus—e.g., Jesus' teaching, or temple activity, or association with sinners—see the discussion by Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 3–7.

<sup>23</sup> Meier, Marginal, 2:970.

other miracle workers in their healings.<sup>24</sup> Also, the memory of Jesus as a miracle worker underlies almost all attacks on Jesus in the rabbinic traditions.<sup>25</sup> Further, Josephus described Jesus as a “wise man” (σοφὸς ἄνθρωπος), which he unpacks in terms of an ability to perform “surprising feats” (παραδόξων, “miracles”),<sup>26</sup> as well as to teach (Ant. 18.63).<sup>27</sup> What is significant for us is that, in summing up the work of Jesus, miracle working takes pride of place. Then, in a speech in Acts where Jesus’ ministry is summarized, Peter says Jesus went about “doing good and healing” (εὐεργετῶν καὶ ἰώμενος, Acts 10:38). This phrase may well be a hendiadys for in Acts 4:9 Peter and John’s healing of the lame man is simply described as a “good deed” (εὐεργεσία). Thus, Acts 10:38 is probably another tradition remembering Jesus as primarily a miracle worker.<sup>28</sup>

(3) There is also evidence that Jesus thought of himself as primarily a miracle worker. On being asked if he was “the one who is to come,” Jesus is reported as replying: “the blind receive their sight, the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, the deaf hear, the dead are raised, the poor have good news brought to them” (Matt 11:3, 5/Luke 7:19, 22).<sup>29</sup> Not only does miracle working dominate this description of his

<sup>24</sup> See Twelftree, Exorcist, 139–140 and those cited. I am no longer as confident that the evidence is as extensive. See G. H. Twelftree, “Jesus the Exorcist and Ancient Magic,” in M. Labahn and B. J. Liethaert Peerbolte, eds., A Kind of Magic: Understanding Magic in the New Testament and its Religious Environment (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 2007), 78–81.

<sup>25</sup> Cf. A. E. Harvey, Jesus and the Constraints of History (London: Duckworth, 1982), 98.

<sup>26</sup> Josephus uses παραδόξων variously, including for the miraculous; e.g., Ant. 2.223, 285, 295, 345, 347; 3.1, 30, 38; 5.28; 9.58, 60; 10.214, 235.

<sup>27</sup> Of course, this point depends on the veracity of the Testimonium Flavianum, both generally and in relation to the particular points made here. On the debate concerning the veracity of the testimony of Josephus see, e.g., G. H. Twelftree, “Jesus in Jewish Traditions,” in The Jesus Tradition Outside the Gospels, ed. D. Wenham, Gospel Perspectives 5 (Sheffield: JSOT, 1985): 301–308; G. Vermes, “The Jesus-Notice of Josephus Reconsidered,” JJS 38 (1987): 1–10; Meier, Marginal, 1:56–69; K. A. Olson, “Eusebius and the Testimonium Flavianum,” CBQ 61 (1999): 305–322.

<sup>28</sup> That this memory was, at least, part of Luke’s tradition is suggested by the absence from it of Luke’s penchant for balancing word and deed; on which see P. J. Achtemeier, “The Lukan Perspective on the Miracles of Jesus: A Preliminary Sketch,” in Perspectives on Luke-Acts, ed. C. H. Talbert (Danville, VA: Association of Baptist Professors of Religion and Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1978), 153–167, at 156.

<sup>29</sup> On these verses reflecting the voice of Jesus see the summary discussions by J. Nolland, Luke 1–9:20, WBC 35A (Dallas Word, 1989), 326–327 and W. D. Davies and D. C. Allison, The Gospel According to Saint Matthew, 3 vols., ICC (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1988, 1991, 1997), 2:244–245.

ministry, the phrase “the poor have good news brought to them” is likely to be part of the description of Jesus as a miracle worker. That is, in drawing on Third Isaiah (Isa 61:1, LXX), where the poor are not the disadvantaged sections of society but are the entire nation of humiliated and dispirited returnees in Jerusalem awaiting salvation,<sup>30</sup> it is reasonable to conclude that the “poor” in the saying of Jesus are to be understood not (only) as a disadvantaged section of society requiring gracious or encouraging teaching from him but as the nation of Israel as a whole, suffering, subjected and oppressed, waiting and expecting God to bring salvation.<sup>31</sup> In context here, that salvation is described as coming not through words but through the miracles of Jesus.<sup>32</sup> Further, in Q there is the saying: “if in Tyre and Sidon had been done the works (αἱ δυνάμεις) done in you, they would have repented long ago” (Matt 11:22/Luke 10:13).<sup>33</sup> What is notable is that the miracles (αἱ δυνάμεις), without the teaching, are assumed to sum up his ministry and to have been sufficient to elicit repentance.<sup>34</sup> In these texts we are obliged to move beyond seeing miracle working as the most time consuming, or even important activity of Jesus, to seeing such activity as encapsulating (though not eclipsing) his whole pre-Easter ministry. The same view arises from noting Jesus’ understanding of the kingdom of God.

(4) The clearest and best known saying of Jesus on the relationship between the kingdom of God, his miracles, and also on his self-understanding is the so-called Spirit-finger saying: “But if in God’s Spirit (Luke has ‘finger’) I cast out the demons, then has come (ἔφθασεν)<sup>35</sup>

<sup>30</sup> Cf. D. P. Seccombe, Possessions and the Poor in Luke-Acts (Linz: Studien zum Neuen Testament und seiner Umwelt, 1982), 21–43; also J. Jeremias, New Testament Theology (London: SCM, 1971), 112–113 also noting Ps 34:18 [19]; Isa 57:15; 66:2; IQM XIV, 7; 1QS XI, 1.

<sup>31</sup> See also Pss 9:18; 68:10; Zech 11:7, 11; Pss. Sol. 10:6.

<sup>32</sup> Cf. Davies and Allison, Matthew, 2:243. See also the discussion by J. A. Fitzmyer, The Gospel According to Luke I–IX, AB 28 (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1983), 147–149.

<sup>33</sup> For a discussion of the probability that this saying can be traced back to the historical Jesus see J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus and the Spirit (London: SCM, 1975), 70–71 and Davies and Allison, Matthew, 2:270–271.

<sup>34</sup> In so far as becoming a follower of Jesus involves repentance, the gospel writers are agreed that repentance can arise out of the miracles. See, e.g., Mark 1:30–31/Matt 8:14–15/Luke 4:38–39; Mark 10:46–52/Matt 9:27–31/20:29–34/Luke 18:35–43; John 6:14; cf. Matt 8:16–22.

<sup>35</sup> That the plain sense of the ἔφθασεν, along with the saying as a whole, is that the kingdom of God is either being realized or in the process of arriving in the exorcisms of Jesus see the discussion in Twelftree, Exorcist, 218–219.

upon you the kingdom of God" (Matt 12:28/Luke 11:20).<sup>36</sup> Regardless of which particular word can be traced back to Jesus—Spirit or finger<sup>37</sup>—the result is the same: for Jesus, his exorcisms were not preparatory to, nor were they signs or evidence of, the coming of God's reign; they were, in themselves, the kingdom of God expressed in the lives of those healed.<sup>38</sup>

Two further points are to be taken into account in the case to show that Jesus' miracles were not simply important but the interpretive key to his ministry. (5) That is, there is evidence the miracles contributed, at least, indirectly to his arrest. For example, in the synoptic stories of the healings of the paralytic (Mark 2:1–11/Matt 9:1–8/Luke 5:17–26) and the man with the withered hand (Mark 3:1–6/Matt 12:1–14/Luke 6:1–11), and in the Johannine story of the healing of the man born blind (John 9:1–41), Jesus is portrayed as coming into conflict with the authorities as a direct result of performing a miracle (cf. Matt 12:27/Luke 11:19). Even if it was granted that the conflict motif is the responsibility of Mark,<sup>39</sup> Sanders is probably right to say that, "One can move from miracles to crowds to teaching to tumult to death much more easily than from a teacher of law to a miracle worker to a prophet whose passion for sanctity irritated the authorities in Jerusalem."<sup>40</sup> (6) The interpretive significance of the miracles can also be seen in that those who sought to follow and emulate Jesus

---

<sup>36</sup> For a discussion of the historicity of this saying see J. D. G. Dunn, "Matthew 12:28/Luke 11:20—A Word of Jesus?" in Eschatology and the New Testament, ed. W. H. Gloer (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1988), 29–49. For more details on what follows see Twelftree, Miracle Worker, 268 and esp. n. 63. While Becker, Jesus, 172, is technically correct to note that "Jesus' central concept of the kingdom of God appears in none of the miracle stories" he fails to take into account the eschatological import of Matt 11:5/Luke 7:22 (see above).

<sup>37</sup> See R. A. Piper, "Jesus and the Conflict of Powers in Q," in The Sayings Source Q and the Historical Jesus, ed. A. Lindemann, (Leuven: Leuven University Press, 2001), 329 n. 40. Eve, Jewish Context, 331, speculates that those not committed to the two-source hypothesis may see these verses flowing directly from Matthew's pen, tidying up Mark without the aid of any prior tradition, and copied by Luke.

<sup>38</sup> Cf. Twelftree, Miracle Worker, 269.

<sup>39</sup> See the summary of discussions in R. A. Guelich, Mark 1–8:26, WBC 34A (Dallas: Word, 1989), 83 and 132–133.

<sup>40</sup> Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 164, his emphases. Cf. Smith, Jesus the Magician, 16–17; D. C. Allison, Jesus of Nazareth: Millenarian Prophet (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1998), 49: "Jesus as miracle worker—probably explains in great measure Jesus' great popularity and helps us understand why people paid attention to what he had to say."

conducted miracles, which, like Jesus, they explained in terms of the powerful presence of God now being evident in human affairs.<sup>41</sup>

From these points it is reasonably established that the miracles can be taken as that feature, above all others, whose removal would fundamentally distort and undermine any credible reconstruction of the historical Jesus.<sup>42</sup> Not only did the performing of miracles probably dominate Jesus' public ministry and loom large in his impact on others. In terms of significance, from his perspective, the miracles were, in themselves, the powerful presence or kingdom of God. Without the miracles there would have been no kingdom to announce.<sup>43</sup> Further, it was in the conducting of miracles that Jesus had his experience of the endowment by the eschatological Spirit confirmed—defining the nature of his ministry, his teaching, and who he understood himself to be: God's anointed messiah. At least some members of the audience also concluded that Jesus was the eschatological messiah so that, along with him attracting dangerously large crowds, his collision with his Jewish opponents catapulted him beyond mere legal wrangles into the Roman political arena which killed him.<sup>44</sup> We have also noted that, beyond Easter, the miracles of Jesus remained fundamental in how he was understood by his followers for, continuing or reproducing his ministry, they included miracles in their activities.

2. "Divine Man:" A cul de sac?

Even granting that the miracles are part of, or are of fundamental significance in any reconstruction of the historical Jesus there is little agreement on how he would have been—and should be—understood as a miracle worker. In the exploration of what D. F. Strauss (1808–74) had called the "gemeiner Volksglaube" of the time of Jesus, for those who are associated with what came to be called the Religionsgeschichte

<sup>41</sup> Cf., e.g., Mark 3:14–15; Luke 9:1–2; 10:9 Acts 3:1–26; Rom 15:18–19; 1 Cor 4:20; 1 Cor 12:12; Gal 3:2–5; 1 Thess 1:5.

<sup>42</sup> Cf. S. Davies, "The Historical Jesus as a Prophet/Healer: A Different Paradigm," Neot 30 (1996): 21–38.

<sup>43</sup> See also, Twelftree, "Mainstream," 123. Cf. Schlatter, History, 174: "By omitting works and limiting oneself to mere teaching Jesus' regal will would fall by the way-side."

<sup>44</sup> So also, Twelftree, "Miracles," 123–124.

liche Schule,<sup>45</sup> the dominance of the Old Testament gave way to the contemporary background of the New Testament writers for interpreting the miracle stories. Stimulated by the sensational archeological and papyrological discoveries,<sup>46</sup> an important point established by members of the School was that the reported miracles of Jesus in the gospels are similar to the miracles reported of other miracle workers of the period.<sup>47</sup> However, just which traditions the miracles of Jesus were like, and what that analogy may mean, was and remains a matter of debate. One suggestion has been that Jesus should be understood as a “divine human” (θεῖος ἄνθρωπος) or “divine man” (θεῖος ἀνὴρ), with Apollonius of Tyana generally taken as the classic example.<sup>48</sup>

According to Richard Reitzenstein (1861–1931), one of the products of the history of religions school is that a “general conception of the θεῖος ἄνθρωπος begins to prevail, according to which such a divine man combines within himself, on the basis of a higher nature a personal holiness, the profoundest knowledge, vision, and the power to work miracles.”<sup>49</sup> The concept was used—notably by Martin Dibelius (1883–1947) and Rudolf Bultmann (1884–1976)—to explain the hellenistic origin and Christology of miracle stories in the gospels.<sup>50</sup>

---

<sup>45</sup> On which see K. Rudolph, “Religionsgeschichtliche Schule,” in The Encyclopedia of Religion, ed. M. Eliade (New York: Macmillan and London: Collier Macmillan, 1987), 12:293–296; W. G. Kümmel, The New Testament: The History of the Investigation of Its Problems (London: SCM, 1973), Part V. Those most consistently recognized as part of the school are: H. Gunkel (1862–1932); J. Weiss (1863–1914)—Bultmann’s Doktorvater; W. Bousset (1865–1920); E. Troeltsch (1865–1923); and W. Heitmüller (1869–1926). In relation to this school and the miracles of Jesus see Kahl, Miracle Stories.

<sup>46</sup> Cf., e.g., A. Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East (London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1910); G. Milligan, Selections from the Greek Papyri (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1910).

<sup>47</sup> See R. Reitzenstein, Hellenistische Wundererzählungen (Leipzig: Teubner, 1906); Deissmann, Light; O. Weinreich, Antike Heilungswunder (Giessen: Töpelmann, 1909).

<sup>48</sup> See in particular C. R. Holladay, THEIOS ANER in Hellenistic-Judaism (Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1977); B. L. Blackburn, Theios Anēr and the Markan Miracle Traditions (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1991).

<sup>49</sup> R. Reitzenstein, Hellenistic Mystery-Religions (Pittsburgh, PA: Pickwick, 1978), 26. See also L. Bieler, THEIOS ANĒR. Das Bild des ‘Göttlichen Menschen’ in Spätantike und Frühchristentum, 2 vols. (Vienna: Höfels, 1935–36).

<sup>50</sup> M. Dibelius, From Tradition to Gospel (1919, ET Cambridge and London: Clarke, 1971), 70–97; R. Bultmann, History of the Synoptic Tradition (1921, ET New York: Harper & Row, 1976), 241.

While there were refinements of this theory,<sup>51</sup> by the early 1980's there were a number of studies that called into question the concept of a divine man itself,<sup>52</sup> or its value for understanding the synoptic<sup>53</sup> or Johannine<sup>54</sup> miracle traditions. Despite some continuing attempts to use the theios anēr notion to interpret the gospel traditions of the miracles of Jesus,<sup>55</sup> the idea should be laid to rest.<sup>56</sup> For there was great diversity among miracle workers, performing a diverse range of miracles in the New Testament era, whose divinity was judged and expressed with a range of criteria and terms equally diverse,<sup>57</sup> though rarely was the term theios anēr used.<sup>58</sup> More fruitful, though not without contro-

<sup>51</sup> E.g., that the theios anēr concept made its way into early Christianity through Hellenistic Judaism see F. Hahn, The Titles of Christology (London: Lutterworth, 1969), 11–13, 289 and those cited by Blackburn, Theios Anēr, 4 n. 12.

<sup>52</sup> P. W. von Martitz, “υἰός,” TDNT 8:338–340; D. L. Tiede, The Charismatic Figure as Miracle Worker (Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1972); Holladay, THEIOS ANER; E. V. Gallagher, Divine Man or Magician? (Chicago, IL: Scholars Press, 1982); J. D. Kingsbury, “The ‘Divine Man’ as the Key to Mark’s Christology—The End of an Era?” Int 35 (1981): 243–257; J. D. Kingsbury, The Christology of Mark’s Gospel (Philadelphia, PA: Fortress, 1983), 33–37 and those he cites 34 n. 42.

<sup>53</sup> O. Betz, “The Concept of the So-called ‘Divine Man’ in Mark’s Christology,” in D. E. Aune, ed., Studies in New Testament and Early Christian Literature (Leiden: Brill, 1972), 229–240; H. C. Kee, “Aretology and Gospel,” JBL 93 (1973): 402–422; H. C. Kee, Aretologies, Hellenistic ‘Lives,’ and the Sources of Mark (Berkeley, CA: The Center for Hermeneutical Studies in Hellenistic and Modern Culture, 1975), 1–21; R. Pesch, Das Markusevangelium, 2 vols. (Freiberg: Herder, 1976), 1:278–281; O. Betz, and W. Grimm, Wesen und Wirklichkeit der Wunder Jesu (Frankfurt am Main: Peter Lang, 1977); Kee, Miracle, 146–170, 297–299.

<sup>54</sup> E.g., W. Nicol, The Semeia in the Fourth Gospel (Leiden: Brill, 1972), 48–94; D. Moody Smith, “The Milieu of the Johannine Miracle Source: A Proposal,” in R. Hammerton-Kelly and R. Scroggs, eds., Jews, Greeks and Christians (Leiden: Brill, 1976), 164–180.

<sup>55</sup> More recently, e.g., H. D. Betz, “Gottmensch II,” in RAC 12 (1983): cols. 234–312; G. P. Corrington, The “Divine Man” (New York: Peter Lang, 1986); G. P. Corrington, “Power and the Man of Power in the Context of Hellenistic Popular Belief,” Helios 13 (1986): 75–86.

<sup>56</sup> Cf. J. R. Brady, Jesus Christ. Divine Man or Son of God? (Lanham, MD, New York and London: University Press of America, 1992), esp. 118–137; E. Koskenniemi, Apolonios von Tyana in der neutestamentlichen Exegese (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1994) on which see the critique by J.-J. Flinterman, “Review Article: The Ubiquitous ‘Divine Man,’” Numen 43 (1996): 82–90.

<sup>57</sup> Martitz, “υἰός,” TDNT 8:334–340 (339) and B. L. Blackburn, “‘Miracle Working ΘΕΙΟΙ ΑΝΔΡΕΣ’ in Hellenism (and Hellenistic Judaism),” in Wenham and Blomberg, The Miracles of Jesus, 185–218, esp. 188.

<sup>58</sup> Blackburn, “ΘΕΙΟΙ ΑΝΔΡΕΣ,” 185–218, esp. 188; cf. Blackburn, Theios Anēr, 94–96; and B. L. Blackburn, “Divine Man/Theios Anēr” in DJG, 189–192.

versy, have been the discussions of the Jewishness of Jesus as a miracle worker.<sup>59</sup>

3. Jesus Among Jewish Miracle Workers

Paul Fiebig (1876–1949) devoted an enormous number of publications to the rabbinic miracle stories<sup>60</sup> and became convinced of the closeness of Jesus to the rabbis. However, Schlatter disputed that Judaism proved a model for the miraculous activity of Jesus on the extraordinary grounds that neither Josephus nor the Mishnah contain any miracle story which dates back to the first century of this era.<sup>61</sup> This enabled Schlatter to uphold the superiority of Jesus over the rabbis who, in contrast to Jesus, used magical devices.<sup>62</sup>

More recently, in a number of accessible and highly regarded publications, Geza Vermes has set out to demonstrate the obvious, though often unappreciated, statement that “Jesus was a Jew and not a Christian.”<sup>63</sup> Just what particular kind of Jew remains a matter of contention.<sup>64</sup> Vermes may have general support for saying that “Jesus impressed his countrymen, and acquired fame among them, chiefly

<sup>59</sup> See the discussion by T. Holmén, “The Jewishness of Jesus in the ‘Third Quest,’” in Jesus, Mark and Q, ed. Labahn and Schmidt, 143–162.

<sup>60</sup> See the publications of Fiebig’s cited in Kahl, Miracle Stories, 17–19.

<sup>61</sup> A. Schlatter, Die Gemeinde in der apostolischen Zeit und im Missionsgebiet—Das Wunder in der Synagoge (Gütersloh: Bertelsmann, 1912), 53–70; cf. Schlatter, History, 176. On miracles in Josephus see, e.g., O. Betz, “Miracles in the Writings of Flavius Josephus,” in Josephus, Judaism, and Christianity, ed. L. H. Feldman and G. Hata (Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1987), 212–235. On miracles in early rabbinic tradition see, e.g., M. Becker, Wunder und Wundertäter im frührabbinischen Judentum, WUNT 2.144 (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 2000) and Eve, Jewish Context.

<sup>62</sup> Cf. Schlatter, History, 176–177.

<sup>63</sup> G. Vermes, Jesus and the World of Judaism (London: SCM, 1983), 1. See also his Jesus the Jew (Glasgow, UK: Fontana/Collins, 1973 and London SCM, 1983) and The Religion of Jesus the Jew (London: SCM, 1993). W. Horbury, “Jesus the Jew,” Theology 77 (1974): 227–232, at 229, cites Arthur Marmonstein as having compared Jesus with the miracle working rabbis. Similarly, L. E. Keck’s review of Vermes, Jesus the Jew in JBL 95 (1976): 508 draws attention to R. Otto, The Kingdom of God and the Son of Man (London: Lutterworth, 1938). Cf. D. Flusser, “Jesus and the World of Judaism,” Judaism 35 (1986): 361–364, at 362, reviewing Vermes’ Jesus and the World of Judaism says; “independently... I came to the conclusion that Jesus was a Galilean ‘hasid’ and wonderworker.” Most recently see also D. Flusser, Jesus (1968, Jerusalem: Magnes, 1998); and C. R. Evans, Jesus and his Contemporaries (Leiden: Brill, 2001), ch. V.

<sup>64</sup> See G. Vermes, “Jesus the Jew: Christian and Jewish Reactions,” TJT 4 (1988): 112–123.

as a charismatic teacher, healer and exorcist.<sup>65</sup> However, there is less agreement that Jesus is to be seen as the paramount example of the early Hasidim—holy men, part of charismatic Judaism—who made their strongest impact through their miracles.<sup>66</sup> What is pointed out is that Vermes has made an unwarranted distinction between the holy men (Honi and Hanina ben Dosa) and the rabbis (Yohanan ben Zakkai and Eliezar). For, on the one hand, miracles are also associated with the rabbis and, on the other hand, teaching is also credited to the holy men.<sup>67</sup>

Although the rabbis and holy men provide near parallels to Jesus, it is the very miracles on which Vermes relies that set Jesus over against other contemporary holy men.<sup>68</sup> As Vermes tells us, the association of miracle and prophecy is not peculiar to the Jewish holy men, for the expectation of prophetic miracles is rooted in the biblical heritage of Jewry as a whole.<sup>69</sup> Further, so far as I know, none of the Jewish holy men made any connection between their miracles and a message. Also, as Vermes points out, Jesus' healing technique is simplicity itself compared to the rabbis.<sup>70</sup> Moreover, Vermes does not take in to account that the rabbis and holy men were not the only miracle workers in Palestine in Jesus' time (see the next section). This means that it is neither possible to conclude that the style of the charismatic rabbi is one that Jesus chose<sup>71</sup> nor that Jesus is to be seen solely in light of these Jewish figures.<sup>72</sup>

---

<sup>65</sup> Vermes, World of Judaism, 5; Vermes, Jesus the Jew, 79, 223–224. For critical and more detailed assessment of Vermes see B. J. Hubbard, "Geza Vermes's Contribution to Historical Jesus Studies: An Assessment," SBLSP 24 (1985): 29–44; D. Flusser, "Jesus and the World of Judaism," Judaism 35 (1986): 361–364; Twelftree, Exorcist, 209–212.

<sup>66</sup> Vermes, Jesus the Jew, 58–82, 223–224.

<sup>67</sup> Evans, Contemporaries, 241, citing A. Büchler, Types of Jewish-Palestinian Piety from 70 B.C.E. to 70 C.E. (New York: Ktav, 1968), 7–67 and B. D. Chilton, The Temple of Jesus (University Park, PA Pennsylvania State University Press, 1992), 92 n. 5. Evans, Contemporaries, 242–243 also notes that Hillel the Elder is not credited with any miracles. On neither Hanina in particular nor miracle-workers in general belonging to the Hasidim see Eve, Jewish Context, esp. 294.

<sup>68</sup> Cf. Twelftree, Exorcist, 211.

<sup>69</sup> Cf. Horbury, "Jesus the Jew," 230.

<sup>70</sup> Vermes, Jesus the Jew, 65 and n. 31; Vermes, World of Judaism, 8.

<sup>71</sup> Cf. Harvey, Constraints, 107.

<sup>72</sup> Evans, Contemporaries, 243.

In providing a broader sketch of Judaism for the context of the miracles of Jesus than Vermes, Eric Eve<sup>73</sup> concludes that (1) most of the Jews who produced Second Temple literature were little preoccupied with the miraculous; that (2) where there was an interest in miracles it was usually through an interest in biblical miracles, especially the miraculous events surrounding the exodus; and that, (3) outside Josephus, stories of post-biblical miracles were rare.<sup>74</sup> Nevertheless, Eve shows that, in what he terms the Enochic-Qumran traditions, there seems to be slightly more interest in healing miracles and even more interest in exorcism. He reasonably suggests, therefore, that “perhaps the best way of understanding the context of Jesus’ healing and exorcism is at the creative confluence of three streams within Judaism: the widespread traditions about prophets like Elijah and Elisha, the Enochic-Qumran traditions concerned with the eschatological defeat of demonic powers, and popular folk-religion.”<sup>75</sup>

In trying to locate Jesus’ miracles in his Jewish context, Eve draws attention to the fact that, given the comparative wealth of material on angels and demons in general, it is significant that there is a comparative paucity of material on possession and exorcism.<sup>76</sup> This is true when considering stories of, or traditions about, individual historical exorcists. However, the background to the miracles of Jesus includes the material remains of ancient magic<sup>77</sup> for it probably reflects the most common forms of exorcism in late antiquity, including first century Palestine.<sup>78</sup>

---

<sup>73</sup> Eve, Jewish Context, chapter 9. Recognizing the impossibility of examining every available text from the Second Temple period, Eve restricts his treatment to the main bodies of Second Temple literature (in order of his treatment): Josephus, Philo, the Wisdom of Solomon and Ben Sira, Pseudo-Philo, the Book of Watchers in 1 Enoch and Jubilees, selected Qumran texts including the Genesis Apocryphon (1Qap Gen), the Prayer of Nabonidus (4Q242) and the Messianic Apocalypse (4Q521), Tobit and Artapanus. For what follows, in more detail, see G. H. Twelftree, review of Eve in JETS 47 (2004): 512–514.

<sup>74</sup> Eve, Jewish Context, chapter 9.

<sup>75</sup> Ibid., 259.

<sup>76</sup> Ibid., chapter 12.

<sup>77</sup> I use the term “ancient magic” neutrally, as a term of convenience, to describe the materials and literature well known in, but not limited to, what are called the magical papyri.

<sup>78</sup> Note Esther Eshel, “Genres of Magical Texts in the Dead Sea Scrolls,” in Die Dämonen; Demons, ed. Armin Lange, Hermann Lichtenberger and K. H. Diethard Römheld (Tübingen; J. C. B. Mohr, 2003), 395–415 for evidence of such material in Palestine at the turn of the era. Further on the dating of this material see Twelftree, “Ancient Magic.”

4. Jesus Among Ancient Magicians<sup>79</sup>

The issue is not, was Jesus a magician?—that will be discussed in the next section. Rather, the controversy here is over how far the so-called magical material is useful in understanding the miracles of Jesus, especially his exorcisms.<sup>80</sup> For, despite any detailed parallels, in this material healings are understood to depend more on what is said and done than on the identity of the healer (e.g., PGM IV:1231–1239, 3025).<sup>81</sup> The rationale was that the healer is not presuming to operate in his own power or any power he may have imbibed from the god; the god is called up to perform the exorcism. There was also the view that the forceful expulsion of the daimon from the person is expected to be successful because the practitioner himself is using the strength or authority of the gods named as the means to effect the cure (cf. IV:1239–1241, 1245–1246).

From the data available to us<sup>82</sup> these healing methods were sometimes used by anyone following generally accepted lines (cf. Justin, Dial. 85:2–3). There were also professional healer-magicians who were called upon to help people find a lover, restrain anger, get rid of a friend, produce a trance, gain control of a god, acquire business and customers, and cause sickness, for example, as well as to heal.<sup>83</sup> Often

---

<sup>79</sup> In more detail and specifically in relation to exorcism see Twelftree, “Ancient Magic.”

<sup>80</sup> That this “magical” material is not useful see, e.g., R. Latourelle, The Miracles of Jesus (New York: Paulist, 1988), 167. To the contrary see, e.g., Aune, “Magic,” 1507–1557, esp. 1523–1539. It needs to be stressed that, in this point, “magic” is not to be understood pejoratively over against miracle. Instead, the terms “magic” and “magician” are to be understood in connection with the material and healers described particularly (though not only) in the magical papyri.

<sup>81</sup> See the extended discussion in Twelftree, Exorcist, §3.

<sup>82</sup> In relation to exorcism see Twelftree, “Ancient Magic.” More broadly see, e.g., Aune, “Magic,” 1533–1538.

<sup>83</sup> Cf. Josephus Ant 8.45–49; PGM IV. At Qumran the healers (a Maskill or scribe) are best described as designated practitioners; cf. 4Q560 on which see D. L. Penney and M. O. Wise, “By the Power of Beelzebub: An Aramaic Incantation Formula from Qumran (4Q560),” JBL 113 (1994): 650; P. S. Alexander, “‘Wrestling Against Wickedness in High Places’: Magic in the World View of the Qumran Community,” in S. E. Porter and C. A. Evans, eds., The Scrolls and the Scriptures: Qumran Fifty Years After, JSPSup, 26 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 1997), 330. Cf. J. Naveh, “Fragments of an Aramaic Magic Book from Qumran,” IEJ 48 (1998): 252–261. See also 11Q5 (11QPs<sup>a</sup>); 11Q11; 4Q510; 4Q511 on which see the discussion in Twelftree, “Ancient Magic,” 63–64.

peripatetic,<sup>84</sup> they were so well regarded that they were sought in the highest circles (Josephus Ant. 8.46). The healers reflected in the Qumran documents needed only a text which they may have memorized. Other healers could also perform healings using words alone or include activities or, perhaps, dispense some article (e.g., a finger ring) or phylactery—or both—that was already imbued with preternatural power (cf. PGM XII. 266) to bring about healing. They also had on hand a wide range of materials, including vegetable matter and sheets of papyrus and metal, for example, and, probably, possessed such containers and utensils that facilitated the preparation of their prescriptions. Some of these healer-miracle workers took on apprentices who may have included family members (cf. Matt 12:27/Luke 11:19; Acts 19:14).<sup>85</sup> There is also evidence that they gave attention to their personal diet as well as to ritual purity.<sup>86</sup>

Against this background Jesus is said to stand out as commanding healing without any aid.<sup>87</sup> It is true that there appear to be distinctive features to Jesus as a miracle worker: (1) there is no evidence he collected, maintained or used artifacts or a library of incantations; (2) his healing commands were extremely brief and did not involve mentioning his power-authority; and, (3) although like his contemporary miracle workers, exorcism was only part of Jesus' activity, exorcism dominated his public ministry.<sup>88</sup>

However, these differences must not be allowed to obscure those factors Jesus and the magicians hold in common. (1) In saying "If I cast out demons by Beelzebul, by whom to your sons cast them out?" (Matt 12:27/Luke 11:19) Jesus places himself on the level of other

---

<sup>84</sup> See W. Burkert, The Orientalizing Revolution, Revealing Antiquity, 5 (Cambridge, MA and London: Harvard University Press, 1992), 41–46; R. Kotansky, "Greek Exorcistic Amulets," in Ancient Magic and Ritual Power, ed. M. Meyer and P. Mirecki, Religions in the Graeco-Roman World, 129 (Leiden and Boston: Brill, 1995), 243–277, at 253 n. 23.

<sup>85</sup> See also Burkert, Revolution, 44–46. That Jesus is referring to his own followers rather than unknown Jewish exorcists associated with the Pharisees see R. Shirock, "Whose Exorcist are They? The Referents of οἱ υἱοὶ ὑμῶν at Matthew 12.27/Luke 11.19," JSNT 46 (1992): 41–51.

<sup>86</sup> PGM IV. 3079–3084. Cf. Burkert, Revolution, 55–64.

<sup>87</sup> E.g., C. C. Caragounis, "Kingdom of God, Son of Man and Jesus' Self-Understanding II," TynBul 40 (1989): 223–238 at 230–231. Cf. A. Oepke, "ἰάομαι, κτλ.," TDNT 3:194–215, at 210; W. Grundmann, "δύναμαι/δύναμις," TDNT 2:284–317 (302); J. J. Rousseau, "Jesus, an Exorcist of a Kind," SBLSP 32 (1993): 129–153 at 148; Becker, Jesus, 176.

<sup>88</sup> See Twelftree, "Miracles," 104–124.

miracle workers. Further, by him saying that he cast out demons “by the Spirit (or finger) of God” (Matt 12:27–28/Luke 11:19–20), Jesus indicates that he was not healing unaided but was using a power-authority. In this Jesus shared the same views as those involved in ancient magic: at will they used a power-authority to heal through language they understood to be performative (or empowered) because it was dependent on (or infused with) a power-authority.<sup>89</sup> Not surprisingly, then, all Jesus’ commands, or supposed words of power, have parallels in ancient magic.<sup>90</sup> Concomitantly, if not generally as clipped as the commands of Jesus, the healer-magicians also, on occasion, used simple commands uncluttered by any artifacts or extended incantations.<sup>91</sup> Notwithstanding, (2) both Jesus and the healer-magicians used artifacts. As a healer Jesus used a herd of pigs into which he is said to have allowed the daimons to go, in a process which transferred the daimons from the man into the water, one of their assumed habitats.<sup>92</sup> He also used spittle, mud and touch.<sup>93</sup> (3) The initial dramatic confrontation that is reported to have taken place between Jesus and the demoniacs<sup>94</sup> probably has its resonance, if not parallel, in ancient magic expecting daimons to flee from the presence of rings and amulets that had been charged or imbibed with

<sup>89</sup> Cf. PGM XII:301–306. See Iamblichus, de Mysteriis 5:26 and the discussion by F. Graf, “Theories of Magic in Antiquity,” in P. Mirecki and M. Meyer, eds., Magic and Ritual in the Ancient World, Religions in the Graeco-Roman World, 141 (Leiden: Brill, 1995), 94–95.

<sup>90</sup> M. J. Geller, “Jesus’ Theurgic Powers: Parallels in the Talmud and Incantation Bowls,” JJS 28 (1977): 141–155; G. H. Twelftree, “ΕΙ ΔΕ...ΕΓΩ ΕΚΒΑΛΛΩ ΤΑ ΔΑΙΜΟΝΙΑ...,” in Wenham and Blomberg, The Miracles of Jesus, 378–381 and Twelftree, Exorcist, 153–155.

<sup>91</sup> This simple approach can be seen in the amulets and the various once-isolated incantations that are now components of the more complex and developed forms reflected in some of the magical papyri (e.g., PGM IV:1227–1264), and particularly in the report Justin gives of Jewish exorcisms (Justin, Dial. 85:2–3). See also the comments on incantations from Qumran by E. Eshel, “Genres of Magical Texts,” 405.

<sup>92</sup> O. Böcher, Christus Exorcista, BWANT 5.16 (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1972), 20–32. On the transfer of daimons from one habitat to another see Twelftree, “ΕΚΒΑΛΛΩ,” 382 n. 80 and those cited; Burkert, Revolution, 62 and n. 30; and, also on the historicity of this aspect of the story, see Twelftree, Exorcist, 74–76, 155.

<sup>93</sup> See S. Eitrem, Some Notes on Demonology in the New Testament, Symbolae Osloenses fasc. supplet. 20 (Oslo: Universitetsforlaget, 1966), 55–70 and Aune, “Magic,” 1533–1538.

<sup>94</sup> Cf. Mark 1:23–24; 5:6–7. On the probable historicity of this aspect of the Jesus tradition, even though it was probably taken up and enhanced by Christian tradition, as in Mark 3:11, see Twelftree, “ΕΚΒΑΛΛΩ,” 371–372 and Twelftree, Exorcist, 146–148.

supernatural powers.<sup>95</sup> From this we can deduce that, like the healer-magicians, Jesus would have been understood to be imbued with, or linked to, such powers.

It is reasonable to conclude that healer-magicians provide a part of the appropriate background for understanding the miracles of Jesus for he also worked with the same rationale as the healers of ancient magic.<sup>96</sup> The two most significant points at which Jesus stands out from the healer magicians is that he chose to conduct so many of them<sup>97</sup> and then makes the unique claim<sup>98</sup> that his particular miracles<sup>99</sup> had eschatological significance.<sup>100</sup>

5. Was Jesus a Magician?<sup>101</sup>

The debate over whether or not Jesus was a magician is not new;<sup>102</sup> but it was given focus and a new lease of life in 1978 with the

<sup>95</sup> See PGM IV. 2145–2240; XII. 270–350; XXXVI. 275–283. Cf. Pesiqta deRav Kahana 4:5.

<sup>96</sup> Cf. Aune, “Magic,” 1532: “The great gulf which some New Testament scholars would place between ‘the powerful word of the Son’ and ‘magical incantation’ is simply non-existent.” To the contrary, e.g., H. C. Kee, “Magic and Messiah,” in Religion, Science, and Magic, ed. J. Neusner, E. S. Frerichs, and P. V. McCracken Flescher (New York, NY: Oxford University Press, 1989), 121–141, at 139: “there is no evidence in the gospel tradition that Jesus engaged in methods of magic.”

<sup>97</sup> E.g., Becker, Jesus, 170: “To no miracle worker in all of Antiquity were as many miracles attributed as there were to Jesus.”

<sup>98</sup> Cf. Twelftree, Exorcist, e.g., 228 and D. Trunk, Der messianische Heiler, Herders biblische Studien, 3 (Freiburg: Herder, 1994), 426.

<sup>99</sup> This takes account of the parable of the strong man—Mark 3:27/Matt 12:29; Luke 11:21–22, which is probably close to something Jesus said; R. Pesch, Das Markusevangelium, 2 vols., HTKNT (Freiburg: Herder, 1980), 1:219—and gives full weight to the ἐγώ of Matt 12:28/Luke 11:20. However, see the caution by Dunn, Remembered, 695 n. 384.

<sup>100</sup> See Matt 12:28/Luke 11:20; Mark 3:27/Matt 12:29/Luke 11:21–22; Matt 11:2–6/Luke 7:18–23 and Matt 11:20–24/Luke 10:12–15 on which see Twelftree, Miracle Worker, 268–274. Cf. Theissen, Miracle Stories, 278: Jesus “combines two conceptual worlds which had never been combined in this way before, the apocalyptic expectation of universal salvation in the future and the episodic realization of salvation in the present through miracles.”

<sup>101</sup> In this section I am indebted to discussions and correspondence with S. Brian Pounds and am able to correct my conclusions in Exorcist, esp. 206–207 on which see the discussion by John W. Welch, “Miracles, Maleficium, and Maiestas in the Trial of Jesus,” in Jesus and Archeology, ed. James H. Charlesworth (Grand Rapids, MI and Cambridge, UK: Eerdmans, 2006), 349–383, at 359–360 n. 17.

<sup>102</sup> The earliest indisputable, post-canonical, extant reference to such a debate is Justin Martyr (c. 100–c. 165), Dial. 69. See also the discussion in J. M. Hull, Hellenistic Magic and the Synoptic Tradition (London: SCM, 1974), 1–4.

publication of Morton Smith's Jesus the Magician.<sup>103</sup> Even though Smith's particular program can be shown to have failed,<sup>104</sup> and few have followed directly in Smith's footsteps,<sup>105</sup> in recent times an increasing number of scholars have concluded that Jesus was, or was charged with being, a magician.<sup>106</sup> At the heart of the problem of deciding whether or not Jesus was a magician are a number of the issues. (1) Until recently the debate has been confused by a lack of agreement on how magic is to be defined.<sup>107</sup> Although there is by no means a consensus, the debate has moved to a concerted effort to define magic in terms of ancient rather than modern theories.<sup>108</sup> What emerges is a great variety of notions so that magic is more in the eye of the beholder than in what or who is described. Nevertheless, there remain some who see magic as a degenerate form of religion.<sup>109</sup> Others continue to define magic as functionally separate from religion, identifiable on the basis of techniques used.<sup>110</sup> Sometimes this conclusion

<sup>103</sup> M. Smith Jesus the Magician (London: Gollancz and New York: Harper & Row).

<sup>104</sup> See the extended discussion by Twelftree, Exorcist, 190–207 and the devastating critique by J. Neusner, "Forward," to B. Gerhardsson, Memory and Manuscript (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1998), xxv–xxxii.

<sup>105</sup> Cf., e.g., Crossan, Jesus, chapter 8.

<sup>106</sup> E.g., Aune, "Magic," 1507–1557; Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 166, 169; Crossan, Historical Jesus, 311; G. N. Stanton, "Jesus of Nazareth: A Magician and a False Prophet Who Deceived God's People?" in J. B. Green and M. Turner, eds., Jesus of Nazareth Lord and Christ (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans and Carlisle, UK: Paternoster, 1994), 164–180, at 178. In the minority are, e.g., Kee, Magic, 139; Meier, Marginal, 2:551 and Twelftree, Exorcist, 190–207 (though see below).

<sup>107</sup> For brief histories of the study of magic see F. Graf, Magic in the Ancient World (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1997), 8–19 and those cited.

<sup>108</sup> A. F. Segal, "Hellenistic Magic: Some Questions of Definition," in R. van den Broek and M. J. Vermaseren, eds., Studies in Gnosticism and Hellenistic Religions, Études préliminaires aux religions orientales dans l'Empire romain, 91 (Leiden: Brill, 1981), 349–375; Graf, Magic, esp. chapters 1 and 2; Graf, "Theories," 93–104; T. E. Klutz, "Reinterpreting 'Magic' in the World of Jewish and Christian Scripture: An Introduction," in idem, ed. Magic in the Biblical World, JSNTSup 245 (London and New York: T&T Clark, 2003), 1–9, esp. 1–5.

<sup>109</sup> So, e.g., H. D. Betz, "Introduction to the Greek Magical Papyri," in idem, ed., The Greek Magical Papyri in Translation Including the Demotic Spells, 2d ed. (Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1992), xli–lviii, at xlvi: "instead of turning against religion, as the skeptics among the Greek and Roman philosophers did, the magicians made use of it."

<sup>110</sup> E.g., Kee, Miracle, 212; E. Yamauchi, "Magic or Miracle? Diseases, Demons, and Exorcisms," in Wenham and Blomberg, The Miracles of Jesus, 89–183 at 135–139. H. C. Kee, Medicine, Miracle and Magic in New Testament Times (Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1986), 3. Dunn, Remembered, concentrates on "four fea-

is used to distance Jesus from the charge of magic,<sup>111</sup> other times to show the similarity between Jesus and magic.<sup>112</sup> This takes us to a related issue.

(2) There has sometimes been a lack of clarity on the issue of perspective—from whose perspective is Jesus being considered a magician?—so that it is unclear whether or not it is being concluded that the charge of magic was brought against the historical Jesus by his opponents, later ancient detractors, or by current scholarship.<sup>113</sup> (3) From the perspective of later times, including our own, one of the difficulties of determining whether or not the historical Jesus was accused by his opponents of being a magician is that the term μάγοι does not appear in the gospel traditions. Therefore, one of the issues is determining the meaning of the terms that are used.

A lucid and persuasive case that the language of Jesus' opponents reflects them labeling and attempting to marginalize him as a magician has been set out by Graham Stanton.<sup>114</sup> Recognizing the risk of anachronism in working back from later times, Stanton starts with criticisms of Jesus found in Jewish, Christian and pagan writings in the middle of the second century. He notes that the double polemical accusations against Jesus of "magician" (μάγος) and "false prophet" (ψευδοπροφήτης) or "deceiver" (πλάνος) are very closely related in this literature.<sup>115</sup> Stanton also notes that this double accusation cannot be dependent on the New Testament for, even though the πλάνος accusation occurs, Jesus is never called ὁ μάγος. Further, Stanton notes that, although the polemic sometimes involves only one of these terms,<sup>116</sup> the other can be taken as implied since there was a tures of Jesus' technique" (690)—material aids, touching, faith, power source—in his discussion "Was Jesus a Magician?" (689–694).

---

<sup>111</sup> E.g., Harvey, Constraints, 109.

<sup>112</sup> E.g., Aune, "Magic," 1538.

<sup>113</sup> Particularly the case with Smith, Magician. See the assessment by Twelftree, Exorcist, 190–206.

<sup>114</sup> Stanton, "Magician," 164–180. A similar case is made by S. R. Garrett, The Demise of the Devil (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1989), ch. 1; cf. S. R. Garrett, "Light on a Dark Subject and Vice Versa: Magic and Magicians in the New Testament," in Religion, Science, and Magic, ed. Neusner, Frerichs and McCracken Flesher, 142–165.

<sup>115</sup> Stanton, "Magician," 172–173 citing, e.g., Justin, Dial. 69.7; b. San. 43a; 107b; Acts Thom. 96; 102; 106–107.

<sup>116</sup> For the single accusation that Jesus was a sorcerer, Stanton, "Magician," 171, cites Justin, Apol. 1.30.1; Celsus (Origen, CC 1.6, 28, 68, 71; 2.32, 48–49). For the single accusation that Jesus was a false prophet or deceiver, Stanton (171–172), cites close relationship in antiquity between them.<sup>117</sup> To these two accusations—magician and false prophet (or deceiver)—ancient polemic tied a third. That is, even in the New Testament, it was alleged that the magician and the false prophet were able to act because of a close relationship to the devil or demons (Acts 13:6–12; Rev 16:13–14; 19:20).<sup>118</sup>

When Stanton turns to the gospels he notes that leading people astray—the second part of the double accusation implying the first part of being a magician—is found at the level of redaction.<sup>119</sup> However, as there is no reason to suppose the accusation arose at the level of redaction, and that John the Baptist, with whom Jesus was closely aligned, was labeled by Q as a demon-possessed false prophet,<sup>120</sup> it is almost certain Jesus was so accused.

Also, the third part of the accusation (carrying out exorcisms by the prince of demons) is found in Mark 3:22 and Q (Matt 12:24/Luke 11:15). Given the close association of the three-part accusation, Stanton is right to say there is “little doubt that both the Markan and Q traditions are tantamount to a charge that Jesus was a magician.”<sup>121</sup> Further, “[s]ince few scholars have any reservations about the authenticity of these two traditions, it is highly likely that Jesus was written off by his opponents as a magician, and thus a social deviant.”<sup>122</sup> In

---

Justin Dial. 108; T. Levi 16:3 on which see further G. N. Stanton, “Aspects of Early Christian Jewish Polemic and Apologetic,” NTS 31 (1985): 377–382, reprinted in G. N. Stanton, A Gospel for a New People (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1992), 232–255.

<sup>117</sup> Stanton, “Magician,” 172–173 citing Acts 13:6–12; Philo, Spec. Leg. 1.315; Josephus Ant. 20.169–172; War 2.261–263; cf. Acts 21:38.

<sup>118</sup> Stanton, “Magician,” 173–175 citing, e.g., Justin, Dial. 7.3; 69; Celsus (Origen, CC 1:68). Cf. Garrett, Demise, 15–17 citing, e.g., Jub. 48.9–11; CD V, 17b–19; Herm. Mand. 11 and J. Reiling, Hermas and Christian Prophecy, NovTSup 37 (Leiden: Brill, 1973), 38–43, 55, 95.

<sup>119</sup> Stanton, “Magician,” 175–178 citing, e.g., Matt 9:34; 10:25; 27:63–64; Luke 23:2, 5, 14; John 7:12, 25–27, 40, 46, 47.

<sup>120</sup> Stanton, “Magician,” 180.

<sup>121</sup> Stanton, “Magician,” 178. In that some of Jesus’ teaching and healing rescinded the action—consequence principle and, therefore, would have opened himself to the suspicion of magic see T. Holmén, “Jesus and Magic: Theodicean Perspectives to the Issue,” in M. Labahn and B. J. Liethaert Peerbolte, eds., A Kind of Magic: Understanding Magic in the New Testament and its Religious Environment (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 2007), 43–56.

<sup>122</sup> Stanton, “Magician,” 178. His supporting evidence that “In his healing miracles and exorcisms Jesus undoubtedly used techniques which would have been perceived by contemporaries to be magical” (178 n. 44, cf. 176, 177)—citing Aune, “Magic,” 1523–1529 and Smith, Magician, 94–139—is unconvincing for it assumes that magic was perceived as involving technique.

other words, aside from any consideration of his technique or how he compares to his peers, it is reasonable to conclude that the historical Jesus was accused by his opponents of being a magician; in league with the devil and leading people astray.<sup>123</sup>

6. What did the Miracles Mean?

It is not so easy to penetrate behind the various gospel traditions to the understanding Jesus may have had of his miracles.<sup>124</sup> This difficulty is exhibited in the variety of ways the miracles have been interpreted. Nevertheless, there is a general consensus that, as E. P. Sanders puts it, we cannot say that “Jesus proffered his miracles to his audience” as bearing evidence of his status. For the tradition has it that Jesus refused to give a sign. However, perhaps, Sanders reflects, “Jesus himself saw them as evidencing his status as true spokesman for God, since that sort of inferences was common in the Mediterranean,” for Jesus spoke and acted with divine authority and, at least in replying to John, appealed to the miracles as establishing his authority.<sup>125</sup>

That the miracles are expressions of compassion is the view of A. E. Harvey. He seeks to understand what the miracles meant for Jesus through a discussion of the options open to a person “who possessed psychic or supernatural powers.”<sup>126</sup> Harvey clears the ground by setting out all the options Jesus did not take. He shows that Jesus did not use his powers to foretell the future in order to be seen as an abnormally wise and divinely gifted man in line with Hellenistic traditions.<sup>127</sup> Neither did Jesus choose the style of the “Charismatic,”<sup>128</sup>

---

<sup>123</sup> Citing M. W. Dickie, Magic and Magicians in the Greco-Roman World (London and New York: Routledge, 2003), 99, Welch, “Miracles,” 361 n. 21 suggests that “Jesus’ connection with prostitutes, who were often associated with magic, might also have linked Jesus in some kind with magic.”

<sup>124</sup> However, in view of the probably authentic sayings (see below) it is unlikely L. E. Keck, Who Is Jesus? (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 2001), 83 is correct in saying that Jesus may not have had a view.

<sup>125</sup> Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 172. Cf. Allison, Jesus, 91 notes that the central beliefs of millenarians are authenticated by a prophet’s miracles.

<sup>126</sup> Harvey, Constraints, 105.

<sup>127</sup> Ibid., 106.

<sup>128</sup> Ibid., 107.

nor, as others have agreed,<sup>129</sup> did he heal by normal medical means.<sup>130</sup> According to Harvey the miracles Jesus chose to perform do not seem to be a means of drawing attention to the power of the thaumaturge and investing him with unanswerable authority.<sup>131</sup> Nor do they seem to have been performed in a spirit of competition with other charismatic figures. Further, Harvey does not think that the reports of miraculous activity can provide us with anything of value for determining his religious significance for, "Messiahs must be capable of wonder-working, even if this is not what is primarily stressed in their mission."<sup>132</sup> Instead, put positively, "we find," says Harvey, that "an impressive number of them took the form of an attack on the limitations of the human condition which seemed most intractable, most inexplicable, and most stubbornly to prevent mankind from moving into that better world which is surely intended for us in the future purposed of God."<sup>133</sup> As convincing as this may be, as we will see, from the evidence of probably authentic sayings of Jesus, this does not go far enough.

For John Dominic Crossan,<sup>134</sup> the significance of the miracles is in their intersecting with Jesus' table fellowship. This forms the heart of Jesus' program as a Cynic peasant whose aims are not seen simply in his teaching but also in his offering of free miracles and in his eating freely with anyone. Crossan says that "[m]iracle and parable, healing and eating were calculated to force individuals into unmediated physical and spiritual contact with God and unmediated physical and

<sup>129</sup> Blackburn, "Miracles," 374 n. 92 and those cited.

<sup>130</sup> Cf. the report of Emperor Vespasian; Harvey, Constraints, 107–108 citing Solon fragment 13.61–62 (West); Seneca Benef. 6.16.2; Galen Nat. fac. 3.7; Tacitus Hist. 4.81; and Seutonius Vesp. 7. Harvey notes that, nevertheless, Jesus' use of touch and spittle were normal medical procedures.

<sup>131</sup> Harvey, Constraints, 110.

<sup>132</sup> Ibid., 101 citing, B. R. Wilson, Magic and the Millennium (London: Heinemann, 1973), 134.

<sup>133</sup> Harvey, Constraints, 118.

<sup>134</sup> J. D. Crossan, The Historical Jesus (North Blackburn, VIC: CollinsDove, 1993). Cf. J. D. Crossan, "The Presence of God's Love in the Power of Jesus' Works," Concilium 10 (1969): 34–40. On what follows see also Twelftree, Miracle Worker, 355–356. For critical discussions of the work of Crossan see, H. Childs, The Myth of the Historical Jesus and the Evolution of Consciousness (Atlanta, GA: Society of Biblical Literature, 2000); D. L. Denton, Historiography and Hermeneutics in Jesus Studies, JSNTS 262 (London and New York: T&T Clark, 2004). On Crossan's treatment of the miracle traditions see P. F. Craffert, "Crossan's Historical Jesus as Healer, Exorcist and Miracle Worker," RelTheol 10 (2003): 243–266 and Crossan's response, "Methodology, Healing, Story, and Ideology," ibid. 296–303.

spiritual contact with one another. He announced, in other words, the brokerless kingdom of God.<sup>135</sup> The miracles represent Jesus' response to a colonial people under political and religious pressure.<sup>136</sup> Thus, Jesus' understanding of the kingdom is not to be interpreted against the background of an apocalyptic longing but against the wisdom tradition's recognition of a present kingdom in which the wise, good and virtuous share.<sup>137</sup> However, the evidence does not support the view that Jesus pitted himself against an exploitative temple and priesthood which claimed an exclusive right to broker healing.<sup>138</sup> Also, at least in view of few miracles being associated with the Cynic tradition,<sup>139</sup> it is of only limited value to view Jesus in terms of contemporary Cynics. Further, Jesus' egalitarian motive is speculative and there is no evidence that Jesus rejected the notion of an apocalyptic kingdom.<sup>140</sup>

In Jesus and the Victory of God N. T. Wright says that Jesus intended his healings to function in exact parallel with the welcome of sinners because most, if not all, of his mighty works could be seen as the restoration to membership in Israel of those who had been excluded.<sup>141</sup> Wright notes that many of the people Jesus healed came from banned or excluded categories—the blind, deaf, mute, lepers, Gentiles and a Samaritan, for example. Jesus' healings not only brought physical wholeness but inclusion so that, at the deepest level on the part of Jesus and his contemporaries, they also were “part of that open welcome which went with the inauguration of the kingdom.”<sup>142</sup> Wright also takes the multiplication of the bread and the storm stillings, with their overtones of the exodus, as signs of covenant renewal so that we

<sup>135</sup> Crossan, Jesus, 422.

<sup>136</sup> Ibid., e.g., 292. Cf. B. D. Ehrman, Jesus (Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1999), 197.

<sup>137</sup> Crossan, Jesus, 287–291.

<sup>138</sup> Cf. Vermes, “Reactions,” 115, notes that Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 301–302, “is to be commended for his pertinent reminder that the disciples of Jesus were not persecuted by Pilate, which surely would have happened if they had been seen as representing a revolutionary faction.”

<sup>139</sup> See the discussion in Twelftree, Exorcist, 28–30 and the critique of Jesus being viewed as an itinerant Cynic see R. Horsley, “Jesus, Itinerant Cynic or Israelite Prophet?” in Images of Jesus Today, ed. J. H. Charlesworth and W. P. Weaver (Valley Forge, PA: TPI, 1994), 68–97.

<sup>140</sup> See H. C. Kee, “A Century of Quests for the Culturally Compatible Jesus,” TToday 52 (1995): 17–28 (17); also Blackburn, “Miracles,” 391–392.

<sup>141</sup> Wright, Victory, 191.

<sup>142</sup> Ibid., 192.

are glimpsing the simple reconstruction of Israel.<sup>143</sup> The exorcisms stand out as being part of a battle in which he alone was involved, for they were neither part of Jewish expectations nor a major focus for the early church. They show that Jesus saw himself as surrounded by places, people and influences that belong to the enemies of Yahweh and his people.<sup>144</sup> However, it is not Rome but the Satan and his hordes who are the enemy. Therefore, the mighty works were not showy magic or attempts to win support or indications that Jesus was “divine.” “They were signs which were intended as, and would have been perceived as, the physical inauguration of the kingdom of Israel’s god, the putting into action of the welcome and the warning which were the central message of the kingdom and its redefinition.”<sup>145</sup>

Similarly, though without the covenantal aspect, James Dunn also sees the most distinctive feature of Jesus’ exorcisms and healings to be found in the eschatological significance that Jesus attributed to them.<sup>146</sup> Dunn notes the key saying in Matthew 12:27–28/Luke 11:19–20: “It was the fact that Jesus achieved his success by the Spirit/finger of God which demonstrated or proved that the kingdom of God had come to them.” Dunn says that it is this that distinguishes Jesus’ exorcistic success from his contemporaries; “he laid claim to a plenitude of power which, by implication, these other exorcists did not experience.”<sup>147</sup> Then, the saying at the conclusion of the reference to the eschatological blessings in Jesus’ mission—“Blessed is the one who takes no offence at me” (Matt 11:6/Luke 7:23)—shows Jesus saw his mission “as embodying these blessings, himself as the decisive agent in the realization of eschatological hopes.”<sup>148</sup> Despite what Dunn recognizes as the increasingly social and political interpretations of eschatology in contemporary scholarship, in this material he affirms Bultmann’s description of “the immediacy of [Jesus’] eschatological consciousness.”<sup>149</sup>

---

<sup>143</sup> Wright, Victory, 193.

<sup>144</sup> Ibid., 195.

<sup>145</sup> Ibid., 196.

<sup>146</sup> Dunn, Remembered, 667–696, esp. 694–696; cf. Becker, Jesus, 175.

<sup>147</sup> Ibid., 694.

<sup>148</sup> Ibid., 695.

<sup>149</sup> Bultmann, History, 126. However, there Bultmann says, “we cannot without more ado be sure that passages whose Jewish origin is improbable are genuine sayings of Jesus.”

In helping resolve the controversy over the meaning of the miracles, there are a number of Jesus' sayings that could reasonably reflect his voice.<sup>150</sup> From these it is hard to avoid the conclusion that Jesus considered he was performing miracles—astonishing events carrying the signature of God.<sup>151</sup> Further, this material gives the impression that Jesus considered performing miracles the main focus of his ministry and that exorcism was the epitome of his ministry. In particular, despite Sanders' uncertainty,<sup>152</sup> it is hard to avoid the conclusion that, for Jesus, the miracles—especially the exorcisms—were, in themselves, not demonstrations or confirmations of the kingdom of God<sup>153</sup> but its realization or expression in the lives of those healed.<sup>154</sup> To this we must add that although (against Crossan) the themes of solidarity and integration do not appear,<sup>155</sup> in light of the segregating impact of sickness,<sup>156</sup> Jürgen Becker is probably right to say that Jesus' miracles are to be understood “as the eschatological restoration of life and as inclusion in the end-time community.”<sup>157</sup>

Also, if we are to be true to the evidence we cannot ignore the fact that, at least because of his miracles, Jesus appears to have been conscious he was God's key figure or Messiah in a situation where he thought God's expected end time reign was taking place in and through his activities.<sup>158</sup> And, we can see, especially in the answer to John the Baptist (Matt 11:2–6/Luke 7:18–23) and the “Woes” (Matt

---

<sup>150</sup> The parable of the strong man (Mark 3:27/Matt 12:29/Luke 11:21–22); Jesus' answer to John the Baptist (Matt 11:2–6/Luke 7:18–23); the “woes” on Chorazin, Bethsaida and Capernaum (Matt 11:20–24/Luke 10:12–15); the “Spirit/Finger” saying (Matt 12:27–28/Luke 11:19–20); the saying about a sign from heaven (Matt 12:38–39; 16:1–4; Mark 8:11–13/Luke 11:16, 29; John 6:30) and Jesus' saying “Tell that fox...!” (Luke 13:32).

<sup>151</sup> For a discussion of the definitions of miracle, especially for Jesus and the gospel traditions see Twelftree, Miracle Worker, 24–27, 348–350 and the literature cited.

<sup>152</sup> Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 133–140, 148–150, discussed in Twelftree, Exorcist, 218–219.

<sup>153</sup> So, e.g., Dunn, Remembered, 694; Stanton, “Message,” 60.

<sup>154</sup> Further see Twelftree, Miracle Worker, esp. 268–269. Cf. Becker, Jesus, 175: “His miracles themselves become experiences of the rule of the God, who is presently at work establishing his kingdom.”

<sup>155</sup> So also Becker, Jesus, 177.

<sup>156</sup> See Lev 13:45–46; Deut 28:28–29; 1QSa II, 5–7; 11Q19 XLV, 12–13; XLVIII, 14–15 cited by Becker, Jesus, 177.

<sup>157</sup> Becker, Jesus, 177. On Jesus' expression of this in his table fellowship see, e.g., Meyer, Aims, 158–162.

<sup>158</sup> Cf. B. F. Meyer, “Jesus' Ministry and Self-Understanding,” in Chilton and Evans, Studying the Historical Jesus, 345: “Jesus was the conscious bearer of a (indeed, of the) climactic and definitive mission to all Israel” (his emphasis).

11:20–24/Luke 10:12–15) that, as Ben Meyer (1927–95) put it, “[t]he whole of this activity [the mission of Jesus] was designed to elicit an act of faith-recognition.”<sup>159</sup> In this we can probably see why Jesus chose to perform miracles: they were an inescapable yet ambiguous signal of his messianic significance. Added to this are the exorcisms which exemplified his idea that his ministry was a battle with and the first stage of the defeat of Satan. Also, some of the miracles were able to highlight God’s involvement in Jesus’ activity and others showed Jesus expressing compassion in the miracles.

In light of this it is plain to see that, though less canvassed in recent times, the long favored view that, for Jesus, the miracles were “signs” having little or no intrinsic significance save to point beyond themselves to the more important message of the kingdom of God,<sup>160</sup> is not supported by the evidence.<sup>161</sup> Even though the Fourth Gospel understands the miracles to be signs, they are not intended to point to the less significant message of Jesus but to Jesus himself.<sup>162</sup> Further, the sayings of Jesus we have noted in this section (n. 148 above) suggest a different relationship between miracle and message. It is not that Jesus understood his miracles to be evidence of the dawning or nearness of the kingdom of God.<sup>163</sup> Nor can we agree with Marcus Borg that the coming of the kingdom of God refers to the power of the other realm active through Jesus the holy man instead of the eschatological coming of the reign of God.<sup>164</sup> Rather, the miracles are, themselves, the eschatological kingdom of God in operation or made manifest.<sup>165</sup>

<sup>159</sup> Meyer, “Jesus’ Ministry,” 351.

<sup>160</sup> E.g., M. Dibelius, Jesus (1939, ET London: SCM, 1963), 81; R. Bultmann, Jesus Christ and Mythology (New York: Charles Scribner’s Sons, 1958), 12–13. Also, A. Fridrichsen and H. N. Ridderbos cited by H. van der Loos, The Miracles of Jesus, NovTSup 8 (Leiden: Brill, 1965), 282.

<sup>161</sup> So also J. Gnilka, Jesus of Nazareth (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1997), 129 citing Dibelius, Jesus, 69.

<sup>162</sup> See John 2:23; 4:54; 10:38; 12:18; 20:30. Cf. R. H. Hiery, “Satan, Demons, and the Kingdom of God,” SJT 27 (1974): 35–47, at 37–38; A. Fridrichsen, The Problem of Miracle in Primitive Christianity (Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg, 1972), 63–72.

<sup>163</sup> Cf. R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament, vol. 1 (London: SCM, 1952), 7.

<sup>164</sup> M. J. Borg, “An Orthodoxy Reconsidered: The ‘End-of-the-World Jesus,’” in L. D. Hurst and N. T. Wright, eds., The Glory of Christ in the New Testament (Oxford: Clarendon, 1987), 207–217, at 216–217.

<sup>165</sup> See those cited by Blackburn, “Miracles,” 373–374; cf. Gnilka, Jesus, 129. See also the discussion in Twelftree, Exorcist, 166–171 and also D. Connolly, “Ad miracula

Given the fundamental importance and interpretive significance of the miracles (see above) it is reasonable to conclude that the miracles are not illustrative of a more fundamental message, nor that the miracles (or other activities) flowed from the message.<sup>166</sup> Rather, Jesus was a healer who needed to explain the significance of the miracles and the new state of affairs they embodied.

7. Miracles of Nature: Legend or History?

While there may be a general consensus that the healing and exorcism stories probably reflect reminiscences of the historical Jesus, this is not agreed in relation to the so-called nature miracles, which have caused scholars considerable angst (cf. n. 14 above). Difficulties with these stories abound: only the disciples appear to be aware of them, their support in the sayings of Jesus is limited or non-existent,<sup>167</sup> they are not mentioned in the summaries of Jesus' miraculous activity,<sup>168</sup> and they are flush with Old Testament motifs as well as beliefs and practices of the early church.<sup>169</sup>

At one end of a spectrum, following in the footsteps of Herman Reimarus (1694–1768),<sup>170</sup> is Gerd Lüdemann. On the grounds that “one cannot change one's picture of the world at will” and that taking “refuge in the ancient picture of the world simply because this is presupposed in the Bible is mistaken in every respect,” Lüdemann states baldly that the “modern picture of the world has no room” for nature miracles.<sup>171</sup> Similarly, Jürgen Becker argues that, along with the epiphanies and especially the raisings of the dead, the nature mirsanationum apud Matthaeum,” VD 45 (1967): 306–325 and C. Dietzfelbinger, “Vom Sinn der Sabbatheilungen Jesu,” EvT 38 (1978): 281–298.

---

<sup>166</sup> So Keck, Who is Jesus? 83.

<sup>167</sup> See the discussion in Blackburn, “Miracles,” 370 nn. 75–76; cf. Sanders, Historical Figure, 157.

<sup>168</sup> Barnes Tatum, Quest, 217.

<sup>169</sup> See R. H. Fuller, Interpreting the Miracles (London: SCM, 1963), 37–39, discussed by Blackburn, “Miracles,” 370–371.

<sup>170</sup> For Reimarus the miracles were not only invented by Christians but also only of secondary importance, secondary because “miracles of themselves do not constitute a single article of faith” and because “Christ himself would have the miracles accounted as secondary.” H. S. Reimarus, Reimarus: Fragments 1774–1778, (Philadelphia, PA: Fortress, 1970 and London: SCM, 1971), 239–240, cf. 160, 232–234.

<sup>171</sup> G. Lüdemann, The Great Deception (Amherst, NY: Prometheus, 1999), 70, cf. 71–72.

acles “are all dimensions of the picture of Jesus that reveal the church’s own Easter experience.”<sup>172</sup>

Although Meier thinks that the story of the feeding of the multitude may have a symbolic base (a meal Jesus shared with a large crowd) and was only later taken to be miraculous,<sup>173</sup> he comes to the same point as Lüdemann: all the so-called nature miracles appear to be the creation of the early church.<sup>174</sup> Crossan also acknowledges the dramatic and symbolic aspects of the nature miracles but asserts that the stories should be grouped together with the post-Easter apparitions.<sup>175</sup> For they are not concerned with control over nature before Jesus’ death but are about power and authority in the earliest Christian communities.<sup>176</sup> In any case, nature miracles such as the raisings from the dead are to be dispensed with on his view that: “I do not think that anyone, anywhere, at any time brings dead people back to life.”<sup>177</sup>

More popular, and not resorting to invention, are those who propose that the miracles are to be interpreted rationally.<sup>178</sup> Karl F. Bahrtdt (1741–92), who is to be counted among those first to apply a non-supernatural interpretation to the miracle stories of the gospels,<sup>179</sup> sought to explain them rationally. In the case of Jesus walking on the sea, for example, he said that we can imagine that there was a piece of timber in the water near the shore. Jesus stepped onto it and finding it bore his weight approached the boat on it. The reason why the disciples cried out in fear when they saw Jesus was that they were prisoners to the prejudices of their miracle-believing age and disregarded the natural causes of events. Thus only their limited knowledge caused the disciples to assume a miracle had taken place. We

---

<sup>172</sup> Becker, Jesus, 173. See also those cited in n. 14 above.

<sup>173</sup> Meier, Marginal, 2:968.

<sup>174</sup> Ibid., 2:970.

<sup>175</sup> J. D. Crossan, Jesus: A Revolutionary Biography (New York: HarperSanFrancisco, 1994), 181; cf. Gnilka, Jesus, 133; P. J. Madden, Jesus’ Walking on the Sea, BZNW 81 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1997), 138–139.

<sup>176</sup> Crossan, Biography, 186.

<sup>177</sup> Ibid., 95.

<sup>178</sup> For other recent proponents of rational interpretations of miracles also see, e.g., H. Braun, Jesus of Nazareth (Philadelphia, PA: Fortress, 1979) and Gnilka, Jesus, 133–134.

<sup>179</sup> A. Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus (London: SCM, 2000), 37; cf. 42–46 where Natürliche Geschichte des grossen Propheten von Nazareth, 4 vols. (Copenhagen: Bethlehem, 1800–1802<sup>1</sup> and 1806<sup>2</sup>) by Karl Heinrich Venturini (1768–1849) is also discussed.

know better: "The laws of Nature are eternal and unalterable. Miracles suspend them. Therefore miracles are impossible."<sup>180</sup>

Sanders draws attention to the need for rational explanations to be modern, making it easier for people to continue to believe the Bible is historically accurate and scientifically sound. He thinks that the principle is partly right in that "it is plausible to explain an exorcism as a psychosomatic cure."<sup>181</sup> However, taking into account there being little response to the major miracles, he says that, "Possibly Jesus' actual miracles were relatively minor and excited the public only temporarily." He grants that this is speculative, though he thinks it a reasonable solution.<sup>182</sup>

In dealing with "the most 'extraordinary deeds' attributed to Jesus"—the stilling of the storm, the feeding of the 5,000 and the walking on the water<sup>183</sup>—James Dunn finds incidental details which he takes to "suggest that some historical reminiscences have been incorporated into these stories."<sup>184</sup> Also, taking his lead from Rudolf Otto (1869–1937), Dunn suggests that levitation and "psychical phenomenon of operatio in distans" may help explain these miracle stories.<sup>185</sup> However, in the case of the story of Jesus walking on the water, with such statements as "they thought they saw a ghost" and the repeated descriptions of fear, Dunn says, "if truth be told, the story at this point reads more like a straight ghost story than anything else."<sup>186</sup> Importantly, as they now stand, the nature miracle stories have been shaped to bring out biblical echoes and parallels: Jesus is greater than Jonah in the stilling of the storm, greater than Elisha in the feeding of the 5,000, and enacts or embodies the Creator's mastery over the elements in walking on the sea.<sup>187</sup> Possibly, then, he says, "we have to envisage traditions given the shape which still

---

<sup>180</sup> K. F. Bahrtdt, Briefe über die Bibel im Volkston (Halle, 1702), 16th letter, cited in E. and M.-L. Keller, Miracles in Dispute (London: SCM, 1969); 71–72.

<sup>181</sup> Sanders, Historical Figure, 159.

<sup>182</sup> Ibid., 157, cf. 164.

<sup>183</sup> Dunn, Remembered, 683–684.

<sup>184</sup> Ibid., 687. He mentions, e.g., "the other boats with them" and the "cushion" (Mark 4:38) in the story of the stilling of the storm, and the numbers "five" and "two" and "green" grass (6:38–39) in the story of the feeding of the crowd.

<sup>185</sup> Dunn, Jesus, 72–73 citing R. Otto, The Kingdom of God and the Son of Man (London: Lutterworth, 1943), 347–350, 368–374.

<sup>186</sup> Dunn, Remembered, 688.

<sup>187</sup> Ibid., 686–687.

determines them more or less from the first telling, and by those reflecting on experiences which they interpreted in and by the telling. But," he concludes, "even granted the possibility I doubt whether much weight can be placed on it."<sup>188</sup>

Going much further than Dunn, and arguing for the essential historicity of nature miracles, are some of the essays collected by David Wenham and Craig Blomberg.<sup>189</sup> However, Borg speaks for probably most of the academy when he says that the miracles of nature are to be left in a "historical suspense account."<sup>190</sup> He argues that the historical verdict about whether or not such events really happen will depend, in part, on whether or not we think even a charismatic can do these kind of things. Also, he says, the symbolic elements in the stories make it difficult to determine what Jesus actually did.<sup>191</sup>

8. Summary and Conclusions

In this chapter we have identified and set out the major controversies associated with the miracles of Jesus. In doing so we have seen that, over against Bultmann, Schlatter's view that the "attempt to find a miracle-free Gospel as the first form of Christian tradition to which only later miracle accounts were attached has no chance of success,"<sup>192</sup> is, with important exceptions (see n. 14 above), the majority opinion. However, as secure and important as the miracle tradition may be, the view brought to the English speaking world by C. H. Dodd (1884–1973) that the miracle stories are peripheral to the kerygma<sup>193</sup>—which remains intact—cannot be sustained in view of the evidence. Instead, the evidence points to the miracles being fundamental to any legiti-

<sup>188</sup> Dunn, Remembered, 688–689.

<sup>189</sup> Wenham and Blomberg, ed., The Miracles of Jesus. See also Loos, Miracles; R. Latourelle, The Miracles of Jesus and the Theology of Miracles (New York: Paulist, 1988).

<sup>190</sup> Borg, New Vision, 70 citing a phrase used by Fuller, Miracles, 38. Cf. H. E. W. Turner, Jesus, Master and Lord (London: Mowbray, 1954), 181 who suggested leaving the nature miracles "in a kind of theological 'suspense account'."

<sup>191</sup> Borg, New Vision, 67, 70.

<sup>192</sup> Schlatter, History, 174.

<sup>193</sup> So J. M. Robinson, A New Quest of the Historical Jesus (London: SCM, 1959), 59. Even before Dodd there were a number of studies of the historical Jesus subordinating the miracles to the teaching of Jesus, e.g., A. C. Headlam, The Life and Teaching of Jesus the Christ (London: John Murray, 1923).

mate reconstruction of the historical Jesus, including how he understood himself.

Second, a cadre of controversies shows that there is no agreement as to how Jesus is to be seen in relation to miracle traditions and workers of the period, save that he was remembered as a particularly prolific miracle worker. Attempts to fit Jesus into one of the perceived categories of miracle workers of the time have not been successful. Nevertheless, Eric Eve may have come closest to portraying accurately the context of Jesus' miracles as the creative confluence of traditions about prophets like Elijah and Elisha and the Enochic-Qumran traditions concerned with the eschatological defeat of demonic powers, as well as popular folk-religion,<sup>194</sup> provided it is understood that this includes the magical traditions. For in these we see parallels to Jesus' brief healing commands, to his use of a power-authority, to his use of artifacts, as well as evidence of a dramatic encounter between the healer and the sickness.

Third, as unpalatable as it may now be, Jesus' contemporaries most probably accused him of being a magician. However, this was not because of his approach or techniques, which were paralleled in the so-called magical literature, but rather, not least, because he was thought to be leading people astray.

Fourth, there is no agreement as to the meaning of the miracles: are they expressions of compassion, or Jesus' response to a colonial people under political and religious pressure, or restoring people to membership of Israel or—as the evidence more likely shows—the eschatological kingdom of God in operation or made manifest, and also reflecting Jesus' self-consciousness that he was endowed with the eschatological Spirit? Perhaps, then, for Jesus, the miracles evidenced his status as spokesman for God.

Finally, though the discussion is not extensive, the lines are drawn most clearly and firmly regarding the status of the miracles of nature. We have observed that, inevitably reflecting philosophical and theological presuppositions, some see them as pure invention, others as either containing historical reminiscences—perhaps explicable by paranormal means, or even reflecting events as they stand. Not a few Jesus scholars have deposited these stories in a “historical suspense account” unable (or unwilling) to withdraw them. Whether or not nature miracles can be withdrawn from such an account depends on solving profound metaphysical and epistemological problems relating, for example, to the way God is thought to act, and how it could be known (including, not least, from ancient documents) that such a miracle had taken place. Further, any entertaining of the idea that nature miracles could be considered a legitimate part of the Jesus tradition also depends on the broad question: “Is Jesus the sort of person to Whom such a mastery over nature can reasonably be ascribed?”<sup>195</sup>

---

<sup>194</sup> Eve, Jewish Context, 259. Cf. Meier, “Present State,” 482–483.

---

<sup>195</sup> Turner, Jesus, 181, discussing A. Richardson, The Miracle Stories of the Gospels (London: SCM, 1941), 123–130.

THE MESSAGE OF JESUS II: PARABLES

ARLAND J. HULTGREN

For people who have even a basic acquaintance with the teachings of Jesus, his parables are the best known units within the gospels. Moreover, it is generally thought among scholars that, if one wants to get at the message of Jesus, one should go to the parables.<sup>1</sup> Even if they have been passed on and written down by evangelists who interpreted and edited them, many of the parables are regarded as conveying authentic material.<sup>2</sup>

1. What is a Parable?

The English word “parable” is derived from the Greek word παραβολή, and like its Greek antecedent its basic and primary meaning is a “comparison.” A parable is a figure of speech, such as a simile or a brief narrative, by which the speaker makes a comparison between some transcendent, mysterious, or otherwise puzzling reality and that which is familiar to common human experience. Although people immediately think of the parables of Jesus whenever the subject of parables comes up, certain types of parables are actually found elsewhere in the literatures of antiquity. Aristotle speaks of parables as illustrations that a teacher such as Socrates might use to confirm a point being made within a larger discourse (Rhetoric 2.20). And figures of speech called

---

<sup>1</sup> Cf. the statement of Joachim Jeremias, The Parables of Jesus, 2nd ed. (Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice Hall, 1972), 11: “The student of the parables of Jesus... may be confident that he stands upon a particularly firm historical foundation.” Cf. comparable statements by C. H. Dodd, The Parables of the Kingdom, rev. ed. (New York: Charles Scribner’s Sons, 1961), viii; Bernard B. Scott, Hear Then the Parable: A Commentary on the Parables of Jesus (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989), 63; Marcus J. Borg, “The Teaching of Jesus Christ,” ABD 3:804–812, at 807; and Klyne R. Snodgrass, Stories with Intent: A Comprehensive Guide to the Parables of Jesus (Grand Rapids: W. B. Eerdmans, 2008), 31.

<sup>2</sup> Of the 33 parables considered, 23 of them are classified as “authentic” (5 as certain and 18 as probable) in the work of the Jesus Seminar, as recorded in The Parables of Jesus: Red Letter Edition, ed. Robert W. Funk et al. (Sonoma, CA: Polebridge, 1988), 74.

“parables” appear in the works of Plato (e.g., Gorgias 493–94; Republic 6.487–89) and in the writings of certain Cynics and Stoics (e.g., Epicurus, Discourses 1.14.15; 2.14.21–22).

Parables and parabolic sayings appear within the Old Testament and other literatures of Jewish origin as well. The best-known parable in the Old Testament is the address of the prophet Nathan to King David after David had arranged for the death of Uriah and took Bathsheba as his wife (2 Sam 12:1–4). The passage is not actually called a “parable” within the Old Testament itself, nor are any other such stories that employ narration and partially resemble parables in content and function (e.g., 1 Kings 20:39–40; Isa 5:1–7; 28:23–29), but they are a mode of story-telling that anticipates that of Jesus. Parables appear also in rabbinic literature,<sup>3</sup> illustrating the existence of parable telling in the ancient Jewish world. But the degree to which the rabbinic parables antedate the rise of Christianity is debated. Most rabbinic parables that remain in written sources are from the second and third centuries CE.

By means of parables Jesus carried on instruction by making comparisons between eternal, transcendent realities and that which was familiar to the common human experience of his day. Although some scholars have proposed definitions,<sup>4</sup> there is no commonly agreed-upon definition of what a parable is within the scholarly literature. Within his own work, the author has used the following as a working definition:

A parable is a figure of speech in which a comparison is made between God’s kingdom, actions, or expectations and something in this world, real or imagined. There are two types of parables:

1. Narrative parables: the comparisons made include narration; these parables typically have a “once upon a time” quality about them and the particularity of stories set in the past.

---

<sup>3</sup> For a fine collection of rabbinic parables, cf. Harvey K. McArthur and Robert M. Johnston, They Also Taught in Parables: Rabbinic Parables from the First Centuries of the Christian Era (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1990). For a major study, cf. David Stern, Parables in Midrash (Cambridge: Harvard University, 1991).

<sup>4</sup> Examples of proposed definitions appear in the works of C. H. Dodd, The Parables of the Kingdom, rev. ed. (New York: Charles Scribner’s Sons, 1961), 5, and Bernard B. Scott, Hear Then the Parable: A Commentary on the Parables of Jesus (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1989), 8.

2. Similitudes: the comparisons are made without stories but by means of the words “is like” or “is as if”; analogies are made between their subjects and general and timeless observations.<sup>5</sup>

Some examples of the first type are the familiar Parables of the Prodigal Son (Luke 15:11–32) and the Ten Maidens (Matt 25:1–13). They contain delightful and memorable stories. The stories have been composed as though they are unique happenings that have taken place and are recalled by the story teller, even though they are not historical reports. Some examples of the second type, the similitudes, are the familiar Parables of the Mustard Seed (Mark 4:30–32//Matt 13:31–32//Luke 13:18–19) and the Leaven (Matt 13:33//Luke 13:20–21). These are extremely brief, do not contain stories, and make a succinct comparison. Their imagery is familiar, constant, and often observed in everyday life.

In addition to these two types of parables, it is possible to add a third. In some major studies they are called Example Narratives (or in German Beispielergählungen).<sup>6</sup> There are four parables placed in this category, all of them appearing in the Gospel of Luke. They are the Parables of the Good Samaritan (10:25–37), the Rich Fool (12:16–21), the Rich Man and Lazarus (16:19–31), and the Pharisee and the Tax-Collector (18:10–14). The reason that they are sometimes considered to be in a category by themselves is that their meanings are transparent (as models of behavior), and they simply call for application, whereas narrative parables leave the hearer with enigmas to ponder. In form, however, they are actually narrative parables. If they are placed into a separate category, that is on the basis of their message, not their form.

---

<sup>5</sup> Arland J. Hultgren, The Parables of Jesus: A Commentary (Grand Rapids: W. B. Eerdmans, 2000), 3.

<sup>6</sup> Adolf Jülicher, Die Gleichnisreden Jesu, 2nd ed., 2 vols. (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr [Paul Siebeck], 1899; reprinted, Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1963), 1:114; 2:585–641; Rudolf Bultmann, History of the Synoptic Tradition, rev. ed. (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1968), 177–179; B. T. D. Smith, The Parables of the Synoptic Gospels: A Critical Study (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1937), 18.

2. The Parables in the Gospels (Canonical and Apocryphal)

The parables of Jesus are located in both canonical and non-canonical gospels. If we limit ourselves to the New Testament alone, all of the parables of Jesus are located in the synoptic gospels. Sometimes the passage in John 10:1–6, in which Jesus speaks of himself as the shepherd who enters the sheepfold by way of the gate, is considered a parable, and in some translations of the New Testament the term παροιμία used at the end of the passage (10:6) is translated as “parable” (KJV, ASV). But the passage is more commonly regarded as a Christological discourse, and then the Greek term is translated simply as “figure of speech” (RSV, NIV, NRSV).

A discussion of the parables of Jesus gets complicated by the question of what should be included under the term “parable.” Scholarly works concerning the parables differ widely in this. The massive work of Adolf Jülicher deals with 53 units within the gospels as parables, while the work of Joachim Jeremias takes up 41, and that of C. H. Dodd only 32. Clearly the question of what to include in a treatment of the parables of Jesus is not easy to resolve. For example, are the sayings of Jesus about not placing a patch of new cloth on old clothes and not putting new wine in old wine-skins (Mark 2:21–22//Matt 9:16–17//Luke 5:36–38) to be classified as parables? Luke calls them “parables” (5:36), but Mark and Matthew do not. Some interpreters include them in their lists of parables,<sup>7</sup> but others do not.<sup>8</sup> Even though these sayings are to a certain degree parabolic (making comparisons), it is questionable whether they should be considered parables. They do not correspond fully with what are clearly the shortest of parables (the similitudes) in which an explicit comparison is made, such as, “the kingdom of God is like...,” nor do they correspond to the longer parables that contain narratives. It is fair to say that they are parabolic sayings, even if not full-fledged parables. Since they are questionable, they have not been included in the following list. The list provided here consists of 37 units of synoptic tradition that can safely be classified as parables. Other things might be included, but inclusion of them would be controversial. The parables are listed here according to their sources, based on the standard two-source theory of gospel origins.

<sup>7</sup> A. Jülicher, Gleichnisreden, 2:188–202; C. H. Dodd, Parables, 6, 90; Charles E. Carlston, The Parables of the Triple Tradition (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1975), 14–15, 62–66, 125–129. John D. Crossan, “Parable,” ABD 5:146–52 (148), speaks of it (and other units) as an “aphoristic parable.”

<sup>8</sup> Robert H. Stein, An Introduction to the Parables of Jesus (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1981), 25, calls the sayings “possible examples of parables.” J. Jeremias, Parables, 247–248, does not include them in his “Index of Synoptic Parables,” but on p. 90 he mentions them while discussing “paired parables and similes,” and on p. 117 refers to them as “sayings.” W. Oesterley, Parables, does not include them.

Those that appear in the Gospel of Mark (five, often with parallels) are:

- The Sower (4:3-8//Matt 13:3-8//Luke 8:5-8)
- The Seed Growing Secretly (4:26-29)
- The Mustard Seed (4:30-32//Matt 13:31-32//Luke 13:18-19)
- The Wicked Tenants (12:1-12//Matt 21:33-46//Luke 20:9-19)
- The Waiting Slaves (13:34-37//Luke 12:35-38)

Those attributed to the Q source (a total of six) are:

- The Father's Good Gifts (Matt 7:9-11//Luke 11:11-13)
- The Wise and Foolish Builders (Matt 7:24-27//Luke 6:47-49)
- The Children in the Marketplace (Matt 11:16-19//Luke 7:31-35)
- The Leaven (Matt 13:33//Luke 13:20-21)
- The Lost Sheep (Matt 18:12-14//Luke 15:4-7)
- The Faithful and Wise Slave (Matt 24:45-51//Luke 12:42-46).

Parables distinctive to the Gospel of Matthew (a total of ten) are:

- The Weeds in the Wheat (13:24-30)
- The Treasure in the Field (13:44)
- The Pearl of Great Price (13:45-46)
- The Dragnet (13:47-50)
- The Unforgiving Slave (18:23-35)
- The Workers in the Vineyard (20:1-16)
- The Two Sons (21:28-32)
- The Wedding Feast (22:1-14)
- The Ten Maidens (25:1-13)
- The Talents (25:14-30)

Parables distinctive to the Gospel of Luke (numbering sixteen) are:

- The Two Debtors (7:41–43)
- The Good Samaritan (10:25–37)
- The Friend at Midnight (11:5–8)
- The Rich Fool (12:16–21)
- The Barren Fig Tree (13:6–9)
- The Great Banquet (14:16–24)
- Building a Tower (14:28–30)
- The King Going to War (14:31–33)
- The Lost Coin (15:8–10)
- The Prodigal Son (15:11–32)
- The Unjust Manager (16:1–8)
- The Rich Man and Lazarus (16:19–31)
- The Slave at Duty (17:7–10)
- The Unjust Judge (18:2–8)
- The Pharisee and the Tax Collector (18:10–14)
- The Pounds (19:12–27)

To these 37 parables some would want to add one more, viz. what is sometimes called the Parable of the Sheep and the Goats, which is distinctive to Matthew (25:31–46).<sup>9</sup> Strictly speaking, however, that passage is not a parable from beginning to end. It has a parable-like beginning—that of the Son of man being compared to a shepherd who separates the sheep from the goats—but after that it is an eschatological discourse concerning the final judgment, and so it is often named the Final Judgment, not the Parable of the Sheep and the Goats.

In addition to the parables in the synoptic gospels, there are additional parables in the apocryphal Gospel of Thomas and Gospel of Truth. Five parables in the Gospel of Thomas have parallels in the synoptic gospels. These are the Sower (Mark 4:3–8 par.; Gos. Thom. 9), the Weeds in the Wheat (Matt 13:24–30; Gos. Thom. 57), the Rich Fool

---

<sup>9</sup> It is treated as a parable, for example, in the works of J. Jeremias, The Parables of Jesus, 206–210; John Donahue, The Gospel in Parable: Metaphor, Narrative, and Theology in the Synoptic Gospels (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988), 109–125; and Jan Lambrecht, Once More Astonished: The Parables of Jesus (New York: Crossroad, 1981), 196–235. It is not discussed at all in the works of A. Jülicher, C. H. Dodd, B. T. D. Smith, E. Linemann, and B. Scott.

(Luke 12:16–21; Gos. Thom. 63), the Great Banquet (Luke 14:16–24; Gos. Thom. 64), the Wicked Tenants (Mark 12:1–12 par.; Gos. Thom. 65), and the Lost Sheep (Matt 18:12–14 par.; Gos. Thom. 107). Moreover, that same gospel contains four additional parables not found in the synoptics: the Wise Fisherman (Gos. Thom. 8), the Disciples as Little Children (21), the Woman with a Jar (97), and the Assassin (98). The apocryphal Gospel of Truth (31–32) contains one parable of Jesus, which also appears in the synoptic gospels, viz. the Parable of the Lost Sheep.

3. Some Landmarks in Parable Interpretation

From the first century into modern times the allegorical method was used to interpret the parables of Jesus. The English word “allegory,” like “parable,” is a loanword from Greek. The word in Greek (ἀλληγορία) is a compound from ἄλλος (“other”) and ἀγορία (“speaking”), and thus means “speaking otherwise than one seems to speak,” and in common usage it is defined as “an extended or continued metaphor.”<sup>10</sup> Allegorical interpretation of the parables of Jesus rests on the assumption that they contain more than what is immediately seen in the story line, and interpretation proceeds by assigning meaning to virtually every detail being narrated. In the history of allegorical interpretation of the parables the details have regularly been considered to refer symbolically to classic Christian doctrines. But it is important to notice that allegorical interpretation started very early. It appears already in the New Testament itself, such as in the interpretations given there to the Parables of the Sower (Mark 4:13–20 par.) and the Weeds in the Wheat (Matt 13:37–43). A classic case of allegorical interpretation is in St. Augustine’s treatment of the Parable of the Good Samaritan. Among other things, he sets up the following equivalencies: the man who travels from Jerusalem to Jericho is Adam; his descent from Jerusalem is his loss of immortality; the thieves are the devil and his angels; the Samaritan is Christ; the inn is the church; and the innkeeper is the apostle Paul.<sup>11</sup> Clever as that interpretation is, it can hardly be expected to have been the meaning of the parable as Jesus told it to his first hearers or for Luke the evangelist as he wrote it down.

<sup>10</sup> J. A. Simpson and E. S. C. Weiner, eds., The Oxford English Dictionary, 2nd ed., 20 vols. (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1989), 1:333.

<sup>11</sup> For a fuller summary, cf. C. H. Dodd, Parables, 1–2, summarizing from Augustine, Quaestiones Evangeliorum 2.19.

A decisive break was made toward the end of the nineteenth century with the publication of Adolf Jülicher's two-volume work on the parables. Jülicher called for a non-allegorical interpretation, insisting that the interpreter should seek to find and explicate the "one point" that a parable makes.<sup>12</sup> While that view has been granted ever since Jülicher's work, it goes without saying that the ancients did not distinguish as carefully as modern interpreters might do between parable and allegory, and the parables of Jesus often contain allegorical elements. Surely the groom in the Parable of the Ten Maidens (Matt 25:1-13) represents Christ—and so there is an allegorical element present. In fact, some parables can be considered allegorical parables in their entirety, such as the Parables of the Great Banquet (Luke 14:16-24), the Wedding Feast (Matt 22:1-14), and the Wicked Tenants (Mark 12:1-12 and parallels). The allegorical elements have to be taken into account in interpreting these parables. Having said that, however, Jülicher's plea is important, and it has been widely accepted that the interpreter should not allegorize. As to whether or not one should look for the main point of a parable, discussion continues. Often Jülicher's "one point" approach is criticized as too narrow. But the parables do not say just anything. They have at least a direction or thrust to them, inviting the hearer to see things in new ways. Moreover, some parables may have more than one point or thrust to them. For example, the Parable of the Prodigal Son (Luke 14:11-32) portrays the overwhelming love and grace of God for the one who has fallen away but has been restored (15:11-24), but it goes on also to expose the hardness of heart of the one who cannot accept it (15:25-32). The parable makes what might be called "complementary points," for they are related as two sides of a coin, but are not actually the same.

Major shifts were made in the twentieth century. Particularly in the works of C. H. Dodd and Joachim Jeremias there was an attempt to recover the meaning of the parables within their ancient Palestinian settings and within the ministry of Jesus. For C. H. Dodd the task of parable interpretation is to answer the question, "What was the original intention of this or that parable, in its historical setting?"<sup>13</sup> Joachim Jeremias thought of his work on the parables as "recovering their original meaning."<sup>14</sup> As he puts it succinctly:

---

<sup>12</sup> A. Jülicher, Die Gleichnisreden Jesu, 1:61, 74, 317.

Each of [Jesus'] parables has a definite historical setting. Hence to recover this is the task before us. What did Jesus intend to say at this or that particular moment? What must have been the effect of his word upon his hearers? These are the questions we must ask in order...to recover the original meaning of the parables of Jesus, to hear again his authentic voice.<sup>15</sup>

The positive side of Dodd and Jeremias is that they stressed the importance of the historical setting of Jesus and the gospels. But their approach has some down sides. Here we can limit ourselves to Jeremias. In his work he seeks constantly to peel away secondary accretions from the gospel writers to get to the original parable and thereby hear the "actual living voice" (the ipsissima viva vox) of Jesus. This gets to be speculative. The assumption is that the evangelists are not only interpreters (which they are), but also roadblocks to confronting the message of Jesus.

But equally difficult is the question of the function of the parables in their original settings.<sup>16</sup> Jeremias claimed in a rather dogmatic fashion that "all the Gospel parables are a defence of the Good News" addressed to critics.<sup>17</sup> In fact, Jeremias has written that Jesus used parables as "weapons of controversy" that he lobed against his opponents.<sup>18</sup> Never could parables have been used by Jesus for teaching in the way that the gospel writers have presented them. By such a sweeping generalization, Jeremias precluded the possibility that a given parable could have been uttered by Jesus for a didactic purpose to the disciples or to the crowds. To exclude that possibility in

---

<sup>13</sup> C. H. Dodd, Parables, vii–viii. Cf. also 14, 18–19.

<sup>14</sup> J. Jeremias, Parables, 13.

<sup>15</sup> Ibid., 22.

<sup>16</sup> Cf. the following comments: Martin Dibelius, From Tradition to Gospel (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1935), 254: "...we do not know to what situation these parables were originally fitted"; and Rudolf Bultmann, History of the Synoptic Tradition, 2nd ed. (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1968), 199: "The original meaning of many similitudes has become irrecoverable in the course of the tradition" (italics original).

<sup>17</sup> J. Jeremias, Parables, 145; cf. 33–38.

<sup>18</sup> Ibid., 21.

advance seems unjustified, even strange, in the world of Jesus. We should keep our minds open to the possibility that Jesus used the parables for a wide range of objectives, to various audiences, and at various points in his ministry.<sup>19</sup>

It is fair to say that the book on the parables by Jeremias has had a central place in parable interpretation since the middle of the twentieth century. But it has never stood alone. Other interpreters have approached the parables in the light of modern linguistic theories, including semiotics,<sup>20</sup> or in the light of psychological dynamics,<sup>21</sup> and socio-economic realities of the ancient world.<sup>22</sup> It has been recognized too that the parables can have multiple meanings.<sup>23</sup> Then too there are those who have sought to interpret the parables within the contexts of the particular gospels in which they appear,<sup>24</sup> an approach that recognizes that the parables reflect not only the preaching of Jesus but also that of the early church, plus redaction by the gospel writers themselves. There is no one approach to parable interpretation, but the history of their interpretation is instructive, showing some directions that are widely accepted in the scholarly literature: the parables should not be allegorized; they should be understood in the light of their setting in the ancient world (so information concerning their "local color" is important); and they should be interpreted within their literary contexts, the synoptic gospels, recognizing that the evangelists edited and interpreted them for their own times and places. If

<sup>19</sup> A. Jülicher, Gleichnisreden, 1:146.

<sup>20</sup> Cf. essays in Daniel Patte, ed., Semiotics and Parables: Exploration of the Possibilities Offered by Structuralism for Exegesis (Pittsburgh: Pickwick, 1976); and Bernard B. Scott, Hear Then the Parable: A Commentary on the Parables of Jesus (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989).

<sup>21</sup> Richard Q. Ford, The Parables of Jesus: Recovering the Art of Listening (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1997).

<sup>22</sup> William R. Herzog II, Parables as Subversive Speech: Jesus as Pedagogue of the Oppressed (Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox, 1994).

<sup>23</sup> On this, cf. especially Mary A. Tolbert, Perspectives on the Parables: An Approach to Multiple Interpretations (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979).

<sup>24</sup> B. T. D. Smith, The Parables of the Synoptic Gospels (Cambridge: Cambridge University, 1937); Eta Linnemann, The Parables of Jesus: Introduction and Exposition (London: SPCK, 1966); Charles E. Carlston, The Parables of the Triple Tradition (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1975); Jan Lambrecht, Once More Astonished: The Parables of Jesus (New York: Crossroad, 1981); John R. Donahue, The Gospel in Parable: Metaphor, Narrative, and Theology in the Synoptic Gospels (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); and Arland J. Hultgren, The Parables of Jesus: A Commentary (Grand Rapids: W. B. Eerdmans, 2000).

one seeks to discern the message of the historical Jesus, that means that one has to be mindful of how the parables of Jesus were transmitted and preserved, how they reflect interests of the church in their oral period of transmission, and how the evangelists provide their own interpretations. That such happened is clearly seen at a literary level in several cases. One of the most obvious is the presentation of the Parable of the Lost Sheep in the Gospels of Matthew (18:12–14) and Luke (15:4–7). Luke's version highlights the immense joy of the shepherd (symbolizing God) in discovering the one sheep that was lost. Matthew's version, however, highlights the urgency of the shepherd (symbolizing God) in seeking the one that had gone astray. The comment in 18:14 ("So it is not the will of your Father in heaven that one of these little ones should be lost"), which is not in Luke's version, gives a clue to Matthew's interest in using the parable. For him, it is critical that persons be kept from going astray, and it is urgent to reclaim those who do. There is then an ecclesiological interpretation that most likely does not go back to Jesus. The version in Luke's Gospel can most likely be closer to the original proclamation of Jesus.

4. The Message of Jesus in the Parables

Discerning the message of Jesus in his parables requires attention to both his manner of teaching and to what is typical of the content of the parables. Such discernment discloses several features. The first section below has to do primarily, but not exclusively, with the manner of teaching in the parables. The second section takes up the content of Jesus' teaching.

Prior to the discussion of Jesus' message in the parables, a brief preface may be necessary. If one is to get at the message of Jesus, rather than simply to the message of the gospel writers, it has to be recognized that all of the parables appearing in our texts have been set into frameworks by the evangelists. Furthermore, they were transmitted over the years in oral form, and they have been edited by the evangelists at the point of their being written down. That means that it is impossible to get at the exact wording of Jesus, if that is what is meant by his "message." But that is to restrict matters too much and demand more of the sources available than is possible. One must be content with less. What is possible is to discern teachings that emerge not simply in one parable, which may be a composition of the evangelist who has written it down, but in other parables and traditions across the spectrum of traditions, thereby giving us a higher degree of confidence in seeking what can be traced back to the historical Jesus.

4.1. The Manner of Jesus' Teaching

4.1.1. Direct Address

One of the most striking things about the parables is their directness of address to the audience—a feature that is attested in all streams on tradition (Mark, Q, L, and M—and thus has the ring of authenticity). While this feature is present in all of the parables of Jesus, it is particularly evident (and confirmed) in those in which he begins to speak to his hearers with such penetrating questions to them as: “which one of you?” (Luke 11:5; 14:28; 17:7; 15:4//Matt 12:11),<sup>25</sup> “what woman?” (Luke 15:8), “what father among you?” (Matt 7:9//Luke 11:11), “what king?” (Luke 14:31), “will any one of you?” (Luke 17:7), “who then is the faithful and wise one?” (Matt 24:45//Luke 12:42), and “what do you think?” (Matt 18:12; 21:28). At other times the question is more oblique: “with what can we compare the kingdom?” (Mark 4:30) or “to what shall I compare the kingdom?” (Luke 13:20). Or at still other times there is the simple indicative: “everyone who hears . . .” (Matt 5:24). Such opening phrases engage the hearers immediately, putting them on the spot and eliciting a response.

4.1.2. Authoritative Speech

Contrary to many other examples of parable telling in antiquity, the parables of Jesus are not simply building blocks within a larger, longer argument that is to be concluded outside of the parables themselves. The parables are themselves front and center bearers of the message of Jesus; little more, or even nothing, needs to be said. At most there will be a single sentence or two of application. Thereafter the parables of Jesus leave room for interpretation.

---

<sup>25</sup> This formulation does not seem to have any contemporary parallels, according to J. Jeremias, Parables, 103.

This point is important when comparing the parables of Jesus to known rabbinic parables. Interpreters have often made the point that the latter are primarily exegetical. That is to say, their purpose is to interpret, clarify, and apply the scriptural tradition of Israel.<sup>26</sup> Typically the rabbinic parable interprets a biblical text, and its meaning is controlled by the text being cited. There is hardly any room at all for interpretation. So Daniel Boyarin says that it can thus be called a “closed text, not an open one.”<sup>27</sup> However characteristic it may be of rabbinic parables to be exegetical, that is not typical of the parables of Jesus. There is only one parable that is elicited from Jesus on the basis of reference to a biblical text. That is the Parable of the Good Samaritan, which Jesus tells in response to the lawyer who asks “And who is my neighbor?” in connection with a previous reference to Leviticus 19:18.<sup>28</sup> Aside from that one instance, normally Jesus utters parables with an apparent sense of sovereign freedom. His manner of teaching by parables without recourse to biblical texts may be the basis for the claim that he taught “as one having authority, and not as the scribes” (Mark 1:22).

4.1.3. Familiar, Simple Metaphors

The fact that the parables of Jesus are not used for argumentation in the sense of the ancient philosophers, popular rhetoricians, or rabbinic masters is significant for the content of Jesus’ parables. There is very little previous learning that Jesus’ hearers need to bring to the occasion beyond what is gained through life experience. The subject of the parables is typically the familiar things of everyday life: men and women working, losing, and finding; fathers and sons in strained and joyous relationships; kings, rich men, and slaves in stereotypical roles; domestic animals, seeds, plants, vineyards, leaven, and the like. These become symbols, to be sure, resonating with Jewish symbols of

---

<sup>26</sup> Günther Bornkamm, Jesus of Nazareth (New York: Harper & Brothers, 1996), 69; H. McArthur and R. Johnston, They Also Taught in Parables, 172; D. Stern, “Jesus’ Parables from the Perspective of Rabbinic Literature,” in Parable and Story in Judaism and Christianity, ed. Clemens Thoma and Michael Wyschogrod (New York: Paulist Press, 1989), 58; and Daniel Boyarin, Intertextuality and the Reading of Midrash (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1990), 80–83.

<sup>27</sup> D. Boyarin, Intertextuality, 82.

<sup>28</sup> That is not to overlook the fact that scriptural allusions abound in the parables of Jesus. The most obvious are in the Sower and the Wicked Tenants (Mark 4:3–8; 12:1–12 and parallels).

previous generations. Yet they would have been familiar to anyone who had even a rudimentary acquaintance with the Jewish heritage, an acquaintance that anyone of that time and place would gain from life experience.

4.1.4. Oral Techniques

Story telling requires that the narrator keep the plot simple in ways not necessary when composing at the desk. This is particularly the case for the longer parables of Jesus. An excellent example is the Parable of the Great Banquet (Luke 14:16–24). In this parable a wealthy man sends out only one slave to do his bidding, but the tasks he does are more than any one person could do in the time allowed. He makes the rounds to call all who had been invited, records their excuses, reports back to his master, is told to go out and “bring in the poor, the crippled, the blind, and the lame,” responds that that has been done already (apparently prior to his report), and then he is ordered to go out to the roads and lanes and compel people to come in. All this takes place while the food for the banquet is still fresh and warm!

In addition to simplicity, good story telling—especially when done as an oral performance—requires that any tension within the plot be held to the end, but must be arrived at efficiently. That is precisely what happens in the Parable of the Workers in the Vineyard (Matt 20:1–16). Those who are hired in the eleventh hour get paid first, so that those who worked throughout the day have the opportunity to make their complaint when they are paid the same amount, which to them is an injustice. If the latter were the first to be paid, and were then on their way, the parable simply would not work.

One of the problems with the modern reader who reads the parables is that the temptation is always there to ask questions that are irrelevant to story telling in an oral culture. But to do so can ruin a good story. One need not, and should not, ask what the shepherd did with the ninety-nine sheep that he left behind while looking for the one that was lost in the Parable of the Lost Sheep (Matt 18:12–14// Luke 15:4–7). Attention is to be directed instead to the shepherd who goes out to seek the one that is lost. Nor is it helpful to ask why the bridegroom was delayed or how the foolish maidens could obtain oil for their lamps in the middle of the night in the Parable of the Ten Maidens (Matt 25:1–13). The parable does not narrate an actual event in the first place. The narrative goes on toward the outcome of the story very quickly, and stopping along the way to ask questions about the details can impede hearing the story's ending.

These and other techniques of story telling appear in the parables of Jesus. Because of their familiarity with the parables, modern readers often miss the techniques employed and consequently the impact they would have had in the ministry of Jesus.

4.1.5. Surprise Endings

Characteristic of many of the parables of Jesus, not all, is the element of surprise in the way they end. Over against common assumptions, the parables of Jesus do not always portray typical human behavior as illustrative of God. Time and again the behavior described is not typical, and that is decisive for the teaching at hand about God. Within the Parable of the Workers in the Vineyard (Matt 20:1-16), for example, in which the "eleventh-hour workers" receive pay equal to that of those who worked all day, "Jesus deliberately and cleverly led the listeners along by degrees until they understood that if God's generosity was to be represented by a man, such a man would be different from any man ever encountered."<sup>29</sup>

4.1.6. Wisdom and Eschatology

The parables of Jesus capture, combine, and make use of two major Jewish traditions: wisdom and eschatology. Sometimes the two traditions appear in separate spheres of thought and teaching.<sup>30</sup> The wisdom tradition takes for granted that wisdom is timeless, consisting of truisms that are valid for all times and places. The eschatological tradition, on the other hand, makes assertions related to temporality. But the two traditions converge in the parables of Jesus, and this gives them a distinctive character. For example, the women in the Parable of the Ten Maidens (Matt 25:1-13) can be divided into wise and foolish, but it is only the wise who in the end are admitted to the wedding feast. The hearer knows then that a certain kind of wisdom is needed to enter the kingdom, and that is made clear by the words: "Keep awake therefore, for you know neither the day nor the hour"

---

<sup>29</sup> Norman Huffman, "Atypical Features in the Parables of Jesus," JBL 97 (1978): 209.

<sup>30</sup> This is so even if the apocalyptic tradition has its roots in the wisdom tradition, as suggested by Gerhard von Rad, Old Testament Theology, 2 vols. (New York: Harper & Row, 1962-65), 2:306.

(25:13). The servant in the Parable of the Faithful and Wise Servant (Matt 24:45–51//Luke 12:42–46) considers his duty with care and performs it. If he does not do so, he is punished. The hearer is to be wise and apply the parable in such a way that he or she remains faithful, lest in the judgment he or she is cast out. Not all of the parables combine both the wisdom and eschatological traditions of the Jewish heritage, but the two traditions are so interwoven among so many of the parables that such an interweaving can be considered characteristic of the parables of Jesus.

4.2. The Content of the Message

4.2.1. God (Theology)

The parables are thoroughly theological.<sup>31</sup> But what is striking about them is that they do not describe God's attributes or discuss God's nature theoretically. As parables, they can hardly do that. What is characteristic rather is the sense of God's intimacy and familiarity through the use of common metaphors—a father, king, shepherd, owner of a vineyard, or a woman who sweeps her house. The concreteness of the metaphors keeps the discussion from abstractions. What is distinctive about the parables is the way that these metaphors for God are put to work. The behavior of the protagonist is so often not typical, since the parables are about God, whose love and grace exceed normal expectations. A theology of the parables affirms certain facets about the character of God that can be discerned.

The clearest affirmation about God is that God is good and gracious beyond human expectations. In the Parable of the Prodigal Son, Jesus compares God to a father who runs to meet his wayward son who is coming home (Luke 15:20). Where else in the world of Jesus can one find anything comparable? Aristotle has written that a dignified man walks with slow steps,<sup>32</sup> and a middle-aged father cannot be expected to run down the road in a world where honor and shame guide one's behavior. Furthermore, the father will not listen to the son's litany of repentance (contrast the son's broken-off speech of 15:21 with what he had practiced in 15:18–19). The father is clearly a metaphor for God, and so in this parable Jesus portrays God as more loving and merciful than any human father that one might know. Similarly, in the Parable of the Unforgiving Servant (Matt 18:23–35), in which a certain king forgives his slave an indebtedness of 10,000 talents, the figure is so astounding that it is impossible to imagine. In order to earn that amount of money, a common laborer would have to work for about 200,000 years. Another way of putting it is that it is comparable to a year's wages for 200,000 laborers. The amount owed and subsequently forgiven simply for the asking is ridiculously high. Once again, however, the parable is about the love, mercy, and grace of God.

---

<sup>31</sup> This is not universally granted. Cf. the statement of W. Herzog, Parables as Subversive Speech, 28: "The parable... was not primarily a vehicle to communicate theology or ethics but a codification designed to stimulate social analysis and to expose the contradictions between the actual situation of its hearers and the Torah of God's justice." As a generalization, however, that viewpoint does not work, as the author admits (p. 4), and in fact he can apply it to only nine parables.

<sup>32</sup> Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics 4.3.1125.10–15; cited by Kenneth E. Bailey, Finding the Lost: Cultural Keys to Luke 15 (St. Louis: Concordia, 1992), 144.

The love, mercy, and grace of God extend to persons who are not considered worthy of it by normal standards of judgment. That becomes clear in those parables that portray God as reaching out to the lost, as in the Parables of the Lost Sheep (Matt 18:12–14//Luke 15:4–7) and Lost Coin (Luke 15:8–10) and in the speech of the father to the elder son in the Parable of the Prodigal Son (Luke 15:31–32). The same theme appears in the Parable of the Workers in the Vineyard (Matt 20:1–16); those who work only one hour are not worthy of the wages given to those who work all day, and yet they are paid the same. In these parables we have God portrayed as a shepherd, a woman, a father, and a wealthy landowner who employs day laborers for his vineyard. Their actions are not typical of ordinary persons in those roles. Jesus is a masterful storyteller who has these persons act in extremely unusual, non-typical ways, since they symbolize God. But if God's love, mercy, and grace extend to persons not ordinarily considered worthy, the obverse is also the case. God opposes the proud who parade their righteousness (the Pharisee and the Tax Collector, Luke 18:9–14).

Although God is clearly loving and merciful, God is also a God of judgment. That is illustrated in the parable just mentioned. God has already made a judgment when, according to Jesus, the one man goes down to his house "justified" (Luke 18:14), but the other does not. God condemns those who, though lavishly forgiven, will not forgive others, as in the Parable of the Unforgiving Slave, in which the slave who does not forgive is cast into prison (Matt 18:23–35). Similarly, the rich man in the Parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus is consigned to torment because of his arrogant, uncaring, and inattentive conduct in this life (Luke 16:19–31). The Parables of the Weeds in the Wheat and the Dragnet (Matt 13:24–30, 47–50) use metaphors for a final judgment (reaping, gathering, and burning in the first of them; sorting and casting away in the second).

4.2.2. The Kingdom of God

Frequently the parables are about “the kingdom of God” or—in the language of the Gospel of Matthew—“the kingdom of heaven.” The latter no doubt means the same as the former, since “heaven” can be a circumlocution for “God,” as in the utterance of the prodigal son, “I have sinned against heaven” (Luke 15:18.21). The phrases are very common in the four gospels, appearing some 94 times (counting parallels) within the synoptic gospels.

The English phrase “kingdom of God” represents the Greek expression ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ, which could just as well be translated as “the rule of God” or “the reign of God,” since it is a dynamic expression referring to an activity, not a territory (as it usually means in modern English). Several of the parables open with explicit reference to the kingdom of God. They are introduced by a formula, such as “The kingdom of God/heaven is like...” There are eleven such parables. Two are in Mark and parallels: the Parables of the Seed Growing Secretly (4:26–29) and the Mustard Seed (4:30–32//Matt 13:31–32//Luke 13:18–19). One is from Q: the Parable of the Leaven (Matt 13:33//Luke 13:20–21). Eight can be assigned to the Special Matthean tradition: the Parables of the Weeds in the Wheat (Matt 13:24–30), the Treasure in the Field (13:44), the Pearl of Great Price (13:45–46), the Dragnet (13:47–50), the Unforgiving Servant (18:23–35), the Workers in the Vineyard (20:1–16), the Wedding Feast (22:1–14), and the Ten Maidens (25:1–13). None can be assigned to the Special Lukan tradition.

Although there are fewer than a dozen parables that begin with the introductory phrase concerning the kingdom of God, the theme of the kingdom is present to some degree in virtually all of the parables of Jesus, as well as in so much of his teaching in general. By means of this expression, Jesus reaches back into the scriptural tradition of Israel, where it is affirmed that God is king of the universe and reigns over all things, both nature and human affairs (Ps 22:28; 47:2, 7–8; 95:1–3; 103:19; Isa 43:15; 44:6). But in the history of Israel it was often abundantly clear that God’s reign was not always evident. In those times the rule of God became a future hope (Pss 102:12–22; 145:10–13; Dan 7:18; Mic 4:6–8). In his own ministry Jesus revived the concept of the reign of God, affirming that it is both a present reality and a future hope. It is dawning already so that its effects are made known in the healings that Jesus performed, and the ethic that he taught was essentially a “kingdom ethic,” that is, a declaration of what life in God’s kingdom (or under the rule of God) entails. The metaphor of the present of Jesus’ ministry as the “dawn of the kingdom” is helpful.<sup>33</sup> The dawn precedes the rising of the sun, but its effects can be seen as lighting up the present. So the ministry of Jesus was, in this way of thinking, a time in which the effects of the kingdom could be seen, even if its coming in its fullness had to be awaited as a future event.

The parables that speak of the kingdom explicitly compare it to one who sows, a king who gives a marriage feast, ten maidens, etc. The comparison, however, is not to a person, but to the story that follows. Some speak of the kingdom of God as growing. These include the so-called Parables of Growth (the Seed Growing Secretly, Mark 4:26–29; the Mustard Seed, Mark 4:30–32; and the Leaven, Matt 13:33). Others speak of the kingdom as a joyful discovery, in which God’s reign becomes a wonderful event in one’s life (the Treasure in the Field, Matt 13:44; and the Pearl of Great Price, 13:45–46). If we ask what the circumstances were in which Jesus spoke these parables, it may well be that the Parables of Growth were uttered in times in which it appeared to his disciples that his ministry (and following) seemed to amount to very little. By means of these parables, Jesus taught that the reign of God, though seemingly having little impact in the present, shall come in its fullness. Or as one interpreter has put it succinctly, “Though the ministry of Jesus in Israel often did not lead to anything, yet it was the condition for and the initial realization of the coming of the kingdom of God.”<sup>34</sup> And those parables concerning discovery of the kingdom expressed the joy that comes to the one who experiences the reign of God to the extent that he or she can detach the self from a commitment to other things, giving them a secondary significance, and commend oneself to God's continuing rule and future fulfillment of it.

---

<sup>33</sup> The metaphor has been employed by G. Bornkamm, Jesus of Nazareth, 92.

<sup>34</sup> Nils A. Dahl, “The Parables of Growth,” Jesus in the Memory of the Early Church (Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Publishing House, 1976), 162.

There are other parables of the kingdom, however, in which the kingdom cannot simply refer to the reign of God as a subject in itself. Something more is meant. These parables are all in the Gospel of Matthew, and they speak of the kingdom in the most general way, conveying a theological truth concerning God's activities as ruler in the present or future, signifying that what people do in the present will come under scrutiny and testing at the Final Judgment. And so, in spite of the fact that the followers of Jesus are to exhibit a righteousness greater than that of the Pharisees (cf. Matt 5:20), there is to be no purifying of the community prior to the Final Judgment, for one cannot always be confident in making judgments (the Weeds in the Wheat, 13:24–30; the Dragnet, 13:47–50). The disciple, who has been forgiven so generously by God, is to forgive others (the Unforgiving Servant, 18:23–35). One cannot consider others as undeserving of God's grace, for it is beyond human comparison (the Workers in the Vineyard, 20:1–16; the Wedding Feast, 22:1–14). And the wise disciple will be prepared for the coming of the Bridegroom, even if his coming is far into the future (the Ten Maidens, 25:1–13). The last of these is quite clearly allegorical to the extent that the Bridegroom represents Christ, who is to come. Yet the parable may well be rooted in the teaching of Jesus, in which the imagery of God as Israel's husband exists (Isa 54:5–8; 62:5; Jer 31:32; Ezek 16:8–14; Hos 2:1–23), and the imagery of a marriage feast and feasting as metaphors for the kingdom is common in Jesus' proclamation (Matt 8:11//Luke 13:29; Matt 22:1–10; Luke 12:37; 22:16). It is then surely possible that Jesus composed a parable by which to set forth the need for his disciples to be prepared for the coming of the kingdom. If they are wise, they will be ready whether that is soon (as expressed elsewhere in the gospel traditions; cf. Mark 9:1; 11:10; Luke 19:11) or late.

4.2.3. Life in the Presence of God

As indicated above, four of Jesus' parables provide examples of behavior, and they are often placed into a category known as Parables of Exemplary Behavior or Example Stories,<sup>35</sup> all of which are located in the Travel Narrative of the Gospel of Luke (9:51–19:27), a section where Luke makes no use at all of materials from the Gospel of Mark. They are distinct among the parables in that they do not make comparisons between that which is told in story form and some other reality (such as the kingdom), but provide illustrations or examples of both attitudinal and ethical matters. The Parable of the Good Samaritan (10:25–37) is a response of Jesus to a lawyer, who has quoted the love commandment of Leviticus 19:18 (“you shall love your neighbor as yourself”) and then asks concerning the meaning of the word “neighbor.” In this parable, one of the best known of all, Jesus in effect turns the question around, so that the lawyer is confronted with the question concerning what it means to be a neighbor. The one who proves to be a neighbor is “the one who showed mercy,” an expression used by the lawyer so that he need not speak the word “Samaritan.” The thrust of the parable is to make the point that a person should not limit the meaning of the word “neighbor” by a definition of the term, for to do so is in fact to ask who is not one’s neighbor. Moreover, the question to be asked is not “Who is my neighbor?” but “Am I a neighbor?” The Parable of the Rich Fool (12:16–21; Gos. Thom. 63) is an assault by Jesus on the attitude that one can secure a meaningful life by an increase in material resources. The Parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus (16:19–31) warns the “haves” of the world to put away any arrogance they have toward the “have-nots” and to involve themselves in relieving their plight. And the Parable of the Tax Collector (18:9–14) exposes the self-righteousness of those who can boast of their acts of piety, and commends the one who has nothing to offer before God except repentance.

---

<sup>35</sup> The latter is the term used by B. T. D. Smith, Parables, 18; A. M. Hunter, Parables, 11; and in the English version of R. Bultmann, History of the Synoptic Tradition, 177.

Beyond these four Parables of Exemplary Behavior, several other parables have to do with life in the presence of God, teaching the hearer about attitudes and behavior fitting for the kingdom. As indicated already with certain parables of the kingdom, there are teachings about the need to extend forgiveness (the Unforgiving Slave, Matt 18:23–35), to leave judgment up to God (the Weeds in the Wheat, Matt 13:24–30), and to be a faithful and wise disciple, even if that may entail readiness for the long haul (the Ten Maidens, Matt 25:1–13).

Other parables pick up still other themes, a virtual miscellany of them. What is the meaning of fidelity to God? It is not a matter of words and good intentions, but of doing what one is asked to do without any pretensions to righteousness about it (the Parable of the Two Sons, Matt 21:28–32). What does an authentically human life mean, except to be faithful and wise even when there is no apparent check on one's attitude and behavior? In the final analysis, an accounting will take place, but in the meantime the person committed to God and his reign, as understood by Jesus, must have inner strength to persevere (the Faithful and Wise Slave, Matt 24:45–51// Luke 12:42–46). Living in the presence of God, as interpreted by Jesus, one should make use of the gifts one has. The wise but forthright, uninhibited use of gifts will bring fullness of life, while not making use of them leads to loss (the Talents, Matt 25:14–30, and the Pounds, Luke 19:12–27). In the case of these parables it becomes clear that interpreting them and other parables simply as ways in which Jesus subverted or replaced conventional wisdom, as is sometimes done, does not do justice to them. Then they become banalities. They are meaningful only when a life of commitment to God, as envisioned by Jesus, is presupposed.

4.2.4. The Final Judgment

As indicated earlier, God is portrayed in the parables of Jesus not only as a God of love and mercy, but also of judgment. The Final Judgment is presupposed and alluded to in several of the parables, such as in the Rich Man and Lazarus (Luke 16:19–31) and the Unforgiving Slave (Matt 18:23–35), but in those cases it is hardly dominant as a theme. There are two parables, however, in which the Final Judgment is prominent as a theme, signifying that it will be a moment of accounting and a separation of those who will be condemned from those who are gathered into the realm of those who are saved. Those are the Parables of the Weeds in the Wheat and Its Interpretation (Matt 13:24–30, 37–43; Gos. Thom. 57) and the Dragnet and Its Interpretation (Matt 13:47–50). Furthermore, if we consider it a parable, one can also include the discourse on the Final Judgment (Matt 25:31–46), often called the Parable of the Sheep and the Goats.

These three units, all in the Gospel of Matthew alone, clearly reflect Matthean theological concerns, and each contains Matthean terminology to a high degree. That does not mean, however, that they are Matthean compositions. Scholars often assign them in their basic form to Jesus, allowing however for some Matthean redaction.<sup>36</sup> The fact that the Final Judgment is spoken of, or referred to, in teachings of Jesus outside the parables and in various strands of tradition (with attestation not only in Matthean traditions at Matt 10:15 and 11:24, but also in Q, Matt 11:22//Luke 10:14 and Matt 12:41–52//Luke 11:31–32) gives support to the view that it is present as a theme also in the parables of Jesus.

---

<sup>36</sup> On the Weeds in the Wheat, cf. C. H. Dodd, Parables, 148; B. T. D. Smith, Parables, 198; J. Jeremias, Parables, 227; Jan Lambrecht, Out of the Treasure: The Parables

5. Concluding Comment

The parables of Jesus do not provide the sum total of his teaching. Many of his teachings, both theological and ethical, lie outside of the range of the parables. Furthermore, one cannot consider any of the parables as a clear theological statement. They cannot bear the entirety of Jesus' message (or his theology). They bring forth facets of his message, provoking the hearer—and reader of the gospels of today—to reconsider their views concerning God, God's kingdom, and God's expectations and to see different ways to construe those views. Descriptive or doctrinal statements could never have generated and elicited those ways of seeing to the degree that the parables were able to do. If one is to speak of the genius of Jesus the man, that will have to include reference to his ability to tell parables and to tell the ones he did. The person who has tried to compose a parable, and to match those of Jesus, soon begins to marvel at those told by Jesus.

---

in the Gospel of Matthew (Grand Rapids: W. B. Eerdmans, 1992), 165; and Hans Weder, Die Gleichnisse Jesu als Metaphern: Traditions- und redaktionsgeschichtliche Analysen und Interpretationen, FRLANT 120 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1978), 123–124. On the Dragnet, cf. A. Jülicher, Gleichnisreden, 2:569; C. H. Dodd, Parables, 150–152; J. Jeremias, Parables, 225–227; and H. Weder, Gleichnisse, 144. On the Final Judgment, cf. J. Jeremias, Parables, 206–210, and other references in A. Hultgren, Parables, 325 (n. 75).

PART THREE

JESUS AND THE LEGACY OF ISRAEL

JESUS AND GOD

MARIANNE MEYE THOMPSON

1. Introduction

In the history of Christian thought, the question of the “novelty” or “uniqueness” of the New Testament vis-à-vis the Jewish matrix from which it sprang has been raised often. In years past, the emphasis tended to fall on the radical disjuncture between the Christian and Jewish faiths, typically underscored by characterizing aspects of Christian belief and practice as “unique” and, consequently, superior to Judaism. Within this overall framework that pits the early Christian movement against its Jewish context, Christian theologians have, on the one hand, emphasized both the distinctiveness of Jesus’ understanding of God and (consequently) the discontinuity between Jesus and Judaism (or sometimes the Old Testament) on precisely this point. For example, William Bousset wrote:

What is most completely original and truly creative in the preaching of Jesus comes out most strongly and purely when he proclaims God the heavenly Father. . . . The [Judaism of Jesus’ time] had neither in name nor in fact the faith of the Father-God; it could not possibly rise to it.<sup>1</sup>

Bousset’s pupil, Rudolf Bultmann, echoed his teacher’s view:

[In Judaism] God had retreated far off into the distance as the transcendent heavenly King, and His sway over the present could barely still be made out. For Jesus, God again became a God at hand. This contrast finds expression in the respective forms of address used in prayer. Compare the ornate, emotional, often liturgically beautiful, but often overloaded forms of address in Jewish prayer with the stark simplicity of “Father”! . . .<sup>2</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> Jesu Predigt in ihrem Gegensatz zum Judentum: Ein religionsgeschichtlicher Vergleich (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck und Ruprecht, 1892), 41, 43, cited and translated in G. F. Moore, “Christian Writers on Judaism,” HTR 14 (1921): 197–254, at 242.

<sup>2</sup> Theology of the New Testament, 2 vols. (ET: New York: Charles Scribner’s Sons, 1951, 1955), 1:23, 25.

Similarly, in his article on abba for the Theological Dictionary of the New Testament, Gerhard Kittel wrote,

Jesus' term for God...shows how this Father-child relationship to God far surpasses any possibilities of intimacy assumed in Judaism, introducing indeed something which is wholly new.<sup>3</sup>

On the other hand, more recently a number of scholars have also argued for the fundamental continuity of Jesus' convictions about God with those of the Jewish matrix from which he came. So, for example, Brevard Childs writes: "Jesus brought no new concept of God, but he demonstrated in action the full extent of God's redemptive will for the world which was from the beginning."<sup>4</sup> Similarly, N. T. Wright notes that the teachings of Jesus do not present an "innovation" in their portrayal of the actions of God. Commenting on the parable of the prodigal, Wright asserts:

For Israel's god to act in this way is not an innovation; it is consistent with his character as revealed throughout Israel's long and chequered history. This is who he is, who he will be.<sup>5</sup>

Furthermore, Wright argues that Jesus shared the fundamental convictions of Jewish monotheism about God and God's relationship to Israel; indeed, Jesus' own convictions about his mission depended upon and arose from those beliefs. Jesus would scarcely have appeared as a teacher of new ideas, including new ideas about God, however much his later interpreters sought to argue to the contrary.

It is the contention of this chapter that Jesus taught little about God that could be called innovative in the sense of introducing concepts about God unheard of in Judaism. Indeed, it would be difficult to argue a case at all that Jesus thought his primary mission was to teach people ideas, let alone ideas about God. It is even somewhat artificial to isolate Jesus' "teaching about God," as though it formed a distinct subject matter on which he taught, for his understanding of God weaves its way through exhortation and warning, parable and story, as well as through the very fabric of his life. Jesus did often rebuke his listeners for failing to act in ways that he deemed consonant with Israel's understanding of and commitment to God. For example, when Jesus spoke of God's mercy, he was not introducing a new idea about God, but rather emphasizing a fundamental tenet of Israel, which he contended needed to be freshly appropriated in the daily life and practice of God's people. Or, again, while accepting the common and biblical notion of a righteous God who would judge the wicked, Jesus drew the lines between righteous and unrighteous differently than did many of his contemporaries. We should not think, therefore, of Jesus as an innovator with respect to beliefs about God, but rather as picking up and weaving together already existing threads, even if sometimes he produced new and distinctive patterns.

<sup>3</sup> "abba," TDNT 1:6.

<sup>4</sup> Brevard S. Childs, Biblical Theology of the Old and New Testaments (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1992), 358.

<sup>5</sup> N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God, Christian Origins and the Question of God 2 (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1996), 130.

2. The God of the Scriptures and Early Judaism

The Scriptures of the Old Testament provide the substance of Jesus' understanding of God. Therefore, it is no surprise that Jesus' convictions about God do not come to expression as a list of attributes of God, but rather are inseparable from the basic narrative of God's calling of and covenant with the people of Israel, and the demand for obedience and faithfulness inherent in that calling and that covenant. Jesus read the Scriptures as containing promises of God's provision for his people, God's commands with regard to appropriate conduct, as well as warnings of God's judgment on disobedience. Such promises and commands at times explicitly articulate and, at other times, assume implicitly an understanding of God as faithful, providing, commanding, judging, holy, and merciful.

These characteristics of God are found persistently in the literature of Second Temple Judaism, although that literature manifests differences about such matters as how a righteous God judges, when and how justice will be meted out, and to whom and on what basis God will be merciful. Here we see that the primary issues for discussion are not "abstract" attributes of God, but how God acts towards his people and the world. In the brief discussion that follows, we shall try to single out those scriptural convictions about God that are particularly emphasized at the time of Jesus. This means that we will therefore neglect certain matters, such as the historical development of ideas. For our purposes, it is more important to know what beliefs might have been current at the time of the first century than to trace the development of these convictions. But this discussion should help us to see how Jesus understood God in the light of his reading of Scripture, his understanding of Israel's identity and situation, and his own experiences within the broader shared experience of his people.

Foundational to Israel's belief in God was the confession of Yahweh as the one and only God. The regularly recited Shema, "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God, the Lord is one" (Deut 6:4), expresses Israel's basic understanding of God and of its relationship to God as God's chosen and covenant people. The emphasis on God as the unique God, who alone merits Israel's worship and obedience, came to pointed expression in the insistence that one could not serve both God and other masters (Josephus, War 2.118). Often, too, Yahweh was said to be an incomparable God, different from all other deities. Particularly in the Old Testament prophets, the emphasis on God's uniqueness was often coupled with polemic against the worship of other gods, who are regarded as "dead idols," artifacts created by human hands. Israel believed that God had called it to a peculiar destiny and that it owed God a peculiar obedience, and the prophetic tradition testifies repeatedly that disobedience in the form of idolatry or injustice would bring God's judgment.

The prophets' attack on idolatry was often coupled with the insistence that God was the sole creator of all that is. The belief that God created the world can be found in various places throughout the Scriptures of the Old Testament, including particularly the Psalms and portions of Isaiah. Especially in Second Isaiah, God is portrayed not only as the Creator of the world, but emphatically as the sole Creator of the world (Isa 44:24) and indeed of all that is (40:28; 45:7). God is the "creator of the ends of the earth" (40:28), whose hand "laid the foundation of the earth" (48:12-13; cf. 42:5; 44:24; 45:11-12).

Because God is understood as the Creator of all things, God is also often spoken of as a living God, the God who lives, or the God of life. We find in the Old Testament the epithets "the living God" (Deut 5:26; Jer 10:10), the "everlasting God" (Isa 40:28), and "the living God and everlasting King" (Jer 10:10).<sup>6</sup> God is the Everlasting God

---

<sup>6</sup> According to Paul A. Rainbow, the identification of God as "living" and/or "true" is one of ten features of explicitly "monotheistic speech" in Greco-Roman Judaism. As Rainbow points out, such phrases as "living God" or "true God" are often linked with other formula which posit the uniqueness of Yahweh, and gener-

(Gen 21:33; Isa 40:28; Jer 10:10; Hab 1:12), the one who is “from everlasting to everlasting” (Pss 90:2; 93:2). Related to these assertions is the oath formula, “As Yahweh lives,” or “As I live, says Yahweh.”<sup>7</sup> All these expressions are grounded in the simple assertion, “Yahweh lives” (Pss 18:46), which means, as the book of Daniel puts it, that “Yahweh lives forever” (Dan 12:7; Deut 32:40; cf. Isa 48:12; Pss 41:14, 106:48). The designation of God as the “living God” often serves to contrast God, the one who made the earth, with “dead idols,” made from the things that God had made, and made by human hands (1 Sam 17:26, 36; 2 Kgs 19:4, 16; Jer 23:36; Deut 5:26; Josh 3:10; Pss 42:2, 84:2; Isa 40:18–20; 41:21–24; 44:9–20, 24; 45:16–22; 46:5–7). “[Idols] are the work of the artisan and of the hands of the goldsmith... they are all the product of skilled workers. But the Lord is the true God; he is the living God and the everlasting King” (Jer 10:8–10). The living God is the creator and source of life (Ps 36:9; Jer 2:13; Ezek 37:1–6).

Not surprisingly, this emphasis on God as Creator and Living God is found also in the literature of Second Temple Judaism. Josephus notes, for example, that the Essenes give thanks to God before meals in order to honor the “bountiful giver of life” (Josephus, War 2.131). God is “the beginning and middle and end of all things,” who created the world “not with hands, not with toil, not with assistants of whom He had no need” (Apion 2.190–192; cf. Ant 8.280, “the beginning and end of all”). In fact, Josephus argues that the etymology of the Greek word Zeus shows the proper understanding of deity, for the name comes from the fact that “he breathes life (zēn; ζῆν) into all creatures” (Ant. 12.22). Indeed, the God of Israel is “the God who made heaven and earth and sea” (Apion 2.121, 190–192).<sup>8</sup>

Along these same lines, in 2 Maccabees, God is spoken of as the “creator of all things” (2 Macc 1:24). In the apocryphal book Bel and the Dragon, Daniel asserts that he worships “the living God, who created heaven and earth and has dominion over all flesh” (Bel 5, 6, 24, 25). Sirach writes of God that, “He who lives for ever created the whole universe” (18:1). Israel’s God is the “Lord God who gives life to all ally imply that other gods do not exist or simply cannot be compared with the one God. See Paul A. Rainbow, Monotheism and Christology in 1 Corinthians 8:4–6 (Oxford, D.Phil. diss., 1987), 44–46.

---

<sup>7</sup> See Hans-Joachim Kraus, “Der lebendige Gott. Ein Kapitel biblischer Theologie,” Evangelische Theologie 27 (1967): 169–199.

<sup>8</sup> See also Jdt 9:12; Jub. 2.31–32, 12.19, 16.16–27, 22.5, 26–27; 2 Macc 1:24; 7:28.

things" (Jos. Asen. 8.4), the "Creator of all things" who, in his mercy, gives "life and breath" (2 Macc 1:24, 7:23). Precisely in this life-giving activity, God is unique. Echoing the words of Isaiah, one of the Scrolls from Qumran reads, "You are the living God, you alone, and there is no other besides you" (4Q504 5.9). Similarly, for Philo, God is the source of the life of the world (Her. 206); Creator and Maker (Spec. Leg. 2.30; Somn. 1.76; Mut. 29; Decal. 61); planter of the world (Conf. 196); Father; Parent (Spec. Leg. 2.198); "Cause of all things" (Somn. 1.67);<sup>9</sup> and fountain of life (Fug. 198).<sup>10</sup>

Given this persistent emphasis on God as creator, it is not surprising that E. P. Sanders boldly states, "The doctrine of creation—that this world was made by God, is good, and is to be cared for as his—is perhaps Judaism's most important single contribution to civilization."<sup>11</sup> But Sanders—and others—have also noted that a strong doctrine of God as creator goes hand in hand with the understanding that God continues to rule over the entire world. Indeed, these themes also appear in the Old Testament and again, particularly in the latter half of Isaiah, where the understanding of God as creator cannot be separated from the view of God as sovereign over the world that he has made. Having made the world, God does not simply abandon it to its own devices. Sirach, for example, stresses God's sovereignty over the earth through the regular use of the epithets "Creator" and "Maker." God's sovereignty comes to expression in two ways: he commands the natural phenomena (39:16, 28–31; 42:21), who "never disobey his word" (16:28; 39:31; 43:5, 10), and orders the events of history. Therefore, Sirach draws parallels between God's creation of the heavenly bodies, living beings, and human beings (16:26–17:32). Similarly, God created human beings, and gave them a fixed number of days (17:20). In the same vein, the Egyptian romance Joseph and Asenath

<sup>9</sup> See Decal. 52: "The transcendent source of all that exists is God."

<sup>10</sup> "God is the most ancient of all fountains.... God alone is the cause of animation and of that life which is in union with prudence; for the matter is dead. But God is something more than life; he is, as he himself has said, the everlasting fountain of living."

<sup>11</sup> E. P. Sanders, Judaism: Practice and Belief 63 BCE to 66 CE (Philadelphia: Trinity Press, 1992), 247. For further discussion, see also Richard Bauckham, God Crucified: Monotheism and Christology in the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998), esp. 9–13; Marianne Meye Thompson, The God of the Gospel of John (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2000), 73–77, 136–40.

notes that the heavenly luminaries “never transgress [God’s] ordinances, but are doing [God’s] will to the end,” inasmuch as God created them (12.2; cf. L.A.B. 30.5, 312).

In the Dead Sea Scrolls, we read of a similar correlation between God’s creation of the world and God’s providential ordering of events and the destinies of human beings:

From the God of knowledge stems all there is and all there shall be. Before they existed he made all their plans, and when they came into being they will execute all their works in compliance with his instructions (1QS III, 15–16; cf. CD II, 7–10).

In the hymns of the community, there are numerous descriptive epithets for God, many of which testify to the inextricable link between God’s creation and sovereign rule over the world. God is called “my justice,” “foundation of my well-being,” “source of knowing,” “spring of holiness,” “peak of glory,” and “all-powerful one of eternal majesty” (1QS X, 11–13). God’s creation of the world inevitably implies God’s continued governance of it. The providential ordering of events is simply a corollary of a belief in God’s creation of all that is. Any statement regarding God’s continued providential rule in the world raises the question of how the manifestation of God’s providence was understood. Apocalyptic literature is frequently characterized as a response to the crisis created by an apparent absence of God’s providential ordering of current events in history, or at least by a puzzling turn of events in the fortunes of his people. Hence, questions regarding God’s sovereignty over the world are often couched in contexts of human suffering: why do the righteous suffer? The fact that they do so does not count as testimony against the sovereignty of God, whose justice will surely vindicate the faithful.

Israel’s peculiar character and obligation were found in its call to be holy as God is holy (Lev 20:22–26). In Leviticus, the command is set in the context of the separation between Israelites and Gentiles, which was to be expressed in part in the distinction to be made between clean and unclean foods. By the time of Jesus, there was heightened emphasis upon those practices of the law, including circumcision and the observance of Sabbath and purity laws, that distinguished Jews from their neighbors. Yet the precise ways in which these were to be kept were debated among first-century Jewish sectarians. So, for example, one finds various texts among the Dead Sea Scrolls that speak of what one may or may not do on the sabbath in order not to violate the commandment to keep the sabbath holy (e.g., CD XI, 12–16). Could one, for example, pull an ox or person out of a pit on a Sabbath? Such discussions are echoed in the gospels and later in rabbinic literature (e.g., Mark 2:23–28, 3:1–6; Luke 13:10–17; m. Yoma 8:6). While on the surface the issue has to do with how one keeps the law, ultimately the issues at stake are what it means to live as and to be the holy people of God in keeping with one's understanding of the will and identity of God.

Israel was also set apart from other nations by the presence of the temple in Jerusalem, the dwelling of God, which was to guard and reflect God's holiness. The ritual baths that have been excavated at the site of the Jerusalem temple are testimonies to the efforts to preserve the purity of the temple as the "house" of a holy God. Similarly, various texts from the first century, notably the Dead Sea Scrolls, indicate that certain individuals or groups expected judgment upon the temple, because those in charge, sometimes illegitimately so, had allowed it become a corrupt economic center rather than a place of prayer and worship of God (1QpHab VIII, 10–13; IX, 3–5; XII, 2–10). The Scrolls also underscore and link the holiness of God to the holiness and purity of the temple (11QTemple passim). Josephus faults the high priesthood for its corruption, greed, and violence (Ant. 20.181; 20.206–207), and elsewhere he criticizes Jewish revolutionaries for turning the temple into a fortress. While he continues to refer to it as "the Holy Place" (War 4.147–54), he also laments to the temple, "You were no longer the place of God" (War 5.19–20). The destruction that followed passed judgment not on the temple, but on those who had defiled the temple as the holy place of a holy God.

God's own holiness was preserved in a number of other ways too. The name of God was deemed unspeakable in everyday discourse, as the prohibition in the Dead Sea Scrolls illustrates (1QS VI, 27–VII, 2; cf. Ant. 2.275–276; War 5.438). Numerous circumlocutions, such as Lord, Power, the Name, the Blessed One, or the Almighty, were biblical terms used in order to avoid pronouncing the holy name of God. In certain written texts of Second Temple Judaism, the name of God is often rendered by a series of four dots (4Q176; 4Q462), the use of older scripts, or various other practices to avoid writing the name of God.

These substitutions not only serve to guard the holiness and transcendence of God; they also sometimes give expression to functions or traits of God in the Scriptures, and further underscore various facets of God's character and activity. Designations for God such as Almighty, Lord of Hosts, Most High, and King express belief in God's sovereignty, that the God who had created the universe also continued to govern it. That God is sovereign meant that God is a just and righteous God who would some day vindicate the righteous who had trusted in him, and thereby display his righteousness as well. God could be expected to judge justly, to vindicate the righteous and to punish the wicked, because God is the "all-seeing" God who does not overlook injustice and evil. Because God was just, God would eventually act on Israel's behalf to release it from oppression by foreign nations. God could be trusted to accomplish these ends, because God is all-powerful. God was also a merciful God. Indeed, God's actions uniquely manifested "the two measures" of justice and mercy. God metes out justice; but God also bestows mercy.

One of the prominent images of God in the Old Testament that gathers together an understanding of God's sovereignty, justice, and judgment is the image of God as king. A number of Psalms, for example, praise the God who is King and who will judge the earth (Pss 93, 96, 99). Isaiah promises that God's vindication of Israel will be revealed to all nations in a judgment that will show that the Lord is reigning on heaven and earth (Isa 24:21–23; 33:22–34). It is the task of the herald of good news to announce "Your God reigns!" (Isa 52:7; cf. Isa 59–61). Daniel envisions a kingdom given to the "saints of the Most High," a kingdom that will supplant the wicked kingdoms of the pagan nations. Throughout the Old Testament, there is both a universal and a particular manifestation of God's rule. God is king of all the nations and king of the universe, and yet in a particular way also king of Israel. The vindication of God's sovereignty, therefore, will not mean the dissolving of all boundaries of national identity, but rather will issue in God's rule on Zion, through Israel, over the entire world. The tension between God's universal and particular rules will not continue indefinitely, but will be resolved in the establishment of God's kingly rule.

In other words, God's "kingdom" has as its goal the establishment of God's rule of justice, which implies judgment upon the wicked and upon all injustice, and the vindication of the righteous. In judgment, God displays his holiness and righteousness, and vindicates his claim to be the one sole king and lord of all. In the Old Testament prophets, God's judgment sometimes falls on the nations and thus vindicates Israel (Isa 13; 34; Jer 46:10; Ezek 30; Zech 12–14); sometimes it falls on Israel itself (Isa 2:12–17; Ezek 7; Amos 5:18–20), and sometimes first on Israel and then on the nations (Joel 1:4–2:17; 2:18–3:21).<sup>12</sup> Seldom is Israel exempt from God’s words of warning and judgment. Within the literature of early Judaism one finds, on the one hand, the hope for the vindication of Israel and judgment upon the wicked who oppress it. So, for example, the Psalms of Solomon envision a day of the Lord’s judgment, on which God enacts his sovereignty over all the world, as wrath for sinners and mercy for the righteous, both living and dead (14.9). Israel’s visitation is conceived of not as destruction or punishment, but as the Lord’s discipline of his people (8.26; cf. 8.29; 13.7–10). On the other hand, there are also texts that have in view the judgment of individuals, whether Jew or Gentile, according to their good and evil deeds (e.g., Jub. 5). So also the Dead Sea Scrolls assume a vindication of the “sons of his truth” and a great judgment upon the “sons of iniquity,” who clearly include those within Israel who do not properly keep God’s law (see 1QH; 1QM XI; 11QMelch II, 13).

God is a God of judgment; but God is also a God of mercy. One of the images used to characterize God with a particular view to his mercy is that of God as Father. The picture of God as father, found in the Old Testament and in Second Temple Judaism, encompasses God’s saving and nurturing role in relationship to Israel, both as present reality and as future hope. In the pages of the Old Testament itself, God is referred to as the father of Israel (Isa 63:16, 64:8–9; Jer 3:19, 31:9).<sup>13</sup> The prophet Jeremiah, for example, speaks of the time of Israel’s restoration:

In those days the house of Judah shall join the house of Israel, and together they shall come from the land of the north to the land that I gave your ancestors for a heritage.
I thought
how I would set you among my children, and give you a pleasant land,
the most beautiful heritage of all the nations.
And I thought you would call me, My Father, and would not turn from following me. (Jer 3:18–19)

---

<sup>12</sup> For fuller discussion see Marius Reiser, Jesus and Judgment: The Eschatological Proclamation in its Jewish Context (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1997).

<sup>13</sup> Marianne Meye Thompson, The Promise of the Father (Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox, 2000), 35–48.

Similar, too, is Jeremiah's poignant description of the "return" of the exiles, both to their land and to their God:

With weeping they shall come,
and with consolations I will lead them back,
I will let them walk by brooks of water, in a straight path in which they shall not stumble;
for I have become a father to Israel, and Ephraim is my firstborn. (Jer 31:9)

As the father of Israel, God is the one who calls Israel into being, cares and provides for it, disciplines and instructs it, and gives it its inheritance (Deut 32:4–6; Jer 3:19; 31:9; Isa 61:7–10, 63:16). Israel, in turn, owes to God honor and obedience (Deut 32:6; Mal 1:6). Hence, the image of "Father" refers to God's redemptive purposes for Israel (Mal 2:10; Deut 32:18), and to God's purposes to "beget" a people who honor, love, and trust God, and who derive their identity from God's election and their sustenance from his compassion (Pss 27:10; 103:13).

In keeping with standard themes of prophetic criticism, Israel's obedience to God was to be manifested in faithful relationships with each other. For example, Malachi exhorts the people with the queries, "Have we not all one father? Has not one God created us? Why then are we faithless to one another, profaning the covenant of our ancestors?" (2:10). Because the people of Israel belong to God as Father, they also belong to each other as kin or family. They are to live faithfully both with respect to God and also with respect to each other.

Many of these same notes regarding God as Father are picked up in various texts of Second Temple Judaism, suggesting that the image of God as the father of Israel was not only an important way of understanding God's mercy and care, discipline and instruction, but also provided an image for expressing God's call in the past and his promise of redemption in the future.<sup>14</sup> So, for example, Jubilees envisions a time when God will create a new spirit for Israel, with the result that, "They will do my commandments. And I shall be a father to them and they will be sons to me. And they will all be called 'sons of the living God.' . . . I am their father in uprightness and righteousness. And I shall love them" (Jub. 1.23–25). One of the hymns found in the Dead Sea Scrolls celebrates God as a "Father to all the sons of thy truth" (1QH XVII, 35–36), thus limiting God's "fatherhood" to those who know and follow God's truth.

---

<sup>14</sup> Thompson, The Promise of the Father, 48–55.

3. God and the Gospels

As we turn to examine Jesus' convictions about God, we are faced with various matters of method in the study of the gospels, and at the outset we will sketch briefly some of our assumptions. First, I assume that the synoptic gospels provide the primary data for this study. The Gospel of John, focused so sharply on the identity of Jesus in relationship to God, contains little of the synoptic material on matters such as God's mercy, justice, righteousness, holiness, and forgiveness, themes which play an important role in the Old Testament and later Jewish thought. Nevertheless, particularly in the emphasis on God as the source of life, judge of all the wicked and righteous, and righteous sovereign of Israel, John's understanding of God squares with the portrait sketched above. Although it develops more fully certain features of biblical and Jewish thought about God, it does not sketch a decidedly different portrait of God than we find in the synoptic gospels. Therefore, John can be used as a corroborating witness to the picture of God found in the other three canonical Gospels.

While I adopt the so-called two- (or four-) source theory of gospel origins, few conclusions reached here would be changed were one to adopt another hypothesis. The traditions regarding Jesus' convictions about God remain relatively stable throughout various forms and sources, in all likelihood because so much of the picture of God in the gospels reflects core convictions found in the Old Testament and in early Judaism. As noted earlier, Jesus' innovation did not lie in forging new ideas about God, but in emphasizing certain convictions and bringing them to bear on his proclamation of God's kingdom and his call to God's people.

Second, along with a number of other scholars who take part in the quest for the historical Jesus, I deem the "criterion of dissimilarity" or "discontinuity" to be of limited value for the purposes of understanding Jesus in context. In the present instance, this criterion would in fact prove useful in only a few respects. For example, it is a commonplace in the Old Testament, Judaism, and in early Christian literature to say that God is king. On the basis of the criterion of dissimilarity, then, the conviction of God's future sovereign rule could scarcely be deemed authentic. Yet the thesis that Jesus proclaimed the kingdom of God—an idea that rests on the underlying conviction that God is king and will one day rule as king—is arguably one of the best attested aspects of Jesus’ proclamation. However, it must also be noted that the criterion was intended to have a primarily positive function in establishing as unassailable certain aspects of Jesus’ teaching and deeds. With respect to Jesus’ convictions regarding God, the criterion might be deemed to be useful in testifying to the likelihood that Jesus addressed God as abba.<sup>15</sup> But while the criterion of dissimilarity has been invoked to bolster the authenticity of Jesus’ address to God in this way, the argument can be carried through successfully. For as we shall see, the address to God as Father is not unprecedented, and Jesus seems more likely to be calling to mind a familiar theme linked with God’s restoration of the people of Israel than to be introducing a novel idea about God. Furthermore, the image of God as Father becomes highly significant in the rest of the New Testament outside the gospels.

Finally, Jesus’ understanding of God cannot simply be limited to his teaching. The evidence provided by the shape of his life and praxis, such as his prayer, exorcisms, table fellowship, and healing, also illuminate Jesus’ convictions about God and how God’s purposes were to be lived out among his people. Hence, I use the “convictions” rather than “beliefs,” to steer clear of the notion that we are interested in uncovering Jesus’ “ideas.” To speak of Jesus’ convictions suggests that the entire shape of Jesus’ life and career bears testimony to his understanding of Israel’s God and also to his own identity and vocation with respect to that God.

4. Jesus and God: The Testimony of the Gospels

At the outset we do well to note that Jesus’ proclamation is characterized by its tenacious theocentricity. The Shema, with its call to love God with all one’s heart, soul, strength, and mind, was taken by Jesus as the heart of the Torah and the cornerstone of human life before God (Mark 12:28–34; Luke 10:25–37). Jesus exhorted his followers to seek the kingdom of God before all else (Matt 6:33; Luke 12:31), to commit themselves to God and not to riches (Luke 12:21). Echoing the views of Judas the Galilean that one cannot submit both to human masters and to God, Jesus warned his listeners that no one can serve two masters (Matt 6:24; Luke 16:13). He therefore called for single-minded devotion to God, promising that those who were “pure of heart” would see God. To the young man who called him “Good Teacher,” Jesus responded, “No one is good but God alone,” making God the measure of all truth and goodness (Mark 10:18). Jesus’ call to love and obey God above all else demonstrates, as one scholar has put it, that Jesus’ “concentration on God and his kingdom is what was constitutive of Jesus.”<sup>16</sup> In keeping with the emphases in the teaching of Jesus, the evangelists portray Jesus’ rebuffing the temptations of Satan with words that point to his own dependence upon and wholehearted commitment to the one God: “Worship the Lord your God, and serve only him” (Matt 4:10; Luke 4:8). The impression given by the gospels is that Jesus called others to live as he himself lived: in wholehearted obedience to God. Moreover, in doing so, he articulated his own understanding of Israel’s defining confession and the heart of the Torah.

---

<sup>15</sup> For a discussion of Jeremias’ arguments, as well as the Jewish data at this point, see Thompson, The Promise of the Father, 21–34.

As I noted above, certain attributes or functions ascribed to God in both the Old Testament and Judaism were deemed distinctive and defining of God’s identity. In particular, the identity of God as creator and as sovereign over the world and its affairs stand out. While the Old Testament and Jewish sources refer often to God as Creator—as, indeed, do various portions of the New Testament (cf. John 1:1–3; Col 1:15–17; Heb 1)—the theme plays little explicit role in the synoptic gospels’ presentation of the teaching of Jesus. The lack of this topos in the gospels indicates that for Jesus and his contemporaries, this aspect of God’s work was not in question. The gospels are not apologetic works directed to pagans, nor do they contain the sort of polemic against the existence of other gods that we find, for example, in the prophets and in some of Paul’s letters. It is implicitly assumed rather than explicitly argued that God created the world and that God continues to care for it. Yet, for Jesus, God’s continued care over the world becomes the basis for the exhortation to trust in God’s provision and goodness. So, for example, it is God who sends the rain and sun alike (Matt 5:45), who clothes the birds of the air and the grass of the field (Matt 6:26–30; Luke 12:24–28), and knows when a sparrow falls (Matt 10:29–31; Luke 12:6–7). Indeed, as Creator, God has the power of life and death (Luke 12:4–5), and as sovereign, God can demand an account of human beings at any time (Luke 12:19–20). In these sayings of Jesus, one finds the inextricable link between God as the one who created the world and as the one who remains sovereign over it.

---

<sup>16</sup> Leander Keck, A Future for the Historical Jesus: The Place of Jesus in Preaching and Theology (Nashville: Abingdon, 1971), 213.

As I have just noted, the teachings of Jesus do not manifest the attack on idolatry found in the Old Testament and some Jewish apologetic texts, as well as in various New Testament texts (Acts 15:20, 17:16; Rom 1–2; 1 Cor 8:6, 12:2; 2 Cor 6:16). Hence, we do not find in the teachings of Jesus any echoes of the biblical attacks on worship of “dead idols” rather than “the living God.” Nevertheless, Jesus’ understanding of God as the living one does undergird his conviction about the resurrection of the dead, a conviction shared widely in Second Temple Judaism.<sup>17</sup> When challenged by the Sadducees regarding the possibility of future resurrection with the deliberately ludicrous scenario of a woman married to seven different husbands, Jesus defends the resurrection with the statement that “God is the God of the living” (Mark 12:27 pars).

Jesus believed God to be a holy God. Indeed, the opening petition of the so-called Lord’s Prayer,—“May your name be sanctified”—reflects the opening petition of the Jewish Kaddish prayer, “Magnified and sanctified be his great name.” It was to be the prayer of every Israelite, and of Jesus’ followers, that God would be honored and exalted in his holiness. The formulation of this petition uses one of the various circumlocutions for the name of God, which was deemed unspeakable in everyday discourse. Jesus’ references to “the kingdom of God” or “kingdom of heaven” may reflect first-century reluctance to utter the name of God.

The temple was a tangible symbol of the holiness of God and, as such, it was to be guarded as holy. Regulations regarding ablutions prior to entry into the temple were intended to prevent impurity from contaminating the purity of God’s temple. Like his contemporaries, Jesus assumed that the temple was to be kept holy as the house of God. However we are to interpret the “temple action” of driving out the money changers and sellers, whether as “cleansing,” a portent of the coming judgment, or both, his prophetic warnings of the temple’s destruction reflect the belief that as the house of God the temple ought to be a holy place. Judgment would fall precisely because the temple had been defiled by those who had made it a “den of thieves” (Mark 11:17; Matt 21:13; Luke 19:46). According to Josephus, the Essenes refused to take oaths (War 2.135). Jesus likewise cautioned against swearing oaths by heaven, earth, or Jerusalem, on the grounds that these represented respectively the throne, the footstool, and the city of the King. Heaven, earth, Jerusalem, and temple encompass the entire domain of God and, as God’s, these domains were holy. (Matt 5:34–35). To swear by that which was holy was to defile it. Similarly, Jesus was repeatedly said to drive out “unclean spirits” and to “cleanse” lepers of their impurity. These actions demonstrate Jesus’ understanding that God, in his merciful sovereignty, intended to bring about the eschatological purity of Israel, the people of a holy God.

---

<sup>17</sup> See Dan 12:2–3, 13; 2 Macc 7:9, 14, 21–23, 28–36; 12:44; 1 En 51.1–5, 62.13–15; 103.4; 4 Ezra 7.28–32; 2 Bar. 50.2–4; 4Q521 2 II, 1–13; 7; 5 II 1–7; 1 QH XIX, 10–14; L.A.B. 3.10, 19.12–13; Josephus, Apion 2.217–218; m. Sanh. 10:1; m. Sotah 9:15.

But strict preservation of ritual purity was not the animating vision behind Jesus’ teaching and practice, and this is due ultimately to his understanding of God and God’s will for Israel. When, for example, proper interpretation of the law and obedience to it were disputed, Jesus insisted that mercy and compassion provided the norms for how the law should be lived out (Luke 10:25–28; Luke 6:32–36 par. Matt 5:43–48; Matt 9:9–13, 12:1–8; 18:23–35; 25:31–46). According to Matthew, Jesus asserts that the “greatest commandment in the law” is to love God, and a second weighty commandment is to love one’s neighbor. “On these commandments depend all the law and the law and the prophets” (Matt 22:40). By contrast, Sipra Lev. 195 (on 19:2) asserts that “most of the principles of the Torah” depend upon the contents of the command, “You shall be holy, for I the Lord your God am holy.” It is important to note here that Matthew does not portray Jesus as contrasting love of God with obedience to the law; rather, the heart of the law is precisely to be found in wholehearted obedience to God. Hence, like the prophets, Jesus emphasized the point that without mercy and compassion, zealous devotion to ritual purity or cultic observance was fruitless, or worse (Matt 23:23).

In defending his disciples’ action of plucking grain to eat on the Sabbath day, Jesus contended that “the Sabbath was made for human beings.” Therefore, their pressing needs could be met on the Sabbath.

Similarly, just as one might be allowed to pull an ox out of a well on the Sabbath day—a point that the Dead Sea Scrolls, for example, dispute (CD XI, 14)—one could heal a man's withered hand (Matt 12:9–13). And if one might lead an animal to give it water on the Sabbath, so might one heal on the Sabbath day a woman who had suffered many years (Luke 13:11–15). Whereas some may have eaten only with those they knew to be also strict in their observance of laws of purity and tithing, Jesus ate at table with tax collectors and the “lost sheep of the house of Israel.” Jesus' views undoubtedly rested on his convictions that the sovereign rule of God, God's “kingship,” entailed the concrete expression of God's mercy and compassion. Here Jesus echoes the prophetic critique against reliance on ritual and sacrifice, such as we read in many well-known passages from the Old Testament prophetic tradition (Isa 58:6–7; Jer 7:3–4; Amos 5:21–24; Mic 6:8). The traditions of the gospels indicate that Jesus assumed that God desired justice, mercy, and love, inasmuch as God is a just, merciful, and loving God. Jesus articulates the correlation between God's character and human conduct when he explicates his command to love one's enemies, “so that you may be children of your Father in heaven; for he makes his sun rise on the evil and on the good, and sends rain on the righteous and on the unrighteous” (Matt 5:44–48; Luke 6:32–36).

God's mercy also lay at the heart of Jesus' understanding of his mission as the one who proclaimed and enacted the kingdom of God. Jesus proclaimed that God's sovereignty and justice on earth would be manifested in healing, the release of captives, and the deliverance of the oppressed. His extensive healing ministry attests to his belief that God's sovereignty was active through him to bring wholeness to people. In the synoptic gospels, the exorcisms are described as carried out by the power of the Spirit of God to expel the various spiritual and demonic powers that victimized people's lives (Matt 12:28; Luke 11:20). So also Jesus likened his table fellowship to the healing work of a physician who had come to make people well, to restore them to wholeness (Mark 2:17). The captives to whom Jesus promised redemption included a woman who had been “bound by Satan” for thirteen years, as well as Zacchaeus, a rich tax collector who had been enslaved to the power of mammon (Luke 13:10–17; 19:1–10). Whenever such actions of deliverance appeared to violate the laws that protected the sanctity of the Sabbath or that guarded Israel's purity, Jesus appealed to the fundamental principle that God's mercy took precedence over other matters of observing the law. Even here, Jesus can scarcely be said to be an innovator in his understanding of God: the prophets before him had similarly demanded justice, mercy, and the humility as the heart of the worship and obedience to God.

Because God's sovereign rule was demonstrated through mercy and compassion, God's sovereignty would also be manifested in judgment on injustice and unrighteousness. These are often portrayed in parable and metaphor in terms of separation. The parables of the wheat and the weeds, the great net, and the sheep and the goats are all parables in which the righteous and wicked are separated, and these are parables of judgment (Matt 13:24–30, 47–50; 25:31–48). While there are numerous passages in both the Old Testament and Jewish literature that foresee judgment upon the enemies of Israel, many of the images of judgment in the gospels point to a judgment upon Israel. There will be a division between the wicked and righteous within Israel, rather than between Israel and its neighbors. Jesus pronounced judgment upon various cities and villages for their failure to respond to his teaching (Matt 11:21–24), and was particularly harsh in his condemnation of the leaders of the people and of the Pharisees for their failures to serve as faithful shepherds of the flock (Matt 23; Luke 11:38–52). When God's justice was established, it would bring with it a number of surprises: those who found acceptance in God's sight were not those who in terms of commonly shared notions of righteousness ought to have merited favor before God, such as the zealous Pharisee, but those, such as the tax collector, who approached God with a humble, open posture, acknowledging their sin and casting themselves on God's mercy (18:9–14). The sovereign and all-powerful God did not seek and favor the powerful, but the poor in spirit, the humble, the obedient, the just, and the merciful.

God's justice was thus expressed not in the vindication of the "righteous," but in the vindication of the humble, the merciful, the unrighteous. In the parable of the laborers in the vineyard (Matt 20:1–15), the owner of the vineyard shows unexpected generosity to those who did not deserve it. But if God chose to be merciful, who could complain? What is particularly striking in this parable is that God's sovereignty manifests itself first and foremost as graciousness, as mercy. Here we do not have an arbitrary capriciousness—although one can well imagine that those who were not paid so generously might have thought so! Rather, God's sovereign decision to do what he wants "with that which belongs to him" (Matt 20:15) takes the form of an abundant and generous mercy.

Within this framework, we may also understand some of the other enigmatic sayings of Jesus. For example, Jesus gives thanks to God because in his “gracious will” he had “hidden these things from the wise and the intelligent and...revealed them to infants” (Matt 11:25–26). Such a prayer seems to thank God for hiding truth from some; but it is the “gracious will” of God that those who might not otherwise have access to these hidden things are now the beneficiaries of God’s generosity. Still, God remains sovereign, and that conviction gives a hard edge to Jesus’ sayings, including this one about God’s “gracious will.” A similar passage is quoted from Isa 6:9–10 in all four gospels: here, Jesus, like Isaiah, preaches to a people who are apparently blind and deaf to the presence of the kingdom of God in the work of Jesus (Mark 4:10–12; Matt 13:13–15; Luke 8:10; cf. John 12:40). The saying in the original context in Isaiah, as well as its application in the gospels, is difficult because it points to that blindness and deafness as the judgment of God. And yet Jesus, like Isaiah, does not imagine that the judgment which issues in the failure to see and hear need be permanent; God can also open the eyes and ears of his people. For God was surely a merciful God.

Indeed, God’s mercy was also made known in forgiving the sins and hearing the prayers of his people. Both Luke and John particularly stress that Jesus was a person of prayer, but numerous traditions in the gospels point to Jesus’ sense of dependence upon God and God’s kindness and goodness to his people. Jesus promises that God can be trusted to hear the prayers of his people, encouraging them to make their petitions known with boldness and persistence (Matt 7:7–11; Luke 11:5–8; 18:1–7). He himself is pictured as calling upon God in times of need, including in face of approaching death (Mark 14:36), and entrusting himself into God’s hands at the hour of his death (Luke 23:34, 46). Again, the gospels portray Jesus as living out the faith and trust to which he called his followers.

The exhortation to trust in God is particularly grounded in Jesus’ understanding of God as Father. In all likelihood, Jesus used the Aramaic term abba (“father”), but he may also have used various other forms such as the Hebrew abinu (“Our father”). Although the authenticity of Jesus’ address to God as abba has been challenged, there are good grounds for arguing that it originated with Jesus himself. A striking fact is that both Mark and Paul repeat the Aramaic term abba in documents (Mark, Galatians, Romans) which were most likely intended to be read by those whose native tongue was not Aramaic, suggesting an unusual respect for the term. While both the genesis and preservation of this address have been attributed to its origin in the Palestinian Aramaic-speaking churches, there is no reason to rule out the fact that Jesus himself used this form of address and taught his disciples to do so as well. The address of God as Father is found in multiple forms and sources of the gospel tradition, and stands in continuity both with the Old Testament and with Second Temple Judaism, as well as with the use and importance of the term in the early church. The recurrence of both “my father” and “our father” in prayer, parable, and sayings of the Jesus tradition, shows that it played a larger role in the Gospel traditions than in either the Old Testament or the literature of Second Temple Judaism. Taken together, these arguments suggest that the prominence of “father” in the gospels is best understood as reflecting Jesus’ own practice of addressing God.

In speaking of God as Father, Jesus appropriates a prophetic image for God to announce to Israel that the time for its renewal and restoration was at hand. Jeremiah, for example, linked the time of Israel’s restoration with its calling upon God as “My Father” (3:18–19; 31:9). In Jesus’ address to and portrayal of God as Father, he invoked such biblical imagery to signal that God was calling Israel to offer its allegiance, honor, and love to God. In calling upon people to return to God as their Father, much as Jeremiah did, Jesus’ call manifested the same single-mindedness that we have seen elsewhere. He exhorted his followers, “Call no one your father on earth, for you have one Father—the one in heaven” (Matt 23:9). No other figure of authority properly merited the designation of Father; indeed, it was God who manifested the care and provision that one expected of human fathers. Hence, God saw and tended to the needs of his people and could be trusted to provide bread for his children (Matt 6:25–33; 7:7–11).

If Jesus’ followers were to call upon God as Father, then they were also to regard each other as kin, as brothers and sisters (Mark 3:34; Matt 18:15–18). They were to mirror the compassion of their heavenly Father, who provided food and clothing, by themselves feeding the hungry and clothing the naked (Matt 25:31–46). They were to forgive each other as they had been forgiven (Matt 6:12; 18:21–22). Jesus’ announcement that God was merciful was not news to Israel. But Jesus was now calling those who had experienced the mercy of God to make that the motivation and measure of their action. Indeed, perhaps Jesus' most famous parable, the so-called "parable of the prodigal son," pictures a compassionate father who welcomes his wandering younger son home, and encourages his older son to welcome his brother with equal joy and forgiveness. Those who are children of the father are siblings to each other, and they are to treat each other with the same kind of generosity and forgiveness that they have received from their father.

In thinking of God as Father, a number of questions arise which have to do with the distinctiveness of Jesus' relationship to God as Father. These questions have implications not only for Jesus' understanding of God, but also for his understanding of his own role and identity. As such, these questions begin to take us into other areas of exploration. Nevertheless, the fact that Jesus' understanding of God has implications for his understanding of his mission and identity, shows that these topics are inextricably linked. Here we shall briefly sketch some key features of Jesus' designation of God as "Father," without fully exploring the possible ramifications for trying to get at Jesus' own aims and self-consciousness.

The work of Joachim Jeremias has been seminal in studies of God's fatherhood. Jeremias argued that "the complete novelty and uniqueness of Abba as an address to God in the prayers of Jesus shows that it expresses the heart of Jesus' relationship to God."<sup>18</sup> Jeremias thus argued (1) that this address of God as Abba was unique; and (2) that this unique form of address disclosed Jesus' own understanding of his relationship to God. In these conclusions he has been followed by numerous New Testament scholars. But while Jeremias' work has been highly influential, it has also often misinterpreted as holding that Jesus taught a unique—and new—understanding of God as near, loving, and accessible. No longer was God a remote and distant king; now God was an accessible and loving Father. But Jeremias did not argue that Jesus' view of God was novel or unique; rather, he argued that Jesus addressed God in a distinctive way because his experience of God was distinctive, even unique. Moreover, the uniqueness of Jesus' view was dependent upon his conviction of the nearness of

---

<sup>18</sup> New Testament Theology: The Proclamation of Jesus (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1971), 67.

God's kingdom. That is to say, there was an explicitly "eschatological" dimension to Jesus' use of "Father" for God. This squares with those Old Testament passages that foresee the restoration of Israel as Israel's return to trusting in God as Father. Jesus' teaching about God as Father undoubtedly reflected the way in which he perceived God's fatherly care for Israel, but it also contained within it the promise that God would now welcome Israel as a father welcomes his children home.

The gospels consistently maintain a distinction between Jesus' address to God as "my father" and his references, when speaking to his disciples, to God as "your father." "Our Father" occurs only in the address of the Lord's Prayer, when Jesus instructs his disciples how they are to pray. The distinction likely rests on the two-pronged characterization, found in the Old Testament, of the King of Israel as a son of God and the Israelites as children of God. We have already examined some of those passages in the Scriptures where Israel is referred to as God's "son" and the Israelites are to respond to God as Father. There are also passages, notably Ps 2:7 and 2 Sam 7:12-14, which speak of the relationship between God and the king of Israel as the relationship of father and son. This relationship marks the king out in his role of representing Israel to God and, conversely, God to Israel. We note in the gospels and other writings of the New Testament the implicit linkage between the designations of Jesus as "son of God" and "Messiah" (Matt 16:16; Mark 1:1; John 20:31; Rom 1:1-6). This conjunction of "son of God" and "Messiah" is probably a development of the biblical designation of the king of Israel as son of God. While "King"—and later, "Messiah"—and "Son" cannot simply be collapsed into each other, the traditions of the gospels show that Jesus referred to God as his own father, and also as the father of his disciples, and that he was called "Messiah." The distinction between Jesus' filial relationship to God, and the relationship of his own disciples to God, becomes central in the Gospel of John and, eventually, in early Christian reflection upon both the identity of Jesus and of God.

JESUS AND THE SABBATH

SVEN-OLAV BACK

1. Introduction

Both in the Old Testament and in ancient Jewish literature the Sabbath is seen as a great gift of God, filled with divine blessing. At the same time, the Sabbath commandment stands out as a fundamental obligation. As a “sign” (אֹת) of the covenant between God and Israel, the Sabbath was, and still is, one of the major Jewish symbols. Keeping the commandment faithfully—and hence doing no “work” (מְלָאכָה) whatsoever on the holy day—indicates one’s fidelity towards the covenant, but disregarding the Sabbath is a sure indication of disloyalty.

The Old Testament provides some examples of what counts as “work,”<sup>1</sup> but there is no exhaustive definition. Hence, it is only natural that different Jewish groups tried to find out more precisely what might have been meant by מְלָאכָה. There was a great deal at stake. It comes as no surprise, however, that a complete consensus was not achieved. It is true that some basic rules were generally accepted, but we also hear complaints about mistaken views regarding the Sabbath commandment. Thus, for example, the Damascus Document claims that even “all Israel” has gone astray (תַּעֲרָה) regarding the holy Sabbaths of God.<sup>2</sup>

If the New Testament Gospels may be trusted, Jesus of Nazareth was one of those who attracted criticism and disapproval on account of his Sabbath behaviour. For one thing, he performed acts of healing on the Sabbath. The texts describe how people suffering from chronic diseases are restored to health by Jesus: a man with a withered hand (Mark 3:1–6; Matt 12:9–14; Luke 6:6–11), a crippled woman (Luke 13:10–17), a man suffering from dropsy (Luke 14:1–6), a paralysed man (John 5:2–9, cf. vv. 15–16; 7:19–24), and a man born blind (John 9:1–7). In addition, Jesus is reported to have authorised his disciples' plucking of ears of grain—i.e., “work”—on the Sabbath (Mark 2:23–38; Matt 12:1–8; Luke 6:1–5).

---

<sup>1</sup> Ploughing and reaping (Exod 34:21), treading winepresses (Neh 13:15), cooking (Exod 16:5, 23), lightning of fire (Exod 35:2), gathering wood (Num 15:32–36), buying and selling (Neh 10:32; 13:15–22), carrying loads through the city gates or out of the houses (Jer 17:19–27), leaving one’s place (מִקוֹם) (Exod 16:29), doing one’s pleasure, one’s ways, and—mysteriously—“speaking a word” (dabber dābār, Isa 58:13).

<sup>2</sup> CD III, 12b–16a.

What shall we make of these texts? Are they simply to be understood as products of the primitive Church and the evangelists, reflecting the disputes of the Church and the opinions of the early Christian writers? Or can we use them to find historically reliable information about Jesus? If so, how should we understand the position of Jesus with regard to the Sabbath?

In Part 5 of this article, I will provide an outline of a reasonable answer to the last question. I start, however, with an overview of the scholarly discussion on the subject “Jesus and the Sabbath” (2). This will show the need for the parts that follow: a short description of some early Jewish positions with regard to the Sabbath—with an emphasis on matters of halakhah and practice (3)—and an assessment of the general historicity of the Sabbath stories of the synoptic Gospels (4).

2. The Scholarly Discussion: a Sketch

Thirty years ago, F. Neiryneck opened a survey of the scholarly discussion of our subject by giving an account of E. Lohse's investigations.<sup>3</sup> This remains a good starting point as there are several points in Lohse's articles that have been broadly accepted in subsequent studies: (a) First, Jesus was indeed involved in conflicts that were triggered by his acts of healing on the Sabbath. This is true even if the Sabbath stories in the Gospels to a large extent reflect debates between the primitive Church and “the Synagogue.”<sup>4</sup> (b) Secondly, there are three authentic Sabbath sayings embedded in the polemical material of the Church, viz. Mark 2:27, Mark 3:4, and Matt 12:11–12a par Luke 14:5.<sup>5</sup> (c) Thirdly, Mark 2:27 is regarded as of crucial importance when it comes to finding out the Jesuanic attitude to the Sabbath.<sup>6</sup> A fourth element in Lohse's overall view, viz. that the story about the cornfield incident (Mark 2:23–28) is a fabrication by the earliest Church,<sup>7</sup> is also quite common among scholars, but it has not won the same amount of approval as the three other points.

<sup>3</sup> Frans Neiryneck, “Jesus and the Sabbath: Some Observations on Mark 2.27”, in Jacques Dupont, ed., Jésus aux origines de la christologie, BETL 50 (Leuven: Leuven University Press, Gembloux: Éditions J. Duculot, 1975) 228–231; Eduard Lohse, “Jesu Worte über den Sabbat”, in Walther Eltester, ed., Judentum, Urchristentum, Kirche: Festschrift J. Jeremias, BZNW 26 (Berlin: Alfred Töpelmann, 1960), 79–89; idem, “σάββατον κτλ.”, ThWNT VII, 21–31. Cf. idem, Grundriß der neutestamentlichen Theologie, 3rd ed. (Stuttgart/Berlin/Köln/Mainz: Kohlhammer, 1984), 32.

<sup>4</sup> Lohse, “Worte”, 79–84; “σάββατον”, 22 n. 172.

As far as Jesus' attitude to the Sabbath is concerned, Lohse's interpretation is this: the love commandment is the highest commandment; hence, human beings and human needs must not be subjected to "the Jewish Sabbath casuistry." Jesus thus turns against the scribal halakhah. However, there is also a sense in which Jesus turns against the written commandment of the Torah as well: by giving a higher value to human beings and their needs, Jesus denies the absolute binding force ("Allverbindlichkeit") of the Sabbath commandment.<sup>8</sup>

In all essentials, H. W. Dione reaches the same conclusions as Lohse. The authentic sayings (those identified by Lohse) show that Jesus acted and spoke out against Jewish Sabbath regulations. For him, human beings were more important than Sabbath rules. He refused to interpret the Law in a literal manner and subordinated it to humans. By his critical attitude, Jesus shook one of the foundations of Judaism.<sup>9</sup>

Joachim Jeremias differs from Lohse in sharply distinguishing between Jesus' attitude to the written Torah and his attitude towards later halakhah. He claims that Jesus decidedly rejected the halakhic tradition of the Pharisees. The Sabbath rules, in particular, were the objects of Jesus' aversion. The maxim in Mark 2:27 states, on one hand, that the Sabbath is a divine gift to people; on the other hand, it attacks the Sabbath halakhah, "this meticulous casuistic system, which categorized all the actions which were forbidden on the Sabbath." Jesus also transgressed the Sabbath halakhah in action, particularly

<sup>5</sup> Lohse, "Worte", 84; Grundriß, 32.

<sup>6</sup> Idem, "Worte", 85, 89; "σάββατον", 25; Grundriß, 32. Cf. Neiryneck, "Jesus", 31: "It is on [Mark 2:27] that the exegetical literature on 'Jesus and the Sabbath' is most concentrated." For some more references to typical statements regarding Mark 2:27 as a key to the proper understanding of Jesus attitude to the Sabbath, see Sven-Olav Back, Jesus of Nazareth and the Sabbath Commandment (Åbo: Åbo Akademi University Press, 1995), 96.

<sup>7</sup> Lohse, "Worte", 82; "σάββατον", 22.

<sup>8</sup> Idem, "Worte", 85, 89; "σάββατον", 25; Grundriß, 32.

<sup>9</sup> H. W. Dione, Jésus et le Sabbat: contribution à la recherche historique sur Jésus de Nazareth (unpublished diss.; Strasbourg, 1989), 316–324.

through acts of healing. This he justified by referring to the love commandment (Mark 3:4).<sup>10</sup>

Willy Rordorf, wishing to add “a couple of complementary points of view” to Lohse’s interpretation,<sup>11</sup> sees Jesus as not only harshly attacking the “casuistic hair-splitting” of the Pharisees, but also as setting aside the Sabbath commandment itself. Through the statement of principle in Mark 2:27, Jesus destroyed the entire Sabbath theology of post-exilic Judaism. Jesus’ actions on the Sabbath were deliberate provocations. But Jesus did not only aim at destruction and provocation; his Sabbath actions were first and foremost “veiled proclamations” of his messiahship.<sup>12</sup>

Jürgen Roloff distances himself from an interpretation that would depict Jesus as voicing a “humanitarian” protest against the “legalism” of the Pharisees. Rather, he stresses—in a way that is reminiscent of Rordorf’s view—the Christological implications of Jesus’ words and actions. In the final analysis, Jesus’ stance in the Sabbath conflicts amounts to a veiled proclamation of his ἐξουσία.<sup>13</sup>

According to Stephen Westerholm, Jesus had no intention of abolishing the Sabbath or bringing in a new law to replace it. Nor did he systematically reject the Sabbath halakhah of the Pharisees. He did oppose it at times, but his opposition was not based on his having made a careful distinction between biblical law and extra-biblical rules. Nor is it sufficient to say that Jesus was simply more lenient than the Pharisees, and thus showed greater concern for human needs. Rather, a deep difference in the understanding of God’s will was at stake in the Sabbath conflicts.<sup>14</sup> The Pharisees treated the rules in the Torah as statutes, the very wording of which was binding.<sup>15</sup> In contrast, for Jesus it was important that one penetrated behind the wording of the Torah to the divine purpose behind this wording. In

<sup>10</sup> Joachim Jeremias, Neutestamentliche Theologie I: Die Verkündigung Jesu, 3rd ed. (Gütersloh: Gütersloher Verlagshaus Mohn, 1979), 198–202 (201).

<sup>11</sup> Willy Rordorf, Der Sonntag: Geschichte des Ruhe- und Gottesdiensttages im ältesten Christentum, AThANT 43 (Zürich: Zwingli Verlag, 1962), 58.

<sup>12</sup> Ibid., 55–71.

<sup>13</sup> Jürgen Roloff, Das Kerygma und der irdische Jesus: historische Motive in den Jesus-Erzählungen der Evangelien (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1970), 52–71.

<sup>14</sup> Stephen Westerholm, Jesus and Scribal Authority (Lund: Gleerups, 1978), 102–103.

<sup>15</sup> Ibid., 12–52.

Jesus' view, the will of God was fulfilled by a heart in tune with God's purpose, not by mere compliance with statutes.<sup>16</sup>

Berndt Schaller, like did Roloff and to some extent Westerholm, dissociates himself from the view that Jesus would have held "love," or "a radical ethos," or "humanity" in greater esteem than "cultic piety" and the Sabbath commandment.<sup>17</sup> Instead, following a suggestion by Christian Dietzfelbinger, Schaller understands Jesus' healings on the Sabbath in the context of his proclamation of the kingdom of God. The acts of healing were a "commentary" on the kingdom proclamation. "Der Sabbat ist in dieser Sicht gerade der Tag, an dem Jesus die heilende Herrschaft Gottes über den Menschen in der Tat verkündet."<sup>18</sup>

Gerd Theissen and Annette Merz detect three motifs behind Jesus' Sabbath behaviour. First, there is an ethical motif, suggesting that helping people overrides the Sabbath commandment (and other commandments as well). Secondly, there is an eschatological motif, discernible for instance in the saying which interprets an act of healing as a liberation from the bond of Satan (Luke 13:16). Thirdly, there is a messianic motif: the authority of Jesus is comparable to that of David (Mark 2:25–26). These different motifs fit well together: God's eschatological saving acts mean "help" to suffering people, and thus have an ethical quality; and this "ethical will of God," overriding the common Sabbath practice, is connected to charismatic (messianic) authority.<sup>19</sup>

The above-mentioned scholars assume that Jesus, through his Sabbath healings, really transgressed the Sabbath halakhah of the Pharisees (or other adversaries under the influence of the Pharisees).

<sup>16</sup> Westerholm, Jesus, 53–125, esp. 98–103.

<sup>17</sup> Berndt Schaller, Jesus und der Sabbat, Franz-Delitzsch-Vorlesung 1992 (Münster: Institutum Judaicum Delitzschianum, 1994), 25.

<sup>18</sup> Ibid., 26–27, at 27. Cf. Christian Dietzfelbinger, "Vom Sinn der Sabbatheilungen Jesu," EvTh 38 (1978): 294–298. T. W. Manson long ago emphasized Jesus' proclamation of the kingdom of God as the key to a proper understanding of Jesus' actions on the Sabbath: "Jesus did not break through the Sabbath rules lightly or unadvisedly, but because 'the King's business required haste'; because the service of the Kingdom of God and the warfare against the kingdom of Satan must go on day in and day out; because the business on which God had sent Him was the most important business in the world," The Sayings of Jesus, repr. (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1979), 190.

<sup>19</sup> Gerd Theissen and Annette Merz, Der historische Jesus: ein Lehrbuch, 2nd ed. (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1997), 329.

Some of them, referring to Mark 2:23–24, also hold that Jesus authorised the “reaping” by some disciples in the cornfield.

These views, however, are challenged by several scholars, who maintain that Jesus was either totally law-abiding (e.g., David Flusser)<sup>20</sup> or, at least, was involved in no conflicts as far as the Sabbath was concerned (e.g., E. P. Sanders). Sanders claims, “There was no substantial conflict between Jesus and the Pharisees with regard to Sabbath, food, and purity laws.”<sup>21</sup> Regarding the Sabbath, Sanders does not in fact allow for any conflicts at all between Jesus and Pharisees. The reasons for this position are primarily the following: (a) The synoptic Sabbath stories do not portray any transgression of the Sabbath commandment on the part of Jesus. It is the disciples, rather than Jesus, who are rebuked for plucking ears of grain in the cornfield (Mark 2:23–24).<sup>22</sup> Further, “The stories of healing on the Sabbath reveal no instance in which Jesus transgressed the Sabbath law.”<sup>23</sup> Hence, the Sabbath acts of healing, as depicted by the Gospels, would have met no objections. Therefore, the stories do not seem credible.<sup>24</sup> (b) The Sabbath stories reflect later disputes about the Sabbath commandment—partially disputes among Christians and partially disputes with non-Christian Jews. These disputes are, firstly, the reason why the Sabbath stories have such a prominent position in the Gospel tradition. Secondly, they have given rise to an early Christian “production” of Sabbath stories.<sup>25</sup>

Lutz Doering contends, against Sanders and others, that Jesus did heal sick people on the Sabbath, and that he thereby indeed transgressed the Sabbath commandment as it was understood by contemporary interpretations, including the Pharisaic one.<sup>26</sup> He accepted and

---

<sup>20</sup> David Flusser, Jesus in Selbstzeugnissen und Bilddokumenten (Reinbek bei Hamburg: Rowohlt, 1968), 44–49.

<sup>21</sup> Ed P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (London: SCM, 1985), 265. See also 264, 291–292, 318.

<sup>22</sup> Ibid., 266, 292.

<sup>23</sup> Ibid., 266. See also the discussion in Sanders, Jewish Law from Jesus to the Mishnah: Five Studies (London: SCM; Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1990), 19–23.

<sup>24</sup> Cf. Jewish Law, 1: “In Jesus and Judaism I brushed aside the disputes about sabbath, purity and food as being probably inauthentic, and I have not changed my mind.”

<sup>25</sup> Idem, Jesus, 264, 266, 292. See also idem, The Historical Figure of Jesus (London: SCM, 1993), 214–215, 217, 223.

<sup>26</sup> Lutz Doering, Sabbat: Sabbathalacha und -praxis im antiken Judentum und Urchristentum, TSAJ 78 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1999), 445–450, 477.

honoured the Sabbath as an institution (it was made for the sake of man, Mark 2:27), but showed no particular interest in matters of the halakhic sphere—except for the principle that saving a human life (פְּקוּחַ נַפְשׁ in later Rabbinic terminology) “overrides” the Sabbath. In Mark 3:4, Jesus alludes to this halakhic principle. However, he gives it a broad interpretation. He goes beyond the usual limits by applying the principle even to chronic illness: healing sick people is indeed ψυχήν σώσαι.<sup>27</sup>

Applying the פְּקוּחַ נַפְשׁ-principle—especially in this liberal way—means valuing human beings higher than the Sabbath. Now, this is exactly the point of Mark 2:27. With this saying, which implicitly refers to Gen 1:26–2:3 (man created before the Sabbath, not vice versa), Jesus insists on the “Vorordnung des Menschen vor den Sabbat und Einordnung des Sabbats als eine dem Menschen dienende Institution.”<sup>28</sup>

These views, Doering suggests, are probably connected to Jesus’ eschatological ministry and proclamation. There is a correspondence between the Endzeit and the Urzeit: the eschatological Kingdom of God makes the Urzeit relation between humans and the Sabbath once again a living reality.<sup>29</sup>

According to Andrea J. Mayer-Haas, there is no evidence to show that healing on the Sabbath was considered unlawful by anyone in ancient Judaism.<sup>30</sup> Nevertheless, Jesus had to defend his Sabbath acts of healing—which were “Ausdruck seines menschenfreundlichen

<sup>27</sup> Doering, Sabbat, 452–454, 477. “Jesus setzt an bei erkannten Themen zeitgenössischer jüdischer Sabbathalacha..., weitet aber den Horizont, indem er die Heilung chronisch Kranker unter dem Blickwinkel der Lebensrettung betrachtet und somit das... anerkannte Prinzip der Lebensrettung ausdehnt” (454). The view that Jesus “widens the horizon” in Mark 3:4 is also held by Theissen and Merz, who add the comment, “Aber das ist im Grunde nur ein kleiner Schritt über das hinaus, was im Judentum schon an Tendenzen vorhanden war” (Jesus, 329; cf. 266). See also Gerd Theissen and Dagmar Winter, The Quest for the Plausible Jesus: The Question of Criteria (Louisville, KY/London: Westminster John Knox, 2002), 181.

<sup>28</sup> Ibid., 416–419, 423–424, 477 (416; emphasis removed).

<sup>29</sup> Ibid., 424, 454–456, 477.

<sup>30</sup> Andrea J. Mayer-Haas, “Geschenk aus Gottes Schatzkammer” (bSchab 10b): Jesus und der Sabbat im Spiegel der neutestamentlichen Schriften, NTAbh 43 (Münster: Aschendorff, 2003), 672–673, 678.

Gottesbildes”<sup>31</sup>—against criticism on the part of rigorists.<sup>32</sup> There are authentic traces of this defence in Mark 2:27 and in the saying behind Luke 14:5 and Matt 12:11.<sup>33</sup> As these sayings show, Jesus appealed to contemporary Jewish Sabbath theology and to the Sabbath practice of his “Hörer/innen.”<sup>34</sup>

3. The Sabbath in Early Judaism: Some Pertinent Points

Doering recently took a fresh look at Sabbath halakhah and practice in ancient Judaism 475 BCE–135 CE, and presented his findings in a work running to almost 700 pages.<sup>35</sup> This standard study may be consulted both for the broad lines and for questions of detail. Here, my aims are more modest. First, I offer some general remarks (together with halakhic examples) on Sabbath halakhah and practice in the period from Jubilees to the early Tannaites. Secondly, I investigate the special question of healing on the Sabbath.

The sources provide some examples of non-conformism with regard to the Sabbath commandment. In addition to the obvious case of the apostates in the days of the Hellenistic reform (1 Macc 1:43), we may refer to the radical allegorists criticised by Philo (Migr. 89–93); they emphasised the inner, “spiritual” meaning of the Sabbath and argued that outward obedience to the commandment was superfluous. In addition, a handful of Aramaic ostraca from first-century Palestine make mention of one person’s delivery of figs, bread and meal on the Sabbath and thus seem to testify to a lax Jewish Sabbath practice similar to the one criticised by Nehemiah (13:15).<sup>36</sup> But these <sup>31</sup> Mayer-Haas, “Geschenk”, 679. Mayer-Haas also suggests that Jesus understood his acts of healing “im Kontext seiner Botschaft von der hereinbrechenden Königsherrschaft Gottes” (678). On the other hand, however, she rejects the understanding of Doering, “der Jesu Sabbatheilungen in einer eschatologischen Perspektive interpretiert” (679, n. 30).

<sup>32</sup> Ibid., 677–679.

<sup>33</sup> The latter saying is reconstructed in three different ways by Mayer-Haas. The first version is printed on 210–211 (as a possible part of the pre-Markan version of Mark 3:1–6); a second one (without  $\nu\iota\omicron\nu\ \eta$ ) is implied on 210, n. 358; and on 347 there is a third version.

<sup>34</sup> Ibid., 678–679.

<sup>35</sup> Doering, Sabbat. The former date refers to the Elephantine ostraca, and the latter to the Tannaitic Rabbis of the Yavnean era.

<sup>36</sup> See the discussion in Doering, Sabbat, 387–397. The ostraca were published by A. Yardeni: “New Jewish Aramaic Ostraca,” IEJ 40 (1990): 130–152.

instances of non-conformism are probably to be seen as exceptional.<sup>37</sup> Eagerly seeking to be obedient was the normal Jewish way, especially once the acute Hellenistic crisis was over.<sup>38</sup>

The duty to obey is integral to the covenant: as the people of God, Israel stands under the obligation to keep all the commandments of God.<sup>39</sup> This includes observing the Sabbath and thus refraining from all kinds of מלאכה on the seventh day of the week. As Jubilees (2.19) puts it:

And he said to us, "Behold I shall separate for myself a people from among all the nations. And they will also keep the sabbath. And I will sanctify them for myself, and I will bless them. Just as I have sanctified and shall sanctify the sabbath day for myself thus shall I bless them. And they will be my people and I will be their God."<sup>40</sup>

But how was the Sabbath commandment to be understood and applied? The Book of Jubilees almost immediately goes beyond general admonitions, and provides lists defining in some detail what constitutes "work" (2.29–30; 50.8–12).<sup>41</sup> Similarly, the Sabbath section of the Damascus Document begins with the general command... אַל יַעֲשֶׂה אִישׁ מְלָאכָה (CD X, 14–15), and then continues with a series of detailed halakhot specifying the concept מלאכה (CD X, 10–XI, 18).<sup>42</sup> In m. Shabb. 7:2 there is the classical Tannaitic list of forbidden Sabbath "works." Also, from the works of Philo, a lengthy list of Sabbath rules may be put together.<sup>43</sup> Similarly, the Pharisees, renowned for their remarkable ἀκριβεία in legal matters,<sup>44</sup> must have given the

<sup>37</sup> For the moment, we disregard the Gospel evidence.

<sup>38</sup> Cf., e.g., Martin Hengel, Judentum und Hellenismus: Studien zu ihrer Begegnung unter besonderer Berücksichtigung Palästinas bis zur Mitte des 2. Jh.s v. Chr., WUNT 10, 2nd ed. (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1973), 532–564.

<sup>39</sup> Ed P. Sanders, Paul and Palestinian Judaism: A Comparison of Patterns of Religion (London: SCM, 1977), 81–84 and passim.

<sup>40</sup> James H. Charlesworth, ed., The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha, vol. II (London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1985), 57.

<sup>41</sup> Doering, Schabbat, 70–108.

<sup>42</sup> Ibid., 133–210. Doering also analyzes some 4Q fragments containing Sabbath rules (ibid., 215–255). See also Lawrence H. Schiffman, The Halakhah at Qumran, SJLA 16 (Leiden: Brill, 1975), a study of the Sabbath halakhah in the Damascus Document.

<sup>43</sup> Doering, Schabbat, 328–366.

<sup>44</sup> Josephus describes the Pharisees as σύνταγμα τι Ἰουδαίων δοκοῦν εὐσεβέστερον εἶναι τῶν ἄλλων καὶ τοὺς νόμους ἀκριβέστερον ἀφηγεῖσθαι (War 1.110). See further War 1.648; 2.162; Ant. 17:41; Life 191 and Acts 22:3; 26:5. On the Pharisaic ἀκριβεία, see Alfred I. Baumgarten, "The Name of the Pharisees," JBL 102 (1983): 411–428;

Sabbath commandment serious attention and tried to define it meticulously, but there are only relatively few pieces of evidence regarding the results they achieved.<sup>45</sup>

As indicated above, no complete consensus was reached regarding the correct Sabbath halakhah in ancient Judaism, all the efforts notwithstanding. We cannot speak of a “normative” halakhah that all Jewish groups accepted as binding.<sup>46</sup> Doering observes the existence of two main halakhic “schools” working with the Sabbath commandment.<sup>47</sup>

First, there is the “priestly” school, represented mainly, but not exclusively, by Jubilees and the Damascus Document; the Sadducees may also have belonged to this school. The priestly Sabbath halakhah was strict.<sup>48</sup> For example, it tolerated sacrifices on the Sabbath,<sup>49</sup> but, it seems, no other “overriding” of the commandment was permitted.<sup>50</sup> It did not accept legal fictions like the ‘erūb,<sup>51</sup> it showed great interest in defining even certain types of talking as forbidden on the Sabbath (dabber dābār, Isa 58:13)<sup>52</sup> and was stringent regarding the Sabbath day’s walk.<sup>53</sup> In addition, it demanded that people should celebrate the Sabbath in a state of ritual purity.<sup>54</sup>

The other halakhic school is “non-priestly.” It is reflected in the views of Philo, Josephus, and the early Tannaites. The Pharisees were also among its representatives. This school was more lenient in its halakhot than the “priestly” one. It was more accommodating and

---

Günter Stemberger, Pharisäer, Sadduzäer, Essener, SBS 144 (Stuttgart: Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1991), 86–87; Ed P. Sanders, Judaism: Practice and Belief, 63 BCE–66 CE (London: SCM, Philadelphia: Trinity, 1992), 420–421.

<sup>45</sup> Cf. Back, Jesus, 31–50; Doering, Schabbat, 516–527, 535–536.

<sup>46</sup> Doering, Schabbat, 575.

<sup>47</sup> Ibid., 576 and passim.

<sup>48</sup> Cf. Josephus’ remark on the Essenes as strict in Sabbath matters: φυλάσσουνται ... ταῖς ἑβδομάσιν ἔργων ἐράπτεσθαι διαφορώτατα Ἰουδαίων ἀπάντων (War 2.147), and note the criticism voiced against “all Israel” in CD III, 12–16a.

<sup>49</sup> Important texts: Jub 50.10–11; CD XI, 17b–18a; cf. Doering, Schabbat, 68, 205–210.

<sup>50</sup> Cf. CD XI, 16–17a; 4Q265 VI, 6–8; Doering, Schabbat, 117, 201–204, 232–235, 281.

<sup>51</sup> Cf. Jub 2.29; 50.8; CD XI, 7b–9a; m.Er 6:2; Doering, Schabbat, 72–75, 180–181, 524–527.

<sup>52</sup> Jub 50.8; CD X, 17b–19; 4Q264a I, 5–8; cf. Doering, Schabbat, 83–87, 114, 138–143, 225–227, 272.

<sup>53</sup> Jub 50.12; CD X, 21b; cf. Doering, Schabbat, 87–91, 145–151.

<sup>54</sup> Cf. Jub 50.8; CD XI, 3–4a; XI, 14b–15a; 4Q265 VI, 2–4; Doering, Schabbat, 67, 79–83, 165–169, 196–198, 236–237.

willing to take people's ability to obey the Law into consideration. For instance, the Sabbath limit was at the distance of 2,000 cubits from the edge of the village (or town)<sup>55</sup>—not 1,000 cubits, as in the halakhah of the Damascus Document. Further, the legal fiction of the 'ērub was accepted,<sup>56</sup> as well as several instances of “overriding” of the Sabbath—e.g., for the purpose of saving a human life (the so-called פיקוח נפש—principle).<sup>57</sup> This school of halakhah did not demand the celebration of the Sabbath in a state of ritual purity. It was also possibly more relaxed in its views on “talking” on the Sabbath (cf. Isa 58:13).<sup>58</sup>

But even with halakhic schools with different views on the Sabbath, there was also a “pool” of common Jewish halakhot, so that the Sabbath halakhah of a particular group—e.g., the Pharisees—contained both group-specific and commonly held rules.<sup>59</sup> Among the commonly held rules were not only the basic biblical commands (e.g., no lighting of fires, no cooking, no agricultural work), but also more detailed regulations.

An example of this is the very clear-cut ban on anything resembling harvesting; cf. Exod 34:21: “Six days you shall labour, but on the seventh day you shall rest; even during the ploughing season and harvest you must rest.” Both the “priestly” and the “non-priestly” schools were uncompromisingly strict in this matter. According to the Damascus Document, one is allowed to walk in a field (הדש) on the Sabbath (X, 20, 22b–23a), and it is permitted to pick up and eat what has fallen to the ground and thus has entered the process of decaying (אבד, X, 22b–23a), but it is presupposed as self-evident that one must not reap anything.<sup>60</sup> According to Philo, the Sabbath rest must also include animals and even every species of plant and tree; hence, one is not allowed to reap anything whatsoever: οὐ γὰρ ἔρνος, οὐ κλάδον, ἀλλ’ οὐδὲ πέταλον ἐφεῖται τεμεῖν ἢ καρπὸν ὄντινῶν δρέψασθαι (Vit. M. 2:22). Another first-century source attributes the same strict approach

<sup>55</sup> Cf. Acts 1:12; m. Sotah 5:3; m. Erub. 4:3; Doering, Schabbat, 151–154, 569–570.

<sup>56</sup> m. Erub. 6:2; Doering, Schabbat, 524–527, 531–532, 533–534.

<sup>57</sup> For texts pertaining to the פיקוח נפש—principle, see ibid., 355 n. 334, 567 n. 6 (cf. the discussion on pp. 566–568). For other cases of “overriding” of the Sabbath, see ibid., 522–524, 528–529, 533.

<sup>58</sup> Cf. Life 277–279; Doering, Schabbat, 496–497.

<sup>59</sup> Ibid., 575: “Die unterschiedliche Realisierung des Gebots in den verschiedenen Gruppen und Kreisen hat zur je charakteristischen Mischung von auf breiterem Konsens beruhender und gruppenspezifischer Sabbathalacha geführt” (emphasis removed).

<sup>60</sup> Ibid., 156.

to the Pharisees, who object to the plucking of ears of grain on the Sabbath: ἴδε τί ποιοῦσιν τοῖς σάββασιν ὃ οὐκ ἔξεστιν (Mark 2:24).<sup>61</sup> The same halakhah has similarly found its way into Rabbinic literature; plucking (שלל) is categorised as a form of harvesting.<sup>62</sup> On the basis of this material, Doering concludes:

Das Verbot des Entfernen von Teilen einer eingewurzelten Pflanze (auch zum sofortigen Verzehr) ist im antiken Judentum gruppenübergreifend belegt. Es handelt sich offenkundig um eine gemeinsame Tradition, der ein bestimmtes Verständnis des Ernteverbots zugrundeliegt. Als spezifisch pharisäisches Verbot ist es nicht bezeugt.<sup>63</sup>

Turning to the question of healing (רפואה) on the Sabbath, and focusing directly on the acts of healing attributed to Jesus in the Gospels (Mark 3:1–6 par Matt 12:9–14, Luke 6:6–11; Luke 13:10–17; 14:1–6; John 5:2–9 [cf. vv. 15–16 and 7:19–24]; 9:1–7), one finds that these texts clearly imply that Jesus' healing of people suffering from chronic illnesses transgressed the Sabbath commandment as it was understood by his adversaries.<sup>64</sup> Most scholars have accepted the implied picture of Jesus' historical opponents as being to the point. They have argued, or assumed, that healing on the Sabbath was indeed seen as a “work” (מלאכה), and that this “work” was not allowed to “override” the Sabbath unless human life was at stake.

In principle, this common view could be challenged in two ways. One could argue (a) that the healings described by the Gospels would not in fact have been regarded as מלאכה in ancient Judaism, or one could suggest (b) that they would have been allowed to “override” (דחה) the Sabbath. These are the two ways of justifying healing on the Sabbath from a halakhic point of view.

---

<sup>61</sup> In this context, I do not use the Markan story as a historically correct description of a factual incident, but rather as a first-century illustration of the halakhic principles of the Pharisees. They are depicted here as ἀκριβεῖς, but in this case their ἀκρίβεια is in no way extraordinary.—The Pharisees' walking in the cornfields on the Sabbath is of course not incompatible with their being ἀκριβεῖς. The Essenes were reputed to be the most strict of all Jews in questions concerning the Sabbath; nevertheless, as noted above, the (Essene) Sabbath halakhah of the Damascus Document presupposes as self-evident that walking in a שדה is permitted on the Sabbath (CD X, 20, 22b–23a)—granted, of course, that one does not stray outside the Sabbath limit.

<sup>62</sup> See t. Shabb. 9:17.

<sup>63</sup> Doering, Schabbat, 429 (emphasis removed); cf. 574.

<sup>64</sup> Mark 3:2, 6; Luke 13:14; John 5:16; 7:23; 9:16.24.

As seen in Part II above, the common view has in fact been challenged in recent times, especially by some scholars involved in the “Third Quest.” These scholars have decided on option (a) above and thus argue that the Gospel stories (or at least the earliest one; cf. below) about Jesus healing on the Sabbath do not describe anything that would have been understood as “work” by Jews in the time of Jesus and/or the Gospels. According to Geza Vermes, “none of the Sabbath cures of Jesus entailed ‘work’, but were effected by word of mouth, or at most, by the laying on of hands or other simple physical contact.”<sup>65</sup> E. P. Sanders and John P. Meier, for their part, wish to distinguish between healing by physical contact/laying on of hands (cf. Luke 13:13; 14:4; John 9:6), which was indeed regarded as work,<sup>66</sup> and healing by word of mouth (cf. Mark 3:5; John 5:8), which was not work. Commenting on Mark 3:1–6, Meier contends that Jesus “performs no action” since he only speaks; hence, no “work” is done:

Jesus literally does nothing—that is, he performs no action—and so in no sense can he be said to break the Sabbath by working. Thus, it is incredible that Pharisees or anyone else would seek to put Jesus to death for the event described in Mark 3:1–6. It is also difficult to believe that any group of Jews could or would accuse Jesus of breaking the Sabbath when all Jesus did was to speak a few words that brought healing to a crippled hand.<sup>67</sup>

---

<sup>65</sup> Geza Vermes, The Religion of Jesus the Jew (London: SCM, 1993), 23. Cf. Sanders, Jesus, 266: “The stories of healing on the Sabbath... reveal no instance in which Jesus transgressed the Sabbath law. The matter is quite simple: no work was performed. If Jesus had to remove a rock which was crushing a man’s hand, there would have been a legal principle at issue: was the man’s life in danger, or could the work have waited for the sun to set? But the laying on of hands (Luke 13:13) is not work, and no physical action of any kind is reported in the other stories.” For Sanders’ change of mind regarding the laying on of hands, see the following footnote.

<sup>66</sup> Sanders, Jewish Law, 10–11; John P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, 2: Mentor, Message, and Miracles (New York: Doubleday, 1994), 684. Cf. Sanders’ comment on Luke’s lack of awareness of the halakhic point in question: “I somewhat doubt that Luke was aware of this fine legal distinction—that the laying on of hands was work—though in an actual debate in Palestine it would have been an important issue” (Jewish Law, 20).

<sup>67</sup> Meier, Marginal Jew, 2:683. Meier concludes: “Consequently, I do not think that the Sabbath controversy, as it is presented in Mark 3:1–6, goes back to a historical event in Jesus’ ministry”. Cf. ibid., 732 n. 22: “It is remarkable how many exegetes simply take for granted that the pericope depicts Jesus breaking the Sabbath prohibition of work, without ever raising the question whether Jesus performs any physical action in the story.”

What is the basis for the opinion that no Jewish group would have regarded healing by mere words as a מלאכה? Meier refers to Sanders, who presents an argument from silence: “Jesus heals a man by telling him to stretch out his hand [Mark 3:5]. Talking is not regarded as work in any Jewish tradition, and so no work was performed.”<sup>68</sup>

The reasoning of these scholars is partly convincing—but only partly. Sanders and Meier are right in arguing that healing by the laying on of hands (or other physical contact) would have been regarded as מלאכה, and Vermes is right in suggesting that the distinction between healing “by word of mouth” and “by the laying on of hands or other simple physical contact” is not relevant. The rest of the argument of these scholars, however, is not convincing. Before indicating the reasons for this judgment, I wish to underline two things. First, for the moment I am only discussing the halakhic acceptability or non-acceptability of Jesus’ acts of healing as they are described by the Gospels, not the historical authenticity of the Gospel stories. Secondly, the source material relevant to our problem is very limited. Except for the Gospels, there are no pre-Tannaitic sources dealing with healing on the Sabbath;<sup>69</sup> and the Tannaitic texts deal only as it were incidentally with the matter.

Let us now look at the reasons why the common view about Sabbath healing is right, and why the dissenting proposals of Vermes, Sanders, and Meier ought not to be accepted. A preliminary observation is that Sanders’ statement to the effect that “talking” is not regarded as “work” in any Jewish tradition is not quite correct. As we noted above, Isa 58:13 (prohibition of dabber dābār) was an influential text within the “priestly” halakhic school, and certain kinds of talking were in fact not allowed on the Sabbath (Jub 50.8; CD X, 17b–19; 4Q264a I, 5–8; cf. also Philo, Migr. 91). It seems too simple to argue that talking cannot in any circumstance have been regarded as work.

---

<sup>68</sup> Sanders, Jewish Law, 21; Meier, Marginal Jew 2:732 n. 22. See also Sanders, Historical Figure, 215: “There was no interpretation of the Sabbath law that made speaking unlawful. We would expect someone to object had Jesus massaged and bandaged the hand, but talking is not work.”

<sup>69</sup> Doering, Schabbat, 448.

Another point is that there are no relevant Jewish texts directly supporting the claims by Vermes, Sanders, and Meier to the effect that healing by mere words is not מלאכה.<sup>70</sup>

A third point is the fact that the Gospel stories show no particular interest in emphasizing that acts of healing are work (מלאכה, ἔργον); rather, they presuppose this as a matter of course.<sup>71</sup> Luke 13:14, in particular, is illuminating. Here it is only indirectly stated that an act of healing is an ἔργον. The synagogue ruler says: ἐξ ἡμέραι εἰσὶν ἐν αἷς δεῖ ἐργάζεσθαι· ἐν αὐταῖς οὖν ἐρχόμενοι θεραπεύεσθε καὶ μὴ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ τοῦ σαββάτου.

The most important evidence however, is provided by the Mishnah. The reasoning in the following text is simply baffling unless it is based on the presupposition that one must not, on the Sabbath, engage in רפואה since it is a form of מלאכה:

Greek hyssop may not be eaten on the Sabbath since it is not the food of them that are in health, but a man may eat pennyroyal or drink knot-grass-water. He may eat any foodstuffs that serve for healing [לרפואה] or drink any liquids except purgative water or a cup of root-water, since these serve to cure jaundice; but he may drink purgative water to quench his thirst, and he may anoint himself with root-oil if it is not used for healing [לרפואה]. If his teeth pain him he may not suck vinegar through them but he may take vinegar after his usual fashion, and if he is healed, he is healed [ואם נתרפא נתרפא]. If his loins pain him he may not rub thereon wine or vinegar, yet he may anoint them with oil but not with rose-oil. Kings' children may anoint their wounds with rose-oil since it is their custom to do so on ordinary days. R. Simeon says: All Israelites are kings' children! (m. Shabb. 14:3–4).<sup>72</sup>

The tendency here is to circumvent a rule that is taken for granted—i.e., “no רפואה on the Sabbath”—without infringing on the letter of the rule. One is of course allowed to eat and drink on the Sabbath, as long as it is a question of normal food and drink. However, eating and drinking is forbidden if the sole purpose thereof is to effect רפואה. The רפואה may only be a side-effect, an accidental outcome

<sup>70</sup> See Westerholm, Jesus, 149–150 n. 18; Schaller, Jesus, 11–12; Doering, Schabbat, 446–447 on some Rabbinic texts (b. Sanh. 101a; t. Shabb. 7:23; y. Shabb. 14:3) which allow the use of magical incantations in certain cases (e.g., against snakes) on the Sabbath.

<sup>71</sup> Cf. Jürgen Becker, Jesus von Nazaret (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1996), 373.

<sup>72</sup> Herbert Danby, The Mishnah: Translated from the Hebrew with Introduction and Brief Explanatory Notes (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1933), 113.

(אם נתרפא נתרפא).<sup>73</sup> Similarly, anointing with ordinary oil is not work, but exactly the same action—anointing—is in fact a forbidden work if one uses a special liquid, since one would then show that the sole purpose of the anointing is to effect רפואה. We observe the same principle at work in m. Shabb. 22:6: “They may not straighten a [deformed] child’s body or set a broken limb. If a man’s hand or foot is dislocated he may not pour cold water over it, but he may wash it after his usual fashion, and if he is healed, he is healed [ואם נתרפא ונתרפא].”<sup>74</sup>

These Mishnah passages are important in this context for two reasons. First, they show—even if only indirectly—the existence of a definition to the effect that healing (רפואה) is work (מלאכה) and thus not allowed on the Sabbath. Secondly, they offer an analogy that shows just how unconvincing it is to argue, “Talking is not regarded as work in any Jewish tradition, and so no work was performed.”<sup>75</sup> Of course talking is permitted on the Sabbath (at least in general). So are eating and drinking; but eating and drinking may nevertheless be banned as מלאכה on the Sabbath, namely, if this activity takes place precisely in order to effect רפואה.<sup>76</sup>

My point here is not that the Mishnah passages as such should be dated to the first century. The point is rather that the rule, “No רפואה on the Sabbath,” is not only presupposed by the first-century Gospels, but also by a third-century Jewish source. Now, perhaps some would like to argue that (a) the Gospels are mistaken: there was no such rule in first-century Judaism; and that (b) the non-existent rule “presupposed” by the Gospels came into existence later on and was eventually included in the Mishnah. This is of course a theoretical possibility. But it seems far more likely that (a) the rule in question was already in fact in existence in the first century, that (b) the Gospels alluded to it, and that (c) it survived and was also presupposed

<sup>73</sup> Doering, Schabbat, 449.

<sup>74</sup> Danby, The Mishnah, 119. Sanders is of course aware of the rule presupposed by the Mishnah passages quoted above: “The discussions pay some attention to ways of getting around the general ban... The implied definition, ‘practicing medicine is work’, and the implied rule, ‘no minor cures on the sabbath’, are tough” (Jewish Law, 13). Referring to the circumvention of the rule, he adds: “...but the application is more humane”.

<sup>75</sup> Sanders, Jewish Law, 21.

<sup>76</sup> Cf. Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 329: “Natürlich waren Worte am Sabbat erlaubt. Erlaubt war aber auch Essen und Trinken—jedoch nicht dann, wenn beides ausschließlich einem therapeutischen Zweck diente.”

in m. Shabb. 14:3–4; 22:6.<sup>77</sup> There is hardly any reason to suppose that the rule was exclusively Pharisaic.<sup>78</sup>

4. The Sabbath Stories as Evidence of Jesus' Sabbath Practice and Attitude

In this section I offer some considerations regarding the Gospel Sabbath stories as evidence of Jesus' Sabbath practice and attitude. I do not intend to investigate every Sabbath story in detail here, but instead address the question whether, taken as a whole, the stories may be seen as witnesses to Jesus' Sabbath practice and attitude, or whether they instead reflect the views of the primitive Church and/or the Gospel writers. Most of the following comments pertain to the Gospel Sabbath stories—especially the synoptic ones—in their present form. However, for the sake of clarity, I wish to indicate my stance regarding the earliest layer of the synoptic Sabbath material. This layer is as follows: the pronouncement stories Mark 2:23–26; Mark 3:1–6; Luke 13:10*, 14, 16, and the sayings Mark 2:27; Luke 14:5 par Matt 12:11–12a.<sup>79</sup>

It is of course possible that even the earliest versions of the Sabbath stories and sayings reflect concerns and attitudes of early Christians. However, even if it could be shown what those concerns and attitudes were, and if a correlation between them and the Sabbath stories could be established, it would be simplistic to argue that the stories therefore cannot also be used as evidence of the Sabbath acts and sayings of Jesus. Let us recall, e.g., Gerd Theissen's hypothesis of the Wandercharismatiker. Theissen uses (mainly) the synoptic Gospels as sources in his sketching out of the life-style, activities and convictions of the itinerant charismatics. Among other things, he suggests that these early Christians imitated the freedom of the “Son of Man” with regard to the Sabbath.<sup>80</sup> Even if this suggestion were judged to be plausible, nothing would follow as far as the question of the authenticity of the Sabbath stories is concerned. As Theissen points out, there is not necessarily a connection between the Sitz im Leben of Jesus traditions and the authenticity (or non-authenticity) of these same traditions:

<sup>77</sup> There is an often-quoted "liberal" Rabbinic ruling in m. Yoma 8:6: "If a man has a pain in his throat they may drop medicine into his mouth on the Sabbath, since there is doubt whether life is in danger, and whenever there is doubt whether life is in danger his overrides the Sabbath" (Danby, The Mishnah, 172). This ruling can of course not be quoted against my argument here. On the contrary: precisely by invoking the נפיקה פיקוה principle in the case of the sore throat, the ruling indirectly shows that the basic rule is, "No רפואה on the Sabbath." Cf. Back, Jesus, 49; Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 329.

<sup>78</sup> Doering, Schabbat, 517: "Wahrscheinlich ist das Verbot des Heilens am Sabbat... nicht speziell pharisäisch, sondern ist von weiten Kreisen des antiken Judentums vertreten worden."

<sup>79</sup> See Back, Jesus, 68–147.

So kann die Frage offen bleiben, ob es sich um echte oder unechte Jesustraditionen handelt. Setzen wir die Echtheit einer Überlieferung voraus, so dürfen wir annehmen, daß die Tradenten ihr Leben in Übereinstimmung mit der Überlieferung gestaltet haben. Nehmen wir ihre Entstehung in der nachösterlichen Jesusbewegung an, so kann vorausgesetzt werden, daß die Tradenten die Überlieferung in Übereinstimmung mit ihrem Leben gestaltet haben.<sup>81</sup>

On a general level, the notion of a complete correlation between Jesus traditions and the behaviour and convictions of group(s) carrying on these traditions is far from persuasive.<sup>82</sup> However, at this point, we merely note that even a complete and positive correlation between the Sabbath stories and the beliefs and practices of, say, early Christian itinerant charismatics would in principle have no bearing on the question of the authenticity of those stories.

On the other hand, however, we have to reckon with the possibility (or the probability) that even traditions that originally came into being through the impact of Jesus and thus from the start reflected his acts and sayings, have been elaborated on in the course of their transmission—and of course also through the redactional work of the

---

<sup>80</sup> Gerd Theissen, Soziologie der Jesusbewegung: Ein Beitrag zur Entstehungsgeschichte des Urchristentums, Theologische Existenz heute 194, 2nd ed. (Munich: Chr. Kaiser, 1978), 28: “Daß der Menschensohn Herr über den Sabbat ist, bedeutet ja konkret, daß die wandernden Jünger die Sabbatgebote brechen durften wie einst der heimatlose David (Mk 2,23ff).” See also Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 329–330 (the itinerant charismatics as transmitters of the Sabbath stories), and Theissen, The Gospels in Context: Social and Political History in the Synoptic Tradition (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991), 112–118 (on the transmitters and the function of the Gospel apophthegms in general).

<sup>81</sup> Soziologie, 12.

<sup>82</sup> See, e.g., Bengt Holmberg, Sociology and the New Testament: An Appraisal (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990), 119–125; Tom Holmén, “Knowing about Q and Knowing about Jesus: Mutually Exclusive Undertakings?”, in Andreas Lindemann, ed., The Sayings Source Q and the Historical Jesus, BETL 158 (Leuven: Leuven University Press, 2001), 497–514.

evangelists. Hence, it is quite legitimate to use the Sabbath stories to investigate the attitude of the evangelists and other early Christians. This however is not the main task of this article; here, my primary interest is in Jesus' acts and sayings.

What reasons are there, then, to consider the Gospel stories as evidence of Jesus' Sabbath practice and attitude? First, with an eye on the discussion in Part III of this article, two simple observations can be made. (a) In ancient Judaism there were different ways of understanding the Sabbath commandment, and sometimes harsh criticism was voiced against groups who were thought to be mistaken and going astray concerning the Sabbath. More specifically, there is first-century evidence of people who did not conform even to the generally accepted Sabbath rules; cf. Philo's critique of the radical allegorists for the Diaspora, and the above-mentioned Aramaic ostraca for Palestine. From an outsider's perspective, Jesus, as described by the Gospels, was another non-conformist. (A closer look, however, will show Jesus' own profile in the matter.) (b) The testimony of the Gospels to the effect that Jesus and his disciples really offended pious Jews, including Pharisees, by healing sick people and by plucking ears of grain (and, in Jesus' case, defending this)—this testimony makes perfect sense when these actions are viewed in a first-century Palestinian context; the arguments to the contrary are far from persuasive.

Secondly, let us observe the attestation of Jesus' controversial Sabbath practice. There are two pronouncement stories in Mark (Mark 2:23–26; 3:1–6), and an additional two in the Lukan Sondergut (Luke 13:10–17; 14:1–6).<sup>83</sup> The Gospel of John also has a couple of stories depicting Jesus' Sabbath healing (John 5 and 9). There is a common Sabbath saying behind Luke 14:5 and Matt 12:11–12a,<sup>84</sup> and

---

<sup>83</sup> The Lukan Sabbath stories are not redactional fabrications. Luke found the pronouncement story Luke 13:10*, 14–16 among his Sondergut and reworked it. In the process, he also added vv. 11–13 and most of v. 10. For a more detailed discussion, see Back, Jesus, 121–126. The story in Luke 14:1–6 was thoroughly reworked by Luke, but not created by him; see ibid., 132; Eduard Schweizer, Das Evangelium nach Lukas, NTD 3 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1982), 154; Joseph A. Fitzmyer, The Gospel According to Luke (X–XXIV), AB 28A (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1985), 1038–1039; Wolfgang Wiefel, Das Evangelium nach Lukas, THKNT 3 (Berlin: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 1987), 267. Some scholars argue that Luke 14:1–6 was part of Q, but the evidence for this view is scant; see Back, Jesus, 131–132.

<sup>84</sup> It is possible that the saying was once part of Q; for this view, see, e.g., Frans Neiryneck, "Luke 14,1–6: Lukan composition and Q saying", in F. van Segbroeck, the many minor agreements between Matt 12:1–8 and Luke 6:1–5 against Mark 2:23–28 seem to indicate the existence of a parallel tradition, i.e., a version of the cornfield incident that Matthew and Luke were aware of, in addition to Mark 2:23–28.<sup>85</sup> There is, then, a relatively wide sweep of sources attesting to the controversial Sabbath practice of Jesus.<sup>86</sup>

Thirdly, there are no substantial reasons to assume that the Sabbath stories originated as reflections of early Christian Sabbath controversies or suchlike. A conditio sine qua non for such a view of the stories is that a correlation can be shown to exist between the Sabbath stories and early Christian controversies. But (a) there is no clear correlation between the Christian Sabbath disputes known from first-century sources and the Gospel Sabbath stories, and (b) the attempts to show analytically that the Gospel stories reflect otherwise unknown post-Easter Sabbath controversies are not at all persuasive.

---

ed., Evangelica II (1982–1991): Collected Essays by F. Neiryck (Leuven: Leuven University Press, Leuven: Peeters, 1991) 183–204; Christopher M. Tuckett, Q and the History of Early Christianity: Studies on Q (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1996), 414–416; cf. Back, Jesus, 133 (more references). Due to the significant difference in wording between Matthew and Luke here, this suggestion is however unlikely. It is more probable that the two versions of the saying represent different translations from an Aramaic original.

<sup>85</sup> See the discussion in Back, Jesus, 71–74 (with reference to scholars holding this view); Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 328; Tom Holmén, Jesus and Jewish Covenant Thinking, Biblical Interpretation Series 55 (Leiden: Brill, 2001), 93–94.—Matt 12:5–7 is not an M-saying but rather a creation by the evangelist; see Back, Jesus, 102–105.

<sup>86</sup> According to Kloppenborg, the people behind Q knew nothing about Jesus being involved in Sabbath controversies; hence, he argues, Jesus was in fact hardly involved in such controversies. John S. Kloppenborg, “The Sayings Gospel Q and the Quest of the Historical Jesus”, HThR 89 (1996): 332–334. This line of argument does not seem persuasive. (a) First, even if we disregard the possibility that the saying in Luke 14:5 par Matt 12:11–12a and the parallel tradition used by Matthew and Luke in their version of the cornfield incident (cf. above) were indeed part of Q, we cannot confidently say that Q showed no knowledge of Sabbath controversies. In the nature of the case, we cannot know for certain what Q did not include; but, of course, in order to make an argument from silence—in itself a highly questionable enterprise!—we must first be able to establish that silence. (b) Secondly, even if that silence on the part of Q could be demonstrated, an argument from silence would still be shaky, since “we know little or nothing of Q’s sources at the level of material available to Q but which Q chose to omit”: Christopher M. Tuckett, “Q and the Historical Jesus”, in Jens Schröter and Ralph Brucker, eds., Der historische Jesus: Tendenzen und Perspektiven der gegenwärtigen Forschung (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2002), 232. (c) Third, a good case can be made for the position that the Q redactor(s) found the Sabbath stories potentially dangerous and therefore “deliberately not included them” (ibid., 228–233 [232]).

(a) While there is no evidence for first-century disputes between Christian Jews and other Jews concerning the Sabbath, the Corpus Paulinum does contain references to Sabbath disputes among Christians. In Gal 4, Paul refers to the demands put forward by Jewish Christians to the effect that the Gentile Galatians must keep “days, months, seasons, and years”; the Sabbath is probably included in the “days” here. Paul firmly rejects these demands and seems horrified that the Galatians are giving in to them (Gal 4:10–11). The conflict concerns the question whether Gentile Christians have to keep the Sabbath or not. The answer to this question is either “no” (according to Paul) or “yes” (according to other Jewish Christians). The conflict hinted at in Rom 14 is similar in nature. The “weak” Christians wish, among other things, to make a distinction between “days”—ἡμέραν παρ’ ἡμέραν κρίνειν (Rom 14:5)—and they also insist that the “strong” should do the same. Again, the point of the dispute concerns an either/or question: to keep the Sabbath or not. Paul sides, in principle, with the “strong”: there is no need to worry about making distinctions between “days.” In Colossians, the problem is, once again, fundamentally of the same nature (Col 2:6–23, esp. 16). Outside of these passages from the Pauline corpus, there is no further explicit evidence of internal Christian Sabbath disputes. There is also no evidence to suggest, for instance, that healing or reaping on the Sabbath were typical activities among first-century Christians.<sup>87</sup>

It is not clear how the Sabbath stories and sayings in the Gospels could be taken to hint at a solution to the either/or problems attested to by the Epistles. None of the sayings of Jesus can plausibly be construed as an attempt to “abrogate” the Sabbath. It is true that Mark 2:27 has been interpreted in a very “radical” way. For instance, Beare thought the saying sounded like Protagoras of Abdera (πάντων χρημάτων μέτρον ἄνθρωπος); Wong understands it as being extremely anti-Jewish; and Rordorf maintained that it amounted to an attack on the Sabbath commandment, meant the destruction of the entire Sabbath theology of post-exilic Judaism, and opened the way to transgress the Sabbath commandment.<sup>88</sup> But these interpretations are arbitrary. The “radical” saying Mark 2:27 is in fact very close to the well-known Rabbinic saying, “The Sabbath was handed over to you, but you were not handed over to the Sabbath,” and this saying, of course, is not Protagorean, nor is it anti-Jewish, nor does it imply any “abrogation” of the Sabbath.<sup>89</sup> Similarly, there are no signs of an “abrogation” of the Sabbath in the rest of the Gospel material. It is clear, then, that the early Church transmitted the Sabbath stories without assimilating them to the either/or problem which is disclosed by the Pauline corpus.<sup>90</sup>

<sup>87</sup> On attempts to show analytically that the Gospel Sabbath stories reflect otherwise unknown conflicts, see below.

<sup>88</sup> F. W. Beare, “The Sabbath Was Made for Man?” JBL 79 (1960): 132; Eric K. Wong, “The Matthaean Understanding of the Sabbath: A Response to G. N. Stanton”, JSNT 44 (1991): 7; Rordorf, Sonntag, 61–63.

(b) Attempts to show analytically that the Sabbath stories reflect otherwise unknown disputes, and, at least in part, were crafted in response to those disputes, are in my view unconvincing.

Let us recall Rudolf Bultmann’s hypothesis regarding the Sabbath stories and the other Streitgespräche in the synoptic tradition. According to Bultmann, the Sitz im Leben of the “controversy dialogues” was the apologetics and polemics of the primitive Palestinian community. This community, Bultmann argued, must initially have assumed a relatively free attitude of mind towards parts of the Law. (Later on, following the rise of James the Lord’s brother to the leadership of the community, there was a regressive development, and the free attitude was transformed into obedience to the Law.) There was, among other things, an early liberal Sabbath practice, which attracted criticism from non-Christian Jews. The ensuing Sabbath controversies are reflected in the Gospel Sabbath stories, which were fabricated in the primitive Palestinian community.<sup>91</sup> An important part in this construction is played by the observation of an interesting trait in the texts, namely, that Jesus on several occasions defends the behaviour of his disciples:

<sup>89</sup> See, e.g., Schaller, Jesus, 18; Back, Jesus, 98–100; Doering, Schabbat, 417–419.

<sup>90</sup> Back, Jesus, 59–61; Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 328; Holmén, Jesus, 97–99.—An exception to the non-assimilation pointed out here is provided by the “apocryphal” pronouncement story in Luke 6:5D, which seems to make a point very similar to the one made by Paul in Rom 14. Paul writes, μακάριος ὁ μὴ κρίνων ἑαυτὸν ἐν ᾧ δοκιμάζει· ὁ δὲ διακρινόμενος ἐὰν φάγη κατακέκριται; cf. Jesus’ warning to the Sabbath worker in Luke 6:5D: εἰ μὲν οἶδας τί ποιεῖς, μακάριος εἶ· εἰ δὲ μὴ οἶδας, ἐπικατάρατος καὶ παραβάτης εἶ τοῦ νόμου. Stephen H. Smith claims that a situation like that addressed by Paul in Rom 14–15 is also reflected in Mark 3:1–6: Jesus’ opponents are “a paradigm for the hardline Judaizing Christians” in Mark’s community, whereas the man with the withered hand is “symbolic of the new Israel, the Christian community, which is offered salvation from the oppression of Jewish institutionalism” (“Mark 3,1–6: Form, Redaction and Community Function”, Bib 75 [1994]: 173). Unfortunately, “within the available space” Smith did not have the opportunity to reveal how he reached these conclusions.

<sup>91</sup> Rudolf Bultmann, Die Geschichte der synoptischen Tradition, 9th ed., FRLANT 29 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1979), 39–56; idem, Theologie des Neuen Testaments, 9th ed., UTB 630 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1984), 56–60.

Sie raufen am Sabbat Ähren aus [Mark 2:23], sie fasten nicht in der Weise der Johannes-Jünger [Mark 2:18], sie essen nicht mit gewaschenen Händen [Mark 7:2, 5],—hat sich denn etwa Jesus in all diesen Dingen so korrekt verhalten, daß er nicht angegriffen wird? Und woher, wenn er so konservativ gewesen wäre, die freie Haltung der Jünger? Oder wagt man ihn nicht direkt anzugreifen? Aber warum wagt man es denn bei den Sabbat-Heilungen? Nein! Die Jünger sind die Angegriffenen, d.h. die Gemeinde ist es, und sie wehrt sich mit der Berufung auf ihren Meister. Nur bei den Sabbat-Heilungen muß sich der Angriff naturgemäß gegen Jesus selbst richten; den die Heilungen sind ja zugleich Wunder, die ihn verherrlichen sollen.<sup>92</sup>

Bultmann's hypothesis contains several problematic aspects which I will not dwell on here. However, in this context it is important to point out the flaws in the argument quoted above.

(i) First, it is difficult to imagine the post-Easter community being attacked for not fasting, and then defending itself with a reference to the physical presence of Jesus (Mark 2:18–19a). Bultmann's reasoning, however, implies that this was indeed the case—or, alternatively, that the community, defending its non-fasting, in fact originally referred to Jesus' "spiritual" or "mystical" presence (v. 19a), but that this presence was later on reinterpreted as being physical in nature (i.e., through the addition of v. 19b–20). In the case of Mark 2:18–20, then, Bultmann's reasoning leads to absurd consequences.<sup>93</sup>

(ii) Moreover, his observation on Mark 2:23–26 is not to the point. Jesus is not presented here as "correct" or "conservative," nor is it the case that not he, but instead the disciples are being criticized and that he defends them rather than himself. In fact, the people plucking ears of grain are Jesus' own disciples. As their teacher, he is—quite naturally—seen as responsible for their actions. Accordingly, he is in fact

<sup>92</sup> Bultmann, Geschichte, 50. This argument by Bultmann has received wide support; cf., e.g., Sanders, Jesus, 266: "It is very likely that the pericope on plucking grain on the Sabbath... is a creation of the church. Bultmann long ago observed that the disciples (that is, the church) are criticized, not Jesus, and the passage represents a Christian response to Jewish criticism."

<sup>93</sup> Cf. Martin Hengel & Roland Deines, "E. P. Sanders' 'Common Judaism', Jesus, and the Pharisees," JTS 46 (1995): 7: "The widespread superstition that the Gospels deal primarily with problems of their immediate present frequently leads ad absurdum."

the main target of the Pharisees' criticism. The Pharisees "want to know what kind of teacher Jesus is if he permits his disciples to defy the Law."<sup>94</sup> Since it is not odd, but quite natural, that Jesus should be criticized for the action of his disciples, the Markan scene contains no item that requires an explanation like that suggested by Bultmann ("d.h. die Gemeinde ist es"). Consequently, Bultmann's attempt to buttress his case with textual observations is not convincing. Those observations support neither his general view of the Sitz im Leben of the "conflict dialogues," nor his claim regarding the fabrication of the Sabbath stories.<sup>95</sup>

Lutz Doering has recently proposed that Jesus' non-halakhic stance, as expressed in his Sabbath healings, lived on and was further radicalized by post-Easter Jewish Christian communities. Christians were not only influenced by the Jesus traditions, but also by the "Christ kerygma" and the implications of the Gentile mission. Their Sabbath practice was a liberal one, and it is reflected in the Sabbath stories which these communities transmitted and even partially created.<sup>96</sup>

---

<sup>94</sup> Ellis Rivkin, A Hidden Revolution: The Pharisees' Search for the Kingdom Within (Nashville: Abingdon, 1978), 92. Concerning the teacher's responsibility for his disciples, see, e.g., Erik Beijer, Kristologi och etik i Jesu Bergspredikan (Stockholm: Diakonistyrelsens bokförlag, 1960), 182; David Daube, "Responsibilities of Master and Disciples in the Gospels", NTS 19 (1973): 1–19; Rainer Riesner, Jesus als Lehrer: Eine Untersuchung zum Ursprung der Evangelien-Überlieferung, WUNT 2.7 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1984), 430–431; Samuel Byrskog, Jesus the Only Teacher: Didactic Authority and Transmission in Ancient Israel, Ancient Judaism and the Matthean Community, ConBNT 24 (Stockholm: Almqvist & Wiksell International, 1994), 327; John P. Meier, "The Historical Jesus and the Plucking of the Grain on the Sabbath", CBQ 66 (2004): 569. For some illustrations of the responsibility in question, see 1 Sam 3:11–14; War 1.648–655; Plato, Apol. 24B; Xenophon, Mem. 1.1.1; 1.2.12.

<sup>95</sup> In this context, it is perhaps appropriate to recall Schmithals's stern comments: "Die Texte selbst verraten auch in Bultmann's Analyse ihren 'Sitz im Leben' offenkundig nicht, so daß er auf bloße Vermutungen angewiesen bleibt... Weder Dibelius noch Bultmann gelingt es auch nur an einem einzigen Text der synoptischen Überlieferung... die Frage nach dem 'Sitz im Leben' anders als hypothetisch zu beantworten... Und prüft man die vorgetragenen Hypothesen an den uns zur Verfügung stehenden Quellen nach, lassen sie sich in keinem Fall verifizieren, vielmehr nur als unwahrscheinlich oder als unhaltbar erweisen" (Walter Schmithals, Einleitung in die drei ersten Evangelien [Berlin: de Gruyter, 1985], 310).

<sup>96</sup> Doering, Schabbat, 406–407, 412, 424–425, 430, 445, 477. Doering is vague on the question how this more liberal stance came to expression. Evidently, these Christians did no acts of healing on the Sabbath (445), and it was not their habit to harvest on the Sabbath either: "Sicher rechtfertigt die Gemeinde... nicht eine typische Praxis sabbatlichen Ährenruffens. Sie könnte aber anhand des in ihr Berichteten exemplarisch ihren Umgang mit dem Sabbatgebot darstellen" (412; cf. 430). J. P. Meier accepts

Doering feels that this proposal is confirmed by his analysis of the texts.<sup>97</sup> The only textual observation he invokes as support, however, is exactly the same as Bultmann's, namely Jesus' defence of the disciples in Mark 2:23–26.<sup>98</sup> Hence, textual observations lend no substantial support to Doering's proposal.<sup>99</sup>

It seems, then, that we can argue in the following way.<sup>100</sup> (a) Since there are no substantial reasons to assume that the Sabbath stories originated as reflections of early Christian Sabbath controversies, the earliest stories were probably from the start transmitted first and foremost as memories of Jesus' acts and sayings. (b) The relatively wide sweep of sources attesting to the controversial Sabbath practice of Jesus is also best accounted for by assuming that Jesus was in fact involved in such practice. (c) Moreover, this assumption is confirmed by the fact that the Gospel testimony to Jesus' Sabbath actions and the criticism they attracted makes good sense in the context of first-century Palestine.

---

this way of reasoning ("Plucking", 580 n. 36). I find it puzzling that one should, on one hand, insist on a one-to-one correspondence between the text and the underlying situation of its transmitters (the disciples, i.e., the community is being criticised for its activity on the Sabbath, and refers to Jesus in its defence), but then, on the other hand, back off and refuse to accept the testimony of the text regarding the offensive activity. This kind of reasoning is beyond methodological control.

<sup>97</sup> Doering, Schabbat, 478 n. 440.

<sup>98</sup> Ibid., 412–413.

<sup>99</sup> Doering is aware of the criticism levelled against Bultmann to the effect that a teacher is responsible for the actions of his disciples, and that Jesus' defence of his disciples (and, indirectly, of himself) accordingly constitutes no reason to regard the story in Mark 2:23–26 (or, as Doering [409–412] would prefer, Mark 2:23–24.27[–28]) as a Gemeindebildung. Somewhat oddly, he transforms this critique of Bultmann into a direct and positive argument in favour of the authenticity of the scene, and then counters: "Doch dieser Einzelzug der Perikope spricht nicht für die Historizität der Szene, da Verantwortlichkeit des Meisters auch als Topos in Überlieferung und Literatur begegnet. Es handelt sich somit um ein kulturelles Phänomen, das für die Gestaltung der Szene benutzt werden konnte" (412–413). Quite so, the possibility ("konnte") exists—but what basis is there, in the first place, to suspect a Gemeindebildung in this instance? The mere possibility is of course no substantial basis.—Mayer-Haas claims, "Mk 2,23f.27* rechtfertigt, veranschaulicht am Beispiel einer geringfügigen Sabbatverletzung seitens der Jünger, die 'liberale' Sabbatpraxis seiner Träger unter Berufung auf die Autorität Jesu und brandmarkt die Vertreter strengerer Sabbatruhe als Jesusgegner" ("Geschenk", 187), but is unable to show why this proposal should be understood as anything else than a sheer possibility (cf. ibid., 184–187).

<sup>100</sup> Cf. Becker, Jesus, 373; Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 327–328; Holmén, Jesus, 91–100.

In addition, (d) the Sabbath acts and sayings of Jesus, as they are presented in the earliest layer of the synoptic Sabbath material, are coherent with the main lines of Jesus' ministry and message. This is shown in the following section (V).

5. Jesus' Understanding and Defence of His Sabbath Acts

I have elsewhere argued for the basic historical authenticity of the earliest layer of the synoptic Sabbath material, mentioned above, including the sayings in Mark 2:25–26; 2:27; 3:4; Luke 13:16; Matt 12:11–12a/Luke 14:5.<sup>101</sup> There is no space and no need to repeat the argument here.

In order to understand Jesus' attitude, as it is reflected in the aforementioned material, more than an outsider's perspective is needed. It will not do to claim, e.g., that Jesus' Sabbath behaviour indicated that he was a "liberal" Jew with a menschenfreundlich view of God.<sup>102</sup> We must rather try to reach Jesus' own understanding and defence of his Sabbath acts. Jesus should of course be understood as a first-century Palestinian Jew, but he was distinctive within his context,<sup>103</sup> and this distinctiveness is also manifest in his Sabbath acts and sayings. On the following few pages, I will try to indicate the main points regarding (a) Jesus' understanding of his Sabbath acts, and also regarding (b) his defence of those acts. I will here focus on the acts of healing, giving only cursory attention to the cornfield incident.

But first a few words on Mark 2:27: τὸ σάββατον διὰ τὸν ἄνθρωπον ἐγένετο καὶ οὐχ ὁ ἄνθρωπος διὰ τὸ σάββατον. As we observed above, this saying has frequently been declared the key to a proper understanding of Jesus' attitude towards the Sabbath. Moreover, it has often been understood as making the point that human beings and their needs are more important than the Sabbath commandment: "Nicht mehr der Sabbat und die Forderung des Gesetzes stehen an erster Stelle, sondern der Mensch und seine Bedürfnisse werden höher bewertet als das Sabbatgebot."<sup>104</sup>

<sup>101</sup> See Back, Jesus, 86–90, 100–101, 116–119, 128–129, 141.

<sup>102</sup> Cf. Mayer–Haas, "Geschenk", 679.

<sup>103</sup> Theissen and Winter, Quest, 172–212.

<sup>104</sup> Lohse, "Worte", 85.

Both of these interpretative moves involving Mark 2:27 are problematic. As Neiryck points out, “For an originally free-floating logion—as Mk II,27 probably was—it is especially difficult to define its content.”<sup>105</sup> But if the meaning of the saying is especially difficult to define, it cannot be taken as a key or a starting point. It is rather the case that Jesus’ Sabbath actions and the rest of his Sabbath sayings must provide the key to an understanding of Mark 2:27. Let us now proceed to Jesus’ Sabbath acts and his own interpretation of them.

(a) It is clear that healing (including exorcisms) was a significant element of Jesus’ ministry.<sup>106</sup> On the basis of the previous section (IV) we have reason to believe that this important activity also occurred on the Sabbath. There is no basis for the assumption that Jesus used to heal people predominantly on the Sabbath or precisely because it was the Sabbath; but it is clear that he did not break off his healing ministry on the holy day.

Did his refusal to break off amount to a transgression of the Sabbath commandment? We cannot of course venture to act as judges in matters of first-century halakhah and, e.g., provide our own definition of מלאכה. But we have to acknowledge that Jesus did transgress the Sabbath commandment as it was understood by teachers of halakhah—including Pharisees—in first-century Jewish Palestine. He showed no interest in keeping the Sabbath in an exact manner. He was not among those whom Josephus describes as οἱ μετ’ ἀκριβείας δοκοῦντες ἐξηγεῖσθαι τὰ νόμιμα (War 2.162). He was a non-conformist, at least to a certain extent.

However, his attitude should not be confused with, say, the position of the radical allegorists which provoked the ire of Philo, nor with the laxity of the writer of the first-century Palestinian ostraca referred to earlier in this article. There is also no basis for the view, sometimes held, that Jesus simply wanted to show dissent or provoke pious people on the Sabbath. Instead, he must have viewed his Sabbath acts of healing in the same way as the rest of his healing ministry—i.e., as manifestations of the eschatological, salvific βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ. “Present by operation but future in its fulness, the reign of God was being mediated by its proclaimer”<sup>107</sup>—not however by proclamation only, but also by mighty acts (δυνάμεις). In the eyes of his adversaries, he was a non-conformist and a transgressor. But as for himself, he must have thought he was doing “the King’s business.”<sup>108</sup>

<sup>105</sup> Neiryck, “Jesus”, 269. Cf. Andreas Lindemann, “‘Der Sabbat ist um des Menschen willen geworden...’ Historische und theologische Erwägungen zur Traditionsgeschichte der Sabbatperikope Mk 2,23–28 parr.,” WD 15 (1979): 89: “Der Sinn des Logions Mk 2,27 läßt sich nicht erfassen, wenn man nicht die Situation kennt, in der es gesprochen wurde.”

<sup>106</sup> See, e.g., Barry M. Blackburn, “The Miracles of Jesus”, in Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluation of the State of Current Research, ed. Bruce Chilton and Craig A. Evans, NTTS 19 (Leiden: Brill, 1994), 354–368; John P. Meier, Marginal Jew, 2:617–631; Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 256–283.

From the Jesuanic perspective, people who were confronted with his healing acts—including the Sabbath healings—were brought face to face with God’s own activity and power (Luke 11:20/Matt 12:28). Those with truly seeing eyes and truly hearing ears could experience how the kingdom of God made its way with force (Luke 16:16/Matt 11:12–13). The fulness of the Kingdom was still not there; that was a matter for the future (Luke 6:20b–21/Matt 5:3–6; Luke 11:2/Matt 6:9–10; Luke 13:28–29/Matt 8:11–12). But the Kingdom was present by operation: as the parables of growth (Mark 4:30–32; Luke 13:18–19; Luke 13:20–21/Matt 13:33; Mark 4:3–8; Mark 4:26–29) indicate, “[t]he Kingdom has begun to come in the mission of Jesus; and now it must run its course to the final consummation.”<sup>109</sup> The promises of the prophets were being fulfilled; divine blessings were at hand (Luke 7:22–23/Matt 11:5–6); things that had been the object of the yearning of previous generations were now happening in front of people’s eyes (Luke 10:23b–24/Matt 13:1–17); and the kingdom of the Evil One was receiving blow upon blow (Mark 3:27; Luke 11:20/Matt 12:28; cf. Luke 10:18).<sup>110</sup> The ministry of Jesus ushered in the eschatological and salvific reign of God all the days of the week. As the Sabbath acts of healing indicate, Jesus insisted that “the service of the Kingdom of

<sup>107</sup> Ben F. Meyer, The Aims of Jesus (London: SCM, 1979), 171.

<sup>108</sup> Manson, Sayings, 190.—On Jesus’ interpretation of his ministry of healing, see Helge Kjær Nielsen, Heilung und Verkündigung: Das Verständnis der Heilung und ihres Verhältnisses zur Verkündigung bei Jesus und in der ältesten Kirche, ATDan 22 (Leiden: Brill, 1987), 28–107; Graham H. Twelftree, Jesus the Exorcist: A Contribution to the Study of the Historical Jesus, WUNT 2.54 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1993); Blackburn, “Miracles,” 372–392.

<sup>109</sup> Manson, Sayings, 122, commenting on the parables of the Mustard Seed and the Leaven.

<sup>110</sup> Cf. H. Kruse, “Das Reich Satans”, Bib 58 (1977): 29–61, esp. 37–44.

God and the warfare against the kingdom of Satan must go on day in and day out,”<sup>111</sup> the Sabbath commandment notwithstanding.

This understanding of Jesus’ position vis-à-vis his healing acts on the Sabbath would seem sound even without any knowledge of Jesuanic Sabbath sayings. It involves only the simple assumption that Jesus interpreted his healing acts on the Sabbath in the same way as he interpreted his other healings. It comes as no surprise, however, to see our assumption being confirmed by several of the Sabbath sayings (Luke 13:16; Mark 3:4; Luke 14:5/Matt 12:11–12a).

In Luke 13:16, Jesus interprets the healing of the diseased woman in a mythical way. The idea of the eschatological war between the kingdom of God and the kingdom of Satan is the presupposition of his interpretation, which indicates what happens to the woman when she is healed: ταύτην δὲ θυγατέρα Ἀβραάμ οὖσαν, ἣν ἔδησεν ὁ σατανᾶς ἰδοὺ δέκα καὶ ὀκτὼ ἔτη, οὐκ ἔδει λυθῆναι ἀπὸ τοῦ δεσμοῦ τούτου τῇ ἡμέρᾳ τοῦ σαββάτου; Jesus brings the woman in touch with the kingdom of God, and this means liberation for her; the bonds of Satan are untied. In terms of another saying (Mark 3:27), the woman has been a “possession” in the house of the Strong One. But now the Strong One meets another, superior in strength, and must suffer his own house being robbed.

The healing of the woman means that the Sabbath commandment (in its common interpretation) is put aside. It must not stand in the way of the λύειν, the manifestation of the eschatological and salvific reign of God, for “the warfare against the kingdom of Satan must go on on the Sabbath as well as on the other six days.”<sup>112</sup>

In Mark 3:4, Jesus stresses the necessity of healing on the Sabbath: ἔξεστιν τοῖς σάββασιν ἀγαθὸν ποιῆσαι ἢ κακοποιῆσαι, ψυχὴν σῶσαι ἢ ἀποκτεῖναι; The alternatives are clear cut: it is a matter of either doing good or doing evil—yes, even more: either saving a “soul” or killing it. If these are the alternatives, then it is imperative that Jesus heals and thereby saves the “soul” which is in grave danger. But how can the healing of a chronically ill person be described in this manner? And what is meant by ψυχὴν σῶσαι here? I would suggest that the application of ψυχὴν σῶσαι to the healing of a chronic illness implies an eschatological transformation of the Old Testament view of illness and healing.

<sup>111</sup> Manson, Sayings, 190.

<sup>112</sup> Ibid.

According to a view abundantly attested in the Old Testament, a disease constitutes a serious threat to the “soul” (נפש).<sup>113</sup> When a human being is afflicted by a disease, he, or his “life,” or his נפש, can be said to be near the pit (שחת, Job 33:22), near the gates of death (Ps 107:18), near Sheol (Ps 88:4), even in Sheol (Ps 30:3–4). And when he is cured, he is delivered (Ps 6:5), saved (Ps 6:5), and brought up from Sheol (יהוה העלית מן־שאול נפשי, Ps 30:3–4). Mark 3:4 shows that Jesus shares this Old Testament view of the affliction and salvation of the נפש (ψυχή).<sup>114</sup> He makes no clear distinction between diseases and suffering on one hand and death on the other; in essence, disease and death constitute the same kind of threat to the “soul.” Hence, even healing a withered hand (as in Mark 3:1–6) is saving a נפש (ψυχή).

The Old Testament view presupposed by Jesus in Mark 3:4 is not eschatological at all.<sup>115</sup> But in the Jesuanic context, ψυχήν σῶσαι takes on an eschatological nuance. The non-eschatological Old Testament notion is transformed into an eschatological one.

A clear example of this kind of transformation is provided by the Qumran Hodayot. One of the hymns begins with the following words:

אודכה אדוני כי פדיתה נפשי משחת
ומשאול אבדון העליתני לרום עולם. (1QH 11:19–20a).

I thank Thee, O Lord, for Thou hast redeemed my soul from the Pit, and from the hell of Abaddon Thou hast raised me up to everlasting height.<sup>116</sup>

<sup>113</sup> For the following comments, cf. Johannes Pedersen, Israel I–II: Sjæleliv og Samfundsliv, 2nd ed. (Copenhagen: Povel Branner, 1934), 116–117, 258–259, 363–366; Christian Barth, Die Errettung vom Tode in den individuellen Klage- und Dankliedern des Alten Testaments (Zollikon: Evangelischer Verlag A.G., 1947), 93–102, 124–146; Hans-Joachim Kraus, Theologie der Psalmen, BKAT 15:3 (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1979), 207–209; Nielsen, Heilung, 36.

<sup>114</sup> Cf. Eduard Schweizer, “ψυχή κτλ.” TWNT IX, 637; Klaus Seybold and Ulrich B. Müller, Krankheit und Heilung, Biblische Konfrontationen 1008 (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1978), 102.

<sup>115</sup> Nielsen, Heilung, 36.

<sup>116</sup> Geza Vermes, The Dead Sea Scrolls in English, 4th ed. (London: Penguin Books, 1995), 197.

A “soteriological confession” which exults in the gifts of salvation then follows: God has granted to those who have joined the community new creation, forgiveness of sins, and communion with the angels (1QH XI, 20b–23).<sup>117</sup> The introductory words (1QH XI, 19–20a) allude to the aforementioned Old Testament view of illness and healing. But a transformation has taken place: the expressions פדיתה נפשי משחת and ומשאול אבדון העליתני are filled with a renewed meaning and now refer to the eschatological salvation which for the Qumran community has become a reality in the present (gegenwärtiges Heil).<sup>118</sup>

A similar transformation occurs in Mark 3:4. Within the context of Jesus’ healing ministry—and his interpretation thereof—the saying indicates what happens when a diseased person is confronted with the eschatological and salvific reign of God. This reign, although not yet present in its fullness, is now mediated through Jesus. Whereas in Luke 13:16 the experience of the person in question was described in terms of liberation from the bonds of Satan (λυθῆναι ἀπὸ τοῦ δεσμοῦ τούτου), it is now a matter of a “soul” being “saved” (ψυχὴν σώσει).<sup>119</sup> And again, this must happen in spite of the limitations of the Sabbath commandment.

The saying behind Luke 14:5 and Matt 12:11–12a was probably originally used to defend a Sabbath act of healing by Jesus. It included a reference to the “son” (Luke 14:5), but lacked the conclusion πόσω οὖν κτλ. (Matt 12:12a).<sup>120</sup> The “son” was also part of the original

<sup>117</sup> Heinz-Wolfgang Kuhn, Enderwartung und gegenwärtiges Heil: Untersuchungen zu den Gemeindeliedern von Qumran mit einem Anhang über Eschatologie und Gegenwart in der Verkündigung Jesu, SUNT 4 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1966), 45–52. For the term “soteriological confession,” see ibid., 26–27.

<sup>118</sup> Ibid., 52–61.

<sup>119</sup> The eschatological overtones of this expression are recognised by Grundmann, Guelich, and Marcus in their commentaries on Mark. See Walter Grundmann, Das Evangelium nach Markus, 10th ed., THKNT 2 (Berlin: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 1989), 96; Robert A. Guelich, Mark 1–8:26, WBC 34A (Dallas: Word Books, 1989), 136; Joel Marcus, Mark 1–8: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary, AB 27 (New York: Doubleday, 1999), 252: “Here as elsewhere . . . Jesus reinterprets Old Testament or Jewish principles in an apocalyptically intensified manner . . . For Mark’s Jesus, the eschatological war is already raging, and on that battlefield every human action either strikes a blow for life or wields one for death.”

<sup>120</sup> Daniel Kosch, Die eschatologische Tora des Menschensohnes: Untersuchungen zur Rezeption der Stellung Jesu zur Tora in Q, NTOA 12 (Freiburg/Göttingen: Universitätsverlag, 1989), 204; Back, Jesus, 133–135.

Aramaic saying, which probably contained a wordplay involving ברא (υἰός), בעירא (βοῦς, πρόβατον), and בירא (βόθυνος, φρέαρ).<sup>121</sup> This saying, containing ברא (υἰός), cannot be understood as making an a fortiori argument to the effect that help granted to an animal should all the more be granted to a human being.

It should rather be understood in the same manner as the other so called τίς ἐξ ὑμῶν-sayings,<sup>122</sup> i.e., I. Luke 11:11–13/Matt 7:9–11 (a father being asked for bread by his son); II. Luke 15:4–7/Matt 18:12–14 (a shepherd and his lost sheep); III. Luke 15:8–10 (a woman and her lost coin); IV. Luke 11:5–8 (a head of the house being disturbed at midnight by a friend); V. Luke 14:28–30 (a man wishing to build a tower); VI. Luke 14:31–32 (a king going to war); and VII. Luke 17:7–10 (a master and his working servant). As Greeven pointed out, the τίς ἐξ ὑμῶν-sayings reveal the mindset of God towards human beings “durch einen Hinweis auf das unter Menschen allgemein übliche Verhalten.”<sup>123</sup> The sayings make an a fortiori argument: if this is true of humans, how much more is it true of God! He responds to prayer (I, IV), he seeks out lost people and rejoices when he finds them (II, III), he has resources and strength to finish what he has begun (V, VI), and he has the right to require a lot from his servants (VII). The reference to God is often underlined by common standing metaphors, such as father, shepherd, king, and master.<sup>124</sup>

The τίς ἐξ ὑμῶν-sayings do not simply reveal the mind of God in a general sense, but carry an eschatological significance.<sup>125</sup> II and III concern the eschatological “good news” to the “poor”; this is probably true of I, as well (ἀγαθά are eschatological good gifts); IV gives assurance to those praying for the coming of the Kingdom in its full-

<sup>121</sup> Suggested by Matthew Black as a pun on words behind Luke 14:5 (An Aramaic Approach to the Gospels and Acts, 3rd ed. [Oxford: Clarendon, 1967], 168). Cf. the discussion in Back, Jesus, 135–136, where Joachim Jeremias’ suggestion regarding the secondary nature of ברא is rejected. Cf. Jeremias, Review of Black, Approach, in Göttingische Gelehrte Anzeigen 210 (1956), 8–9. Jeremias’ unlikely proposal is defended by Doering, who makes the dubious claims that (i) בעירא and בירא sounded “gleich,” whereas ברא only sounded “ähnlich,” and that (ii) the original wordplay would have been made up solely of words that were (allegedly) “gleich” (Schabbat, 458).

<sup>122</sup> Cf. Heinrich Greeven, “Wer unter euch...?”, WD 3 (1952) 86–101; Back, Jesus, 137–139.

<sup>123</sup> Greeven, “Wer unter euch...?”, 86.

<sup>124</sup> For references, see Back, Jesus, 138.

<sup>125</sup> For a more detailed argument, see ibid., 139.

ness; VII has the coming judgement in view; and V and VI refer to God's ability to bring forth the consummation of his Kingdom.

If the Sabbath saying behind Luke 14:5 and Matt 12:11–12a is considered together with the other  $\tau\acute{\iota}\varsigma \xi\acute{\xi} \upsilon\mu\omega\upsilon\nu$ -sayings, we must conclude that it, too, aims at the mind and action of God. Polag, commenting on the saying, remarks, "Wenn schon die Menschen so urteilen, um wieviel mehr dann Gott,"<sup>126</sup> and Marshall correctly concludes that there is here "an unexpressed a fortiori argument from what men do on the Sabbath to what God does."<sup>127</sup> We should moreover observe that the saying concerns God's action, but is used to explain and defend Jesus' action: God's action on the Sabbath takes concrete form in the action of Jesus;<sup>128</sup> Jesus' healing is God's own intervention in the misery of man. This is of course quite natural if we remember Jesus' overall interpretation of his healing ministry. Once again, this ministry must, in Jesus' view, go on, in spite of the Sabbath commandment.

(b) But Jesus' stance was contested by people—including Pharisees—who criticized him and insisted that the commandment be kept according to the usual interpretation, which among other things stated that healing (רפואה) was work (מלאכה) and therefore forbidden on the Sabbath. Behind this demand lay, of course, the view that the matter involved one's loyalty toward the covenant.

Regarding Jesus' defence of his Sabbath behaviour, two points can be affirmed: Jesus defended himself (i) with an awareness of his immediate knowledge of God's will and mindset, and (ii) with an awareness of his being on "the King's business," inaugurating His eschatological and salvific βασιλεία.

(i) A closer look at Jesus' overall attitude,<sup>129</sup> as it is reflected in his sayings on various issues covered by the Torah, will reveal an

<sup>126</sup> Athanasius Polag, Die Christologie der Logienquelle (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1977), 80.

<sup>127</sup> I. Howard Marshall, The Gospel of Luke: A Commentary on the Greek Text, NIGTC (Exeter: Paternoster, 1978), 580.

<sup>128</sup> For a discussion of this line of reasoning in several of Jesus' parables, see Jacques Dupont, "Les implications christologiques de la parabole de la brebis perdue", in Origines, 346–350; idem, Pourquoi des paraboles? La méthode parabolique de Jésus, Lire la Bible 46 (Paris: Les Éditions du Cerf, 1977), 34–38; also Eta Linnemann, Gleichnisse Jesu: Einführung und Auslegung, 6th ed. (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1975), 93, 159–162.

<sup>129</sup> For the following two paragraphs, see Back, Jesus, 178–192 and the literature cited there.

underlying claim of independence with regard to the Torah. In his statements, he does not depend on the support of the Torah either in the form of general references or in the form of Torah exegesis. Also, the commandment of Lev 19:18 (“love your neighbour as yourself”) does not seem to stand out as the governing principle behind his Torah-related sayings. Rather, his statements are supported by his own authority. His independence does not necessarily imply criticism of the Torah, and he never offers explicit criticism thereof; but he is not very concerned about being in agreement with it either, and sometimes he does criticize it in an implicit manner. It should be noted that his independence as well as the implied criticism is not confined to the post-scriptural halakhah of the Pharisees (and others), for the distinction between Torah and halakhah does not in general seem important to him.<sup>130</sup>

His independence with regard to the Torah is but one side of the coin. The other side is his claim to an immediate knowledge of God’s will and mindset. Kümmel saw this long ago and reasonably explained, “Er (erhebt) den Anspruch, unmittelbar Gottes Willen zu wissen: Ich aber sage euch, und was ich sage, das ist Gottes Wille.”<sup>131</sup> This claim of immediacy with regard to God’s will causes independence with regard to the Torah, and means that Jesus is able to speak and act, as Mark says, ὡς ἐξουσίαν ἔχων.

The claims to independence and immediacy are reflected in several Sabbath sayings. Greeven pointed out in his seminal article on the τίς ἔξ ὑμῶν-sayings that these sayings are marked by Unmittelbarkeit; they convey the Jesuanic claim to know God’s mindset and actions without Torah exegesis.<sup>132</sup> This is also true of Luke 14:5/Matt 12:11–12a. Interpreting and defending his Sabbath healing, Jesus speaks as if he knew the ways of God immediately; even if an important Torah commandment was involved, there seemed to be no need to consult the texts.

<sup>130</sup> With an eye on the whole law-related authentic material in the synoptic Gospels, Westerholm correctly comments: “It is not sufficient to say that he [sc. Jesus], like the Sadducees, rejected scribal additions to scriptural law; with the exception of the polemic connected with the handwashing dispute [Mark 7:6–13], he made no attempt to distinguish the two” (Jesus, 91; cf. ibid., 61, 89, 128).

<sup>131</sup> Werner Georg Kümmel, “Jesus und der jüdische Traditionsgedanke,” ZNW 33 (1934): 126.

<sup>132</sup> Greeven, “Wer unter euch...?”, 100–101.

In Mark 3:4, Jesus makes the point that healing on the Sabbath is simply necessary, no matter what the Sabbath commandment might have to say about the case at hand. For Jesus, the necessity was of course founded in the will of God. As far as the “free-floating” saying in Mark 2:27 is concerned, a reasonable conjecture would seem to be that it was originally used as a defence of Sabbath healing. Jesus then claimed to know that his healings were in accordance with the Creator’s will behind the Sabbath. By healing sick people, Jesus claimed to realize this divine will, to which he had immediate access.

A consequence of Jesus’ claims to independence and immediate knowledge of the ways of God was that he did not argue on the basis of a superior knowledge of Scripture or halakhah. He did not engage in halakhic or exegetical discussions of the Sabbath commandment. His approach was non-exegetical and non-halakhic.

Thus, we do not find him suggesting any new interpretation of the commandment. There is no attempt to indicate what מלאכה really is, and no attempt to show that his actions are not actually “work” but in fact allowed by the Torah. There is also no effort to distinguish between the written Torah on one hand and later halakhic definitions on the other, and there is no critique of the adversaries to the effect that their position involves a flawed interpretation of the Law.<sup>133</sup> Quite on the contrary, in Mark 2:25–26 he defends himself—i.e., the fact that he, as a teacher, had authorized the “reaping” on the part of his disciples—on the assumption that a transgression of the Sabbath commandment had indeed taken place (David, too, had done something which was not allowed: οὐκ ἔξεστιν, Mark 2:26).

However, as we noticed earlier, some scholars suggest that Jesus in Mark 3:4 as it were extends the פקוּחַ נפֿשׁ-principle so that it includes not only cases of life-threatening situations or lethal illnesses, but chronic diseases as well.<sup>134</sup> If this were the case, Jesus would, after all, be the originator of a new Sabbath halakhah.<sup>135</sup>

<sup>133</sup> In Matt 12:7 the Pharisees are blamed for a lack of knowledge of the Scriptures, in this case Hos 6:6: ἔλεος θέλω καὶ οὐ θυσίαν. But first, this ignorance is connected to their misunderstanding of Jesus, whose ministry is marked by mercy (ἔλεος). And secondly, Matt 12:5–7 is probably a creation by the evangelist. Cf. Back, Jesus, 102–105.

<sup>134</sup> Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 266, 329; Doering, Sabbat, 453–454, 477; Theissen and Winter, Quest, 181.

<sup>135</sup> Pace Doering, who oddly speaks of Jesus’ “non-halakhic position” although he himself insists that Jesus in Mark 3:4 appeals to a principle “die fest in den

An explanation along these lines would fit Matt 12:12b rather well,<sup>136</sup> but it is a bit off the mark as far as Mark 3:4 is concerned. Here, Jesus does not in fact reason on the basis of a principle which he tries to reinterpret by suggesting a wider application of it. Rather, he criticizes the halakhic approach by making it seem absurd. This effect is achieved by combining the halakhic term ἔξεστιν with the black-and-white alternatives ψυχήν σῶσαι and ἀποκτείνειν. Of course ψυχήν σῶσαι is not only allowed but simply necessary, the alternative being ἀποκτείνειν. Nevertheless, Jesus suggests, there is an approach which, when confronted with Jesus' healing activity, triggers the question whether it is "allowed" to "save a soul" rather than to "kill" on the Sabbath. This is the halakhic approach of his adversaries, who follow the common interpretation of the Sabbath commandment.

This interpretation is now called into question by Jesus. But—and this is significant—the object of his criticism is not a certain interpretation in distinction to the commandment itself. There is no hint of any distinction between the Torah and the halakhah here. Jesus simply turns against the Sabbath commandment as it was interpreted by the teachers of halakhah—without indicating whether the interpretation in question is correct or not.

Jesus, then, does not seem to have been very interested in correcting or modifying existing rules or in proposing new ones—not even in Mark 3:4. His was not an exegetical or a halakhic approach.

(ii) Jesus also defended his Sabbath acts with an awareness that he was inaugurating the eschatological and salvific reign of God. The essentials of this aspect should be clear by now (see above), but an additional comment is apposite here. It concerns what may be termed the "ethical character" of the βασιλεία, which was being mediated by Jesus through his mighty acts.<sup>137</sup> Healing sick people means of course fulfilling their "needs" and showing them "love." Nevertheless, it would be inadequate to state that Jesus simply subjected the Sabbath commandment to human needs or that he appealed to a higher commandhalachischen Diskussionen über den Sabbat verankert ist" (Schabbat, 477; cf. ibid., 478).

---

<sup>136</sup> In Matthew 12:11–12, there is an argument which concludes with the statement ὥστε ἔξεστιν τοῖς σάββασις καλῶς ποιεῖν, which certainly sounds like a new halakhic rule. But this rule is of course secondary; it is the outcome of Matthew's redactional work on Mark 3:4, and hence cannot be used to illuminate Jesus' stance in the matter.

<sup>137</sup> Cf. Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 329.

ment within the Torah, i.e., the love commandment of Lev 19:18. The healing of the withered hand in Mark 3, for example, may of course be described as “eine einfache Liebestat,”<sup>138</sup> but such a description would still not reach the heart of the matter, viz. Jesus’ interpretation of this “simple act” as an instance of the future reign of God being in the process of breaking through into this world of human suffering.

6. Conclusion

Jesus did acts of healing on the Sabbath. This meant that he transgressed the Sabbath commandment as it was interpreted by Pharisees and others. Jesus, then, showed no interest in keeping the Sabbath ἀκριβῶς. He was a non-conformist, but not in the same sense as the radical allegorists, nor in the sense that he was ignorant or lax or liberal, but because he was engaged in “the King’s business”, the βασιλεία-work. Jesus interpreted his acts of healing and his exorcisms in terms of the βασιλεία: God was bringing in the eschatological salvation. This interpretation is reflected also in his Sabbath sayings.

When criticized, he answered the criticism and defended his actions, speaking ὡς ἐξουσίαν ἔχων. But he did not defend himself in a halakhic way. He did not create a novel Jesuanic Sabbath halakhah, e.g., by interpreting the Sabbath commandment in a new way or by extending current halakhic principles. Instead, the basis of the Jesuanic ἐξουσία was a conviction of having an immediate awareness of God’s will and of being on “the King’s business.”

---

<sup>138</sup> Kümmel, “Jesus,” 121. Similarly Jeremias, Theologie, 202; James D. G. Dunn, “Mark 2.1–3:6: A Bridge Between Jesus and Paul on the Question of the Law”, NTS 30 (1984): 408: “The episode illustrates how Jesus extracted from the breadth of the law one overriding principle—love your neighbour.”

JESUS AND THE TEMPLE*

JOSTEIN ÅDNA

Any historical treatment of Jesus of Nazareth must include a discussion of his relationship to the temple in Jerusalem, in view of its position as the religious centre for almost all Jews both in the land of the fathers and throughout the wide Diaspora in the first century CE.<sup>1</sup> Irrespective of how one categorises the historical figure of Jesus<sup>2</sup>—i.e., as a charismatic miracle worker, an itinerant sage, a teacher, a prophet, a messianic claimant, or otherwise—he must be assumed to have consciously and deliberately positioned himself in regard to the temple. In fact, both the gospels and other New Testament writings contain a great number of references to the temple. Hence, there seems to be plenty of evidence accessible for a discussion of Jesus' attitude to the temple. However, an investigation committed to the limited as well as ambitious goal of clarifying how the historical figure Jesus of Nazareth related to the temple in Jerusalem, must critically scrutinise the evidence in order to distinguish between what actually portrays and reflects Jesus within the historical context prior to Easter, and what represents a post-Easter perspective. Consequently, our first task must be to identify the material that might serve our objective of describing Jesus' relationship to the temple in Jerusalem.

---

* Thanks to John Goldie MA for helpful suggestions for linguistic corrections and improvements.

<sup>1</sup> Regarding the temple in Jerusalem as the religious and national centre of the Jewish people in the 1st century CE, also with important political and economic functions, cf. inter alia Shmuel Safrai, "The Temple," in The Jewish People in the First Century: Historical Geography, Political History, Social, Cultural and Religious Life and Institutions, ed. S. Safrai and M. Stern, CRINT 1.2 (Assen/Maastricht: van Gorcum; Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1976; repr., 1987), 865–907; Ed P. Sanders, Judaism: Practice and Belief 63BCE–66CE (London: SCM Press; Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1992), 47–169; Kurt Paesler, Das Tempelwort Jesu: Die Traditionen von Tempelzerstörung und Tempelneuerung im Neuen Testament, FRLANT 184 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1999), 136–149; and Gregory Stevenson, Power and Place: Temple and Identity in the Book of Revelation, BZNBW 107, (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2001), 115–182.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. the book by Ed P. Sanders with the corresponding title: The Historical Figure of Jesus (London: Penguin, 1993).

1. A Survey of Texts in the New Testament Relating to the Temple

New Testament writings whose contents explicitly and unequivocally belong to the post-Easter period, like the Acts of the Apostles and the Epistles, might, notwithstanding their late date, still be of some indirect relevance with regard to the historical Jesus.<sup>3</sup> According to Acts the Christian community in Jerusalem regularly assembled in the temple precincts and porticoes (2:46; 5:12, 42) and, in spite of some obvious tensions and conflicts with the temple authorities (cf. 4:1–3; 5:19–21, 25–26), members of the Christian community also participated in the service of the temple congregation and in sacrificial rites (cf. 3:1; 21:23–24). Of course, a number of varying factors might have influenced Jewish Christians in Jerusalem to act in regard to the temple in these ways.<sup>4</sup> It is likely that one decisive formative element has been Jesus' relationship to it; hence, the more easily the post-Easter Christian practice and theology relating to the temple can be drawn from or at least be put in some causal connection to our reconstructed picture of Jesus' attitude to the temple, the more plausible this reconstruction turns out to be.<sup>5</sup>

Turning to the gospels, the Gospel of John stands out as a particular case which raises a number of specific challenges not unique to the theme of Jesus and the temple, but of a more general kind relating to all research on the historical Jesus. As a matter of fact, the temple, both

---

<sup>3</sup> For an overview over the pertinent texts cf. Jostein Ådna, "Christlicher Umgang mit dem Tempel in Jerusalem: Neues Testament," RGG<sup>3</sup> 8:149–150 (English version forthcoming in the English edition Religion in Past and Present [Leiden; Boston: Brill]). A more detailed treatment is offered by Gabriele Fassbeck, Der Tempel der Christen: Traditionsgeschichtliche Untersuchungen zur Aufnahme des Tempelkonzepts im frühen Christentum, Texte und Arbeiten zum neutestamentlichen Zeitalter 33 (Tübingen: Francke, 2000).

<sup>4</sup> Or, to put this with greater historical caution, a number of factors might have brought Luke or the authors of his sources to conceive of such a practice among early Christians in Jerusalem.

<sup>5</sup> Personally, I include here also theological expositions on Christ or the church as the new sanctuary (e.g. 1 Cor 3:16–17; 2 Cor 6:16; Rev 21:22) and on the death of Christ as the ultimate atoning sacrifice surpassing and substituting the sacrificial cult (e.g. Rom 3:25–26; 1 Pet 3:18; Heb 9:26–28) as parts of early Christian theology assumed to have been influenced by Jesus' position towards the temple. Many scholars are more hesitant with regard to such an a priori assumption of a causal link between Jesus and this kind of post-Easter theology, because they consider Easter to be such a radical break that much theological reasoning in the early church was developed on the basis of the belief in and the experience of the resurrected Lord without any traceable continuity to the pre-Easter situation.

as an institution and as a theological issue, has during recent years attracted Johannine scholars to such an extent that there seems to have been published more on (Jesus and) the temple in the Gospel of John than on the same theme in the other gospels or on the historical Jesus and the temple.<sup>6</sup> Within the synoptic gospels the infancy narratives in Luke 1–2 are characterised by a religious piety oriented towards the temple (cf. 1:5–23; 2:22–24, 41, 49).<sup>7</sup> However, for the purpose of this article we must restrict ourselves to materials that relate to the public ministry of Jesus. Apart from the general presentation in all the gospels that Jesus whilst in Jerusalem spent much time in the temple precincts and porticoes (e.g. John 7:14, 28; 8:20; 10:22–23; Mark 11:27–13:2 par.; Luke 21:37–38), retrospectively summarised by himself at his arrest in Gethsemane, “Day after day I was with you in the temple teaching, and you did not arrest me” (Mark 14:49 NRSV; biblical quotations not following NRSV will be explicitly marked), in particular some specific accounts and logia are relevant. To these belong the accounts about the poor widow’s offering (Mark 12:41–44 par. Luke 21:1–4), the payment of the temple tax (Matt 17:24–27) and the healing of a man with leprosy (Mark 1:40–44 par. Matt 8:1–4 and Luke 5:12–14) and, further, <sup>6</sup> Due to restricted space I cannot list this literature here. Cf. references in the bibliography of Kåre Sigvald Fuglseth, Johannine Sectarianism in Perspective: A Sociological, Historical, and Comparative Analysis of Temple and Social Relationships in the Gospel of John, Philo and Qumran, NovTSup 119 (Leiden; Boston: Brill, 2005) to inter alia the monographs of Gunnar Østenstad, Johannes Frühwald-König, Johanna Rahner (1998) and Alan R. Kerr (2002) as well as to the articles of Mark Kinzer (1998), Judith Lieu (1999) and Jarl H. Ulrichsen (2003). Not mentioned by Fuglseth are Mary L. Coloe, God Dwells with us: Temple Symbolism in the Fourth Gospel (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 2001); Ricardo López Rosas, La Señal del Templo Jn 2,13–22: Redefinición Cristológica de lo Sacro, Biblioteca Mexicana 12 (México: Departamento de Publicaciones Universidad Pontificia de México, 2001) and Mark R. Bredin, “John’s Account of Jesus’ Demonstration in the Temple: Violent or Nonviolent?,” BTB 33 (2003): 44–50. After the completion of this article two new monographs on the temple and the temple act in Mark have appeared: Timothy C. Gray, The Temple in the Gospel of Mark: A Study in its Narrative Role, WUNT 2.242 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2008); Solomon Hon-fai Wong, The Temple Incident in Mark 11, 15–19: The Disclosure of Jesus and the Marcan Faction, New Testament Studies in Contextual Exegesis 5 (Frankfurt a.M.: Peter Lang, 2009).

---

The most recent major work on Jesus and the temple in the other gospels that I am aware of, is Emilio G. Chávez, The Theological Significance of Jesus’ Temple Action in Mark’s Gospel, Toronto Studies in Theology 87 (Lampeter: Mellen, 2002).

<sup>7</sup> Here I refrain from an historical analysis of Luke’s infancy narratives. But even if much of the material in Luke 1–2 might be legendary, nevertheless it reflects a dedicated closeness to the temple characteristic of the Jewish Christian tradents of this source material taken up by the evangelist and utilised by him for the introductory part of his gospel.

the sayings about the offering of a gift at the altar (Matt 5:23–24) and about Jerusalem and the temple as the dwelling place of God (cf. Matt 5:35b and 23:21) as well as Jesus' lament over Jerusalem and its "house" which will be desolated (Luke 13:34–35 par. Matt 23:37–39, cf. also Luke 19:41–44). Notwithstanding the relevance of all these texts, there are, however, one particular account and one group of related logia that stand out as the most conspicuous material for any investigation of Jesus' relationship to the temple in Jerusalem, viz. the account about his temple act, related by all four evangelists (Matt 21:12–17; Mark 11:15–19; Luke 19:45–48; John 2:13–22), and the logia about the destruction, or the destruction and the establishment of the (new) temple (Matt 24:2 par. Mark 13:2 and Luke 21:6, on the one hand, and Matt 26:61; 27:40; Mark 14:58; 15:29; John 2:19; Gos. Thom. 71; Acts 6:14, on the other hand). If the temple act is an historical incident and the sayings about the destruction and renewal of the temple are authentic, these traditions will definitely be the most decisive evidence for clarifying how Jesus of Nazareth related to the temple in Jerusalem. Hence, the bulk of this article (parts 2–4) will be dedicated to an investigation of the temple act and the temple sayings, followed by a very short reflection on how they relate to the rest of the temple-related traditions from Jesus' public ministry, mentioned above (part 5).

2. Historicity and Authenticity of the Temple Act and the Temple Sayings

2.1. The Temple Act

Even though the differing contextual positioning of the account about Jesus' temple act in John, on the one hand, and in the synoptic gospels, on the other, viz. at an early point in Jesus' career contra during his last stay in Jerusalem, has caused a few scholars to deduce that Jesus acted twice in the temple and some more to assume that the Johannine date is correct, the vast majority concludes on very solid grounds in favour of the synoptic chronology.<sup>8</sup>

---

<sup>8</sup> To many modern scholars it is probably a surprise to learn that prior to the upcoming of critical biblical scholarship during and after the Enlightenment there was not a unanimous assumption in exegesis that Jesus performed two temple actions. Christina Metzdorf, Die Tempelaktion Jesu: Patristische und historisch-kritische Exegese im Vergleich, WUNT 2.168 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2003), 42–127, has shown that

However, the demonstration of an original position for the temple act paradosis within the account about Jesus' final stay in Jerusalem does not yet answer the crucial historical question regarding this alleged incident. As a matter of fact, in scholarship weighty objections have been voiced against the temple act, both with regard to the way the evangelists recount it, and with regard to whether it is an imaginable historical event at all. Formulated as critical questions, these objections can be put in the following way: 1) How was one person alone able to drive out all the merchants, animals and buyers from the huge outer court of the temple? 2) Why did the money-changers and the sellers, and perhaps the buyers as well, not resist this enforced closing of the temple market? 3) Why did the Jewish temple police not intervene to stop Jesus in obstructing the market activities? 4) Finally, why did the Roman soldiers in the Antonia fortress, at the north-western corner of the temple area, not intervene to put down this violent uprising?<sup>9</sup>

An unconvincing attempt to counteract these serious objections against the historicity is, in my opinion, the claim that Jesus actually acted together with a huge group of followers in attacking and success-both the number of incidents as well as many other historical questions relating to the temple act were extensively discussed in patristic literature. For a survey of opinions in modern scholarship on the number of temple actions and, in case of only one, its chronological date cf. Metzdorf, 183–185, and Jostein Ådna, Jesu Stellung zum Tempel: Die Tempelaktion und das Tempelwort als Ausdruck seiner messianischen Sendung, WUNT 2.119 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2000), 190 n. 89, 309–316. The most recent advocacy of an early date for Jesus' temple act has been presented by Jerome Murphy-O'Connor, "Jesus and the Money Changers (Mark 11:15–17; John 2:13–17)," RB 107 (2000): 42–55. The premise for his assumption that "Jesus' action against the money changers in the temple must be placed very early in his career" (53), is that it was borne by an attitude and a message identical to that of John the Baptist which Jesus according to Murphy-O'Connor shared during the first phase of his public ministry and is to be distinguished from the second, independent phase after the arrest of the Baptist.

---

<sup>9</sup> For a detailed presentation of these objections against the historicity of the temple act, with due references to the scholarly literature (e.g. Ernst Haenchen, Der Weg Jesu: Eine Erklärung des Markus-Evangeliums und der kanonischen Parallelen, 2nd ed. (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1968], 382–389), cf. Ådna, Jesu Stellung, 8–11, 300–301. Ernst Lohmeyer, Das Evangelium des Markus, KEK 1.2, 17th ed. (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1967), 237, has managed to concentrate the most crucial points in one sentence: "Geschichtlich läßt sich der Vorfall kaum noch ganz erkennen; denn es ist schwer vorstellbar, wie Jesus allein den weiten Tempelplatz sollte gesäubert haben, weshalb die Tempelpolizei nicht eingegriffen hat...oder die römische Wache auf der Burg Antonia, weshalb diese Tat in dem Prozeß Jesu keine Rolle spielt." Objections of this kind against the historicity were already discussed in patristic exegesis; the most detailed discussion is to be found in Origen according to Metzdorf, Die Tempelaktion Jesu, 50–54.

fully bringing the whole temple under his control so that there was no time or room for any resistance.<sup>10</sup> A potentially valid defence of the historicity against the referred objections is, however, that the scene of Jesus' temple act was limited to a small area within the temple precincts and that the incident itself was a fairly modest episode not even attracting the interest of the Roman soldiers. An important result of the archaeological research in Jerusalem after 1967 has been a more precise comprehension of the character of the Herodian Temple than before. The combination of the available archaeological-architectural and literary evidence now leads to the conclusion that the temple market was situated in the basilica-like hall along the southern wall of the Herodian Temple complex, extensively described by Josephus, and named by him the Royal Stoa (Ant. 15.411–416).<sup>11</sup> During recent years a number of scholars have accepted the Royal Stoa (or the Royal <sup>10</sup> Those who regard Jesus as a messianic claimant with affinity to the Zealots describe his temple act as a revolutionary attack on the temple, cf. S. G. F. Brandon, Jesus and the Zealots (Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1967), esp. 331–340. However, the assumption that Jesus was supported by a huge crowd of followers in taking over the control of the temple has also been advocated independently of the idea that he was a Zealot revolutionary, e.g. by Joachim Jeremias, New Testament Theology (London: SCM Press, 1971), 228, and Ben F. Meyer, Christus Faber: The Master Builder and the House of God (Allison Park, PA: Pickwick Publications, 1992), 263–264. For a critical assessment of such “maximalist” historical reconstructions cf. Ådna, Jesu Stellung, 301–306.

Bruce Chilton, who already in The Temple of Jesus: His Sacrificial Program Within a Cultural History of Sacrifice (University Park: Pennsylvania State University, 1992) repeatedly spoke about “Jesus’ occupation of the Temple” (cf. inter alia the title of the sixth chapter, 91–111), has recently given a vivid description of Jesus’ takeover of the temple, assisted by some 150 to 200 supporters, in Rabbi Jesus: An Intimate Biography (New York: Doubleday, 2000), 228–230. What Chilton offers is purely novelistic fiction, however, which might be entertaining and fascinating to read, but which has nothing to do with serious historical reconstruction.

<sup>11</sup> Cf. numerous articles by the late Benjamin Mazar, the director of the excavations south and south-west of the Temple Mount in Jerusalem during the years 1968–1977, and by his co-worker, the architect Leen Ritmeyer, e.g. B. Mazar, “The Royal Stoa in the Southern Part of the Temple Mount,” PAAJR 46–47 (1979–1980): 381–387, repr. in Recent Archaeology in the Land of Israel, ed. H. Shanks (Washington: Biblical Archaeology Society; Jerusalem: Israel Exploration Society, 1984), 141–147. For a detailed archaeological and architectural analysis supporting the identification of the Royal Stoa as the site of the temple market, cf. Jostein Ådna, Jerusalem Tempel und Tempelmarkt im 1. Jahrhundert n.Chr., Abhandlungen des Deutschen Palästina-Vereins 25 (Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 1999), 3–90. Although not mentioning the Royal Stoa explicitly, Dan Bahat, “Jesus and the Herodian Temple Mount,” in Jesus and Archaeology, ed. James H. Charlesworth (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2006), 300–308, at 306, also situates the stalls of the money changers here, i.e., in the “space which is more or less in the area occupied today by the Aqsa mosque.”

Portico) as the scene of Jesus' encounter with the money-changers and the vendors of doves.<sup>12</sup>

Before we can go any further towards a conclusion regarding the historicity of Jesus' act based on historically imaginable circumstances in the temple, we must also address another set of objections that have been raised in recent scholarship. According to George Wesley Buchanan, the account of Jesus' action is a midrashic composition in which early Christians who believed that Jesus was the Messiah attributed to him an act of cleansing of the temple from an alleged "necessity of the doctrines and messianic expectations."<sup>13</sup> Henk Jan de Jonge has proposed a similar origin for this paradosis, claiming that the belief among Christians that Jesus had inaugurated God's kingdom on earth brought some of them to deduce that Jesus then must have fulfilled the prophetic vision of Zechariah 14 which culminates in the statement: "and there shall no longer be traders in the house of the LORD of hosts on that day" (v. 21b). Hence, the cleansing of the temple, recounted in Mark 11:15, "is a response in narrative form to the prophetic vision of Zech 14:21," and as a consequence of this recognition of the character of the tradition "any attempt to interpret it as an account of an historical event in Jesus' life becomes superfluous."<sup>14</sup>

---

<sup>12</sup> In addition to those already mentioned in Adna, Jerusalemer Tempel, 89—viz., Richard M. Mackowski, Eckhart Otto, David Flusser, Peter Stuhlmacher, Rainer Riesner and Helmut Merklein—cf. P. M. Casey, "Culture and Historicity: The Cleansing of the Temple", CBQ 59 (1997): 306–332, at 309; Murphy-O'Connor, "Jesus and the Money Changers," 44; Adela Yarbro Collins, "Jesus' Action in Herod's Temple," in Antiquity and Humanity: Essays on Ancient Religion and Philosophy Presented to Hans Dieter Betz on his 70th Birthday, ed. idem and M. M. Mitchell (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2001), 45–61, 58; Anna Maria Schwemer, "Jesus Christus als Prophet, König und Priester: Das munus triplex und die frühe Christologie," in Der messianische Anspruch Jesu und die Anfänge der Christologie: Vier Studien, ed. Martin Hengel and Anna Maria Schwemer, WUNT 138 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2001), 165–230, at 221; Dieter Zeller, "Die Beseitigung des Handels im Tempel (Mark 11,15–19): Ein Beispiel für die umstrittene Stellung Jesu zum jüdischen Kult", in Variationen des Christseins—Wege durch die Kirchengeschichte: Festschrift Peter Fiedler, Übergänge 7, ed. Reinhard Wunderlich and Bernd Feininger (Frankfurt a.M.: Peter Lang, 2006), 65–81, at 69 and 80.

<sup>13</sup> G. W. Buchanan, "Symbolic Money-Changers in the Temple?," NTS 37 (1991): 280–290, at 284.

<sup>14</sup> Henk Jan de Jonge, "The Cleansing of the Temple in Mark 11:15 and Zechariah 14:21," in The Book of Zechariah and its Influence, ed. Christopher Tuckett (Hampshire: Ashgate, 2003), 87–99, at 93. Ibid., 94: "The idea . . . that in Jesus' ministry God had begun to intervene in the history of mankind . . . was given a narrative form with the aid of the notion of the absence of traders from the temple . . . If Jesus' followers believed him to be the one who had inaugurated God's reign on earth, it was quite natural for them to believe that on arriving in Jerusalem he had driven out the traders from the temple."

Some other scholars have suggested that the scene in the temple was invented by the evangelist Mark as a fictitious narrative unit to serve his overarching theological agenda.

The temple act cannot be historical. If one deletes from the story those themes essential to the Markan plots, there is nothing left over for historical reminiscence. The anti-temple theme is clearly Markan and the reasons for it can be explained.<sup>15</sup>

[T]he act fits the Second Gospel's plot line so well that its compositional appropriateness far outweighs the difficulties in trying to conceive it as a historical event...When the aims of Mark are considered, the temple act can be seen to fit nicely into his literary agenda for his gospel. Logic dictates that the compositional alternative be chosen over the historical one.<sup>16</sup>

In two almost identical essays on historical method Robert J. Miller has argued strongly in favour of the methodology inherent in these two quoted examples, only conceding a valid assumption of historicity if "we have no other reasonable way to account for the presence of a story in the text."<sup>17</sup> Such extreme pleading on principle against historicity in the New Testament gospels, exemplified in the rejection that "any behavior by the historical Jesus...might have stood as the source of the traditions concerning the temple act,"<sup>18</sup> has provoked some strong counterattacks. For instance, Jerome Murphy-O'Connor has characterised Miller as a "partisan of ahistoricity," and he cor-

<sup>15</sup> Burton L. Mack, A Myth of Innocence: Mark and Christian Origins (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988), 292.

<sup>16</sup> David Seeley, "Jesus' Temple Act," CBQ 55 (1993): 263–283, at 280 and 283. Cf. also Seeley's reaction to the criticism by P. M. Casey (cf. n. 12) in "Jesus' Temple Act Revisited: A Response to P. M. Casey," CBQ 62 (2000): 55–63. Also in this second article Seeley firmly holds to his rejection of the historicity of the incident: "[T]he easiest and simplest course is still to take the episode as a Marcan composition" (63).

Whereas Seeley, "Jesus' Temple Act," 280, considers it as possible that Mark "may have come upon Zech 14:21 and realized that it offered just the tack he needed for his narrative," de Jonge ascribes the creation of the temple act narrative, inspired by this verse, to some anonymous followers of Jesus prior to Mark, and claims that Mark probably was no longer aware of the narrative's origin in this prophetic vision: "For Mark, the traditional Jewish religion had failed. Mark's view of the temple cult is diametrically opposed to that of Zech 14. It is hard to believe, therefore, that Mark still saw any relationship between his cleansing story and Zech 14:21" (de Jonge, 95).

<sup>17</sup> R. J. Miller, "The (A)Historicity of Jesus' Temple Demonstration: A Test Case in Methodology," SBL.SP 127 (1991): 235–252; idem, "Historical Method and the Deeds of Jesus: The Test Case of the Temple Demonstration," Forum 8 (1992): 5–30. The quote is taken from "Historical Method," 29.

<sup>18</sup> Seeley, "Jesus' Temple Act," 264 n. 2 (italics in the text).

rectly observes that “Miller’s statement is not a methodological principle guaranteeing knowledge, it is an invitation to scepticism.”<sup>19</sup> He is joined by P. M. Casey who states,

Since this excludes by method any possibility that a gospel writer could find his plot on correct information about an important sequence of events, it should not be accepted as a principle for serious historical research. Rather, it illustrates the destructive nature of this approach to criticism of the Gospels.<sup>20</sup>

According to Casey’s judgement, the method of giving priority to a compositional origin of gospel accounts “is especially disastrous in dealing with the cleansing of the temple, which has a Sitz im Leben only in the life of Jesus.”<sup>21</sup> Whether or not the account about Jesus’ temple act might have a plausible Sitz im Leben exclusively in the historical context of Jesus and not in the early church is, of course, a matter of dispute linked to the discussion of how this episode is to be interpreted. But anyway, the justification for assuming an origin of the temple act paradosis in an historical event is in my opinion well founded. If we return to the point made above regarding an historically imaginable frame for an act of this kind in the basilica-like Royal Stoa in the temple, and supplement the finding of this plausible scene with a literary-critical and a traditio-critical analysis of the pertinent gospel texts, we will be able to reach a more definite conclusion on the historicity.

There is almost unanimous agreement among scholars that the Matthean and Lukan versions of the temple act are dependent on the Markan account.<sup>22</sup> Whether there exists a literary link to the Johannine

---

<sup>19</sup> Murphy-O’Connor, “Jesus and the Money Changers,” 44. Contrary to its claim, the principle of priority of a compositional origin over an historical one weakens the critical judgement regarding historicity because “all that one needs to deny the historicity of an event is an imagination fertile enough to develop a hypothesis explaining how the story might have been created” (ibid.).

<sup>20</sup> Casey, “Culture and Historicity,” 331 (italics in the text). Addressed at Seeley in particular, Casey declares that his “argument excludes by method even the possibility that there was a real event which was later written up with secondary material... Seeley has done what he accuses Mark of: he has written fiction, only he has done it by making up interpretations of which there is little or no sign in the text” (329, 330; italics in the text).

<sup>21</sup> Ibid., 329. In Ådna, Jesu Stellung, 317–321, I discussed the contributions by Buchanan, Mack, Seeley and Miller and concluded in agreement with Casey.

<sup>22</sup> This evaluation, in full agreement with the dominant two source theory on the synoptic problem, is upheld among scholars in spite of the fact that the Markan version contains some additional elements missing both in Matthew and Luke, i.e. in version too is more disputed. In agreement with inter alios Peder Borgen and Mark A. Matson I consider John's version to be literarily independent of the synoptics.<sup>23</sup> The assumption of the literary independence of John 2:13–22 naturally leads to considerations about whether the present version is the result of a redactional adaptation of an earlier pre-Johannine stage of the tradition, and consequently about the relationship between this version and the alleged pre-Markan stage of the synoptic branch of tradition. It is common to regard certain elements unique to the pre-Johannine tradition—foremost the presence of sheep and cattle in the temple market as well as Jesus' usage of a whip of cords—as secondary, dramatising features added to the story.<sup>24</sup> Therefore, scholars only rarely claim a general priority for the whole part of the pre-Johannine version with a comparable parallel in Mark, i.e. John 2:14–16*, over against the corresponding pre-Markan tradition. Till Arend Mohr is one of the few firm proponents of such a view.<sup>25</sup> My own conclusion to a detailed traditio-critical analysis of John 2:13–22 is that the earliest level of pre-Johannine tradition is restricted to elements which are common with what is recounted in Mark 11:15, i.e. that Jesus overturned tables of the money-changers and that he had a confrontation with the sellers of doves.<sup>26</sup>

Turning finally to the traditio-critical analysis of Mark 11:15–19, we find that a number of scholars restrict the pre-Markan part of the tra-

---

particular the whole verse Mark 11:16 and the phrase “for all the nations” (πᾶσιν τοῖς ἔθνεσιν) in the quotation from Isa 56:7 as part of Jesus' accompanying word. In my opinion it is not necessary to claim that there existed an “Ur-Markus” in which these elements were not present and to which the two other synoptic gospels related, in order to advocate Matthew's and Luke's dependence on Mark. Cf. my literary-critical analysis of the synoptic parallel accounts in Ådna, Jesu Stellung, 159–178.

<sup>23</sup> The assessment of this question partly depends on how scholars view the literary relationship between John and the other gospels in general. For a denial of literary dependence cf. Ådna, Jesu Stellung, 179–190; Peder Borgen, “John and the Synoptics,” in idem, Early Christianity and Hellenistic Judaism (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1996), 121–157, and M. A. Matson, “The Contribution to the Temple Cleansing by the Fourth Gospel,” SBLSP 128 (1992): 489–506, at 499: “We are left, then, with too many unexplained differences to fit into a model of literary relationship... it is best to conclude that John contains an independent version of the same episode.”

<sup>24</sup> Cf. Ådna, Jesu Stellung, 191–193. Sheep and cattle were purchased at markets outside the temple (cf. Ådna, Jerusalem Tempel, 120–126).

<sup>25</sup> Till Arend Mohr, Markus- und Johannespassion: Redaktions- und traditions-geschichtliche Untersuchung der Markinischen und Johanneischen Passionstradition, Abhandlungen zur Theologie des Alten und Neuen Testaments 70 (Zürich: Theologischer Verlag, 1982), 86–92.

<sup>26</sup> Cf. Paesler, Das Tempelwort Jesu, 72–74 and Ådna, Jesu Stellung, 191–212 and the scholarly literature referred to there.

dition solely to v. 15b, “And he entered the temple and began to drive out those who were selling and those who were buying in the temple, and he overturned the tables of the money-changers and the seats of those who sold doves.”<sup>27</sup> According to these scholars, the subsequent v. 16, “and he did not allow anyone to carry any vessel through the temple” (my translation), is a secondary expansion.<sup>28</sup> However, many scholars do not accept the premise that v. 16 contradicts v. 15b or that it is too enigmatic to be an inherent part of the paradosis, and therefore they consider v. 16 to belong to the same stage as v. 15(b).<sup>29</sup> Moving on to v. 17, we find that many scholars who have different opinions regarding the inner relationship between the preceding verses 15(b) and 16, agree that this verse did not belong to the original form of the paradosis; mostly they regard it as a Markan redactional addition: “He was teaching and saying, ‘Is it not written, “My house shall be called a house of prayer for all the nations”? But you have made it a den of robbers.’” Although they do not recognise v. 17 as part of the pre-Markan version, many of these scholars nevertheless assume that

---

<sup>27</sup> Paesler, Das Tempelwort Jesu, 234–242, delivers a literary- and traditio-critical analysis of Mark 11:15–19 which concludes that only v. 15b belongs to the earliest level (of a development in altogether four stages): “Da nun an V. 15b keinerlei Spuren späterer Bearbeitung zu erkennen sind, steht Mark 11, 15b somit als die älteste greifbare Tradition der Tempelreinigung Jesu und damit wohl auch als der historische Kern dieser Überlieferung fest” (241–242). Also Ed P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (London: SCM Press, 1985) (deduced from his explicit statements about the secondary character of vv. 16 and 17 [364 n. 1 and p. 66]) and Zeller, “Die Beseitigung des Handels,” 68, reckon v. 15b as the traditio-critical nucleus of the temple act paradosis. Maria Trautmann, Zeichenhafte Handlungen Jesu: Ein Beitrag zur Frage nach dem geschichtlichen Jesus, Forschungen zur Bibel 37 (Würzburg: Echter Verlag, 1980), 83–84, holds the whole of v. 15 to be original.

<sup>28</sup> Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 364 n. 1 even seems to contemplate the possibility that this verse might be a late gloss added to the Markan text. Some scholars consider v. 16 as a Markan redactional addition, but because of the verse’s enigmatic character, as seen from a Markan perspective, it is more common to ascribe v. 16 to a particular Jewish-Christian stage of the tradition process, as do Trautmann, Zeichenhafte Handlungen, 108–109, and Paesler, Das Tempelwort Jesu, 240–241, according to whom v. 16, together with parts of v. 17, represents the second stage, characterised as “juden-christliche Neuinterpretation” (242), of the four he reckons with (cf. n. 27).

<sup>29</sup> E.g., Rudolf Bultmann, Die Geschichte der synoptischen Tradition, FRLANT 29, 9th ed. (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1979), 36; Mohr, Markus- und Johanespassion, 92; John Dominic Crossan, The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1991), 359; Peter Richardson, “Why Turn the Tables? Jesus’ Protest in the Temple Precincts,” SBL.SP 128 (1992): 507–523, 521; Collins, “Jesus’ Action in Herod’s Temple,” 46–47, and Casey, “Culture and Historicity,” 310: “Jesus’ prohibition of carrying through is entirely coherent with his removal of traders.”

Jesus' action in the temple was accompanied by some words that commented on or explained what he was doing.<sup>30</sup> Varying proposals have been made regarding which original saying has been replaced by the present v. 17: First, the corresponding words of Jesus in the Johannine version, "Stop making my Father's house a marketplace!" (John 2:16b) have been suggested as the original accompanying saying;<sup>31</sup> second, both Mark 13:2 and 14:58, or some pre-Markan version of these sayings, have been proposed;<sup>32</sup> and, third, some have suggested an original saying by Jesus of which no direct trait or echo is any longer preserved in the New Testament.<sup>33</sup> However, in spite of this widespread scepticism against Mark 11:17, during recent years an increasing acceptance of the authenticity of this verse can clearly be observed.<sup>34</sup> In my opinion, both vv. 15b–16 and 17 belong to the original temple act tradition, with a possible exception for the introduction of the saying in v. 17, καὶ ἐδίδασκεν καὶ ἔλεγεν αὐτοῖς, whereas v. 18 is a redactional, albeit historically accurate, comment, and vv. 15a and 19 make up the redactional frame which integrates the episode in the temple into the Markan chronological scheme of eight days for the events

<sup>30</sup> Cf. Zeller, "Die Beseitigung des Handels," 68: "[E]s deutet doch einiges darauf hin, dass die Handlung Jesu in einem vormarkinischen Stadium einmal von einem tadelnden Wort Jesu, womöglich mit Anspielung auf die Schrift, begleitet war."

<sup>31</sup> Bultmann, Geschichte, 36; Mohr, Markus, 89, 92–95.

<sup>32</sup> Trautmann, Zeichenhafte Handlungen, 122–126; Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 71–77, at 75: "[T]he action and the saying form a unity. Jesus predicted (or threatened) the destruction of the temple and carried out an action symbolic of its destruction by demonstrating against the performance of the sacrifices." Cf. also Sanders, The Historical Figure, 260. Alternatively, Crossan, The Historical Jesus, 359, opts for Gos. Thom. 71 as the version of the temple saying spoken by Jesus at the occasion of his action in the temple.

<sup>33</sup> If, as some scholars assume, the temple act was inspired by or intended to hint at some other prophetic texts than those clearly reflected in Mark 11:17 (cf. 3.2.4), Jesus likely expressed this in an appropriate saying.

<sup>34</sup> Among recent advocates of the authenticity of Mark 11:17, the following can be mentioned: Barry D. Smith, "Objections to the Authenticity of Mark 11:17 Reconsidered," WTJ 54 (1992): 255–271; Casey, "Culture and Historicity," 311; Kim Huat Tan, The Zion Traditions and the Aims of Jesus, SNTSMS 91 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997), 181–185; Hans Dieter Betz, "Jesus and the Purity of the Temple (Mark 11:15–18): A Comparative Religion Approach," JBL 116 (1997): 455–472, at 458 and 467. Cf. Ådna, Jesu Stellung, 225 n. 240, for more scholars in favour of the authenticity of Jesus' saying in v. 17b. Whereas Crossan in The Historical Jesus favoured Gos. Thom. 71 as the authentic saying of Jesus on the occasion of the temple act (cf. n. 32), John Dominic Crossan and Jonathan L. Reed, Excavating Jesus: Beneath the Stones, Behind the Texts, rev. and updated ed. (San Francisco: HarperCollins, 2001), 262–263, accept the scriptural citation from Jer 7:11 and only mention Gos. Thom. 71 in passing as "an independent version" (264).

from Jesus' entry into Jerusalem until the finding of the empty tomb (Mark 11:1–16:8).<sup>35</sup> Together with most scholars, I assume that in the pre-Markan stage the account about Jesus' temple act was directly combined with the request for his authority to act in such a provocative way in Mark 11:27–33.<sup>36</sup>

Combining the outcome of the literary-critical and traditio-critical analysis with the discussion of historical plausibility above, we reach a conclusion regarding the historical reconstruction of the episode in the temple: Inside the Royal Stoa, where the temple market was situated, Jesus overturned some tables and seats belonging to the money-changers and the vendors of doves. Further, he did not allow the transport of vessels between the market area and the inner parts of the temple,<sup>37</sup> and he began to drive out of the market hall some of those who were selling and buying sacrificial items.<sup>38</sup>

2.2. The Sayings About the Temple

We turn to the second group of traditions that we have identified as important for clarifying Jesus' attitude to the temple. The most

---

<sup>35</sup> For a detailed analysis, with extensive references to the scholarly literature, cf. Ådna, Jesu Stellung, 213–231, 315.

<sup>36</sup> Cf. Ådna, Jesu Stellung, 231–238, with due references to the scholarly literature.

<sup>37</sup> This is my understanding of Mark 11:16; cf. Jesu Stellung, 256–265 (see the criticism in Zeller, "Die Beseitigung des Handels," 69 n. 14).

<sup>38</sup> Although during recent years more scholars than those referred to above have rejected or, at least, strongly doubted the historicity of Jesus' temple act (e.g., Jürgen Becker, Jesus von Nazaret [Berlin: de Gruyter, 1996], 407–410; Paula Fredriksen, Jesus of Nazareth: King of the Jews [New York: Vintage Books, 2000], 232, 251; Peter Fiedler, "Kultkritik im Neuen Testament?," in Liturgiereformen: Historische Studien zu einem bleibenden Grundzug des christlichen Gottesdienstes. I: Biblische Modelle und Liturgiereformen von der Frühzeit bis zur Aufklärung, ed. Martin Klöckener and Benedikt Kraneemann, Liturgiewissenschaftliche Quellen und Forschungen 88, [Münster: Aschendorf, 2002], 68–94, 84–85), it is nevertheless widely accepted today that something happened at this occasion in the temple. In addition to the scholars referred to in nn. 12 and 27–34, this holds true for inter alios Marcus J. Borg (cf. 3.1.3); N. Thomas Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God, Christian Origins and the Question of God, vol. 2 (London: SPCK, 1996), 415 n. 175, 424–425; James D. G. Dunn, Jesus Remembered, Christianity in the Making, vol. 1 (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2003), 637; Ulrich Wilckens, Theologie des Neuen Testaments, vol. I.2 (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 2003), 61, and Alexander J. M. Wedderburn, "Jesus' Action in the Temple: A Key or a Puzzle?," ZNW 97 (2006): 1–22, at 6–8. A strong case in favour of the historicity is now also made by Klyne R. Snodgrass, "The Temple Incident," in Key Events in the Life of the Historical Jesus: A Collaborative Exploration of Context and Coherence, ed. Darrel L. Block and Robert L. Webb, WUNT 247 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2009), 429–480, esp. 429–439.

detailed treatment of this material is to be found in Kurt Paesler's book Das Tempelwort Jesu, which actually is the only monograph ever exclusively dedicated to a source critical analysis and a historical interpretation of Jesus' temple saying(s), and in my book Jesu Stellung zum Tempel.<sup>39</sup> The following presentation will, therefore, mainly be based on these two studies.

Few scholars claim that absolutely all the logia about the destruction and renewal of the temple in Jerusalem which the gospels attribute to Jesus, originated after Easter, or even after the destruction of the temple in 70 CE.<sup>40</sup> However, the variations between the different versions of the temple sayings—e.g., between those consisting of only one part, portending the destruction of the temple (Mark 13:2 par.; Acts 6:14), and those which add a second part about the succeeding renewal, or the differences regarding the exact content (Mark 14:58 being the most comprehensive version)—play a decisive role in combination with the scholars' general theories about how the sources are interrelated, when they seek to reconstruct an authentic form of Jesus' temple logion.

The most comprehensive version of the temple saying is found in Mark 14:58: "I will destroy this temple that is made with hands, and in three days I will build another, not made with hands (ἐγὼ καταλύσω τὸν ναὸν τοῦτον τὸν χειροποίητον καὶ διὰ τριῶν ἡμερῶν ἄλλον ἀχειροποίητον οἰκοδομήσω)." Paesler and I agree that all the shorter variants in Mark 15:29; Matt 26:61; 27:40 and Acts 6:14 are secondary to or dependent on Mark 14:58 in spite of its comprehensiveness. More specifically, Paesler considers all four to be redactional adaptations of Mark 14:58.<sup>41</sup>

The temple saying is also present in the Gospel of Thomas; "Jesus says: 'I will [destroy this] house, and no one will be able to build it [again]'" (Gos. Thom. 71).<sup>42</sup> John Dominic Crossan has argued in

<sup>39</sup> Cf. how Christina Metzdorf, Die Tempelaktion Jesu, 192–194, compares the results of Paesler's and my analyses of the temple saying traditions.

<sup>40</sup> Cf. Becker, Jesus von Nazaret, 402–406, for such an evaluation of the evidence.

<sup>41</sup> Cf. Paesler, Das Tempelwort Jesu, 11–60, and Ådna, Jesu Stellung, 111–128. Alternatively, some scholars assume that the first part of the temple saying with the threat of destruction originated in Stephen and his Hellenistic circle; cf. Lloyd Gaston, No Stone on Another: Studies in the Significance of the Fall of Jerusalem in the Synoptic Gospels, NovTSup 23 (Leiden: Brill, 1970), 161–162 (cf. the helpful overview of Gaston's position in Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 364–365 n. 5), and Morna Hooker, "Traditions about the Temple in the Sayings of Jesus," BJRL 70 (1988): 7–19 (16).

<sup>42</sup> English translation according to Synopsis Quattuor Evangeliorum, 15th rev. ed. (Stuttgart: Deutsche Bibelgesellschaft, 1996), 537. Retranslation of the Coptic text of

favour of the primacy of this version, whose second part he interprets as an emphatic statement of the temple's complete and irrevocable demolition, expressed through the rendering, "I will destroy this house utterly beyond repair."<sup>43</sup> However, the inherent assumption that the second element of this saying was secondarily substituted by a contradictory positive statement about a future (re)building of the temple<sup>44</sup> is very unlikely.<sup>45</sup> Further, the usage of the auxiliary verb δύνασθαι in the second part as in Matt 26:61 and of "house" (οἶκος) instead of "temple" (ναός) as object also indicates the secondary nature of this version of the saying.<sup>46</sup> According to Paesler, "house" has replaced "temple" and has probably taken on the metaphorical meaning of "human body."<sup>47</sup> If this analysis is correct, in Gos. Thom. 71 the saying has been transformed to a denial of man's bodily resurrection. Within the context of the Gospel of Thomas this logion clearly expresses a gnostic notion of surpassing the material world and liberation from bodily imprisonment.<sup>48</sup>

After having eliminated the synoptic parallels of Mark 14:58 as well as Acts 6:14 and Gos. Thom. 71, we are left with John 2:19 as the last competing alternative: "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will logion 71 to Greek: λέγει Ἰησοῦς· καταλύσω [τοῦτον τὸν] οἶκον καὶ οὐδεὶς δυνήσεται [πάλιν] οἰκοδομῆσαι αὐτόν (ibid.).

---

<sup>43</sup> Crossan, The Historical Jesus, 359 (my italics). Crossan's inclination to give priority to the version extant in the Gospel of Thomas is, at least partly, influenced by his general preference for this gospel as a source of reliable information about the historical Jesus (cf. ibid., 427–450).

<sup>44</sup> Cf. Crossan, 356: "I take Gospel of Thomas 71 as the most original version we have, and it simply states emphatically: I will destroy this house so utterly that rebuilding will be impossible. The rebuilding does not, initially, reflect any spiritual substitution but is merely an emphatic way of stating utterly, completely, totally, and forever. It is not this version that eased off the rebuilding, taken negatively, but the other versions that have developed the rebuilding, taken positively."

<sup>45</sup> Cf. the convincing argument in Paesler, Das Tempelwort Jesu, 116.

<sup>46</sup> Cf. Paesler, 116–118. He rejects Stephen J. Patterson's proposal that "this house" originally meant the Herodian dynasty and only after the death of Agrippa I in 44 CE was secondarily applied to the temple (cf. Paesler, 111–112, with references to Patterson, The Gospel of Thomas and Jesus [Sonoma, CA: Polebridge Press, 1993]).

<sup>47</sup> Paesler regards 2 Cor 5:1 as a variant of the temple saying in which "house" (οἰκία) has the same metaphorical meaning (93–110). "House" as a metaphor for the human body has a Platonic background (cf. 96–97 n. 19 and 117 nn. 38, 39).

<sup>48</sup> Cf. Paesler, 119–120: "In seiner heutigen Gestalt meint das Tempelwort des ThEv vermutlich den Leib. Möglich ist auch eine Deutung auf den Kosmos als οἶκος des Menschen; ein wesentlicher Unterschied zwischen beiden Deutungen besteht nicht, da das Log 71 in beiden Fällen die in Jesus begründete Aufhebung aller materieller Bindung als das Heilsziel des Gnostikers beschreibt."

raise it up (λύσατε τὸν ναὸν τοῦτον καὶ ἐν τρισὶν ἡμέραις ἐγερῶ αὐτόν).” Some scholars combine the observation that the version in Mark 14:58, according to which Jesus is the one who will destroy the temple (ἐγὼ καταλύσω), is characterised by the evangelist as a false testimony (Mark 14:57), and the usage of the imperative plural in John 2:19 (λύσατε), which is introduced by the evangelist as an explicit saying by Jesus himself, and conclude that the distortion in the presentation given by the witnesses during the interrogation recounted in Mark 14:53–55 must have been the accusation that Jesus himself intended to destroy the holy place.<sup>49</sup> In John 2:21 the temple that Jesus will raise up in three days is identified as his risen body. The use of ἐγείρειν in the second part of the temple saying instead of οἰκοδομεῖν as in all the parallels is obviously a redactional alteration to facilitate this application (cf. John 2:22, as well). The change to the second plural in the first part, which makes the saying an address to the Jewish opponents of Jesus, serves exactly the same adaptation of the saying to the body of Jesus; we can render it as follows: “If you destroy my body, I will raise it from the dead in three days.” According to the evangelist this is exactly what happened as his narrative unfolds (cf. John 11:47–53; 18:30.40; 19:6–7.12). In my opinion all the differences in John 2:19 as compared to Mark 14:58 can be explained as conscious editorial alterations of the Markan version.<sup>50</sup>

Kurt Paesler too regards the Johannine version of the temple saying as the result of redactional activity,<sup>51</sup> but unlike me, he does not derive it from Mark 14:58, but from an alleged independent pre-Johannine version: καταλύσω τὸν ναὸν τοῦτον καὶ διὰ τριῶν ἡμερῶν οἰκοδομήσω αὐτόν (John 2:19*<sup>52</sup>). Paesler is convinced that the phrase “in three days” must refer to the resurrection of Jesus,<sup>53</sup> and because of the inner tension between the object in the first and in the second part caused by διὰ τριῶν ἡμερῶν, he assumes an even earlier version without this

<sup>49</sup> Cf. Ådna, Jesu Stellung, 115 n. 89, for examples of scholars who argue in this way.

<sup>50</sup> Cf. Ådna, Jesu Stellung, 112 n. 84 and 116–117, including n. 93.

<sup>51</sup> According to Paesler, Das Tempelwort Jesu, 66–67, the editorial changes by the evangelist include the imperative of λύειν, the preposition ἐν and ἐγερῶ. Paesler, 61–75, discusses the Johannine version of the temple saying within the context of John 2:13–22 and attributes also the combination of the temple act and the saying to the evangelist (68–69).

<sup>52</sup> Ibid., 74–75.

<sup>53</sup> Cf. Ibid., 167–178.

element—καταλύσω τὸν ναὸν τούτου καὶ οἰκοδομήσω αὐτόν (labelled John 2:19<sup>(*)</sup>)—according to which the temple in Jerusalem will be the object of both Jesus' future destruction and his (re)building activity.<sup>54</sup>

The most conspicuous difference between the reconstructed John 2:19* and Mark 14:58 is the latter's distinction between the temple that Jesus will destroy and the one that he will build, expressed through the added attributes χειροποίητος and ἀχειροποίητος. Paesler submits these epithets to a detailed examination. They are topoi from Greek and Jewish philosophical temple criticism, taken up by Hellenistic Jewish Christians in Jerusalem who had replaced the atoning cult of the temple by the invocation of Jesus' name, and in line with this Christological replacement of the temple had added the attributes χειροποίητος and ἀχειροποίητος to the earlier version of the temple saying found in John 2:19*.<sup>55</sup>

As already noted above, I consider John 2:19 to be directly dependent on Mark 14:58 and see no need or justification for assuming any independent pre-Johannine variant(s) as the earliest version of the two-part temple saying, from which both John 2:19 and Mark 14:58 are allegedly drawn. In my opinion, the epithets χειροποίητος and ἀχειροποίητος applied to the temple in Jerusalem are associated with a strong Jewish apocalyptic tradition, frequently relating to Exod 15:17b–18 as its scriptural basis, that the eschatological temple on Mount Zion unlike its historical predecessors will not be built by human hands, but by God himself.<sup>56</sup> The temporal element in the saying, διὰ τριῶν ἡμερῶν, can also carry a general meaning completely independent of any reference to the resurrection, as it is a well-known expression for a short time span.<sup>57</sup> Hence, contrary to Paesler's claim, the additional elements in Mark 14:58 over against the earliest pre-Johannine stage of the saying in John 2:19<sup>(*)</sup> do not necessarily presuppose a post-Easter origin, but are equally imaginable within the context of the historical Jesus. If the characterisation of the witnesses in Mark 14:57–59 as false can be taken to mean something else than merely that they applied to Jesus a saying that he had never uttered,

<sup>54</sup> Paesler, Das Tempelwort Jesu, 188–189, supported by Wedderburn, "Jesus' Action in the Temple," 17.

<sup>55</sup> Ibid., 203–227, esp. 221–225.

<sup>56</sup> Cf. Ådna, Jesu Stellung, 35–49, 91–110, in agreement with Schwemer, "Jesus Christus als Prophet, König und Priester," 223. See inter alia 4Q174 1 I, 1–5; 11Q19 XXIX, 9–10; 1 En. 90.29; 91.13; Jub. 1.17, 29; Tob 14:5; 4 Ezra 13.36.

<sup>57</sup> Cf. Ådna, 119–121, with references.

and if Jesus' statement that he—not God—is the one who will raise another temple not made with hands can be plausibly accounted for, there is no absolute hindrance for assuming that all of Mark 14:58 might be authentic. I consider that the two conditions just mentioned can be convincingly met,<sup>58</sup> and, supported by further observations, for example that Mark 14:58 can be retranslated to Aramaic, I have concluded in the affirmative regarding the authenticity of Mark 14:58.<sup>59</sup>

Finally, we must turn to the prediction of the temple's destruction which introduces Jesus' eschatological speech in all three synoptic gospels (Mark 13:2; Matt 24:2; Luke 21:6). Once again, the Matthean and Lukan parallels are dependent on the Markan version:<sup>60</sup> "Not one stone will be left here upon another; all will be thrown down (οὐ μὴ ἀφεθῆ ὧδε λίθος ἐπὶ λίθον ὃς οὐ μὴ καταλυθῆ)" (Mark 13:2b). Paesler has undertaken a detailed analysis of Mark 13:1–2 leading to the conclusion that the logion in v. 2b is authentic.<sup>61</sup> As I stated above, he has reconstructed a pre-Johannine version of the "complete" temple saying, consisting of two parts, upon which according to him all extant variants of this saying, including Mark 14:58, depend. The earliest form of the two-part saying—καταλύσω τὸν ναὸν τοῦτον καὶ οἰκοδομήσω αὐτόν (John 2:19<sup>(*)</sup>)—is in Paesler's opinion a post-Easter reworking of Mark 13:2*, in which the divine act of destroying the temple (expressed through a passivum divinum) was transferred to

<sup>58</sup> Cf. Ådna, Jesu Stellung, 113–116, 130–151.

<sup>59</sup> Ibid., 127–130, 151–153. In spite of her corresponding understanding of the epithets χειροποίητος and ἀχειροποίητος (cf. n. 56), Schwemer is more reserved regarding the reconstruction of the original wording: "...den ursprünglichen Wortlaut (können wir) nicht mehr sicher rekonstruieren" (Anna Maria Schwemer, "Die Passion des Messias nach Markus und der Vorwurf des Antijudaismus," in Der messianische Anspruch Jesu und die Anfänge der Christologie, Martin Hengel and Anna Maria Schwemer, 133–169, at 147). Wilckens, Theologie, vol. I.2, 62, seems to accept the authenticity of Mark 14:58 with the exception of the first person singular for which he substitutes a passive that "im Mund Jesu... als Umschreibung des Handelns Gottes aufzufassen (ist)" (62 n. 23).

<sup>60</sup> Cf. Ådna, Jesu Stellung, 440–441 n. 25, and Paesler, Das Tempelwort Jesu, 87.

<sup>61</sup> Paesler, Das Tempelwort Jesu, 76–92, 256, 259–260. Despite the claim to the contrary, Mark 13:1–2 is not a vaticinium ex eventu (84–87); form-critically it is an apophthegma, whose earliest element is the saying in v. 2b (87–89), which can easily be retranslated to Aramaic (89). "In der Tat sprechen einige Anzeichen dafür, daß in Mark 13, 2* die ipsissima vox Jesu vernehmbar ist, so die Formulierung des Wortes im Passivum Divinum und die Tatsache, daß das an sich anstößige Wort trotz des Vorliegens einer offensichtlich nicht erfüllten Prophetie weitertradiert wurde" (89–90; italics in the text). On pp. 90–91 he refers to a number of other scholars who agree that Mark 13:2 is authentic.

the exalted Christ and according to which the destruction would be succeeded by the reconstruction of the sanctuary, once again an act to be performed by the risen Lord.<sup>62</sup>

Some scholars favour a reversed relationship between Mark 13:2 and 14:58 and claim that the former depends on the latter.<sup>63</sup> However, although I assume the authenticity of Mark 14:58, I see no valid reason for rejecting the thesis that Mark 13:2 too is authentic, as Paesler and others have convincingly argued.<sup>64</sup>

2.3. Conclusion

In spite of innumerable variations regarding exact reconstructions, there is a far-reaching agreement in recent scholarship that Jesus'

<sup>62</sup> Paesler, Das Tempelwort Jesu, 189–193. As is evident from the presentation above, Paesler considers Mark 14:58 to be derived from Mark 13:2—albeit through the intermediary stages of the “Ur-Tempelwort” John 2:19<sup>(*)</sup> and John 2:19*. Other scholars who also reckon Mark 14:58 to be dependent upon Mark 13:2 are mentioned by Paesler, 77–79 nn. 12–24 and 91 nn. 109–114.

<sup>63</sup> For representatives of this opinion cf. Paesler, 77 nn. 8–11.

<sup>64</sup> Ádna, Jesu Stellung, 440–442. Zeller, “Die Beseitigung des Handels,” 78–79 n. 53 comments on Paesler’s and my opposing proposals for the reconstruction of the authentic saying(s): “Beide Versuche sind wohl zu zuversichtlich.”

Without necessarily accepting the authenticity of either, some scholars assume, as I do, that Mark 13:2 and 14:58 are mutually independent, e.g., Wolfgang Kraus, Der Tod Jesu als Heiligtumsweihe: Eine Untersuchung zum Umfeld der Sühnevorstellung in Römer 3,25–26a, WMANT 66 (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1991), 220: “Mk hat sowohl in 14,58 wie auch in 13,2 traditionelles Gut aufgenommen.”

A reference must also be made here to Folker Siegert, “‘Zerstört diesen Tempel...!': Jesus als ‘Tempel’ in den Passionsüberlieferungen,” in Zerstörungen des Jerusalemer Tempels: Geschehen–Wahrnehmung–Bewältigung, ed. Johannes Hahn, WUNT 147 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2002), 108–139, although the hypothetical character of much of his reasoning and argument complicates the assessment of his article. Anyway, he seems to consider that both Mark 13:2, understood as an announcement of the end of the Solomonic-Herodian temple (133), and the two-part temple saying (cf. the hypothetical reconstruction, 109) might have their origin with Jesus. “Ein zweiteiliges Tempelwort, wie Matt 26,61 und John 2,19 es wiedergeben, könnte ihm nun gerade in seiner offenen Symbolik, seiner Antithetik und der Selbstimplikation des Sprechers Jesus zugetraut werden” (133).

The two most recent discussions of the temple sayings and of whether they were part of the charges brought against Jesus are found in Dunn, Jesus Remembered, and in Wedderburn, “Jesus’ Action in the Temple,” 15–20. Dunn refrains from any attempt at reconstructing an authentic version, but states that “we can be confident that something Jesus had said about the destruction (and restoration) of the Temple provided the chief ground or excuse for bringing him before Caiaphas’s council. The charge was not without substance!” (632–633). Favouring Mark 13:2* as possibly authentic, Wedderburn regards Mark 14:58 as most probably a reflection of controversy between Jews and Christians caused by the Christians’ claim to be themselves God’s temple (cf. 17).

temple act is historical and his temple saying authentic. When we ask how the act and the saying relate to each other, not surprisingly most scholars who accept the historicity and the authenticity regard them as coherent with regard to their content or message as intended by Jesus. The identification of such a coherence is, of course, most emphatic on the part of those who assume that the authentically reconstructed temple saying was spoken by Jesus on the occasion of his act in the temple as its interpretation.<sup>65</sup> Some other scholars, for example Dieter Zeller, contest the simultaneity of the act and the saying(s), assuming that Jesus uttered the prediction or threat of destruction only when he realised that the temple act did not bring about the lasting effects which he had hoped for.<sup>66</sup> Accepting the historicity of the temple act, including Mark 11:17 as the accompanying interpretative word, as well as both Mark 13:2 and 14:58, I suppose that Jesus spoke the complete temple saying some time during his first days in Jerusalem before the questioning regarding his authority (Mark 11:27–33) made it obvious that the religious leaders of the people would not accept the message conveyed through the temple act and saying, and as a reaction to their lack of willingness to repent, Jesus then uttered his unconditioned prediction of destruction transmitted in Mark 13:2.<sup>67</sup>

3. Interpretation of Jesus' Temple Act

There are numerous interpretations of Jesus' temple act, and it is in no way self-evident how the differing understandings relate to each other, or how they might be systematised. Nevertheless, in my opinion, the distinction between eschatological and non-eschatological interpretations is probably the most fundamental and, consequently, will serve as the major systematising criterion.<sup>68</sup>

---

<sup>65</sup> In addition to Trautmann and Sanders, referred to in n. 32, we may mention Kraus, Tod Jesu, 226–227, and Joachim Gnilka, Jesu von Nazaret: Botschaft und Geschichte (Sonderausgabe; Freiburg, Basle and Vienna: Herder, 1993), 279–280. Paesler, Das Tempelwort Jesu, 75 n. 86 and 259, also contemplates the possibility that the authentic saying by Jesus transmitted in Mark 13:2 was originally uttered on the occasion of the temple act. Dunn, Jesu Remembered, 639, leaves such a simultaneity open, but is nevertheless confident that act and saying both provided “sufficient excuse for a policy of realpolitik to dictate Jesus' removal from the scene.”

<sup>66</sup> Zeller, “Die Beseitigung des Handels im Tempel,” 78–79.

<sup>67</sup> Ådna, Jesu Stellung, 151–152 and 443–444.

<sup>68</sup> Here I am in agreement with Matson, “The Contribution to the Temple Cleansing,” 500. Metzendorf, Die Tempelaktion Jesu, 201, considers the distinction between

3.1. Non-Eschatological Interpretations

3.1.1. A Prophetic Protest Against Deplorable Conditions in the Temple

If Mark 11:17, with the accusation taken from Jer 7:11 of having made the temple a den of robbers, is accepted as the authentic accompanying interpretative saying, the consequence is frequently an understanding of Jesus' act as a strong prophetic protest against some morally unacceptable conditions of the activity in the temple. If we ask what these deplorable conditions were, a number of scholars maintain that the chief priests, generally and in particular with regard to the temple market, exploited their monopoly position for personal enrichment to the detriment of the common priests and the general population.

We propose that Jesus intended his action in the temple to be a prophetic protest against the mismanagement of the temple by the priestly aristocracy... it can be seen that such a prophetic demonstration is also implicitly a challenge to the political-economic base in Jerusalem.<sup>69</sup>

However, there is no evidence of general exploitative conditions at the temple market like high prices for monopoly products or unjustified charges for money-changing, nor could a protest against the wealth and privileges of the chief priests easily be understood as an intended message of the recounted acts by Jesus.<sup>70</sup> messianic and non-messianic interpretations as the most important. In Jesu Stellung I, too, treated "Messianische Interpretationen" as a distinct category within the chapter submitted to "Interpretation der Tempelaktion Jesu" (cf. 334–430, with 376–387 dedicated to the messianic interpretations). Because of limits of space the messianic aspects will not be treated separately here.

---

For other recent presentations of the most frequent varying interpretations, combined with evaluations and critique, cf. Collins, "Jesus' Action in Herod's Temple," 48–53; Zeller, "Die Beseitigung des Handels," 71–78; and Wedderburn, "Jesus' Action in the Temple," 1–6, 9–11, 13–14.

<sup>69</sup> Tan, Aims of Jesus, 185 and 187, cf. 231–232, too. Cf. further inter alios Richard Bauckham, "Jesus' Demonstration in the Temple", in Law and Religion: Essays on the Place of the Law in Israel and Early Christianity, ed. Barnabas Lindars (Cambridge: Clarke, 1988), 72–89, 171–176; Craig A. Evans, "Jesus' Action in the Temple and Evidence of Corruption in the First-Century Temple", in idem, Jesus and His Contemporaries: Comparative Studies, AGJU 25 (Leiden: Brill, 1995), 319–344 (cf. also Evans' article in CBQ 51 [1989]: 237–270), and Casey, "Culture and Historicity," 313–316. Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 638–639, also regards the act of Jesus predominantly as harsh criticism of how priestly authorities ran the temple, as does Wedderburn, 22: "Jesus' action is not so much a removal of impurity as a protest against a system from which the high-priestly caste benefited, but which impeded the common people in their approach to God."

<sup>70</sup> For an overview, with references to many more scholars, and critical assessment cf. Ådna, Jesu Stellung, 335–342.

3.1.2. A Protest Against the Desecration of the Temple<sup>71</sup>

Traditionally, and frequently implicit in the common designation of Jesus' act as the "cleansing of the temple," it has been regarded as a protest against desecration. According to this view the market activity inside the temple area threatened the holiness of the sanctuary and disturbed worship.<sup>72</sup> Further, most scholars who accept the historicity of the short note in Mark 11:16 that Jesus did not allow anyone to carry any vessel through the temple, interpret this as a countermeasure on his part to protect the holiness of the site against a widespread practice of using the temple area "as a shortcut for getting from one side of the town to the other."<sup>73</sup>

Some scholars, most resolutely Peter Richardson and Jerome Murphy-O'Connor, regard the presence inside the temple area of coins with images of Gentile gods and rulers as an intolerable offence to pious Jews who considered this as a violation against the two first commandments, and they interpret Jesus' attack on the money-changers as an expression of a protest against such desecration of the holy site: "Jesus' action in the temple can be read as an explosion of outrage at the Jewish authorities' invitation of a foreign god and an alien custom into the holiest place of Judaism."<sup>74</sup>

The grand expansion of the temple in Jerusalem undertaken by Herod the Great was inspired by international architectural models and served predominantly as a symbol for his ambitions to be accepted and respected on Hellenistic terms as the legitimate ruler of the Jewish

<sup>71</sup> Cf. Ådna, Jesu Stellung, 342–346, for a more detailed presentation and criticism of the variants within this category.

<sup>72</sup> Cf. Betz, "Jesus and the Purity of the Temple," 461–462: "The problem that apparently irritated Jesus was that the merchants and the bankers had moved inside the sacred precinct to conduct their business. This situation brought about a conflict between business and worship, with business increasingly disturbing worship not only by the inevitable noise, confusion and filth but also by introducing different interests and values. Once allowed inside the sacred precinct, business inevitably expanded into the space reserved for worship, subverting the very purpose of the sanctuary."

<sup>73</sup> Ibid., 457; cf. 462, as well. E.g., also Jeremias, New Testament Theology, 145 n. 1, and Meyer, Christus Faber, 265, understand Mark 11:16 in this way; cf. Ådna, Jesu Stellung, 257–259, for many more representatives of such a view.

<sup>74</sup> Murphy-O'Connor, "Jesus and the Money Changers," 50; cf. Richardson, "Why Turn the Tables?," 520; Casey, "Culture and Historicity," 315 and Collins, "Jesus' Action in Herod's Temple," 60. Even for payment of the annual temple tax such offensive coins, viz. silver shekels of Tyre carrying the head of the city god Melkart (or Heracles) on the obverse and a Tyrian eagle on the reverse, were used; cf. Richardson, 512–518; Ådna, Jerusalem Tempel, 96–118, 146–148; Jesu Stellung, 251–253; Murphy-O'Connor, 46–49; Collins, 59–60.

people.<sup>75</sup> Hans Dieter Betz thinks that Jesus in his temple act reacted in particular against the violation of the sanctity of the holy site that this remodelling of the temple implied: “In his judgment, we can conclude, the proper worship of God was compromised by Herod’s subjection of the Temple to the political purpose of glorifying his kingship and by the intrusion of commercialism.”<sup>76</sup>

3.1.3 A Protest Against a Nationalistic Holiness Ideology

Marcus J. Borg thinks that the temple in Jerusalem, not only during the war against the Romans 66–70 CE, but already at the time of Jesus, was the ideological and strategic centre of a Jewish nationalism opting for a strict separation from all Gentiles. As the money-changers and the vendors “served and symbolized the quest for holiness understood as separation,” Jesus chose them as the target of his action and spoke the words transmitted in Mark 11:17; “the ‘odd gesture’ and the words of interpretation cohere: the quest for a holy, separated nation had made of the Temple a ‘den of violent ones’; the merchants, typifying that separation by their activity, were expelled because ‘My house shall be called a house of prayer for all the nations,’ not a center of resistance to the nations.”<sup>77</sup>

---

<sup>75</sup> Cf. Betz, “Jesus and the Purity of the Temple,” 462–467 and Collins, 53–58, who accepts my proposal in Jerusalem Temple, 32–89, 142–145 (cf. also Jesu Stellung, 248–249), that Herod’s remodelling of the temple in Jerusalem in particular followed the architectural pattern of the so-called Kaisareion (Caesareum). Now also Max Küchler, Jerusalem: Ein Handbuch und Studienreiseführer zur Heiligen Stadt, Orte und Landschaften der Bibel 4.2 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2007), 134–136, supports my proposal of the Kaisareion as the architectural model for the Herodian temple.

<sup>76</sup> Betz, 472. Collins thinks that Jesus’ protest against the Herodian temple focused on the mixture of religious and civic activities: “[H]is action... indicates his advocacy of an ideal Temple along the lines of those depicted by Ezekiel and the Temple Scroll. The outer court was to be sacred space devoted to prayer and teaching, not civic space open to the general public and devoted to profane activities... Jesus’ aim was... to extend the holiness of the inner court to the whole Temple” (58, 61). (All references above to Adela Yarbro Collins relate to her article in the Festschrift for Hans Dieter Betz from 2001; however, she also broadly expressed the same points of view in A.Y. Collins, Jesus and the Jerusalem Temple, International Rennert Guest Lecture Series vol. 5 [Ramat-Gan: Bar-Ilan University, 1999].)

<sup>77</sup> M.J. Borg exposes his view in Conflict, Holiness and Politics in the Teachings of Jesus, Studies in the Bible and Early Christianity 5 (New York / Toronto: Edwin Mellen, 1984, quotation from 176). In his later book Jesus—A New Vision: Spirit, Culture and the Life of Discipleship (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1987), Borg seems, on the one hand, to weaken somewhat the emphasis from the former book on Jesus’ alleged universalism and, on the other hand, to mark more decisively the non-eschatological

3.1.4. An Attempt to Reform the Temple Cult in Order to Include All Israel

Bruce Chilton thinks that Jesus performed his temple act in order to bring his rival understanding of purity to the fore, according to which all Jews and Samaritans were pure and, consequently, had a right to appear as the real owners of the sacrifices that they were to offer:

Jesus' occupation of the Temple was directed against animals that did not genuinely belong, in his estimation, to those who were to offer them, because they were procured by means of a purely financial transaction in the Temple... [H]e confronted the authorities in the Temple with the claim that their management was a scandal, and that the direct provision of animals by a forgiven, purified Israel was what was required for the experience of holiness and the reality of the covenant to be achieved.<sup>78</sup>

3.2. Eschatological Interpretations

3.2.1. An Act to Establish the Temple's Holiness

If Jesus' action is interpreted as a fervent advocacy of the temple's holiness and this concern is given a firm eschatological orientation, we must distinguish this understanding from the one presented in paragraph 3.1.2 above. Whereas the former identifies the protest against desecration as a concern to re-establish a lost previous state of purity, this one sees the commitment of Jesus to the holiness of the temple as borne by his eschatologically shaped message and mission. A proposal to understand the incident in the temple as an act on the part of Jesus to establish the proper holiness when the eschatological kingdom of God is about to be realised, has recently been presented by Dieter Zeller, according to whom Jesus wanted to prepare the people of Israel for the imminent eschatological coming of God to Zion by extend-character of Jesus' mission of a "politics of compassion" opposed to the "politics of holiness." Cf. Ådna, Jesu Stellung, 346–349, for a presentation and criticism of Borg.

---

<sup>78</sup> Chilton, The Temple of Jesus, 128, 136. Cf. Ådna, Jesu Stellung, 349–352, for a presentation and criticism of Chilton. Regrettably, Chilton restricts the description of "The Attitude of Jesus Toward the Temple," part of the article "Temple, Jewish" in Dictionary of New Testament Background, ed. Craig A. Evans and Stanley E. Porter (Downers Grove, IL and Leicester: InterVarsity, 2000), 1167–1183 [1173–1176], only to a presentation of his own understanding, thereby giving readers with limited knowledge of the recent scholarly discussion a very misleading impression of how the temple act is generally understood today.

ing the sanctity beyond the inner temple courts to include the whole temple complex.<sup>79</sup>

When the interpretation of Jesus' act as a cleansing of the temple is clearly conceived in eschatological terms, it is sometimes combined with a messianic understanding. Just as the cleansing purifications of the temple recounted in the Old Testament had been undertaken by Davidic kings (cf. 2 Chr 29–31; 34–35), the eschatological cleansing would be performed by the Davidic Messiah. Such a messianic interpretation is further substantiated if the historicity of Jesus' entry into Jerusalem (Mark 11:1–10) is accepted and regarded as a kingly enthronement.<sup>80</sup>

Jesus, the disciples, and the pilgrim crowds combined to make the entry a messianic event, so investing the cleansing of the temple with a messianic dimension... The entry into Jerusalem and the cleansing of the temple constituted a messianic demonstration, a messianic critique, a messianic fulfilment event, and a sign of the messianic restoration of Israel.<sup>81</sup>

---

<sup>79</sup> Zeller, "Die Beseitigung des Handels," 75–78, cf. esp. 78: "... (wir) kommen zur eschatologischen Motivation, die das Handeln Jesu trägt... Nach jüdischer Erwartung tritt Gott auf dem Zion seine Herrschaft an... Bei Jesus finden wir zwar sonst keine solche auf den Zion und den Tempel bezogenen Konkrektionen der Basileia, aber vielleicht deshalb, weil sie schlicht selbstverständlich sind. So ist es wahrscheinlich, dass er durch die symbolische Ausdehnung der Heiligkeitszone auf den ganzen Tempelberg den Tempel und Israel, das sich in den Tagen des Paschafestes dort versammelte, auf das Kommen Gottes vorbereiten wollte."

<sup>80</sup> This messianic interpretation has been unfolded most consistently by Mohr, Markus- und Johannespassion, 96–97: "Den Anspruch, den Jesus bei seinem Einzug in Jerusalem geltend machte, erhebt er in nicht minderem Masse bei der Beseitigung des Marktgetümmels im Vorhof der Heiden. Als Messias, der gemäss 2Sam 7,14 (Ps 2,7) für sich die Gottessohnschaft reklamiert, handelt er im Tempel mit der Machtbefugnis eines stellvertretenden Hausherrn, der die Heiligkeit dieses Hauses gewahrt wissen will." Cf. Ådna, Jesu Stellung, 378–381, for a presentation and criticism of Mohr.

<sup>81</sup> Ben F. Meyer, The Aims of Jesus (London: SCM Press, 1979), 199. Christina Metzendorf, Die Tempelaktion Jesu, 221–240, gives a detailed presentation of "Die Auslegung der Tempelaktion bei Ben F. Meyer," in which she precisely recognises the combination of messianic demonstration and cleansing (cf. 225–226). Tan, Aims of Jesus, 152, 158–159, 192–196, also emphasises the historical and theological connection between the entry, expressing a "kingly" claim, and the temple act, although he is hesitant regarding an explicit messianic interpretation; and Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 639–642, holds it as likely that "among the reverberations set off by" the entry into Jerusalem and "Jesus' action in the Temple would be the question, 'Could this be the expected Davidic Messiah?'" (639).

3.2.2. A Symbolic Act Pointing to the Renewal of the Temple, or to a New Temple

Making the temple act and sayings the point of departure for his description of the historical Jesus in his monograph Jesus and Judaism (1985),<sup>82</sup> Ed P. Sanders sparked off a whole new wave of scholarly engagement with Jesus' relationship to the temple. Identifying the overturning of some tables as the historical kernel, Sanders himself sees this as a demonstrative action...it symbolized destruction. That is one of the most obvious meanings of the action of overturning itself...But what does this mean? On what conceivable grounds could Jesus have undertaken to attack—and symbolize the destruction of—what was ordained by God? The obvious answer is that destruction, in turn, looks towards restoration... We should probably think that his expectation was that a new temple would be given by God from heaven, an expectation which is not otherwise unknown during the period, even if it may not have been universal.<sup>83</sup>

Sanders has been joined by Paula Fredriksen in the understanding that Jesus' symbolic destruction actually meant eschatological renewal: "In the idiom of Jewish apocalyptic, destruction implies rebuilding; and a new or renewed temple...would imply, more directly, that the Kingdom of God was at hand."<sup>84</sup> However, destruction is not the self-evident implication of the overturning of some tables, nor is it obvious

---

<sup>82</sup> Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 61–76. Due to his importance, Metzdorf is justified in choosing Sanders, besides Meyer (cf. n. 81), as the second modern scholar for a detailed treatment in her chapter on the exegesis of the temple act in the 20th century (cf. Die Tempelaktion Jesu, 201–221). Metzdorf is right that both Meyer and Sanders concede a prominent position to the temple act within their respective interpretations of Jesus and his message, but her claim that the understandings of these two scholars are "vollkommen gegensätzlich ausgerichtet" and that "Sanders und Meyer stellen jeweils die Außenpole dar, zwischen denen sich die übrige Exegese des ausgehenden 20. Jahrhunderts bewegt" (4) is unjustified.

<sup>83</sup> Ibid., 70, 71, 73.

<sup>84</sup> Paula Fredriksen, "Jesus and the Temple, Mark and the War," SBLSP 126 (1990): 293–310, at 299. Also in her monograph From Jesus to Christ: The Origins of the New Testament Images of Jesus (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1988), 112–113, Fredriksen stated that Jesus' overturning of tables in the temple "would [probably] have been readily understood by any Jew watching as a statement that the [current] Temple was about to be destroyed...and accordingly that the present order was about to cede to the Kingdom of God" (113, italics in the text; literally repeated in "Jesus and the Temple," 299 with the two words in brackets added). More recently, Fredriksen has voiced severe doubt about the historicity of the incident, cf. n. 38.

that a symbolic enactment of destruction points beyond the destruction itself to restoration or renewal as its real, inherent meaning.<sup>85</sup>

With some hesitation I also include N.T. Wright under this entry. He criticises Sanders for regarding the building of a new temple as an obvious implicit element of a symbolic destruction performed within a programme of eschatological expectation,<sup>86</sup> but he, too, sees Jesus' temple act as "a dramatic symbol of imminent destruction,"<sup>87</sup> and presupposes that Jesus expected a salvific substitute for the destroyed temple: "I think that Jesus saw himself, and perhaps his followers with him, as the new Temple."<sup>88</sup> Surprisingly, and inevitably with an inner tension to his position as a consequence, Wright adds also a royal, messianic aspect to his interpretation, invoking classical texts about the king and the Messiah as temple builder like 2 Sam 7:12–14 and Zech 6:12–13: "Jesus would do, in some sense or other, what David's son Solomon had done—or, mutatis mutandis, what Judas Maccabaeus and his brothers had done. His Temple-action was a claim to royal status."<sup>89</sup>

3.2.3. An Act Preparing Zion for the Pilgrimage of the Peoples

Grounded in prophetic texts like Isa 2:2–4; Mic 4:1–4; Jer 3:17 and Zech 8:20–23 there were expectations of a pilgrimage of the Gentile peoples to the temple at Mount Zion at the end of time. A number of scholars, frequently combining this with an acceptance of the

<sup>85</sup> Sanders' interpretation of the temple act has been vehemently criticised by numerous scholars. Cf. Ådna, Jesu Stellung, 354–357, for a more detailed presentation and criticism.

<sup>86</sup> Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God, 425–426.

<sup>87</sup> Ibid., 424; cf. 416–428 for all the aspects Wright includes as the background of Jesus' "acted parable of judgment" (416, cf. 334), in particular, as implied in the den of robbers accusation, that "the Temple had become, in Jesus' day as in Jeremiah's, the talisman of nationalist violence, the guarantee that YHWH would act for Israel and defend her against her enemies" (420).

<sup>88</sup> Ibid., 426, with a cross reference to ch. 13 of the book (pp. 612–653), in which Wright expounds the notion that Jesus "was not content to announce that YHWH was returning to Zion," but that he "intended to enact, symbolize and personify that climactic event" (615; italics in the text) and in this sense also claimed to represent the new, eschatological temple in persona. However, this is an anachronistic anticipation of the Christology represented by John (cf. 2:19–21) and Revelation (cf. 21:22).

<sup>89</sup> Ibid., 494; cf. 427–428, 490–494. For a presentation of the biblical and early Jewish texts on the Messiah as builder of the new temple, cf. Ådna, Jesu Stellung, 50–87. Wright's attempt to combine this messianic tradition, which necessarily presupposes a new temple building on Mount Zion, with his claim that Jesus did not foresee any such new real, physical temple, is unconceivable to me.

authenticity of the citation of Isa 56:7b in Mark 11:17, have suggested that Jesus' act was meant as a preparation for this eschatological event. For example, James D.G. Dunn has interpreted this quotation by Jesus as expressing his expectation of the pilgrimage of the peoples: "The implication would then be clear: that the action was eschatological in significance—a symbolic representation of the 'cleansing' of the Temple which would be necessary if it was to serve its intended eschatological function, and possibly even a symbolic attempt to bring about these conditions."<sup>90</sup>

3.2.4. The Temple Act as a Fulfilment of Prophetic Announcements

Obviously, scholars who accept the authenticity of Mark 11:17 regard in some way or the other the temple act as a fulfilment of Isa 56:7b, "My house shall be called a house of prayer for all peoples."<sup>91</sup>

Apart from this oracle, scholars most frequently refer to Zech 14:21b, "And there shall no longer be traders in the house of the LORD of hosts on that day," as the prophetic announcement that likely inspired and motivated Jesus to perform his act in the temple, as seen, e.g., in Ben F. Meyer, James D. G. Dunn, Hans Dieter Betz and Anna Maria Schwemer.<sup>92</sup> Kurt Paesler has presented the most detailed argument in recent scholarship in favour of a conscious link between Zech 14:21b and Jesus' temple act.<sup>93</sup> As I have said, he considers what is recounted in Mark 11:15b as the historical kernel of the incident, which is not to be understood as a cleansing or as an attempt at a reform, but as a symbolic abolition of the temple cult. The reason why Jesus, according to Paesler, in this way marks the present validity of the eschatological

---

<sup>90</sup> James D. G. Dunn, The Partings of the Ways Between Christianity and Judaism and their Significance for the Character of Christianity (London: SCM Press; Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1991), 48. (In his more recent Jesus Remembered, 640, Dunn seems more inclined to attribute this understanding to "earliest Christian interpretation", but cf. 650, as well.) For a critical assessment of this interpretation under due consideration of a number of scholars cf. Ådna, Jesu Stellung, 358–364.

<sup>91</sup> Cf. Ådna, Jesu Stellung, 276–287, for an analysis of this oracle, distinguishing between its original context and meaning within the text unit Isa 56:3–8, and secondly, its meaning within the frame of the whole book of Isaiah, and, thirdly, its usage by Jesus.

<sup>92</sup> Cf. Meyer, The Aims of Jesus, 198 and 305 n. 61; Dunn, Partings of the Ways, 48–49; Betz, "Jesus and the Purity of the Temple," 467 n. 44; Schwemer, "Jesus Christus als Prophet, König und Priester," 222–223. More scholars are mentioned in Ådna, Jesu Stellung, 373.

<sup>93</sup> Cf. Paesler, Das Tempelwort Jesu, 243–249, with due references to other scholars (cf. esp. 245–246 n. 84).

conditions described at the end of the prophetic book of Zechariah (cf. Zech 14:20–21) is his proclamation of the presence of the kingdom of God, which ushers in the eschatological era in which the distinction between holy and profane, pure and impure, is transcended.<sup>94</sup>

A third prophetic announcement sometimes taken to be the background of Jesus' act is Mal 3:1, "See, I am sending my messenger to prepare the way before me, and the Lord whom you seek will suddenly come to his temple. The messenger of the covenant in whom you delight—indeed, he is coming, says the LORD of hosts." Ben F. Meyer also reckons with influence from this oracle, as does Alexander J. M. Wedderburn.<sup>95</sup> Finally, mention must be made of Lynn Allan Losie, who thinks that Jesus considered himself to be the eschatological prophet and messenger, preparing the coming of the Lord; hence, he proposes Isa 52:7–12 as "motivating factor" for Jesus' act in the temple.<sup>96</sup>

3.2.5. A Spiritualising Surpassing or Transcendence of the Temple Cult

Some scholars attribute already to Jesus a radical rejection of the need for a physical temple and temple cult in line with Acts 7:48–50 (quoting Isa 66:1–2) and 17:24. Such an understanding can easily take an anachronistic form, ascribing to Jesus and his contemporaries certain

---

<sup>94</sup> Paesler, Das Tempelwort Jesu, 247–248: "Daß... Gott unmittelbar zugänglich ist, da die Gottesherrschaft bereits angebrochen ist, ist ein Konstitutivum der Verkündigung des irdischen Jesus. Es ist daher recht wahrscheinlich, daß Jesus... die hier [Zech 14:20–21] ausgesagte Unmittelbarkeit des Zugangs zu Gottes (sic)—die er in seiner eigenen Predigt und Person gegeben sah—durch das Austreiben der Händler zeichenhaft dokumentierte. Mit seiner Ankunft in Jerusalem sagt Jesus das von Sacharja erwartete eschatologische Laubhüttenfest an."

<sup>95</sup> Cf. Meyer, The Aims of Jesus, 201 and Wedderburn, "Jesus' Action in the Temple," 21.

As exemplified by Henk Jan de Jonge with regard to Zech 14:21b (cf. n. 14), some scholars who reject the historicity of Jesus' temple act consider prophetic texts to be the background for the fictitious story about Jesus in the temple. Walther Schmithals, Das Evangelium nach Markus, Ökumenischer Taschenbuchkommentar zum Neuen Testament 2, 2 vols. (Gütersloh: Gütersloher Verlagshaus Mohn, 1979), can be mentioned as someone propagating the same for Mal 3:1–3: "Die Basis des Berichtes ist die Mal. 3,1ff. verheißene und zur Zeit des Erzählers historisch erfahrbare 'Reinigung' des jüdischen Gottesdienstes durch die Begründung der christlichen Gemeinden" (2:496, italics in the text).

<sup>96</sup> L. A. Losie, The Cleansing of the Temple: A History of a Gospel Tradition in Light of Its Background in the Old Testament and in Early Judaism (Ph.D. diss., Fuller Theological Seminary, 1984), 264. He discusses "Jesus' Cleansing of the Temple," 250–284, see esp. 265–267. Cf. the presentation and criticism of Losie's view in Ádna, Jesu Stellung, 374–376.

presuppositions which arose only in the early church after Easter or even after the destruction of the temple in 70 CE. Maria Trautmann has managed to develop an interpretation of Jesus' temple act as a symbolic relativisation or cancellation of the current temple cult without falling into the anachronistic pit.<sup>97</sup>

3.2.6. An Ultimate Call for Repentance at the Threshold of the Kingdom

It is easily conceivable that Jesus' proclamation of the kingdom of God could turn out to be in rivalry with the temple service. If Jesus is the harbinger or even the exclusive mediator to the people of Israel of the imminent realisation of the eschatological kingdom, the appropriate reaction would be to accept his message and mission and become his disciples. An interpretation of Jesus' temple act from this perspective has been launched for instance by Helmut Merklein and Thomas Söding.<sup>98</sup> According to the latter, in the temple Jesus expresses his call for repentance and belief through an act that must be understood within the context of the message of the kingdom of God. Jesus criticises the notion that salvation is guaranteed by the ongoing temple cult as deceptive, because it actually ignores what God is about to do in order to bring salvation to his people who are completely entangled in sin.<sup>99</sup>

<sup>97</sup> Cf. Trautmann, Zeichenhafte Handlungen Jesu, 121: "Jesus stellte in seiner Aktion am Tempel das gesetzlich vorgeschriebene Opfer mit kultreinen Tieren wie auch die jährliche Tempelsteuer und damit das auf den Tempel konzentrierte und von den Sadduzäern verfochtene Kult- und Sühnewesen in Frage. Die intendierte Kritik Jesu übertraf somit das faktische Ereignis der Tempelreinigung. Es stellte zeichenhaft eine Relativierung des zeitgenössischen Tempelkults, wenn nicht eine Aufhebung desselben dar." Paesler, presented above in the paragraph 3.2.4, comes very close to Trautmann when he states: "Jesu Aktion, wie sie in V. 15b [Mark 11:15b] beschrieben ist, (wird) kaum anders zu verstehen sein denn als Angriff auf den Tempelkult, ja als zeichenhafte Verunmöglichung und Aufhebung des Jerusalemer Kultbetriebes" (Das Tempelwort Jesu, 244 [italics in the text]). Cf. Ådna, Jesu Stellung, 364–368, for a presentation and criticism of more examples of interpretations of the incident in the temple as an act of simply surpassing or transcending the cultic activities.

<sup>98</sup> Helmut Merklein, Jesu Botschaft von der Gottesherrschaft, SBS 111, 3rd ed. (Stuttgart: Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1989), esp. 133–139; Thomas Söding, "Die Tempelaktion Jesu: Redaktionskritik–Überlieferungsgeschichte–historische Rückfrage (Mark 11,15–19; Matt 21,12–17; Luke 19,45–48; John 2,13–22)," TTZ 101 (1992): 36–64.

<sup>99</sup> Cf. Söding, "Tempelaktion" 59–62. "Mit seiner Aktion stört Jesus symbolisch die laufenden Opferriten, die Steuereintreibung und den gesamten Tempelbetrieb. Durch diese Unterbrechung deckt er auf, daß der Tempel nicht etwa jener Ort ist, an dem Gottes Herrschaft besonders deutlich erfahrbar würde, sondern gerade im Gegenteil jener Ort, an dem sich die Ablehnung der mit Jesus nahekommenen Basileia geradezu institutionell formiert. Der Kult bleibt von dieser eschatologischen Kritik nicht

Whereas Merklein and Söding interpret Jesus in prophetic categories, Peter Stuhlmacher and I have combined the interpretation of the temple act as a call for repentance with a messianic understanding of Jesus' mission.<sup>100</sup>

By means of the messianic, symbolic action of the cleansing of the temple Jesus questions the temple's priesthood (and Israel with them) about whether they intend to continue to carry out the atonement ritual without acquiescing to Jesus' message of repentance. Jesus sees that the time has come to worship God in the Spirit of truth and to cleanse the temple for such worship.<sup>101</sup>

4. Collocation of the Temple Act and the Temple Saying(s)

When both the historicity of the temple act as well as the authenticity of the temple saying(s) are accepted, they must, of course, be seen together and possibly given cohering interpretations. Among scholars ausgenommen. Das Naherkommen der Gottesherrschaft bestätigt ihn nicht etwa, purifiziert ihn auch nicht, sondern führt ihn in die Krise" (61–62). Cf. Ådna, Jesu Stellung, 368–372, for a more detailed presentation of Söding, Merklein and other proponents of the interpretation of the temple act as a call for repentance.

---

<sup>100</sup> Cf. Peter Stuhlmacher, "Jesus of Nazareth as Christ of Faith," in idem, Jesus of Nazareth—Christ of Faith (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1993), 1–38, esp. 22–28 and "The Messianic Son of Man: Jesus' Claim to Deity", in The Historical Jesus in Recent Research, ed. James D. G. Dunn and Scot McKnight (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2005), 325–344 (translated from Peter Stuhlmacher, Biblische Theologie des Neuen Testaments, vol. 1: Grundlegung. Von Jesus zu Paulus, 3rd ed. [Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2005], 107–124); Ådna, Jesu Stellung, 136–142. A thorough and impressive defence of Jesus as Messiah has been presented by Martin Hengel, "Jesus der Messias Israels", in Der messianische Anspruch Jesu und die Anfänge der Christologie, Martin Hengel and Anna Maria Schwemer 1–80; cf. in the same volume also Anna Maria Schwemer, "Jesus Christus als Prophet, König und Priester," 207–229.

<sup>101</sup> Stuhlmacher, "Why Did Jesus Have to Die?", in Jesus of Nazareth, 39–57, 48. Cf., further, Biblische Theologie, 1:102: Jesus "griff sogar den Opferbetrieb im Tempel an, solange dieser an seinem messianischen Umkehrruf vorbei praktiziert wurde"; 1:146: "[D]ie gleich nach dem Eintreffen in Jerusalem vollzogene Tempelreinigung (war) eine messianische Zeichenhandlung, mit der Jesus die Tempelpriesterschaft aufforderte, sich seinem Umkehrruf zu stellen"; cf. 149–150, as well. My interpretation will be exposed below in part 4. Also Snodgrass, "The Temple Incident," 474, interprets the temple act as a symbolic, messianic act, implying "an enactment of the kingdom." However, he rejects any intention "to bring about the cessation of sacrifice" (468) as an aspect of Jesus' act. Moreover, Snodgrass combines his eschatological-messianic interpretation with a strong commitment on the part of Jesus for the protection and extension of the temple's holiness and a protest against commercialism and corruption (ibid., 468–471), with some inner tension as an inevitable consequence in combining the categories 3.1.1, 3.1.2 and 3.2.1 above.

presented above, for instance Maria Trautmann, Ed P. Sanders, John Dominic Crossan and Kurt Paesler all appeal to the cohering collocation of their respective interpretations of act and sayings as a strong indication of plausibility.

Trautmann categorises the temple act as a symbolic act in the tradition of Old Testament prophets. Such a symbolic act must be accompanied by an interpretative saying which in the case of Jesus is the two-part temple saying on which the extant expanded version in Mark 14:58 is based (cf. n. 32). Both the act and the saying are utterly critical to the current temple and cult,<sup>102</sup> but the second part of the saying points beyond the destruction.<sup>103</sup>

Sanders states more resolutely that the overturning of tables, allegedly an evident symbol of destruction, points to eschatological restoration (cf. 3.2.2). Further, like Trautmann, he combines the temple act and the saying, but oscillates between Mark 13:2* and 14:58* (cf. n. 32). Particularly if Mark 13:2 should be closer to what Jesus actually said while overturning the tables,<sup>104</sup> there is a striking tension between the negative character of the symbolic act and the accompanying saying, which only announces destruction, and Sanders' claim that the inherent message is a proclamation of eschatological renewal. However, if the two-part temple saying with the announcement that a new temple

---

<sup>102</sup> Trautmann, Zeichenhafte Handlungen, 122 and 124: "Die Tempelhandlung Jesu mußte... als Zeichen der Kritik am Tempel und Tempelkult verstanden werden... Jesu Vertreiben von Käufern und Verkäufern und Umstürzen von Tischen (stellte) ein geringfügiges, aber markantes Vorgehen dar, das seine größere Sinnhaftigkeit durch die verbale Ankündigung eines analogen, jedoch den Tempel in seiner Gesamtheit betreffenden Geschicks erkennen ließ."

<sup>103</sup> Cf. Trautmann, 124: "Wahrscheinlich auch war das Wort schon im Munde Jesu nicht nur ein 'Zerstörungslogion' gewesen, sondern hatte bereits auch das konstruktive Element des Neuaufbaus enthalten." The combination of act and saying will not only announce judgement, but points to "ein letztlich positives Tempelgeschehen" (127). However, because Trautmann exclusively interprets the act as an abolition of the cult (cf. 3.2.5 and n. 97), it remains completely unclear what the alleged positive element of a new temple construction actually means (cf. the criticism in Paesler, Das Tempelwort Jesu, 257–259). It seems as if the surpassing of the temple cult leaves no room or need for a new future temple.

<sup>104</sup> Sanders, The Historical Figure, 260: "I conclude that Jesus' symbolic action of overthrowing tables in the Temple was understood in connection with a saying about destruction, and that the action and the saying, in the view of the authorities, constituted a prophetic threat. Moreover, I think it highly probable that Jesus himself intended the action to predict the destruction of the temple."

will be built to replace the destroyed one is the authentic version, Sanders' positive interpretation is more justified.<sup>105</sup>

John Dominic Crossan favours the version of the temple saying extant in the Gospel of Thomas (Gos. Thom. 71) as authentic (cf. 2.2 and nn. 42–44), originally spoken on the occasion of the temple act (cf. n. 32). Interpreting the act as a symbolic destruction<sup>106</sup> and combining it with a saying also restricted to an emphatic destruction statement (“I will destroy this house utterly beyond repair”), Crossan succeeds better than Trautmann and Sanders in delivering a substantial cohering interpretation of both the act and the saying. However, both the improbability that Gos. Thom. 71 was the authentic version of Jesus' temple saying (cf. the criticism above in 2.2), and Crossan's notion that the rationale behind Jesus' rejection of the temple was that he considered himself in his mission as an itinerant sage to be an alternative and substitute for the temple in Jerusalem,<sup>107</sup> make this historical reconstruction and interpretation absolutely unconvincing.<sup>108</sup>

As distinct from Trautmann, Sanders and Crossan, Paesler leaves it open whether or not the temple saying, i.e., Mark 13:2*, was spoken on the occasion of the temple act (cf. n. 65). Anyway, he regards the symbolic abolition of the temple cult, grounded in the present realisation of the kingdom of God, as the message of the act (cf. 3.2.4 and nn. 93, 94 and 97), and the announcement of judgement against the temple in Mark 13:2*, as mutually coherent. The implicit consequence of a rejection of Jesus' kingdom proclamation is that the cult in the temple in Jerusalem, as in the time before King Josiah's reform, is perverted to idol service.<sup>109</sup> There is, however, possibly a certain tension

---

<sup>105</sup> Ibid., 261: “He was a prophet, and an eschatological prophet. He thought that God was about to destroy the Temple. And then what? ... Jesus probably thought that in the new age, when the twelve tribes of Israel were again assembled, there would be a new and perfect Temple, built by God himself.”

<sup>106</sup> Crossan, The Historical Jesus, 357–358: “That action is not, of course, a physical destruction of the Temple, but it is a deliberate symbolic attack. It ‘destroys’ the Temple by ‘stopping’ its fiscal, sacrificial, and liturgical operations.”

<sup>107</sup> Cf. Crossan, 355: “Jesus was ... atopic, moving from place to place, he coming to the people rather than they to him. This is an even more radical challenge [sc. than John the Baptist] to the localized univocity of Jerusalem's Temple, and its itinerancy mirrored and symbolized the egalitarian challenge of its protagonist. No matter, therefore, what Jesus thought, said, or did about the Temple, he was its functional opponent, alternative and substitute.”

<sup>108</sup> Cf. my criticism in Jesu Stellung, 367–368.

<sup>109</sup> Paesler, Das Tempelwort Jesu, 260–261: “Der Kult auch am Jerusalemer Tempel wird—wie vor Josia—zum Götzendienst, wenn er sich dem Anspruch Gottes verschließt, in Paesler's analysis when he seeks to combine this interpretation of the temple act and saying with an alleged respect and acceptance of the temple cult on the part of Jesus.<sup>110</sup>

Personally, I have advocated the authenticity of Mark 11:15b–17 as well as of both Mark 13:2 and 14:58 (cf. nn. 35, 59, 64), and chronologically situated the destruction prediction in Mark 13:2 after the utterance of the complete temple saying and the incident in the temple as a reaction to the outcome of the temple act (cf. n. 67).

These sayings and the act in the temple must be seen against the background of Jesus' proclamation of the imminent kingdom of God and his messianic mission related to the realisation of the kingdom. In my opinion, his (last) journey to Jerusalem together with the Twelve shortly before Passover and his focus on the temple after the arrival in the city are not coincidental, but on the contrary, constitute direct and conscious links to his kingdom message. The expectation that the temple on Mount Zion will be the centre of God's eschatological reign is deeply rooted in biblical and Jewish tradition, and I think that we have sufficient evidence to state that Jesus accepted and endorsed the Zion tradition.<sup>111</sup> In the temple saying in Mark 14:58 he alludes to Exod 15:17b–18 as the most important scriptural basis for the notion of God's eschatological reign in the sanctuary not made with human hands (ἀχειροποίητος), but raised by God himself. However, by stating that he would establish this eschatological temple within a very short time span (διὰ τριῶν ἡμερῶν...οἰκοδομήσω), Jesus laid claim to a divine act. This is a firm expression of his high and unique calling which granted him an authority that surpasses all traditional limitations of prophetic and messianic offices.<sup>112</sup> und dieser Anspruch ist in der Predigt Jesu von der Gottesherrschaft ergangen und offenbar abgelehnt worden. Wenn aber der Tempel (wieder) Ort des Götzendienstes wird, wenn Jerusalem in ihm das Fundament seiner religiösen Selbstgewißheit hat und seine Einwohner bzw. deren Führer sich daher der von Jesus gepredigten Gottesherrschaft verweigern können, dann muß Jesus auch dem Tempel Jerusalems in schroffer Form sein Ende durch das göttliche Gerichtshandeln ansagen, wie er es auch im Fall der galiläischen Städte Chorazin und Bethsaida getan hatte."

---

<sup>110</sup> Cf. Paesler, Das Tempelwort Jesu, 249, and the criticism in Wedderburn, "Jesus' Action in the Temple," 3 n. 12.

<sup>111</sup> Cf. Ådna, Jesu Stellung, 25–27, 130–133, and in particular the monograph by Tan, The Zion Traditions and the Aims of Jesus. Hence, it is possible to substantiate the assumption of Zeller regarding the links between the kingdom message and the temple on Mount Zion (cf. n. 79).

<sup>112</sup> For more examples of how Jesus as the messianic Son of Man laid claim to divine prerogatives and acted correspondingly cf. the references in n. 100. Hence, it is

The establishment of the new temple as a result of the eschatological realisation of the kingdom of God has consequences for the old temple and the cult performed there. Jesus demonstrates this in his action in the temple.<sup>113</sup> By accusing the temple authorities and the people of having made the temple a den of robbers in the accompanying saying in Mark 11:17, Jesus clearly alludes to the prophet Jeremiah's corresponding accusation against his contemporaries in Jer 7:11. Within the speech of Jer 7:1–15, the metaphor characterises the people's schizophrenic practice of seeking refuge and security in the temple while they at the same time worship idols and disregard God's commandments. Obviously, Jesus has an analogous estimation of the current situation; clinging to the traditional temple cult instead of obediently answering Jesus' call for repentance and discipleship at the threshold of the kingdom of God, the people deceive themselves in seeking their security in an apparatus and order which are no longer appropriate. The implication of the Jeremiah reference must have been plain to those present: Like the sanctuary in Shiloh (cf. Jer 7:12–14) and the temple of Solomon, the Herodian temple would become the victim of destruction if the priests and the people did not react properly to the words and acts of Jesus. Jesus' saying in Mark 11:17 contains also an explicit quotation of Isa 56:7b, "My house shall be called a house of prayer for all the nations." By the first century, this oracle was generally interpreted as relating to the eschatological temple (cf. n. 91), and by citing it Jesus points to the legitimate function of the future temple as the site for all nations' worship of the one true God. Whereas the old atonement cult becomes obsolete when the eschatological renewal is fulfilled, the redeemed and saved of all nations will still perform a worship of prayer and adoration. The contrasting references to the Scripture bring the radical alternatives to the fore: A stubborn clinging to the old will ultimately bring destruction upon the temple, whereas an obedient response to Jesus' call will prepare for the eschatological transformation of which a new, or a renewed temple on Mount Zion, will be a part.

---

characteristic that Jesus did not appeal to the less ambitious tradition about the Messiah as a human builder of the temple (cf. Ådna, Jesu Stellung, 50–87).

<sup>113</sup> I fully agree with those scholars referred to above who see a connection between Jesus' proclamation of the kingdom and his act in the temple (e.g., Zeller and Paesler, cf. nn. 79, 109); more precisely, the act is to be understood as a challenging call for repentance by accepting Jesus' kingdom message (e.g., Merklein, Söding and Stuhlmacher, cf. 3.2.6).

The targets of Jesus' temple act were the money-changers, the vendors of doves, and the vessels used for transport of either money or sacrificial ingredients between the Royal Stoa and the inner parts of the temple. Through his action Jesus disturbed functions vital to the temple cult. Doves were extensively used for burnt offerings and sin offerings by people who could not afford more expensive victims, like lambs or goats (e.g., Lev 5:7; 12:8; 14:21–23). Thus, by overturning the seats of the sellers and by ordering them to remove the baskets or the cages in which they kept the doves, Jesus interrupted the free trade of the objects of sacrifice most in demand for individual sin offerings. Finally, the overturning of the tables of the money-changers disturbed not only the regular service of exchange of different currencies needed when travellers arrived from all of the widespread Diaspora inside and outside the Roman Empire, but affected in particular the collection of the temple tax. The temple tax was the financial source for the collective sacrificial cult, administered daily by the priests in Jerusalem on behalf of the whole Jewish people. The centre of this cult was constituted by the so-called tamid, i.e. the lamb sacrificed as a burnt offering twice a day (cf. Exod 29:38–42; Num 28:3–8; m. Tamid). At the time of Jesus, the daily tamid offering—together with the rites and offerings of the annual Day of Atonement—was considered as the fundamental basis for upholding a continuous state of purity and holiness of Israel, because they “appease and effect atonement between Israel and their Father in heaven” (t. Sheqal. 1:6; cf. Jub. 6.14; 50.11). Further, on the basis of Exod 30:12–13, the temple tax, as the means through which each Jew shared in the atoning effect of the tamid, could be called a ransom (cf. Spec. 1.77; Her. 186; b. B. Bat. 9a). Hence, the action of Jesus hit crucial functions of the temple service and was a symbolic gesture towards disrupting the sacrificial cult and, consequently, smoothly coheres with the accompanying saying. The old atonement cult must be brought to an end because it is inappropriate in the eschatological era, about to be ushered in, in which it will be replaced by the eternal worship of the redeemed from all the nations.<sup>114</sup>

<sup>114</sup> Cf. Ådna, Jesu Stellung, 381–386, with cross-references to the detailed exegetical analyses and arguments throughout the monograph. In English, an abbreviated presentation of my argument is available in my article “Jesus’ Symbolic Act in the Temple (Mark 11:15–17): The Replacement of the Sacrificial Cult by his Atoning Death,” in Gemeinde ohne Tempel—Community without Temple, ed. Beate Ego, Armin Lange and Peter Pilhofer WUNT 118 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1999), 461–475, esp. 464–470. However, when writing this article I did not yet fully grasp how the citation from Being convinced that the decisive moment had arrived, Jesus pushed things to extremes by his provocative act and words in the temple. The outcome would either be that the religious leaders of Israel would finally react appropriately to Jesus' call, or that they would firmly reject him and his message and probably seek options how to pacify or even put an end to his activity. As we know, the reaction of the Jewish authorities was negative. According to Mark, "the chief priests and the scribes...kept looking for a way to kill him" (11:18), and within a few days they were successful as the Romans put Jesus to death on the cross.<sup>115</sup> Hence, it quickly became obvious to Jesus (cf. the questioning about his authority in Mark 11:27–33) that the reaction to his symbolic act and his words in the temple was in the negative. This meant, of course, that the implied warning in the reference to Jer 7:11 about the temple's destruction remained a real threat, and in the announcement transmitted in Mark 13:2 Jesus confirmed that this would be the destiny of the Herodian temple: "Not one stone will be left here upon another; all will be thrown down." If not voluntarily as an effect of Israel accepting Jesus' message, the obsolete atonement cult would then be abandoned by force when the temple was destroyed.

However, in this case of a disobedient reaction to the repentance call too, there is a positive message inherent in the symbolic temple act. The implication of Jesus' attack on the atonement cult is that it will be replaced under all circumstances, if not by the immediate realisation of the eschatological renewal on Mount Zion, then in a different way. The alternative is that Jesus dies vicariously as a ransom (cf. Mark 10:45), and that his body is given and his blood poured out for many (cf. Mark 14:22, 24). Jesus foresaw his violent death and declared, most explicitly in the words of administration during the Passover meal with the Twelve, that his death would have an atoning effect. In case of the negative outcome of the confrontation in the temple, Jesus was willing to offer himself and consequently take over and substitute for the sacrificial cult in the temple as the basis for atonement.<sup>116</sup>

---

Isa 56:7b relates to the future eschatological temple and how the temple act and the temple saying in Mark 14:58 interrelate. In spite of some criticisms, Schwemer, "Jesus Christus als Prophet, König und Priester," 221–223 basically agrees with my collocation of the temple saying and the temple act, the messianic interpretation and the connection to the atonement cult.

<sup>115</sup> I assume a causal link between Jesus' temple act and his death, but it is not possible here to discuss any details of the succeeding events culminating in the historically verified fact of his crucifixion.

5. The Relationship Between Jesus' Temple Act and Saying(s) and Other Accounts and Sayings in the Gospels Relating to the Temple

In the survey in part 1, I briefly listed the most relevant further traditions in the synoptic gospels which have to do with Jesus' attitude to the temple. Not surprisingly, opinions vary a lot within scholarship regarding the authenticity and the interpretation of these materials. Broadly speaking, it seems possible to distinguish between traditions positive to and negative to the temple. Generally, there is a correspondence between how scholars evaluate these traditions, on the one hand, and the temple act and saying(s), on the other hand.

The most outstanding "negative" tradition is Jesus' lament over Jerusalem and its "house" (οἶκος) that will be desolated in Luke 13:34–35 par. Matt 23:37–39. If the "house" is understood to be the temple, this saying likely coheres with the prediction in Mark 13:2, and we observe for example in a scholar like Kurt Paesler, who puts Mark 13:2* at the centre of Jesus' message relating to the temple, support for <sup>116</sup> For a short presentation of this aspect of the temple act cf. Ådna, "Jesus' Symbolic Act in the Temple," 471–473. A detailed exposition is given in Jesu Stellung, 412–430 ("Die Zeichenhandlung auf dem Tempelmarkt und Jesu messianische Leidens- und Opferbereitschaft"), preceded by a description of the atonement cult in the temple in Jerusalem as the proper theological background (387–412). Wilckens, Theologie, vol. I.2, 62–65, also strongly approves a mutually interrelated interpretation of the temple act and the temple saying. Their common message is the destruction of the temple and the end of the sacrificial cult: Jesus' "Vorgehen gegen die Händler und Geldwechsler galt in der Tat dem Opferkult: dessen Ende durch Gott selbst. Darum wird Gott den Tempel zerstören: Die Sühne für die Sünden Israels, die durch die Opferhandlungen bewirkt wird, hat ihre Heilskraft verloren. Israels Sünde ist von solchem Ausmaß und Gewicht, daß sie nur durch Gottes Endgericht gesühnt werden kann" (64–65, italics in the text). According to Wilckens, Jesus clearly realised that such an attack on the temple would lead to his own death, which he considered as the replacement of the temple cult: "Sein Tod wird als Sühnesterben für 'die vielen' an die Stelle der Sühneopfer im Tempel treten und diese ein für allemal ablösen" (65). Wilckens elucidates how Jesus sets out this point at the Passover meal in the passage entitled: "Das Abschiedsmahl als Sühne wirkende Umstiftung des Päsachmahls" (65–85). Cf. also Peter Stuhlmacher, "Jesus' Readiness to Suffer and His Understanding of His Death," in The Historical Jesus in Recent Research, 392–412 (translated from idem, Biblische Theologie des Neuen Testaments, vol. 1, 3rd ed. [Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2005], 124–142).

---

the authenticity of Luke 13:34–35a.<sup>117</sup> A firm proponent of the authenticity of the whole unit, i.e. also Luke 13:35b par. Matt 23:39, is Kim Huat Tan.<sup>118</sup>

Whereas scholars favouring a reforming or a cleansing understanding of the temple act can easily include the “positive” traditions, those who consider the temple act and saying(s) to be expressions of condemnation and destruction will presumably have more difficulty in accepting and integrating this material. Both Jesus’ instruction to the man whom he had healed from leprosy in Mark 1:44 par., “Show yourself to the priest, and offer for your cleansing what Moses commanded” (cf. Lev 13–14), and his saying in Matt 5:23–24 imply an acceptance of at least certain parts of the sacrificial cult in the temple. Some critics try to circumvent this fact by claiming that the real emphasis in these texts lies somewhere else—viz. on the faith in Jesus’ healing power (cf. Luke 17:12–19, as well) and on the willingness to reconcile with one’s brother—but such exegetically justified observations cannot invalidate the fact that these texts take the fulfilment of certain sacrificial rituals for granted.<sup>119</sup> Further, the accounts of the poor widow’s offering (Mark 12:41–44 par. Luke 21:1–4) and the payment of the temple tax (Matt 17:24–27) express an acceptance of financial support of the temple.<sup>120</sup> Personally, as an exponent of a “destruction” understanding

<sup>117</sup> Cf. Paesler, Das Tempelwort Jesu, 250–255. See ibid., 260, for his description of how Luke 13:34–35 relates to Mark 13:2*. It should not be overlooked, however, that Paesler leaves out the last element of the unit in Luke 13:35b, respectively Matt 23:39, as “eine sekundäre Ergänzung der Q-Tradenten” (252).

<sup>118</sup> Tan, Aims of Jesus, 100–128. Tan considers it likely that Luke 13:34–35 was spoken “during the last phase of Jesus’ public ministry while in Jerusalem, possibly just after the ‘cleansing’ of the temple” (124–125). Such a dating of the announcement of the desolation of the temple coheres well with my chronological positioning of Mark 13:2 (cf. above). Given such a date, the foreseen turning point in Luke 13:35b must refer to the return of Jesus as judge at his parousia, at which the greeting of him by the Jerusalemites with the words of Ps 118:26 still expresses a hope for the conversion of the nation of Israel (cf. Tan, 115–121). Insofar as the destruction of the present temple is succeeded by a reversed reality of salvation, Luke 13:34–35 par. Matt 23:37–39 might even be considered to contain an analogous structure to the two-part temple saying in Mark 14:58.

<sup>119</sup> Sanders, The Historical Figure of Jesus, 224, sees Jesus here in agreement with “standard Jewish advice, which reflects endorsement of the sacrificial system.” Paesler, Das Tempelwort Jesu, 231–232, accepts the authenticity of Matt 5:23–24 and infers from it, “daß Jesus den Jerusalemer Kultbetrieb als selbstverständlich gegeben voraussetzt” (232). This seems to be one more example of the inner tension in Paesler’s portrait of Jesus, criticised above (cf. n. 110).

<sup>120</sup> However, in the case of the widow the point is clearly her exemplary attitude of giving everything to God and of exclusively putting her trust in his care. The tradition of the temple act and as a supporter of the authenticity of Mark 13:2 and 14:58, I consider all these “positive” traditions as potentially authentic and coherent with Jesus’ temple act and temple sayings as long as they are chronologically placed prior to Jesus’ last stay in Jerusalem, during which he acted and spoke out against the old temple and its sacrificial cult. Jesus was deeply rooted in the holy traditions of Israel. He venerated Jerusalem with the temple on Mount Zion as the dwelling place of God (Matt 5:35b; 23:21; cf. n. 111), and his willingness to die vicariously confirms the need for atonement which the sacrificial cult in the temple had effected in a legitimate way, until the very moment of the eschatological turning point signified by Jesus’ radical call for Israel’s repentance in his action in the temple.<sup>121</sup>

Our sources for the first decades of the early church seem to reflect varying attitudes towards the temple in Jerusalem. To a large extent, although not with absolute consistency, the differences can be attributed to the so-called “Hebrews” and “Hellenists” respectively (cf. Acts 6:1). Whereas the Aramaic-speaking Jewish Christians in Palestine, under the leadership of James, continued a practice of regularly visiting the temple and even participating in sacrificial rites, the Greek-speaking Jewish Christian “Hellenists” originating in Jerusalem—but soon spreading far beyond Judaea—seem to have conceived of the death of Jesus in such a way as a once and for all substitute for the atonement cult in the temple (cf. Rom 3:25–26 and Hebrews) that Christians no longer needed to nor should take part in the sacrificial rites in the temple in Jerusalem.<sup>122</sup> To me, it seems that the “Hebrew” position corresponded to the attitude of Jesus throughout most of his ministry, as reflected in the “positive” traditions shortly commented upon above, and that the “Hellenist” position much more clearly grasped the far-reaching implications of his act in the temple and his death. In spite of the differing approaches towards the temple within the early church and in spite of the rather frustrating range of disagreements in modern scholarly evaluation of Jesus’ temple act and sayings, I nevertheless find good reason to conclude this review of about the temple tax contains a number of exegetical difficulties and is ambiguous in its view of the tax and whether it is proper to pay it.

---

<sup>121</sup> Cf. Ådna, Jesu Stellung, 434–440 for a fuller treatment of how the “positive” temple traditions relate to the temple act.

<sup>122</sup> Cf. Paul Barnett, The Birth of Christianity: The First Twenty Years, After Jesus, vol. 1 (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2005), 66–76.

recent scholarship with a claim that Jesus' temple act and the related sayings remain crucial to any portrayal of the message of Jesus of Nazareth and his understanding of his own mission.<sup>123</sup>

[Only after having finished this article and too late to be taken into account I discover that one of the editors, Tom Holmén, extensively covers both the temple sayings and the temple act in his monograph Jesus and Jewish Covenant Thinking, Biblical Interpretation Series 55 (Leiden: Brill, 2001), 296–329. Similarly, the treatment of the temple act in Brant Pitre, Jesus, the Tribulation, and the End of the Exile: Restoration Eschatology and the Origin of the Atonement, WUNT 2.204 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck; Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Academic, 2005), 286–290, 368–376, 475 should definitely have been included in the presentation of recent scholarship.]

---

<sup>123</sup> Hence, I disagree with the conclusion in Wedderburn's recent survey of the scholarly debate, according to which the temple act remains too puzzling to serve as a key to Jesus' ministry (cf. Wedderburn, "Jesus' Action in the Temple," 22). In contrast, I consider the decision by the editors of The Historical Jesus in Recent Research to include E. P. Sanders' initial chapter in Jesus and Judaism, 61–76 (with notes, 363–369), serving as the point of departure for portraying Jesus (cf. 3.2.2 above), as one of altogether five contributions on major events in Jesus' career under the title "Jesus and the Temple" (361–381), as concurring with my judgement regarding the centrality of the temple act and sayings to research on the historical Jesus.

JESUS AND THE SHEMA

KIM HUAT TAN

The Shema<sup>1</sup> is in Jewish thought the supreme affirmation of the unity of God and is frequently regarded as the acceptance of the yoke of the kingdom of heaven.<sup>2</sup> If the Shema may be understood as Judaism's most basic confession and something like a creed during the time of Jesus, exploring and elucidating his understanding and employment of it in his ministry becomes a task worth pursuing.

Two things need to be ascertained before results may be arrived at. The first concerns the status of the Shema in Jesus' day. To what extent can the evidence of the Mishnah be retrojected back to Jesus' ministry? Whether we can speak of a creed or simply the frequent use of a passage, such as Deut 6:4–5, has important ramifications. If Jesus was dealing with a creed and made novel statements about its meaning, the overturning of an identity-making consensus may be at work. If he was simply highlighting the importance of one popular passage, what may be at work may simply be an employment of something popular for the building of a new proposal. Of course, the latter is still important for an assessment of the impact Jesus' ministry had on his people, but it would not carry as great a significance as it would have done if the former were true.

The second concerns, of course, whether the gospel traditions, which feature Jesus' discussion and use of the Shema, may confidently be traced back to him and are not merely the products of the post-Easter community. This will involve painstaking sifting and analysis, the results of which will doubtless not be convincing to everyone. However, if it is possible to derive results with a fair measure of confidence, exploring whether Jesus has offered anything new or creative to his contemporaries' understanding of the Shema becomes something that scholarship on the historical Jesus cannot bypass. Indeed, if a leitmotif can be identified, the significance will be great, as it may very well lead us to the heart of Jesus' ministry. There will then be ripple effects on our understanding of Jesus' Jewishness.

---

<sup>1</sup> In today's Jewish liturgy, it comprises three paragraphs: Deut 6:4–9; 11:13–21; and Num 15:37–41. The name is derived from the first two words of Deut 6:4: שמע ישראל (Hear, O Israel!).

<sup>2</sup> L. Jacobs, "Shema, Reading of," EncJud, 1372. Cf. b. Ber. 13b.

1. History of Research

Surprisingly, scholarship on such an important topic has been meagre. Even if we attribute this dearth of interest to anti-Semitism of a bygone era, the lack of scholarly attention to such a topic in modern times is still baffling. This becomes even more apparent when it is realised that the citing of Deut 6:5 in the synoptic gospels (Matt 22.37//Mark 12:30; Mark 12:33; Luke 10:27) presents a most fascinating and intricate problem. They come in different forms. No one citation agrees with another. They all do not appear to conform to either the Masoretic Text (MT) or the LXX. J. Jeremias lamented in 1961<sup>3</sup> that this glaring problem was not addressed by commentators up to his day.<sup>4</sup> The exception to this was the lonely voice of T. W. Manson, who took notice of it but confessed that it was a very complex textual problem which he, unfortunately, was unable to solve.<sup>5</sup> For Jeremias, this phenomenon of textual divergences over the gospels' citation of Deut 6:5 is curious, especially when the Shema was a liturgical text of the Jews of Jesus' day. What proposals did he come up with to explain this curious phenomenon? Beginning from the premise that the Shema was a creed in Jesus' day,<sup>6</sup> he proposed that the divergences in the synoptic gospels had arisen because the Greek-speaking church had stopped reciting it. The Lord's Prayer had taken over its place in the liturgy of the church (Didache 8.3). This contributed to early Christianity's lack of precision over the words of the Shema. Consequently, he concludes:

both the prayers of Jesus and those of the early church stand in the [Jewish] liturgical tradition. The custom of praying three times a day is taken over from Judaism, but the new life bestowed through the gospel

---

<sup>3</sup> In a lecture delivered during the VIII<sup>e</sup> Semaine d'Études Liturgiques at the Institut de Théologie Orthodoxe Saint-Serge, Paris, which was subsequently published. The work utilised is the English Translation, published as The Prayers of Jesus (London: SCM, 1967).

<sup>4</sup> Jeremias, Prayers, 80.

<sup>5</sup> T. W. Manson, "The Old Testament in the Teaching of Jesus," BJRL 34 (1951-2): 312-332, at 318.

<sup>6</sup> Jeremias, Prayers, 80.

shatters the fixed liturgical forms, especially with regard to the content of prayers.<sup>7</sup>

The replacement of an important liturgical element by something novel is a very significant move, since it signals the change in approach to the God who is worshipped and this, in turn, may imply the coming into being of a new community. Jeremias was aware of such implications and, for him this novelty signalled the arrival of the eschatological age.<sup>8</sup> It should be noted here that Jeremias was dealing principally with early Christianity and did not attempt to analyse how the Shema was utilised in Jesus' ministry, and whether there might have emerged a leitmotif in relation to the eschatological age Jesus was inaugurating.

One who comes close to tackling the topic of this essay is B. Gerhardsson. He has devoted a lifetime's study to the possible influence of the Shema on the gospel traditions. His earliest attempt at such a probe is published in 1966 as The Testing of God's Son.<sup>9</sup> Incomplete though the book may be, the argument found in it is none the less coherent and significant. Gerhardsson argues that the triadic pattern of the temptation story in Matt 4:1–11 is based on the rabbinic interpretation of Deut 6:5,<sup>10</sup> where the first temptation may be related to loving God with the heart, the second, the soul, and the third, the might (Mammon). Such a subtle but profound use of the Shema indicates for Gerhardsson that the temptation narrative was written up as a coherent unit from the start by a Pharisaic scribe, well-trained in the methods of rabbinic exegesis.<sup>11</sup> This discovery led him subsequently to look for other passages which might provide evidence of their being influenced by the Shema at the deep structural level. The numerous essays he wrote, barring those in Swedish, are now collected conveniently as a volume entitled The Shema in the New Testament.<sup>12</sup>

Gerhardsson works at the level of the final form of the gospel text without making a detailed excursion into tracing these traditions back to Jesus. That said, the assumption he works with is that, as pious men,

<sup>7</sup> Jeremias, Prayers, 81.

<sup>8</sup> Ibid., 78, 81.

<sup>9</sup> B. Gerhardsson, The Testing of God's Son (Matt 4.1–11 & Par.) (Lund: Gleerup, 1966).

<sup>10</sup> The key text in Gerhardsson's arsenal is m. Ber. 9:5, although other rabbinic passages are utilised, Gerhardsson, Testing, 73–76.

<sup>11</sup> Gerhardsson, Testing, 79–80.

<sup>12</sup> B. Gerhardsson, The Shema in the New Testament (Lund: Novapress, 1996).

Jesus and his disciples must have recited the Shema twice a day, every morning and every evening.<sup>13</sup> He proposes after a lifetime of work that the Shema forms the deep structure not only of Matt 4:1–11 but also that of many other passages in the NT. Six may be singled out for mention: the Parable of the Sower together with the interpretation (Mark 4:1–9, 13–20 and par.); part of the Matthean Passion narrative (Matt 27:33–50); the central portion of the Sermon on the Mount (Matt 6:1–6, 16–21); the six parables accompanying the Parable of the Sower in Matthew (Matt 13:24–50); the description of the believers in Acts 4:32; and the paean to love in 1 Cor 13:1–3. These passages are analysed to show that a triadic pattern underlies them and their themes correspond with that of heart, soul and might in Deut 6:5, at least in the way the rabbis would have recognised (m. Ber. 9.5).

Gerhardsson's thesis has not met with wide approval, due mainly to two reasons. The first is that his argument is based mainly on texts that postdate the formation of the New Testament. Can one use the Mishnaic evidence to analyse texts emanating from an earlier period? Information on pre-Mishnaic Jewish prayer is extremely scanty, and what is available has been debated with respect to its historicity and significance. The second is that his exegesis often appears fanciful and forced.<sup>14</sup> Two examples will suffice: his unpacking of the themes of the six parables in Matthew (Matt 13:24–50) as reflecting the triad of heart, soul and might, in that order, has not been taken up by any major commentary on Matthew. One also wonders whether the description of Jesus' passion in Matthew has been written intentionally to correspond with the triad of heart, soul and might. Such detective work often appears to be over-subtle. Since the gospel traditions are religious traditions, they may easily be pressed into the mould made by the triad of heart, soul and might as such themes are often naturally present in religious discourse. Consequently, it is easy to over-interpret. Clear indicators are needed if we are to be confident that such allusions were originally intended.

That said, Gerhardsson is to be thanked for raising our awareness of possible correspondences between some gospel passages and Deut 6:5. If Gerhardsson's case is cogent, the Gospel traditions may be regarded as profoundly shaped by Jewish themes, especially the Shema. From its presence in the gospel traditions, Gerhardsson conjectures, although he does not insist, that it is eminently possible that Jesus himself was also influenced accordingly.

<sup>13</sup> Gerhardsson, Shema, 10.

<sup>14</sup> Cf. W. D. Davies and D. C. Allison, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Gospel According to Saint Matthew ICC, vol. I (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1988), 353.

In many ways a parallel to Gerhardsson's work, J. Marcus has recently proposed that the Shema played an important role in the composition of Mark.<sup>15</sup> Both work at the level of the final form of the gospels and not that of the Jesus of history. But while Gerhardsson looks for the triadic formula in his investigations, Marcus focuses on the passages that utilise the concept of monotheism, a central concern of the Shema. Marcus points out that in addition to the explicit reference to the Shema in Mark 12:29, two other Markan passages—2:7 and 10:18—implicitly refer to it because the word εἷς, instead of the adjective μόνος, is joined with θεός. The latter would be more fitting if Mark simply wants to say that only God can forgive sins and is good (cf. Luke 5:21). This, then, points to the use of the Shema in the Markan passages,<sup>16</sup> which naturally leads to the question why Mark is interested in the theme of the oneness of God. Marcus's proposal is that Mark was responding to Jewish objections, based on the Shema, to the Christian claims about Jesus.<sup>17</sup> In other words, when Christians attributed to Jesus Christ the authority to forgive sins and other related activities, they also argued that such claims did not militate against monotheism. Jesus would then be regarded as the plenipotentiary of God on earth. For this argument to work, Marcus has to follow the consensus view which states that the practice of reciting the Shema goes back to the Second Temple period. Such a consensus needs examination in the light of a recent and spirited challenge, which will be taken up below.<sup>18</sup> Marcus is certainly to be thanked for a stimulating piece that encourages us to take a further step into the shadowy domains of the Jesus of history and see whether such themes may also be predicated of him.

---

<sup>15</sup> J. Marcus, "Authority to Forgive Sins upon the Earth: the Shema in the Gospel of Mark," in The Gospels and the Scriptures of Israel, ed. C. A. Evans and W. R. Stegner, JSNTS 104/SSEJC 3 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1994), 196–211.

<sup>16</sup> Marcus, "Authority," 197–98.

<sup>17</sup> Ibid., 199–200.

<sup>18</sup> P. Foster, "'Why did Matthew get the Shema Wrong?' A Study of Matthew 22:37," JBL 122 (2003): 309–333.

Mention must also be made of the volume of essays edited by Perry Yoder.<sup>19</sup> Three essays are devoted to exploring the use of the Shema by the synoptic gospels.<sup>20</sup> Although argued with vigour, the results arrived at can be questionable at times, such as the insistence that Mark's discussion of the Shema in Mark 12:28–34 was formulated for a Hellenistic Jewish audience and not a Gentile one;<sup>21</sup> and the collapsing of the command to love God and the command to love the neighbour into a single command in Luke 10:25 as being unprecedented.<sup>22</sup> These essays treat the matter at the evangelists' level and eschew relating it to the historical Jesus.

2. Did the Shema Have the Status of a Creed pre-70 CE?

It is usually claimed that the Shema formed the very centre of the synagogal liturgy and occupied the pivotal place in the worship of the Second Temple.<sup>23</sup> Versepnt puts it succinctly: "It is commonly agreed... that the recitation of the Shema twice a day antedated the destruction of the Second Temple."<sup>24</sup> L. Jacobs' reconstruction is widely accepted: the Shema as it is recited today has undergone the following stages of development: (i) the recitation of Deut 6:4; (ii) the reading of Deut 6:4–9; (iii) the reading of Deut 6:4–9; 11:13–21; and Num 15:37–41; and (iv) the additions of the benedictions.<sup>25</sup> As every Jew of Jesus' day had to recite it twice a day, it may then be assumed that Jesus of Nazareth did the same. Consequently, when the text-forms of the Shema as found in the gospels evince divergence, and when none of the forms appears to be derived either from the MT or the LXX, a conundrum ensues. To add to this confusion, one may refer to Justin Martyr's writings where he cites Deut 6:5 in a binary

<sup>19</sup> P. B. Yoder, ed., Take This Word to Heart: The Shema in Torah and Gospel (Scottsdale, PA/Waterloo, ON: Herald, 2005).

<sup>20</sup> J. W. Carlson, "The Shema in Mark: For a Gentile or Jewish Audience," 52–70; J. T. Williams, "The Significance of Love of God and Neighbour in Luke's Gospel," 71–99; and A. Barker, "The Double Love Command: Matthew's Hermeneutical Key," 100–133.

<sup>21</sup> Carlson, "Shema," 69–70.

<sup>22</sup> Williams, "Significance," 77–86; on this, see our treatment later.

<sup>23</sup> See, e.g., A. F. Segal, Two Powers in Heaven: Early Rabbinic Reports about Christianity and Gnosticism (Leiden: Brill, 1977), 139.

<sup>24</sup> D. J. Versepnt, "James 1:17 and the Jewish Morning Prayers," NovT 39 (1997): 177–191, at 179.

<sup>25</sup> Jacobs, "Shema," 1370.

form!<sup>26</sup> How could such an important text be cited with such variation? Would not its status as the central liturgical item lead to fixity of form? This conundrum is usually resolved in two ways. Jeremias conjectures that this is so because the Greek-speaking church has stopped using the Shema in favour of the Lord's Prayer.<sup>27</sup> Falk points out that when something is made liturgical, its form is not necessarily fixed (cf. the different forms of the Lord's Prayer in Matthew, Luke and the Didache).<sup>28</sup>

Not surprisingly, some Matthean scholars have argued that behind the composition of the First Gospel stood a Gentile and not a Jew.<sup>29</sup> This verdict, incidentally, dovetails with Jeremias' conjecture. But in a spirited defence of the first evangelist's Jewishness, Foster has recently argued that the peculiar Matthean text-form does not prove the contrary because there was no fixed form to begin with.<sup>30</sup> Instead, the practice of reciting the Shema as a creedal statement, which gave rise to a fixed form in its wake, actually started in the Tannaitic period. This conclusion is based on two central arguments: there is no explicit reference to the liturgical use of the Shema prior to m. Ber. 1:1–4; and there is evidence which suggests that such use is a rabbinic innovation (b. Ber. 21a). The key documents usually cited in the consensus view, viz. the Nash Papyrus, 1QS X, the tefillin and the mezuzot from Qumran, and Josephus' Antiquities of the Jews 4.212–213, need closer examination.

We shall begin with the Mishnaic evidence. As E. P. Sanders observes: "the mishnaic rabbis simply took it for granted, as something that did not require debate or proof, that every Jew said the Shema' (along with daily prayers) twice a day."<sup>31</sup> Indeed, the passage in m. Ber. 1.3 is most instructive, for it purportedly records a debate which pre-

<sup>26</sup> In three places the following is found: ἐξ ὅλης τῆς καρδίας σου καὶ ἐξ ὅλης τῆς ἰσχύος σου (Dial. 93.2; 93.3; 1 Apol. 16.6). Cf. R. F. Shendinger, "A Note on the Variant Form of the Shema in the Writings of Justin Martyr," HTR 93 (2000): 161–163.

<sup>27</sup> Jeremias, Prayers, 81.

<sup>28</sup> D. K. Falk, "Jewish Prayer Literature and the Jerusalem Church in Acts," in The Book of Acts in its Palestinian Setting, ed. R. J. Bauckham (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1995), 261–301, at 276 n. 28.

<sup>29</sup> E.g., K. W. Clark, "The Gentile Bias in Matthew," JBL 66 (1947): 165–172; G. Strecker, Der Weg der Gerechtigkeit: Untersuchung zur Theologie des Matthäus (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1962), esp. 26.

<sup>30</sup> Foster, "Matthew," 332.

<sup>31</sup> E. P. Sanders, Judaism: Practice and Belief 63 BCE–66 CE (London: SCM, 1992), 196.

dated Jesus' ministry. The School of Shammai and the School of Hillel differed over the interpretation of the posture to be adopted when reciting the Shema. The fact that the debate was over such a trivial matter as the posture indicates that the content of the Shema had already reached a kind of creedal status and may be assumed as something agreed upon universally. Furthermore, we may cite m. Tamid 5.1, which purportedly describes a communal and liturgical recitation of the Shema and the berakoth, led by priests:

The officer said to them, "Recite ye a Benediction!" They recited a Benediction, and recited the Ten Commandments, the Shema, and the And it shall come to pass if ye shall harken [Deut 11:13–21], and the And the Lord spake unto Moses [Num 15:37–41]. They pronounced three Benedictions with the people: "True and sure," and "Abodah" and the Priestly Blessing; and on the Sabbath they pronounced a further Benediction for the outgoing Course of priests.

Much of what is found in today's synagogal liturgy is similar to what is described in the above passage (cf. also m. Ber. 1:4). Although we do not know what the first benediction is,<sup>32</sup> what is so interesting about this passage is the conjoining of the Ten Commandments (the essence of the Torah) and the Shema (the foundational belief of Israel), and the enveloping of the Shema with benedictions.

Although the compilation of the Mishnah was completed at the end of the second century, the many and varied discussions of the Shema indicate that it was not a recent innovation and had indeed been normative for the rabbis for quite a while. If this is to be objected to, how else could one explain the data found in the Mishnah? Is it credible to think that for the rabbis, the notion began only after the destruction of the Temple and quickly gained normative status so much so that they need not argue over whether the Shema should be recited, but how it should be recited, and in fact harked back to the Schools of Shammai and Hillel? Of course, the critical question is whether such normative status was early only for the rabbis, since b. Ber. 21a suggests that the practice might have been a rabbinic innovation even though it may be granted that it was derived from their predecessors. It reads:

---

<sup>32</sup> But see J. Heinemann, Prayer in the Talmud: Forms and Patterns (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1977), 230.

Rab Judah said: If a man is in doubt whether he has recited the Shema, he need not recite it again. If he is in doubt whether he has said "True and firm," or not, he should say it again. What is the reason?—The recital of the Shema is ordained only by the Rabbis, the saying of "True and firm" is a Scriptural ordinance.

The words "True and firm" refer to the Emet Ve-Yaziv, a benediction pronounced after the morning recitation of the Shema. This saying of R. Judah, albeit codified late, threatens to undo the consistent picture of Shema recitation in the Mishnah. This issue will be addressed after a discussion of the critical pre-Mishnaic passages, which suggest that the practice under discussion is not confined just to the rabbis.

We begin with the Nash Papyrus. This document is the linchpin of the consensus view. Coming to the attention of the scholarly world in 1903,<sup>33</sup> this document, which probably emanated from Fayyum and is to be dated to the second century BCE on palaeographical grounds,<sup>34</sup> contains the Decalogue and the Shema conjoined. The text preserved shows affinity with the LXX. The document breaks off after the second letter of the first word of Deut 6:5,<sup>35</sup> but what is preserved is sufficient to show that, at a very early stage in the religious development of Second Temple Judaism, the Decalogue and the Shema were critical items. E. Würthwein surmises that the document could have functioned either liturgically, devotionally or served as an instructional collection of texts.<sup>36</sup> Whatever option we choose, the following may be deemed to be clearly indicated: (i) the importance of the Decalogue and the Shema for the Jewish faith was established early; (ii) the conjoining of these two passages indicates that there is an intimate link between them in Jewish religious thought; and (iii) this gives supporting evidence for believing that the practice envisaged in m. Tamid 5:1 may have predated the destruction of the Second Temple.<sup>37</sup>

The Qumran evidence becomes critical at this juncture. If it can be established that a sect has not abandoned the use of the Shema in its

<sup>33</sup> Published by S. A. Cooke, Proceedings of the Society of Biblical Archaeology 25 (1903) 34–56. Cooke dated it to the second or first century CE.

<sup>34</sup> This dating was argued for by W. F. Albright and has since prevailed in the scholarly world. See his "A Biblical Fragment from the Maccabean Age: The Nash Papyrus," JBL 56 (1937): 145–176.

<sup>35</sup> וְהַבְּרִית

<sup>36</sup> E. Würthwein, The Text of the Old Testament: An Introduction to the Biblia Hebraica (London: SCM, 1980), 33.

<sup>37</sup> Foster failed to see such implications in his "Matthew," 327–328.

liturgy, we then have a further indication of the widespread use of it in Jewish society. The Qumran evidence comes principally from two sources: 1QS X and the texts found in the tefillin (1Q13; 4Q128–148; 5Q8; 8Q3) and the mezuzot (4Q149–155, 8Q4).<sup>38</sup> To begin with the latter: tefillin and mezuzot are containers bound to the hand or the head and to doorframes respectively, in which are found biblical passages. The inspiration for such a practice comes mainly from Deuteronomy 6:8–9. A quick survey of the contents of these Qumran finds reveals a very interesting picture. The passages in the tefillin are varied. Simplifying for the sake of clarity, they may be ascribed to five blocks of texts: Exod 12:43–13:18; 20:7–12; Deut 5:1–6.9; 10:21–11:21; 32:14–33. These blocks of texts seem to cluster around not so much the theme of confessing Yahweh as one, as that which emphasises the need to remember Torah through the use of religious accoutrements. This being the case, it is not too surprising that the first paragraph of the Shema (Deut 6:4–9), or parts of it, is found only in six of the twenty-four tefillin that could be opened and their contents deciphered (4Q130, 135, 136, 140, 142; 8Q3). The second paragraph of the liturgical Shema (Deut 11:13–21) fares slightly better. The passage or a part of it is found in eight tefillin (1Q13; 4Q128, 130, 131, 136, 143, 146; 8Q3). Only 4Q130 and 4Q136 conjoin the two passages (or parts of them). There is no mention whatsoever of Num 15:37–41, the third paragraph of the liturgical Shema. The mezuzot present a similar picture but with a higher frequency for the first paragraph (Deut 6:4–9): three out of the seven discovered (4Q150, 151, 152); while the second paragraph (Deut 11:13–21) is found twice (4Q153; 8Q4). To sum up: contrary to what is usually believed, the tefillin and the mezuzot from Qumran do not offer strong corroborating evidence for the consensus view.<sup>39</sup> The Scriptural passages chosen are selected based on the theme of remembrance through accoutrements, and the theological ideas that are to be remembered range from the Exodus and Torah to the Shema. No special preference is given to the last mentioned. Indeed, the third <sup>38</sup> There are three tefillin from Cave 5 (5Q8) which unfortunately could not be opened. In addition, it should also be mentioned that there are also three others, which are unfortunately unclassifiable because no one knows from which cave they came. See J. C. Vanderkam, The Dead Sea Scrolls Today (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1994), 33.

<sup>39</sup> Cf. S. C. Reif, Judaism and Hebrew Prayer: New Perspectives on Jewish Liturgical History (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993), 83, 347 n. 26; and Falk, "Jewish Prayer Literature," 287.

paragraph in the recitation of the Shema, as evidenced in the Mishnah, is not featured at all.

The evidence from 1QS X is assessed differently by scholars. The passage around which much discussion has taken place is found in lines 10 and 13–14:

<sup>10</sup>At the onset of day and night I shall enter the covenant of God, and when evening and morning depart I shall repeat his precepts...<sup>13</sup>... When I start to stretch out my hands and my feet I shall bless his name; when I start to go out and to come in,<sup>14</sup> to sit and to stand up, and lying down in my bed I shall extol him; I shall bless him with the offering that issues from my lips in the row of men.

The entering into covenant with God, its position parallel to the recitation (אמר) of the precepts in line 10, which refer to the Torah, and the allusion to Deut 6:7 in lines 13–14<sup>40</sup> have been judged as unmistakably referring to confessing the Shema.<sup>41</sup> Lines 13–16 contain a series of three berakoth. Since line 10 refers to the recitation of the Shema, lines 13–16 may be taken as showing that such a recitation takes place together with the uttering of the berakoth, constituting a parallel to the Mishnaic evidence. Talmon surmises that this evidence from Qumran indicates the beginning of the process of the institutionalisation of Jewish prayers.<sup>42</sup> Furthermore, the Nash Papyrus provides evidence that the Torah, in the form of the Decalogue, and the Shema have been brought together before. Foster remains unnecessarily sceptical and states that the Shema is not explicitly mentioned and what 1QS X, 10–14 may be referring to is some sort of ritualistic practice of covenant renewal taking place in the community.<sup>43</sup> But what is the content of the covenant renewal? In our judgment, this amounts to explaining the obscure with something much more obscure, not with something closer to hand. If it may be argued that 1QS X, 10–14 alludes to the Shema, three implications arise: (i) the twice-daily recitation coincides with the pattern found in the Mishnah; (ii) the Shema governs the life of the community, since sunrise and sunset (and through the night)

<sup>40</sup> The order is reverse with sunrise being mentioned first. The Qumran community most probably reckoned day from sunrise to sunrise instead of the standard Jewish practice of sunset to sunset. See S. Talmon, The World of Qumran from Within (Jerusalem: Magnes, 1989), 175–176.

<sup>41</sup> Versepunt, "Jewish Morning Prayers," 184–185; Falk, "Jewish Prayer Literature," 287–288; and Talmon, World of Qumran, 226.

<sup>42</sup> Talmon, World of Qumran, 225 n. 83.

<sup>43</sup> Foster, "Matthew," 329.

are expressions of the course of the entire day; and (iii) the recitation of the Shema is described as entering the covenant and this has implications for our understanding of the important status of the Shema in the community's understanding of covenantal identity. Falk even suggests that the berakah concerning the heavenly luminaries (beginning from 9.26) and the singing of praise to God among the holy ones, which precedes line 10, have themes in common with the Yoşer or the first benediction preceding the Shema in the rabbinic liturgy.<sup>44</sup>

What about the evidence offered in Josephus? For at least one scholar, this evidence confirms that the practice of enveloping of the Shema with benedictions is pre-rabbinic.<sup>45</sup> The passage in question is Ant. 4.212–213:

Twice each day, at the dawn thereof and when the hour comes for turning to repose, let all acknowledge before God the bounties which He has bestowed on them through their deliverance from the land of Egypt: thanksgiving is a natural duty, and is rendered alike in gratitude for past mercies and to incline the giver to others yet to come. They shall inscribe also on their doors the greatest of the benefits which they have received from God and each shall display them on his arms; and all that can show forth the power of God and his goodwill towards them, let them bear a record thereof written on the head and on the arm, so that men may see on every side the loving care with which God surrounds them.

What must be stated first of all is that the Shema is nowhere explicitly mentioned. Consequently, scholars scrutinise phrases that may allude to the Shema. The first allusion may be found in the phrase “twice each day,” as this is a synonymous way of stating “when you lie down and when you rise up” (Deut 6:7). Secondly, the last clause of 4.213 may be a reference to the mezuzah being placed on doorposts.<sup>46</sup> If this is correct, the mention of displaying gratitude to God on the arms, heads and doorposts indicates that Deut 6:8–9 is being alluded to. However, the passage speaks of acknowledging God for his blessings, especially that of the deliverance from Egypt. This is something not mentioned in the first two paragraphs of the liturgical Shema but in the third. But it must also be pointed out that the Exodus forms the backdrop of the injunctions in the Deuteronomic passages. Some scholars have actually taken the description of the postulated Shema as thanksgiving as attesting to the conjoining of the berakoth with the Shema.<sup>47</sup> This serves then as evidence that what is attested in the Mishnah actually predates the destruction of the Second Temple.

<sup>44</sup> Falk, “Jewish Prayer Literature,” 288, based on M. Weinfeld, “Traces of Kedushat Yotzer and Pesukey De-Zimra in the Qumran Literature and in Ben-Sira” (Hebrew), Tarbiz 45 (1976): 15–26.

<sup>45</sup> Verseput, “Jewish Morning Prayers,” 183.

<sup>46</sup> So H. St. J. Thackeray, ed., Josephus, vol. IV (London and New York: Heinemann and Putnam's Sons, 1930), 578 n. b.

On their own, the different pieces of evidence from the Nash Papyrus, the Qumran finds and Josephus are not compelling. But when they are brought together, they support the conclusion that it is eminently plausible that at least Deut 6:4–9 forms the bastion of Jewish orthodoxy and religious duty before 70 CE. It may be far-fetched to speak of its being a creed but if Jewish communities were asked to summarise their faith and establish a communal liturgy, the one text that they would start with may arguably be Deut 6:4–9. This is further supported by two considerations. First, the love of God and the love of neighbour or humanity have often been regarded as the summary of Torah by many Jews (cf. T. Iss. 5.2; 7.5; T. Dan 5.3; Let. Aris. 229; Philo, Virt. 95; Spec. 2.63). The injunction to love God is found expressed in the locus classicus, Deut 6:5. Second, monotheism may be regarded as a fighting doctrine of many Jews of the Second Temple period.<sup>48</sup> This was given accelerated development because of the Maccabean experience and because of the ethos in which many Jews found themselves: subjects of an Empire which endorsed a plurality of religions. Indeed, the later Talmudic tradition that Rabbi Akiba died with the Shema on his lips as a fulfilment of what it means to love Yahweh with all one's soul (or life)<sup>49</sup> indicates that Deut 6:4–9 was the driving force of Jewish piety and theology. It is only in Deut 6:4–9 that the cardinal ideas of love for Yahweh and monotheism are found conjoined.

What are we, therefore, to make of b. Ber. 21a? The first thing that needs to be mentioned is that b. Ber. 21a shows that there was a debate on the normative status of the recitation of the Shema and it implies that such recitation takes a subordinate role to that of the berakoth. We may very well have here a peculiar view of some rabbis which did not represent the view of the majority. That said, another explanation is possible. The repartee by R. Joseph and the rejoinder by Abaye in the same paragraph of b. Ber. 21a are instructive. These demonstrate that the whole debate was not about whether the Shema was important, but about whether it should be recited in the way that the berakoth should, which (for the rabbis) was clearly commanded by Scripture. Indeed, it may be argued that the fact that even though the recitation of the Shema was widely practised, although there was no clear Scriptural commandment for it, serves to show its significance.

<sup>47</sup> Falk, "Jewish Prayer Literature," 287; Versepunt, "Jewish Morning Prayers," 183.

<sup>48</sup> Cf. N. T. Wright, The New Testament and the People of God (London: SPCK, 1992), 247–259, esp. 248. See also L. W. Hurtado, Lord Jesus Christ: Devotion to Jesus in Earliest Christianity (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2003), 32–42.

<sup>49</sup> b. Ber. 61b.

If what is presented in this section is on the right track, assessing Jesus' attitude towards the Shema and his employment of it in his arguments with the religious leaders of his day becomes a compelling task. In what follows, we will be principally concerned with Deut 6:4–5 and the themes found in it.

3. The Shema in the Gospel Traditions

If we think that a probe into the gospel traditions for indications that Jesus either discussed the Shema or employed it in his teaching ministry will yield only meagre results, we are in for a surprise. There are a couple of important passages which are worthy of close scrutiny. Indeed, if we were to include the theme of rendering service to God alone, more passages may be added to the database. Due to constraints of space, this essay can only take up the evidence from the synoptic gospels.

3.1. The Shema in Matt 22:34–40//Mark 12:28–34

Mark records in 12:28–34 that in response to a scribe's question about the first (ποία ἐστὶν ἐντολὴ πρώτη πάντων = most important)<sup>50</sup> commandment, Jesus replies by quoting Deut 6:4–5. This Markan passage has a parallel in Matthew. There would have been no controversy over the hypothesis that Matthew depended wholly on Mark for the composition of this pericope, if it were not for Luke 10:25–8. This is because some Matthean divergences from the Markan text resemble that of Luke 10:25–8, raising all sorts of questions regarding the source-critical problem. Davies and Allison sum up ably the key agreements between Matt 22:34–40 and Luke 10:25–8 against Mark 12:28–34, and they need not be repeated here.<sup>51</sup> Suffice it to say that these differences concern mainly the identity of the enquirer (the use of νομικός in Matthew and Luke instead of Mark's γραμματεὺς) and his insidious motive; the epithet given to Jesus (διδάσκαλος); the omission of Deut 6:4; the omission of the Markan repetition of the commandment to love and the statement about offerings; and certain nuancing, such as making it clear that the entire Torah is being referred to (ἐν τῷ νόμῳ). In view of this list of agreements against Mark, the following theories for explaining the relationship of the three passages have been proposed:

<sup>50</sup> Cf. R. T. France, The Gospel of Mark: A Commentary on the Greek Text, NIGTC (Grand Rapids, MI and Carlisle: Eerdmans and Paternoster, 2002), 479.

- i. Luke is dependent on Matthew, who in turn has redacted Mark;<sup>52</sup>
- ii. Matthew and Luke used a version of Mark different from that which we possess today;<sup>53</sup>
- iii. Mark is dependent on Matthew and Luke (the Griesbach hypothesis);<sup>54</sup>
- iv. Matthew and Luke are dependent on both Mark and a Q version of the pericope;<sup>55</sup>
- v. Matthew and Luke are dependent on Mark and oral tradition;<sup>56</sup>
- vi. Matthew has a special source, usually referred to as M, and this latter document is dependent on Mark and possibly a Q version;<sup>57</sup> and
- vii. Matthew is dependent on Mark, but Luke has followed a different source.<sup>58</sup>

---

<sup>51</sup> W. D. Davies and D. C. Allison, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Gospel According to Saint Matthew, ICC, vol. 3 (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1997), 235.

<sup>52</sup> R. H. Gundry, Matthew: A Commentary on His Literary and Theological Art (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1982), 448.

<sup>53</sup> G. Bornkamm, "Das Doppelgebot der Liebe," in Neutestamentliche Studien für Rudolf Bultmann, BZNW 21 (Berlin: Töpelmann, 1957), 85–93.

<sup>54</sup> B. C. Butler, The Originality of St. Matthew: A Critique of the Two Document Hypothesis (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1951), 19–21; cf. C. M. Tuckett, The Revival of the Griesbach Hypothesis, SNTSMS 44 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1983), 125–133.

<sup>55</sup> R. Pesch, Das Markusevangelium II (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1979), 244–245.

<sup>56</sup> Davies and Allison, Saint Matthew III, 236.

<sup>57</sup> A. J. Hultgren, "The Double Commandment of Love in Matt 22.34–40," CBQ 36 (1974): 373–378.

<sup>58</sup> C. A. Evans, Mark 8:27–16:20, WBC 34B (Nashville: Nelson, 2001), 262.

In our opinion, hypothesis (vii) best explains the state of affairs. The agreements between Matthew and Luke are not as significant as the differences between them.<sup>59</sup> The settings are different and the questions asked are totally different. The one asked about the greatest commandment, the other about gaining eternal life; again, the one has only one question but the other asked a second question relating to the identity of the neighbour. It seems to me it is the assumption that there could only be one pericope preserved about Jesus' discussion of the Shema that encourages the adoption of the hypothesis that Luke was drawing upon the same tradition. Indeed, it may be more cogent to regard the agreements as merely coincidental and as demonstrating that Jesus was confronted more than once with the important question of the most important commandment.<sup>60</sup>

Omitting the data from Luke, one may then cogently argue that Matthew has performed the following redactional procedure, summed up ably by Hagner.<sup>61</sup> Matthew makes several substantial omissions. The first which needs to be accounted for is the omission of Mark 12:32–34. The reason for this is the hostility of Matthew towards the scribes and religious leaders. This climaxes in a series of denunciations against them in chapter 23.<sup>62</sup> Thus, a didactic story (Mark) has been converted into a conflict story (Matthew), and understandably the scribe is described as attempting to test Jesus (πειράζων αὐτόν, Matt 22:35). In addition, Matthew also omits the citation of Deut 6:4, the opening words of the Shema. Following Hagner, we may regard this omission as being made in the interest of brevity, i.e., the focus is on the commandments and thus there is no need to record the monotheistic confession of Deut 6:4.<sup>63</sup>

The third omission presents a puzzle. Mark 12:30 records a quartet of modifiers to the verb ἀγαπάω as opposed to a triad in Deut 6:4. The third item, καὶ ἐξ ὅλης τῆς διανοίας is not found in the MT. This modifier is rarely attested in the LXX,<sup>64</sup> but not one LXX or MT manuscript attests to a quartet of modifiers. The Matthean passage has three modifiers, following the Old Testament, but what is so surprising

<sup>59</sup> So Evans, Mark 8:27–16:20, 262.

<sup>60</sup> T. W. Manson, The Sayings of Jesus: As Recorded in the Gospels according to St. Matthew and St. Luke (London: SCM Press, 1950), 259–260.

<sup>61</sup> D. A. Hagner, Matthew 14–28, WBC 33B (Dallas: Word, 1994), 644–646.

<sup>62</sup> See the work of D. E. Garland, The Intention of Matthew 23, SuppNovT 52 (Leiden: Brill, 1979).

<sup>63</sup> Hagner, Matthew 14–28, 645.

<sup>64</sup> Chiefly B and Theodotion.

is that it omits Mark's fourth modifier, καὶ ἐξ ὅλης τῆς ἰσχύος σου, and retains the rare third instead! It is clear why Matthew follows a triadic structure as this is attested in the Old Testament; but the reason for Matthew's omission of Mark's fourth item and not the third is puzzling, and will be taken up shortly. Continuing with our analysis of Matthean modifications, we come now to the statement in Matt 22:40. This fits in well with the Matthean emphasis on Jesus' having fulfilled the Law and the Prophets.<sup>65</sup> The epithet διδάσκαλος (Matt 22:36) is a constantly recurring title for Jesus in Matthew. Thus, all the major differences between the two accounts can be accounted for on the basis of the notion of Matthean redaction of Mark. To reach the layer of the dominical Jesus traditions, we will then have to reckon with the Markan account.

Mark places the story within the framework of Jesus' teaching in the Temple. Most of v. 28 and the final clause of v. 34 may be regarded as the result of Markan editorial activity in providing the narrative framework, setting the scene and concluding it. This leaves us with the verbal exchange between Jesus and the scribe. It is well known that R. Bultmann is rather ambivalent about its historicity. Classifying it as a scholarly dialogue, he believes it is certainly plausible that Jesus was asked this sort of question, but he has doubts over the setting, which he believes may be a church creation. However, he is willing to grant that a historical reminiscence may be found in the pericope if it can be demonstrated that no special interests of the church are evident in it.<sup>66</sup> In a similar vein, the majority of the Fellows of the Jesus Seminar opine that the verbal exchange is a unitary composition, containing Jesus' views but written in the words of the young Jesus movement.<sup>67</sup> It is highly plausible that the ipsissima vox Jesu is found here. First, the setting and the subject matter fit in well with the Palestinian milieu of the first century. Second, the commendation of the γραμματεὺς is unique and stands out in the monolithic depiction in the gospels of tension between Jesus and οἱ γραμματεῖς. This is true even for Mark, as the earlier chapters show them in conflict with Jesus (2:6–7, 16; 3:22; 7:1, 5; 8:31; 10:33; 11:18, 27).<sup>68</sup> It is true that, in this pericope, the scribe says something that the post-Easter community would approve of. But what is spoken of only marginally supports the church's claim, which is usually Christologically-shaped. Thus, the pericope is unlikely to be a wholesale post-Easter creation. The foregoing arguments may not convince every scholar but they certainly make its dominical status plausible. The setting, although full of Markan vocabulary, need not be deemed fictional, as such a dialogue must have taken place with an interlocutor. What interlocutor would better fit the bill than someone steeped in Torah? So if we grant that the ipsissima vox Jesu is found here, the mapping out of the key ideas of the passage, especially in relation to status the Shema had in Second Temple Judaism, becomes necessary.

<sup>65</sup> Cf. J. P. Meier, Law and History in Matthew's Gospel, AnBib 71 (Rome: Biblical Institute, 1976).

<sup>66</sup> R. Bultmann, The History of the Synoptic Tradition (Oxford: Blackwell, 1972), 54–55.

<sup>67</sup> See R. Funk et al., The Five Gospels: The Search for the Authentic Words of Jesus (New York: Macmillan, 1993), 104.

According to the Markan pericope, the question which prompts Jesus' reply with the Shema asks about the first among all commandments (ποία ἐστὶν ἐντολὴ πρώτη πάντων, Mark 12:28). Why should this be asked? Three reasons may be operating here. The first is that amidst all the laws and commandments, the enquirer wants to know whether they can be succinctly summed up. This leads to the second reason, viz. that this summing up will reveal the essence of orthodoxy and orthopraxy for the Jews. Consequently, one will then have a hermeneutic for interpreting Torah, the charter of Israel's faith. Hence, whenever there is a conflict of laws, the enquirer will know which has priority.<sup>69</sup> The third reason is that if the essence of one's faith and practice can be defined, the understanding of what constitutes membership in the covenant will then be clarified.<sup>70</sup> At a time when there is great diversity in Judaism,<sup>71</sup> such a question is most understandable. Indeed, Hillel was asked a similar question: whether he could teach the whole of Torah while the learner was standing on one leg. His reply

<sup>68</sup> For a treatment on Mark's attitude towards scribes, see É. Trocmé, The Formation of the Gospel according to Mark (London: SPCK, 1975), 94–99.

<sup>69</sup> Note that the rabbis themselves discuss which commandments are "heavy" and which are "light." The rabbis often used the word כּלל for a summarising principle. See b. Ber. 63a and b. Mak. 24a. Cf. P. S. Alexander, "Jesus and the Golden Rule," in J. H. Charlesworth and L. L. Johns, eds., Hillel and Jesus: Comparisons of Two Major Religious Leaders (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1997), 363–388, esp. 383–388; and A. Y. Collins, Mark: A Commentary (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2007), 571–572.

<sup>70</sup> Cf. Evans, Mark 8.21–16.20, 263.

<sup>71</sup> Cf. the essays in J. Neusner, W. S. Green and E. S. Frierichs, eds., Judaisms and Their Messiahs at the Turn of the Christian Era (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987).

was: "Do not do to your neighbour what is hateful to you; this is the whole of Torah: the rest is commentary."<sup>72</sup>

Jesus' reply cites the Shema. A close examination of this citation will reveal that there is a puzzling element to it because four modifiers to the verb ἀγαπάω are mentioned, and not three, as is the case with the MT or LXX of Deut 6:5. Why this is so will be treated later. But what must be taken into consideration for a thorough understanding of this passage is that the Shema sums up for Israel her fundamental belief and her fundamental praxis (cf. Josephus, Apion 2.190).<sup>73</sup> The Shema then is to be understood as the essence of the pluriform Torah and therefore provides the hermeneutic to a proper understanding of it. What is interesting is that Jesus goes on to speak of the second commandment, something which was not elicited from him by the scribe. Why is this the case? It is because the praxis of the Shema must be related intimately to the praxis of loving one's neighbour. The conjoining of the love for God and the love for neighbour to form the key commands is certainly not the invention of the church, as there is ample evidence to show that many Jews in the Second Temple period thought the same (T. Iss. 5.2; 7.5; T. Dan 5.3; Let. Aris. 229; Philo, Virt. 95; Spec. 2.63).<sup>74</sup>

However, what is implied in Jesus' answer is that he is harking back to the pristine period of Israel's faith before, according to the story of the Tanakh, religion was institutionalised through the building of the Temple and the schism between the Samaritans and the Jews existed. When this is juxtaposed with Jesus' announcement of the dawn of the eschaton, we can then infer that for Jesus the concept of Endzeit = Urzeit often operates (cf. the pericope on divorce, Mark 10:2–12 and parr.). Fulfilment of Torah is envisaged in the new covenant (Jer 31:31–34).<sup>75</sup> The fundamentals of the Jewish faith are not abandoned. The Endzeit recaptures and fulfils the intentions of the Urzeit. The

<sup>72</sup> b. Shabb. 31a. Cf. also Rabbi Akiba's statement in Sipra Lev. § 200 (on Lev 19:15–20).

<sup>73</sup> Cf. R. W. L. Moberly, "Toward an Interpretation of the Shema," in Theological Exegesis, ed. C. Seitz and K. Greene-McCreight (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1999), 24–144.

<sup>74</sup> Cf. D. C. Allison, "Mark 12.28–31 and the Decalogue," in The Gospels and the Scriptures of Israel, ed. C. A. Evans and W. R. Stegner, JSNTS 104/SSEJC 3 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1994), 270–278.

<sup>75</sup> Cf. H. D. Potter, "The New Covenant in Jeremiah xxxi 31–34," VT 33 (1983): 347–357; B. P. Robinson, "Jeremiah's New Covenant: Jer 31,31–34," SJOT 15 (2001): 181–204.

scribe gets the cue from Jesus and replies that this will mean the relativising of the cult.<sup>76</sup> This relativising is not arbitrary, in that it stems from the fundamental belief and praxis of Israel. Thus, if there is one God, the key praxis of the people of God must be to love him and to love the neighbour. This being the case, the badge of covenantal identity cannot be supplied by the cult.

This insight elicits from Jesus the reply that the scribe is not far from the kingdom of God. The key point is that the kingdom of God, i.e., the Endzeit recapturing the Urzeit and demonstrating that what endures through time is the fundamental belief and praxis of Israel, is summed up in the Shema and expressed through loving one's neighbour. This is what is meant when God is said to rule powerfully.<sup>77</sup> The pericope ends there, but the implicit question is that if this is the fundamental hermeneutic for understanding Torah, will it mean that certain current badges of covenantal identity may need rethinking?

To sum up: Jesus believes that the Shema is the fundamental belief and praxis (when this is joined with the love for neighbour) of the people of God. It also provides the hermeneutic for understanding Torah. When this attitude is juxtaposed with the eschatological shape of his ministry, one may then argue that one powerful concept working in his ministry is that of Endzeit = Urzeit. Without destroying the fundamentals, the contemporaneous understanding of what constituted boundary markers, such as those linked with the cult, is questioned and these markers transcended. The Shema then becomes Jesus' hermeneutic for Torah and the explication of covenantal identity.

What should also be noted here is that Matthew omits the first line of the Shema (Deut 6:4) in the interest of brevity, which unfortunately obscures an important point. In the Second Temple period, covenantal identity is often expressed through loyalty to monotheism (Judith 8:18; Wis 11–15; Sib. Or. 3.8–45).<sup>78</sup> This, in turn, is expressed through certain exclusivistic actions or attitudes, often centred on the cult. The implication of Jesus' approval of the scribe's insight is that loyalty to monotheism is not the same as loyalty to the cult.

<sup>76</sup> ὀλοκαυτωμάτων καὶ θυσιῶν in the LXX may be regarded as a set phrase to refer to the cult (cf. 1 Kgs 15:22; Hos 6:6).

<sup>77</sup> On the notion of God's Kingdom as God's royal rule, see the extensive discussion in J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew. Rethinking the Historical Jesus, 2: Mentor, Message and Miracles (New York: Doubleday, 1994), 234–288.

<sup>78</sup> Note the Maccabean revolt and also that Rabbi Akiba was said to have died with the Shema on his lips (b. Ber. 61b) and Jacobs' comments that Jewish martyrs generally died reciting the Shema ("Shema," 1374). Cf. Hurtado, Lord Jesus Christ, 32–42.

Why does Mark include four modifiers? This is a puzzle which admits of no confident solution. It may be argued that Mark includes all the attested modifiers in the Septuagint, i.e., if we think the evangelist has replaced δύναμις with the synonymous ισχύς<sup>79</sup> (see Table 1 below) although no LXX manuscript contains the entire quartet. The reply of the scribe in 12:32 evinces a strange triad: διάνοια is dropped and ψυχή is replaced by σύνεσις, which is not attested at all in the LXX tradition. The language of Mark is most probably that of the LXX.<sup>80</sup> Matthew probably trims the Markan quartet to a triad based on his understanding that the original Old Testament text has only a triad.<sup>81</sup> However, in so doing, he simply deletes the fourth item from the Markan text. Whether this was incredible for a Jew to perform depends to a large extent on whether the wording of the Shema was fixed in this period.<sup>82</sup> We have mentioned that there is evidence to show that even if a text was used liturgically in the period under study, this did not necessitate fixity of wording. There is an alternative explanation, which has recently been suggested by Menken. Beginning from the premise that Matthew must have been familiar with the rabbinic interpretation of מאר as referring to wealth or property, and regarded it as irrelevant or ruinous to a person's quest to belong to the kingdom of God (Matt 6:19–34), it follows that he would not speak of loving God with all one's δύναμις or ισχύς (= מער). The triad of modifiers is hence completed with διάνοια.<sup>83</sup>

Table 1 The modifiers and their order

MT	LXX Rahlfs	LXX Göttingen	Mark 12:30	Mark 12:33	Matt. 22:37	Luke 10:27
לבב	καρδία	διάνοια	καρδία	καρδία	καρδία	καρδία
נפש	ψυχή	ψυχή	ψυχή	σύνεσις	ψυχή	ψυχή
מאר	δύναμις	δύναμις	διάνοια ισχύς	ισχύς	διάνοια	ισχύς διάνοια

<sup>79</sup> Evans, Mark 8.21–16.20, 264.

<sup>80</sup> Mark and the LXX share the same preposition, ἐκ. Matthew uses ἐν instead, following the Hebrew ך.

<sup>81</sup> Davies and Allison, Saint Matthew III, 242.

<sup>82</sup> Cf. the thorough discussion in Foster, “Matthew,” 313–321.

<sup>83</sup> M. J. J. Menken, Matthew's Bible: The Old Testament Text of the Evangelist (Leuven: Leuven University Press, 2004), 218. Cf. J. Nolland, The Gospel of Matthew: A Commentary on the Greek Text, NIGTC (Grand Rapids, MI and Bletchley: Eerdmans and Paternoster, 2005), 911, where he suggests that Matthew seeks to focus on the inner dispositions, leaving the sphere of outer and energetic actions for the command to love the neighbour.

3.2. The Shema in Luke 10:25–37

The Parable of the Good Samaritan in Luke is incontrovertibly regarded as stemming from Jesus. The Fellows of the Jesus Seminar concur and thus the words of the parable are printed in red in The Five Gospels.<sup>84</sup> The frame of the parable describes a lawyer coming to ask Jesus how he might obtain eternal life, provides the answer of Jesus in the form of a question, and reports Jesus' eliciting a response from him after the parable is told. Since the answer of the scribe to the all-important question about gaining eternal life cites Deut 6:5 (with four modifiers as in the case of Mark!), we have potentially another passage which shows Jesus' employment of the Shema to deal with the critical issues of Jewish faith and covenantal identity. Unfortunately, doubts have often been expressed over the authenticity of the frame.

The scepticism over the frame is based mainly on the consideration that it appears suspiciously like Mark 12:28–31 and on the belief that Luke has the tendency to generalise.<sup>85</sup> Scholars have often classified this parable as an example story<sup>86</sup> and such a classification certainly helps to bolster the case for the frame's inauthenticity. Indeed, if it is derived from Mark 12:28–31, we may then have to admit that the frame is patently inauthentic, created in the interest of achieving a hortatory point through the incorporation of an example story. But we have mentioned reasons to think that Luke 10:25–9 may not have been derived from Mark 12:28–31.

In a separate article, I have examined these arguments and found them unconvincing. In fact, there are many indications that the frame is original to the parable.<sup>87</sup> Much of what follows is derived from that study. The key considerations are the following. First, if we are willing to bracket off the notion that this is an example story, we may be open to considering the meaning of the parable differently, a meaning which is anchored in the Jewish context and makes clearer sense in the light

<sup>84</sup> Funk et al., The Five Gospels, 323–324.

<sup>85</sup> B. Witherington III, Jesus the Sage: The Pilgrimage of Wisdom (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1994), 193. Cf. J. Nolland, Luke 9:21–18:34, WBC 35B (Dallas: Word, 1993), 580.

<sup>86</sup> E.g., J. Jülicher, Die Gleichnisreden Jesu, vol. 1 (Tübingen: Mohr, 1899), 114; Bultmann, Synoptic Tradition, 178; J. D. Crossan, "Parable and Example in the Teaching of Jesus," Semeia 1 (1974): 63–104; and Witherington III, Jesus the Sage, 192–193.

<sup>87</sup> K. H. Tan, "Community, Kingdom and Cross: Jesus' View of Covenant," in The God of Covenant, ed. J. A. Grant and A. L. Wilson (Leicester: Apollos, 2005), 122–155, esp. 129–139.

of the narrative frame. Secondly, Gerhardsson's argument that the parables in the Jesus' tradition are not naked narratives with indeterminate meanings but are instead contextually anchored is to be taken seriously.<sup>88</sup> To deny this depends not on considerations found in the gospels themselves but on considerations outside them, which may actually be dependent on certain agendas operating in some prominent schools of interpretation today.<sup>89</sup> The third is that the frame and the parable exhibit elements of the rabbinic yelammendenu rabbenu method of discourse which has a four-part structure: (i) question about a scriptural text (vv. 25–7); (ii) a second text cited to illuminate (vv. 28); (iii) the exposition, which in this case is the parable (vv. 30–5); and (iv) the final remarks (v. 37).<sup>90</sup> Thus, the parable and its frame are given a Jewish setting.

If we regard the frame as authentic, what results for our study on Jesus and the Shema? We may begin by analysing the scribe's question. This concerns the obtaining of eternal life or the life in the age to come (העולם הבא), a key concern of many Jewish writings of the Second Temple period.<sup>91</sup> Jesus' reply points the scribe back to Torah, the charter of Israel's covenant. The scribe cites Deut 6:5, which gains the approval of Jesus, who in turn refers to Lev 18:5 to make the point that he should do what he has said and then he would live, i.e., have a share in the life of the age to come. The discussion then focuses on the identity of the neighbour.<sup>92</sup> In the light of diverse Jewish groupings, such a question is indeed understandable (cf. Sir 12:1–4).

<sup>88</sup> B. Gerhardsson, "If We do not Cut the Parables out of their Frames," NTS 37 (1991): 321–335 (322).

<sup>89</sup> This may be the desire to give the parables autonomy, treating them as naked texts and divorcing them from the particularity of history. This fits in well with certain post-modern agendas.

<sup>90</sup> C. L. Blomberg, Interpreting the Parables (Leicester: Apollos, 1990), 231. On the possibility of Jesus' using rabbinic methods, see B. Gerhardsson, Memory and Manuscript (Uppsala: Gleerup, 1961); R. Riesefeld, The Gospel Tradition (Oxford: Blackwell, 1970); R. Riesner, Jesus als Lehrer, (Tübingen: Mohr, 1981); and most recently, S. Byrskog, Jesus the Only Teacher: Didactic Authority and Transmission in Ancient Israel, Ancient Judaism and the Matthean Community (Stockholm: Almqvist & Wiksell, 1994).

<sup>91</sup> See the many references in E. Schürer, The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ (175 BC–AD 135), rev. and ed. by G. Vermes, F. Millar, and M. Black, vol. II (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1979), 537–538; cf. also Sanders, Judaism, 279–303.

<sup>92</sup> The context of Lev 19:18 presupposes that the neighbour is a member of the covenant community and ער should most probably be interpreted as a fellow Israelite. This concept is appropriated and further illuminated in y. Ned. 9:4. Cf. J. Milgrom, Jesus' reply through the Parable of the Good Samaritan makes use of the famous triad of examples: priest, Levite and Samaritan are mentioned. That these particular characters are mentioned and that the victim is described as ἡμιθάνη—probably meaning half-dead<sup>93</sup>—prompt R. J. Bauckham to argue that the parable is about the resolution of potential conflicts in the injunctions of Torah.<sup>94</sup> The result is that love for the neighbour takes precedence over cultic purity. This need not be contradicted. However, this interpretation is still inadequate for the following reasons. If the parable was told just to establish a halakhic point, Jesus would have been expected to make it clear that the victim was dead. Instead, the parable uses the word ἡμιθάνη. Secondly, rabbinic discussions on the corpse of obligation (מת מכוח) actually make it clear that it should be buried. This is obligatory even for the high priest and the Nazirite, Israel's two most holy men (m. Naz. 7:1; cf. 6.5). This means that if the rabbinic discussions about the obligations to the corpse are anything to go by, the priest and the Levite in the parable will be deemed to have acted inappropriately. There is then no discussion: whether the victim is dead or alive, the two are deemed to be at fault.

The key to the meaning of the parable lies in the third character: the Samaritan. The focus is not on his good deed, but on his goodness, as J. D. Crossan ably argues.<sup>95</sup> The frame sets the stage for understanding the Samaritan's goodness and the point Jesus is trying to make. If Jesus simply wanted to show that the love command takes precedence over everything, it would be more provocative to mention a Gentile instead! That it is the Samaritan who is mentioned is because of the Shema. The confession of the Shema, i.e., if the true intent of it is carried out, leads to life in the age to come. When interpreted against the covenantal horizon, this means that true covenantal membership leads to life in the age to come and, consequently, covenantal membership is linked with the true confession of the Shema. The Shema was something both

---

Leviticus 17–22, Anchor Bible (New York: Doubleday, 2000), 1654–1656. Sir 12:1–7 and 1QS I, 9–10 give evidence that love cannot be extended to enemies or sinners.

<sup>93</sup> Cf. A. J. Hultgren, The Parables of Jesus: A Commentary (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2000), 96; Nolland, Luke 9:21–18:34, 593. See also the philological discussion in T. Kazen, Jesus and Purity Halakhah: Was Jesus Indifferent to Impurity? (Stockholm: Almqvist & Wiksell, 2002), 191–193.

<sup>94</sup> R. J. Bauckham, "The Scrupulous Priest and the Good Samaritan: Jesus' Parabolic Interpretation of the Law of Moses," NTS 44 (1998): 475–489.

<sup>95</sup> Crossan, "Parable and Example," 75.

Jews and Samaritans would confess and not Gentiles. The point then is that the divide between Jews and Samaritans, based principally on the cult (Josephus, Ant. 9.288–291),<sup>96</sup> is to be eradicated in the light of the Shema's being the badge of covenantal membership. Covenantal members are neighbours of each other and hence it is not surprising that the parable is angled to make the scribe confess that the one who acted with mercy (ὁ ποιήσας τὸ ἔλεος μετ' αὐτοῦ), i.e., the Samaritan, is the neighbour.<sup>97</sup> If this is so, the scribe has answered his own question. The neighbour he ought to love is the Samaritan. There is an implicit point operating here: the Samaritan is a neighbour because he confesses the Shema (assumed) and shows mercy to the one in need (mentioned). If we may be allowed to think reflexively, the one on whom mercy is shown may also ipso facto be neighbour. This then enlarges the category of neighbour beyond the boundaries of the covenantal community. But we need not press this point. Suffice it to say that a neighbour is defined in this parable as the one showing mercy. This may be regarded as the main demonstration of Jesus' parable. Hence, the parable should not be understood as an example story but is instead a powerful explication of what it means to be a covenant member. The one criterion elucidated is the true confession of the Shema, demonstrated through love.<sup>98</sup>

To sum up: true confession of the Shema leads to the life to come, i.e., it is the one true badge of covenantal membership. This will heal the divide between the Jews and the Samaritans since the criterion for covenantal membership is not based on the cult anymore. In fact, different Jewish groups, dividing themselves on the basis of different cultic observations or special programmes, have missed the point of what it means to be in the covenant.

---

<sup>96</sup> Cf. F. Dexinger, "Limits of Tolerance in Judaism: The Samaritan Example," in Jewish and Christian Self-Definition, Vol. 2: Aspects of Judaism in the Graeco-Roman Period, ed. E. P. Sanders, A. I. Baumgarten and A. Mendelson (London: SCM, 1981), 88–114.

<sup>97</sup> Samaritans were regarded as enemies and put in the same category as the Philistines and Edomites (Sir 50:25–6).

<sup>98</sup> In many ways, our argument is anticipated by G. Sellin, "Lukas als Gleichniserzähler: Die Erzählung vom barmherzigen Samariter (Luke 10:25–27)," ZNW 65 (1974): 166–189; ZNW 66 (1975): 19–60. Our major disagreement is over the authenticity of the parable. A critique of this is found in Nolland, Luke 9:21–18:34, 589–591. Nolland separates the parable from the frame and denies that neighbour refers to a member of the covenant community. He also has problems with the notion that the Samaritan represents cult-free law observance.

When this passage is viewed together with Mark 12:28–34, a leitmotif in Jesus' use of the Shema emerges. It was employed to sum up Torah's injunctions and in so doing provided a hermeneutic to Torah. This, in turn, established what the one badge of covenantal identity was. This badge was understood to transcend the many divides found in Jewish life and their relations with others, which often took the inspiration from the cult or some special programmes. The Shema and the doctrine of monotheism were used around the time of Jesus to shore up Jewish identity and to differentiate them from other people. Jesus, instead, used the Shema in an inclusive way. The creed then, in Jesus' conception, functioned not so much as a fighting doctrine as an inclusive one, at least in so far as Samaritans were concerned. Of course, this prompts the question whether the Gentiles too may be brought under this umbrella and with the same terms. This is a highly fascinating topic, which this essay, unfortunately, cannot examine.

3.3. εἷς θεός in Mark 2:7 and Mark 10:18//Luke 18:19

J. Marcus has helpfully pointed out in a recent article the significance of the phrase εἷς θεός in two Markan passages.<sup>99</sup> The intent of the statements in Mark 2:7 and Mark 10:18// Luke 18:19<sup>100</sup> is best expressed by using the adjective μόνος to qualify θεός, instead of εἷς. Indeed, this is precisely what is done by Luke for Mark 2:7 (Luke 5:21). This cannot but mean that the confession of the Shema is exerting its influence on the texts.

But are they authentic? The scholars of the Jesus Seminar are highly sceptical about this, assigning the words of Mark 2:7 the colour black, and that of Mark 10:18 the colour grey.<sup>101</sup> In Mark 2:7, the scribes remark that only "one God" can forgive sins. Hence, Jesus' pronouncement of forgiveness has committed the sin of blasphemy. Here, the voice of the synagogue may be heard. Linking the notion of forgiveness with the action of healing, and subsuming these under the title of Son of Man, the pericope argues that Jesus has the authority to pronounce forgiveness. The implicit point may be that the Danielic Son of Man, acting as the vicegerent of Yahweh, performs the latter's tasks.<sup>102</sup> If this pericope is a reflection of Jewish-Christian debates, what can then be discerned is that the meaning of the Shema was one flashpoint. For the synagogue, one God meant only one source of forgiveness. Early Christianity's reply was that the authority to forgive sins has been given to the Son of Man, who demonstrated it through healing. Whether this means (i) there is another Power in heaven existing alongside Yahweh; (ii) the inference drawn from the Shema that there is only one source of forgiveness is wrong; or, as is remotely possible, (iii) Jesus acts for Yahweh and is actually not claiming to have the authority to forgive sins, is something the pericope does not clearly answer.

<sup>99</sup> Marcus, "Authority," 196–211.

<sup>100</sup> Luke uses exactly the clause οὐδεὶς ἀγαθὸς εἰ μὴ εἷς θεός while Matthew obscures the reference to the Shema with his εἷς ἐστὶν ὁ ἀγαθός (Matt 19:17).

<sup>101</sup> Funk et al., The Five Gospels, 44, 90–91.

In Mark 10:18 (= Luke 18:19), Jesus responds in a rather oblique way to the rich man's address of him as good teacher. This has given rise to two streams of scholarship: one claims that Jesus is diverting attention from himself but to God by saying only God is good;<sup>103</sup> and the other that Jesus is implicitly saying that this epithet equally applies to God and himself, and thereby making himself equal with God.<sup>104</sup> As the first stream is fairly well represented in scholarship, it explains why certain Fellows of the Jesus Seminar do not think that the saying was a wholesale church creation and, thus, the words are printed in grey in The Five Gospels.<sup>105</sup> There is probably also a very interesting dissimilarity present in the pericope. Ascribing to human beings the epithet "good" is done frequently, and hence is not scandalous.<sup>106</sup> However, Jesus radicalises the whole concept of goodness by stating that this epithet is reserved for only one being: that which is identified in the Shema.<sup>107</sup> Thus, if there is one God, there is only one source of goodness and only he may be called good. The intention of this radicalising may be (i) to emphasise to humanity that there is no such thing as natural goodness, and thus to lead the enquirer to re-examine the concept; or (ii) to lead the enquirer to realise that Jesus stands alongside God as a worthy recipient of the epithet. Of course, the two options need not be regarded as mutually exclusive.

<sup>102</sup> Cf. France, Mark, 127–28.

<sup>103</sup> Cf. Evans, Mark 8:27–16:20, 96.

<sup>104</sup> Cf. R. H. Gundry, Mark: A Commentary on His Apology for the Cross (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1993), 553.

<sup>105</sup> Funk et al., The Five Gospels, 90.

<sup>106</sup> Cf. Gundry, Mark, 553.

<sup>107</sup> Cf. France, Mark, 402.

What is interesting for historians of early Christianity is that the Shema continues to exert significant pressure on the shaping of early Christian theology, and gives an inkling of the kind of debate that could have taken place between Jews and Christians, the synagogue and the Church.

3.4. The Temptation Narrative in Matthew

Gerhardsson has made a powerful case for viewing the Matthean temptation narrative (Matt 4:1–11) as shaped by the triadic structure of Deut 6:5.<sup>108</sup> For this to be viable, the triad of לֵבב, נֶפֶשׁ and מֵאָרֶץ must be interpreted in the rabbinic way, which is attested in m. Ber. 9:5:

Man is bound to bless [God] for the evil even as he blesses [God] for the good, for it is written, And thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul and with all thy might. With all thy heart—with both thine impulses, thy good impulse and thine evil impulse; and with all thy soul—even if he take away thy soul; and with all thy might—with all thy wealth. Another explanation is: With all thy might—for whichever measure he measures out to thee, do thou give him thanks exceedingly.

Gerhardsson discovers that the order of the temptation in Matthew fits the order of the three modifiers in Deut 6:5, if they are interpreted in the light of the rabbinic perspective. The first temptation may be interpreted as being concerned with craving for food, i.e., an evil inclination. The second is concerned with the safety of the Son of God, i.e., it is about life. The third is concerned with gaining the kingdoms of the world, i.e., it is about possessions and property. Gerhardsson does not attempt to trace the narrative back to Jesus but insists instead that the composer of this narrative would have been a scribe with a profound acquaintance with the Old Testament. Not only that, he was also conversant with the exegetical methods of leading rabbinic schools.<sup>109</sup>

Prominent commentators on Matthew have welcomed Gerhardsson's insights even if they do not fully agree with his thesis.<sup>110</sup> If Gerhardsson is right, it demonstrates that the Shema was a template around which Christian theological reflections were also performed. This in turn raises the possibility that more occurrences of the use of such a template may be found in our gospel traditions. We have earlier commented on some of those which are proposed by Gerhardsson. In our opinion, the most cogent case for this can be made only with regard to the Matthean temptation account.

<sup>108</sup> Gerhardsson, Testing.

<sup>109</sup> Gerhardsson, Testing, 79–80.

<sup>110</sup> Davies and Allison, Saint Matthew I, 353; D. A. Hagner, Matthew 1–13, WBC 33A (Dallas: Word, 1993), 66.

3.5. Possible Allusions (Matt 6:24//Luke 16:13; and Matt 23:8–10)

If one can argue that the triadic pattern of Deut 6:5 may be found as a template for the composition of certain gospel traditions, can one take a step further to look for allusions to the Shema in terms of phraseology and themes?

If the Shema speaks of one unique God, it may justifiably be said that the notion of absolute allegiance to this one God follows naturally in its wake. The logion in Q 16:13 speaks of the necessity of serving only one Master and not two: not Mammon and Yahweh but Yahweh only. Scholars are confident that this logion may be assigned to Jesus, based mainly on the fact that a parallel saying is found in the Gospel of Thomas (logion 47). However, the information Q 16:13 provides in relation to our probe into Jesus' attitude and use of the Shema does not add anything new to what has been adduced earlier. All that can be said is that it provides a further instance of the Shema's looming large in the teaching of Jesus.

Another possible allusion to the Shema in the gospel tradition may be found in Matt 23:8–10, since the oneness theme is also closely linked up with confessing the Shema. In this passage, the disciples of Jesus are purportedly taught that they are to have only one teacher (διδάσκαλος), one Father in heaven, and one guide (καθηγητής),<sup>111</sup> the Messiah. The mention of the Father is sandwiched between the two mentions of Jesus. This at once puts God and Messiah on the one side, over against humanity on the other side, thereby dovetailing with the theme of εἰς θεός in the Markan tradition. S. Byrskog observes that this implies that "adherence to Jesus as teacher relates to the confession of the one and only God."<sup>112</sup> We have here then the use of the Shema for Christological ends, similar to the εἰς θεός passages in Mark. In the opinion of Davies and Allison, these verses represent a Christian reaction to a late first-century development in Judaism.<sup>113</sup> Interestingly, some Fellows of the Jesus Seminar regard the sayings as distant echoes of things Jesus once said.<sup>114</sup>

---

<sup>111</sup> A hapax legomenon, not found in the LXX. See B. W. Winter's study, "The Messiah as Tutor: The Meaning of καθηγητής in Matthew 23.10," TynB 42 (1991): 151–157.

<sup>112</sup> Byrskog, Jesus the only Teacher, 300.

4. Conclusion and Prospects

The theme of confessing that there is one God and loving this one God and neighbour appears in the gospel traditions in many literary forms. We find it in conflict stories, didactic stories, parables, gnomic sayings etc. If Deut 6:4–5 has the role of something like a creed during the time of Jesus, the least we can say is that some important gospel traditions were developed around this creed either as explication or as response. The very heart of Judaism may then be seen as having been appropriated by early Christianity in her debates with the synagogue to show her continuity with the Old Testament heritage. Hence, Jeremias' assessment needs modification. While we cannot claim that early Christianity continued the practice of reciting the Shema morning and evening, we can none the less state, in the light of this study, that she was very well acquainted with the Shema—so much so that it became a weapon in debate and a template for reflection.

Furthermore, if we can be reasonably confident about the authenticity of some of these traditions, especially Mark 12:28–34 and Luke 10:25–37, we can draw some conclusions regarding Jesus' attitude towards and use of the Shema. The Shema summed up for him the faith and praxis of Torah and, thus, provided the proper hermeneutic to it. This was understood as relativising the cult. His use of it when compared to his contemporaries' use may be said to be inclusive. Jews and Samaritans may properly belong to the covenant community, since the badge of identity was no longer certain cultic practices or ideological programmes. Instead, the one badge was the true confession of the Shema, expressed by allegiance to this one God, and loving him and neighbour. When this is juxtaposed with Jesus' eschatological message, we may then say that the pattern of Endzeit = Urzeit operated in Jesus' ministry. This need not be surprising, as in the Jewish outlook, the eschatological time is also a time of restoration and repristination. One wonders whether with repristination comes also the concept of intensification. This could have happened if Mark 10:18 may be traced back to Jesus. The commonly occurring concept of goodness is radicalised. All this is tantalising, but needs to be studied together with other themes in Jesus' ministry. Suffice it here to point out that the Shema provided Jesus with a lens to view Torah, covenantal identity, and certain critical concepts such as goodness.

<sup>113</sup> Davies and Allison, Saint Matthew III, 275–278.

<sup>114</sup> Funk et al., The Five Gospels, 240. The words are in grey.

Understood in this light, the Shema forms a key theme in Jesus' teaching. This encourages exploration into other early Christian writings to see how the Shema has or has not impacted on them.<sup>115</sup> Furthermore, it is instructive to see whether the special use of the Shema by Jesus dovetails in a profound but unexpected way with certain Pauline themes. We can name at least two that deserve scrutiny: the inclusive nature of Pauline theology, where the badge of covenantal identity is faith and not some Jewish boundary markers;<sup>116</sup> and the employment of the concept of monotheism to argue precisely this point.<sup>117</sup> If there is profound harmony here, and if together they present a profound dissimilarity with much of the Jewish use of the Shema, we may have here a new angle to the study of the continuity between the ministry of Jesus and the apostle Paul.<sup>118</sup>

---

<sup>115</sup> E.g., Verseput, "Jewish Morning Prayers," 175–191.

<sup>116</sup> Cf. J. D. G. Dunn, "The New Perspective on Paul," BJRL 65 (1983): 95–122.

<sup>117</sup> Cf. T. L. Donaldson, Paul and the Gentiles: Remapping the Apostle's Convictional World (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1997), 81–88.

<sup>118</sup> Cf. the proposals of A. J. M. Wedderburn, "Paul and Jesus: Similarity and Continuity," NTS 34 (1988): 161–180.

JESUS AND THE PURITY PARADIGM

TOM HOLMÉN

1. Introduction

The theme of Jesus and purity presents one of the most entangled problems of current research into the historical Jesus. To begin with, it has proven genuinely difficult for modern minds to approach and appreciate purity as a religious notion. Religious purity or impurity (henceforth “(im)purity”) keeps resisting definitions and explications that could be found uncontroversial and that would translate to our modern comprehension.<sup>1</sup> Further, (im)purity was an intricate and controversial question within first-century Judaism, too, with a rich Old Testament tradition of rules and regulations as well as a competitively ample repertoire of interpretations and explications in later Jewish literature. Spirited discussions and disputes about how to understand and fulfill the purity laws kept surfacing, attesting to the both problematic and central role of purity matters in people’s lives.<sup>2</sup>

On the other hand, as regards (im)purity in the Jesus tradition we are faced with a relative scarcity of material that directly addresses purity questions. Compared with Jewish writings from and before Jesus’ time where disputes about various purity issues regularly abound, explicit purity language and dwelling on the subject are conspicuously absent.<sup>3</sup> Mark 7:1–23 par. Matt 15:1–20 and P. Oxy. 840 form exceptions

---

<sup>1</sup> See for instance, M. Douglas, Purity and Danger: An Analysis of the Concepts of Pollution and Taboo (New York: Routledge, 2000) and B. Campkin and R. Cox, eds., Dirt: New Geographies of Cleanliness and Contamination (New York: I.B. Tauris, 2007), which in many aspects is a debate with Douglas’ groundbreaking work (first edition 1966).

<sup>2</sup> See below.

<sup>3</sup> Accordingly, some scholars have suggested that there emerged between Jesus and the major religious phalanges no serious debate or altercation that would have been based on purity disputes. See E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (London: SCM Press, 1985), 174–211; similarly P. Fredriksen, “Did Jesus Oppose the Purity Law?,” BRev 11 (1995): 18–25, 42–47. There is, however, a difference between saying that disputes arose solely or even mainly on the basis of purity issues and saying that purity was one contributing factor among others in the disputes.

here but, obviously, more material needs to be included if one wanted to say anything meaningful about Jesus and purity. Part of the problem of addressing the theme of Jesus and purity has therefore been the question about the material that could and should be taken into account.

The basic importance of the issue of purity to the mission and message of Jesus should not be doubted. Because of the central role that purity played in the Judaism of Jesus time—and that it had played in the history of Jewish sectarianism<sup>4</sup>—stances taken on it were considered highly revealing. Different Jewish groupings and even individual religious figures defined themselves to a significant degree through their expositions of the purity regulations.<sup>5</sup> The impression Jesus left by his attitude to and understanding of the purity matters—whatever they were—would have been recognized by the contemporaries in many ways as characterizing what Jesus' proclamation was about.<sup>6</sup> Indeed, purity questions do loom behind some important scenes and forms of Jesus' activity. For instance, Jesus' table fellowship with sinners and outcasts is clearly relevant here even though purity may not have been the sole focus of these gatherings or the main reason why they prompted controversies. Further, in Jesus' Jewish world, purity was integrally related to the temple, and we should be able to assume that even in Jesus' message the issues of purity and temple reflected each other. The temple, again, was something of a black spot for Jesus; this in turn adds to the weight of the temple question within Jesus' message in general and with respect to his views on purity in particular.<sup>7</sup>

---

<sup>4</sup> See M. Smith, "The Dead Sea Sect in Relation to Ancient Judaism," NTS 7 (1961): 347–360, at 352. See also the accounts of the course of events in B. Chilton, A Feast of Meanings: Eucharistic Theologies from Jesus Through Johannine Circles, NovTSup72 (Leiden: Brill, 1994), 15–24; E. Regev, "Abominated Temple and a Holy Community: The Formation of the Notions of Purity and Impurity in Qumran," Dead Sea Discoveries 10 (2003): 243–278.

<sup>5</sup> J. Neusner, The Idea of Purity In Ancient Judaism: The Haskell Lectures 1972–1973, SJLA1 (Leiden: Brill, 1973), 108; S. Westerholm, Jesus and Scribal Authority (Lund: LiberLäromedel/Gleerup, 1978), 62; M. Newton, The Concept of Purity at Qumran and in the Letters of Paul, SNTSMS 53 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1985), 49. "In a way, it seems that during the Hasmonean and Herodian periods there was competition within Judean society for who was the most scrupulous observer of purity": Regev, "Abominated Temple," 243.

<sup>6</sup> It is therefore interesting that the few explicit discussions on (im)purity presenting Jesus as one party that we have, namely Mark 7:1–23 par. Matt 15:1–20 and P. Oxy. 840, feature cases of using purity vs. impurity as a means of criticism and branding.

<sup>7</sup> For these aspects, inter alia, see sections 4 and 5 below.

However, until recently, an important and central aspect of Jesus' activities has been largely neglected in investigations into Jesus' views on (im)purity: Jesus' dealings with people who were considered ritually unclean.<sup>8</sup> The curious thing about these dealings which has often attracted scholars' attention is the unreservedness with which Jesus seems to give himself to these situations. He is not hesitant to come into close contact with people who would communicate severe impurities to him, or even intentionally to touch them. According to a common scholarly interpretation of the dealings, by this activity Jesus inter alia intended to make the unclean clean.<sup>9</sup> In my view, this interpretation should have some remarkable corollaries for understanding Jesus' thinking about purity, and maybe also for understanding his mission and message in more general terms. I will therefore place the dealings and the suggested interpretation of them in the center of the present study. They will form the perspective from which I propose to set out to approach the tangled skein of problems that make up the question about Jesus and purity. The other problems and other material to be discussed will align themselves according to the insights gained from this perspective (that is, the insights gained from the perspective will argue for the particular choice and disposition of material favored here).

---

<sup>8</sup> The dealings take the pride of place in T. Kazen's excellent study Jesus and Purity Halakhah: Was Jesus Indifferent to Impurity? ConBNT 38 (Stockholm: Almqvist & Wiksell, 2002). Although Kazen (23) acknowledges that "[a] recent study with a section on impurity, which does start out with its sources and discusses Jesus' contacts with unclean people . . . is" Holmén's Jesus and Jewish Covenant Thinking, BibInt Series, 55 (Leiden: Brill, 2001), he regards my treatment as unsatisfactory. Yet the main upshot of Kazen's investigation agrees with mine: Jesus appeared indifferent to ritual impurity; see Holmén, Jesus and Jewish Covenant Thinking, 250–251, 340, and Kazen, Jesus and Purity Halakhah, 198, 346.

<sup>9</sup> See, for instance, M. D. Hooker, "Interchange in Christ," JTS 22 (1971): 349–361 (351); M. J. Borg, Conflict, Holiness & Politics in the Teachings of Jesus, Studies in the Bible and Early Christianity 5 (New York: E. Mellen Press, 1984), 134–136; K. Berger, "Jesus als Pharisäer und frühe Christen als Pharisäer," NovT 30 (1988): 231–262 (245–247); R. Guelich, Mark 1–8:26, WBC, 34A (Dallas: Word Books, 1989), 74; C. A. Evans, "Who Touched Me? Jesus and the Ritually Impure," in Jesus in Context: Temple, Purity, and Restoration, ed. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans, AGJU 39 (Leiden: Brill, 1997), 353–376, at 368–369; J. Marcus, Mark 1–8: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary, AB, 27 (New York: Doubleday, 1999), 209; somewhat hesitantly, J. D. G. Dunn, "Jesus and Purity: An Ongoing Debate," NTS 48 (2002): 449–467, 461, and Kazen, Jesus and Purity Halakhah, 346.

My point of departure will thus not be (a) certain definition(s) of the purity concept<sup>10</sup> nor any taxonomy of the purity paradigm in early Judaism.<sup>11</sup> Instead, I seek to understand a concrete instance of Jewish thinking about purity and to see where observing Jesus' undertakings vis-à-vis that very instance can lead us. In what follows, I shall survey how the "making the unclean clean" interpretation is manifested in Jesus' deeds and words (with focus on the deeds). Further, in order to uncover the corollaries of the interpretation, I shall seek to illuminate what the dealings and their interpretation would have meant within Jesus' Jewish context (section 3) and within the contexts both of other Jesuanic material pertaining to (im)purity (section 4) and of Jesus' overall message (section 5). Finally, I shall put forward some remarks on the question of ritual (im)purity in early Christianity (section 6).

2. The Starting Point: Dealings with the Ritually Impure

In order to successfully pursue research in the suggested direction, I shall now seek to lay as solid as possible a foundation for sustaining the interpretation which sees Jesus in his dealings with the ritually impure as intending to make the unclean clean.

The basic historicity of these dealings as a regular pattern of Jesus' behavior should not be doubted. All in all, the material to be focused on here is almost the same as that pertaining to Jesus' miracles.<sup>12</sup> It is therefore of relevance to state that the picture of Jesus as an exorcist <sup>10</sup> For the Old Testament and Septuagintal technical terms for impurity (טמא, "to be impure"; ἀκαθαρσία, ἀκάθαρτος) and purity (טהר, "to be clean or pure"; καθάρος, καθαρίζειν) see G. André, "טמא," TWAT 3 (1982), 352–366, and H. Ringgren, "טהר," TWAT 3 (1982): 306–315 respectively.

<sup>11</sup> In Judaism, impurity was seen as a sign of God's rejection; Neusner, Idea of Purity, 13. This stands despite the fact that the Jewish purity paradigm is highly multifaceted. For instance, one can talk about moral and ritual impurities; see discussion in Holmén, Jesus and Jewish Covenant Thinking, 221–232, esp. 230–232. Within ritual (im)purity, again, a discernibly distinct set of problems was formed by the question of the purity of food; see Lev 11; H. Rabinowicz, "Dietary laws," EncJud 6 (1978): 26–45, at 31–38. Modern scholarship has also divided impurities into "permitted" and "prohibited" ones; see, for instance, E. P. Sanders, Jewish Law from Jesus to the Mishnah (London: SCM Press, 1990), 140–145; D. P. Wright, "Unclean and clean," ABD 6, 729–741, at 729–730. The difference lay inter alia in that "permitted" impurities derive from natural, necessary occurrences, while there is no necessity why the "prohibited" ones could not be totally avoided.

<sup>12</sup> We can disregard the so-called nature miracles (Mark 4:35–41; 6:32–44; 6:45–52; 11:12–14, 20–21; Matt 17:24–27; Luke 5:1–11; John 2:1–11).

and a healer is strongly attested in the sources.<sup>13</sup> No matter what origin or role in Jesus' ministry one ascribes to these characteristics, they form an integral part of the tradition and are nowadays regarded as one of the most reliable facts about Jesus.<sup>14</sup> Naturally, this statement is not an automatic endorsement of the authenticity of every individual tradition bearing these characteristics. Further indications of authenticity will be welcome, although we may also think that the burden of proof lies mostly on the denial of the authenticity of these individual traditions.

The issue of purity is most evident in the reports of Jesus' contacts with lepers (Mark 1:41; Matt 11:5 par. Luke 7:22 [= Q]; Luke 17:11–19 [= Luke's special source])<sup>15</sup> and the dead (Mark 5:21–43; Matt 11:5 par. Luke 7:22 [= Q]; Luke 7:11–17 [= Luke's special source]),<sup>16</sup> but also in the story of the woman who had a hemorrhage (Mark 5:25–34 par.) and the story of the prostitute (Luke 7:36–50). Even Jesus' cures of the lame and the blind would probably have carried purity overtones for many people. And finally, Jesus' contacts with people with unclean spirits, which appear recurrently in the tradition, are no doubt also of relevance here.

I shall first turn to the last mentioned type of contacts, the expulsions of "unclean spirits," for they are reported almost throughout the Jesus tradition and cannot really be removed from the bedrock elements of Jesus' activity.<sup>17</sup> πνεῦμα ἀκάθαρτον<sup>18</sup> represents a known Jewish

<sup>13</sup> Cf. J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the historical Jesus, 2: Mentor, Message and Miracles (AB Reference Library; New York: Doubleday, 1994), 619–630, 646–1039.

<sup>14</sup> Cf. B. L. Blackburn, "The Miracles of Jesus," in Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluations of the State of Current Research, ed. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans, NTTS 19 (Leiden: Brill, 1994), 353–394 (392); J. H. Charlesworth, "Jesus Research Expands with Chaotic Creativity," in Images of Jesus Today, ed. idem and W. P. Weaver, Faith and Scholarship Colloquies 3 (Valley Forge: Trinity Press International, 1994), 1–41 (12–13); C. A. Evans, Jesus and His Contemporaries: Comparative Studies, AGJU 25 (Leiden: Brill, 1995), 213.

<sup>15</sup> Cf. also Mark 14:3.

<sup>16</sup> Cf. also John 11:1–44.

<sup>17</sup> G. Theissen, Urchristliche Wundergeschichten: Ein Beitrag zur formgeschichtlichen Erforschung der synoptischen Evangelien, SNT 8 (Gütersloh: Gütersloher Verlagshaus Mohn, 1974), 274–277; J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus and the Spirit: A Study of the Religious and Charismatic Experience of Jesus and the First Christians as Reflected in the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997), 44.

<sup>18</sup> See Mark 1:23, 26–27; 3:11, 30; 5:2, 8, 13; 6:7; 7:25; 9:25; Matt 10:1; 12:43; Luke (4:33); 4:36; 6:18; 8:29; 9:42.

designation for a demon,<sup>19</sup> and reflects the evil spirits' work of causing uncleanness and leading to it, or their possession of people as a consequence of an impure life.<sup>20</sup> The latter idea is discernible especially in later rabbinic literature.<sup>21</sup> The term "unclean spirit" appropriately marks off spirits which are not to be associated with God, who is holy.<sup>22</sup> Somewhat comparable expressions are "a lying spirit" (1 Kgs 22:22–23), "a spirit of affliction" (1QapGen XX, 16), "a spirit of purulence" (1QapGen XX, 26), and "a spirit of weakness" (Luke 13:11). The condition of being possessed is aptly depicted by Joel Marcus, who comments on Mark 1:23 (and the Markan expression ἐν πνεύματι ἀκαθάρτῳ, which is probably a Semitism):<sup>23</sup> "This picture of 'a man in an unclean spirit,' enclosed by that which contaminates him, is horrifying."<sup>24</sup>

There is no reason to doubt that Jesus shared this common understanding of the nature of these spirits.<sup>25</sup> All that can be gathered from the sources suggests that he had no objections to the notion that the spirits are unclean, nor to seeing them as having contaminated the people they had taken into possession (or who had them in their possession). In fact, both Mark and Q relate that Jesus himself referred to the spirits as unclean (Mark 5:8; Matt 12:43 par. Luke 11:24). Implications for the question of cleaning the unclean should also be

<sup>19</sup> W. Foerster, "δαίμων κτλ.," TWNT 2, 1–21, at 16; Guelich, Mark, 56; J. Reiling, "Unclean Spirits," in Dictionary of Deities and Demons in the Bible, ed. K. van der Toorn, B. Becking and P. W. van der Horst, 2nd ed. (Leiden: Brill, 1999), 882.

<sup>20</sup> See, for instance, Jub. 10.1; 11.4; 1 En. 19.1; 1QM XIII, 5; T. Benj. 5.1–3; cf. already Zech 13:2: הַטְּמָאִים הַרוּחַ, "the unclean spirit," in a cultic context; F. Hauck, "καθάρως κτλ.," TWNT 3, 416–421, 427–34, at 431–432. For the close association of demons and impurity in Judaism, see further Kazen, Jesus and Purity Halakhah, 301–313; C. Wahlen, Jesus and the Impurity of Spirits in the Synoptic Gospels, WUNT 2.185 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2004), 24–59.

<sup>21</sup> See H. L. Strack and P. Billerbeck, Kommentar zum Neuen Testament aus Talmud und Midrasch: Exkurse zu einzelnen Stellen des Neuen Testaments. Erster Teil (München: C.H. Beck'sche Verlagsbuchhandlung, 1928), 503–504.

<sup>22</sup> Strack and Billerbeck, Kommentar, 503; R. H. Gundry, Mark: A Commentary on His Apology for the Cross (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1993), 83; cf. 1QM XIII, 2–5; see Mark 1:24; (3:11); 3:29–30; (5:7) and parallels.

<sup>23</sup> See also Mark 5:2.

<sup>24</sup> Marcus, Mark, 192.

<sup>25</sup> See Kazen, Purity Halakhah, 332–338. Wahlen, Impurity of Spirits, 68 points out early Judaism's "growing interest in spirits and their relation to impurity which... is manifest also in the Synoptic Gospels." Further, he states that "the earliest Palestinian community and perhaps Jesus himself were very concerned with the notions purity and impurity in connection with demon possession, so much so that expelling these spirits is remembered as a significant part of his work" (Wahlen, Impurity of Spirits, 174).

clear. The removal of an unclean spirit denotes almost by definition the removal of uncleanness.<sup>26</sup>

To turn to another type of contacts, most germane to the question are naturally the situations in which Jesus is expressly said to have cleansed people from impurity. In these cases, authenticity remains somewhat less obvious but not quite devoid of arguments, complementing the above-mentioned basic historicity of this pattern of Jesus' behavior. In Matt 11:5 par. Luke 7:22 (= Q: καθαρίζονται) Jesus refers to his own work by mentioning, inter alia, the cleansing of lepers. Actual instances of such cleansing are mentioned in Mark 1:40–45 par. (v. 41, καθάρισθητι) and Luke 17:11–19 (v. 17, ἐκαθαρίσθησαν; cf. v. 15, ἰάθη).<sup>27</sup> These three traditions in three different and independent sources thus offer plural attestation attest that Jesus saw his activity as resulting in the purification of uncleanness. That is, we can appeal to the criterion of multiple attestation in arguing for the authenticity of this common idea within the named passages. A few words are perhaps needed regarding the two actual instances of cleansing, although their individual authenticity is not easily verified.<sup>28</sup> As the stories in Mark 1:40–45 and Luke 17:11–19 report, Jesus sends the lepers to the priests, and in Mark he even gives the order to sacrifice περὶ τοῦ καθαρισμοῦ σου. This appears to be according to the law, which proscribes: "Thus [referring to various purification rites and sacrifices] the priest shall make atonement on his behalf and he shall be clean."<sup>29</sup> However, in both New Testament stories the lepers in reality become both cured and cleansed even before they get to the priests for the sacrifice (cf. Mark 1:42; Luke 17:14). The procedure of sacrifice is undertaken for merely pragmatic reasons, which as such are of course important: the procedure was needed for the reintegration of the lepers into the ordinary social and religious life of the community.<sup>30</sup> But the acts of cleansing occur independently of this procedure.

<sup>26</sup> That is, just as the expulsion of a mute spirit results in a removal of the muteness of the possessed person; see Matt 9:32–33/Luke 11:14.

<sup>27</sup> See also Guelich, Mark, 74; Marcus, Mark, 209.

<sup>28</sup> Cf. Meier, A Marginal Jew, 2: 698–705. This does not invalidate the general conclusion drawn about Jesus cleansing people from impurity. See Meier, A Marginal Jew, 2: 706.

<sup>29</sup> Lev 14:20.

<sup>30</sup> For the contagiousness of leprosy impurity, see Apion 1.281; m. Zabim 5:6; T. Frymer-Kensky, "Pollution, Purification, and Purgation in Biblical Israel," in The Word of the Lord Shall Go Forth: Festschrift D. N. Freedman, ed. C. L. Meyers and M. O'Connor, American Schools of Oriental Research, 1 (Winona Lake: Eisenbrauns, 1983), 399–414, at 399–400; D. P. Wright, The Disposal of Impurity: Elimination Rites

In the cases of the other acts of healing that were listed above, there is no easy way to ferret out indications of authenticity. At any event, what the sources put forward is rather obvious. Consider, for example, the story of the woman who had a hemorrhage. The nature of the woman's disease makes implications of purity inescapable.<sup>31</sup> She had been seriously unclean for all of the large breadth of time she had suffered from her illness, and this must have prevented her from leading a normal life.<sup>32</sup> That is why she is prepared to sneak in the crowd and secretly touch Jesus' cloak. Then she is made healthy again. The natural thought evoked by this scene is that, just as she became healed, she was also cleansed from her impurity. Accordingly, she is also recognized as part of Israel once more.<sup>33</sup> Hence, in the case of the lepers, purification is explicitly said to have taken place before they get to the rites that should officially assure their reintegration into the community. Here the woman's reintegration is implied as a fait accompli thus presupposing her purification.

To a certain extent, we can include here even the cures of lame and blind people. 2 Sam 5:8b reads: "The blind and the lame shall not come into the house." One can think of two slightly differing reasons why the blind and the lame should not enter the temple: either they are regarded as unclean and thus capable of polluting the temple, or they are simply seen as being able to profane the temple's holiness by virtue of their defects.<sup>34</sup> Interestingly, in 11QT XLV, 12–14, a passage elaborating 2 Sam 5:8,<sup>35</sup> the blind are to be excluded so that they "shall not in the Bible and in Hittite and Mesopotamian Literature, SBLDS 101 (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1987), 209–210. Cf. also Lev 5:3 and 13:45–46.

---

<sup>31</sup> Dunn, "Jesus and Purity," 461.

<sup>32</sup> The discharge would have continuously kept her in a state of impurity (Lev 15:25–30). Earlier such impurities with high communicability (cf. Lev 15:19–24, which appears to describe even a fourth level impurity for a woman with a regular discharge of blood) were to be removed from the "camp"; see Num 5:1–4 which lists people with leprosy, abnormal sexual discharge, and corpse contamination. Later expulsion was reduced to apply only to people having leprosy; Wright, Disposal of Impurity, 168–178. Cf., however, War 5.227, where Josephus also mentions gonorrhoea as resulting in expulsion from the city.

<sup>33</sup> Cf. Mark 5:34. See J. A. Fitzmyer, The Gospel according to Luke (I–IX): Introduction, Translation, and Notes, AB, 28 (Garden City: Doubleday, 1981), 747; Evans, "Jesus and the Ritually Impure," 368.

<sup>34</sup> S.M. Olyan, "The Exegetical Dimensions of Restrictions on the Blind and the Lame in Texts from Qumran," Dead Sea Discoveries 8 (2001): 38–50, at 41.

<sup>35</sup> See Olyan, "The Blind and the Lame," 38–43, who argues for 2 Sam 5:8b and a tandem reading of other Old Testament texts such as Isa 52:1 and Num 5:3b as the background of 11QT XLV, 12–14.

defile the city in the centre of which I dwell.” In other words, the blind are regarded as unclean.<sup>36</sup> Further, 1QSa II, 9b–10(11) establishes that, together with other people with physical blemishes, the lame and the blind (deaf, dumb, etc.; see the lengthy list in vv. 3–7) should be regarded as contaminated.<sup>37</sup> Hence, for those who shared the view represented by these texts,<sup>38</sup> even Jesus’ cures of people with bodily defects would have carried important purity connotations.<sup>39</sup> The restoration of sight and capability of movement (among other things) would at the same time have meant a visible and indisputable restoration of purity.<sup>40</sup>

Similar ideas are finally evoked by the stories about Jesus’ touching dead people.<sup>41</sup> A dead human body carries grave ritual impurity, the removal of which from those contaminated would require elaborate procedures and a lengthy period of time.<sup>42</sup> When now the girl of Mark 5 and the young man of Luke 7 were made alive by Jesus, what would have happened to their impurity? It is difficult to think that Jesus understood himself to have raised these people from the dead but not to have restored their purity as well. There may, however, be a further

<sup>36</sup> The lame are not mentioned in 11QT XLV, 12–14.

<sup>37</sup> D. Barthélemy and J. T. Milik, eds., Qumran Cave I, DJD, 1 (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1955), 116 translate “contaminé”; F. García Martínez, The Dead Sea Scrolls Translated: The Qumran Texts in English, trans. W. G. E. Watson, 2nd ed. (Leiden: Brill, 1996), 127 translates “defiled.” This meaning of מונוגט in v. 10 is motivated by the context (especially v. 3). Hence L. Schwienhorst, “נגט,” ThWAT 5 (1986): 219–226 (226) gives the verb נגט in 1QSa II, 3–6, 10 the rendering “mit einer Unreinheit geschlagen sein.”

<sup>38</sup> See also 4QMMT LV–LVII which reasons that those who do not see nor hear cannot know how to apply regulations concerning purity. Cf. even Acts 3:2, 8, 10.

<sup>39</sup> The cures of (inter alia) lame and blind people are related in, for example, Mark 3:1–5, Matt 11:5 par. Luke 7:22 (= Q), and Luke 13:11–13 (lame) as well as in Mark 8:22–25; 10:46–52; Matt 11:5 par. Luke 7:22 (= Q), Matt 12:22; 15:29–31 (blind).

<sup>40</sup> A cultic defectiveness along the lines of 2 Sam 5:8, be it uncleanness or the power to profane, seems to be presupposed in Matt 21:12–14. See D. Hagner, Matthew 14–28, WBC, 33B (Dallas: Word Books, 1995), 601; cf. U. Luz, Das Evangelium nach Matthäus: 3. Teilband Mt 18–25, EKKNT 1.3 (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1997), 188.

<sup>41</sup> Mark 5:35–43; Luke 7:12–16; cf. also John 11:17–44. In Luke 7:14, Jesus is said to touch the bier on which the corpse is lying. This act was almost equally serious, for a human corpse could create first-level impurities (by contact, overshadowing etc.)—that is, new sources of impurity. Hence the rabbinic term “father of fathers of uncleanness.”

<sup>42</sup> Corpse-impurity makes persons (or objects) unclean for seven days: Num 19. The impurity should be removed by sprinkling water especially blended for this purpose on the third and seventh days. The mixture consists of water and the ashes of the red cow: Num 19:2–9. On the seventh day, impure persons are to bathe and wash their clothes: Num 19:19; cf. 31:24.

point that could be advanced here. A corpse is very impure, but if it ceases to be a corpse, would not its impurity also cease to exist? After all, a corpse has not been rendered impure by being touched by a corpse but rather by being one. Such a situation differs from all the cases where a recovery had been anticipated. There are regulations for instance for the case that a leper has become cured,<sup>43</sup> that is, how such people should deal with the impurity their ailment had given them. With respect to corpse impurity, however, the comparable regulations concern only those who have acquired impurity by having somehow been in contact with a corpse, not those who have regained their lives.<sup>44</sup> According to a halakhic logic that I have been informed about, if a human corpse regains its life, its purity is as the same as if it have lived the whole time, i.e., it is no longer unclean.<sup>45</sup> If this reasoning applied as early as Jesus' time, the restored purity of the girl and the young man in Mark 5 and Luke 7 would have been evident precisely by the token of their restored life.

Be this last issue as it may, the natural conclusion regarding the healings performed by Jesus is that along with the restored health of the people came also their restored purity. This is what is expressly suggested by the cleansing of the lepers and what is clear in the exorcisms of the unclean spirits. And to the extent that the other acts of healing with more or less apparent overtones of purity provide historically reliable information, they yield not a disharmonious but rather a corroborating picture.

One more point deserves to be observed. Purity could naturally be lost for a good cause and then regained through appropriate means. In Jesus' dealings with the unclean such causes are clear, although perhaps not altogether obvious. For instance, Jesus is not a close relative of the dead girl or the dead young man, and in the case of the woman with a hemorrhage he does not even take the initiative. At any event, however, one was not supposed to gratuitously delay undertaking the measures for purification even when not with the aim of entering the

---

<sup>43</sup> See Lev 13:1–46.

<sup>44</sup> See n. 42 above.

<sup>45</sup> Private communication with Professor Jacob Neusner and with my Rabbi. Cf. the First Temple stories 1 Kgs 17:17–24; 2 Kgs 4:18–37.

temple.<sup>46</sup> Delaying purification was considered a sin.<sup>47</sup> In the case of Jesus, then, the remarkable thing is that there is in the sources no mention of him employing the means of purification. This is not attested or alluded to in the data at any point where Jesus' contamination would have been evident. Similarly, Jesus is nowhere depicted as behaving as if he sought to avoid communicating the impurities he had acquired.

The silence that we encounter here is not surprising, for all the activities of Jesus described above seem by their very nature to exclude the idea that he had temporarily sacrificed his state of purity only to restore it again, and to restore it with the ordinary means of purification. Why would he have needed to implement these for his own purification when he did not need to resort to them for others? We can also account for the silence on the basis of what has been suggested all along: Jesus saw himself as being able to restore people's purity. Impurity did not threaten Jesus' state of purity, but was simply overcome by him.<sup>48</sup> (The silence is also broken in a way that supports the conclusion drawn from it here. Papyrus Oxyrhynchus 840 has a Pharisee accuse Jesus precisely of what we have suggested above, namely that Jesus did not regularly go through the proper means of purification.)<sup>49</sup>

---

<sup>46</sup> S. Westerholm, Jesus and Scribal Authority, ConBNT, 10 (Lund: Gleerup, 1978), 64; E. P. Sanders, Judaism: Practice and Belief 63 BCE–66 CE, 2nd ed. (London: SCM Press, 1994), 218. For evidence for extra-temple purity, see J.C. Poirier, "Purity Beyond the Temple in the Second Temple Era," JBL 122 (2003): 247–265, at 256–259. He states (265) in conclusion: "The notion that the ritual purity laws of Second Temple Judaism existed solely for the sake of the temple is a scholarly construct with little basis in reality." Cf. also the case of the miqvaot discussed below in section 3. See further J. Milgrom, "Israel's Sanctuary: The Priestly 'Picture of Dorian Gray,'" RB 83 (1976): 390–399.

<sup>47</sup> See Lev 5:1–6, which speaks of an unintentional delay; in Lev 17:15–16 find an intentional delay; Ant. 3.262; D. P. Wright, "Unclean and Clean: Old Testament," ABD 6 (1992): 729–741, at 737–738; Sanders, Practice and Belief, 219.

<sup>48</sup> Kazen, Purity Halakhah, 255 is right to maintain that even if Jesus and his disciples had immersed when attending important festivals together with other pilgrims (John 13:10 probably belongs to such a context), this "is not equal to regular immersions after contact with different types of impurity bearers."

<sup>49</sup> Whatever one may make of the papyrus, it does reflect the conditions of the temple and purity discussions at Jesus' time fairly accurately; see Kazen, Purity Halakhah, 256–60. Very suggestive is for example the statement of the Pharisee that he has "gone down by the one stair and come up by the other." The description is strikingly illuminated by the last decades' archaeological findings of numerous miqvaot with both divided and double staircases; see for instance Sanders, Practice and Belief, 225. Grenfell and Hunt, who originally published the papyrus, ascribed this statement of the Pharisee to the author's imagination; see B. P. Grenfell and A. S. Hunt, eds., The

The material that has been under discussion here forms essentially part of the miracle and exorcism tradition which, as a whole, comes with high claims to authenticity. A closer look at instances of the tradition where the question of purity is most evident has produced quite a consistent result. The sources clearly affirm that Jesus purposed to make the unclean clean. Sometimes this intention of his is made explicit, sometimes it appears as the natural implication of the stories. Nothing that would contest this impression could be discerned; there appear no deviating, competing or contradicting ideas. The inevitable conclusion thus seems to be that just as Jesus demonstrated power over diseases, demons, and death, he thought he could even reverse impurity. Of course, if one completely mistrusts what the sources suggest, one can question this conclusion. From that perspective, however, all conclusions must remain questionable.

Thus, in my view, there are good grounds for understanding Jesus' dealings with the unclean along the lines of the interpretation that he saw himself making the unclean clean.<sup>50</sup> I have pressed the issue and studied it at some length in order to lay a solid foundation for the following discussion about the corollaries of this interpretation. The settings within which the dealings and their interpretation will now be studied, prompting and eliciting the corollaries, are thus Jesus' Jewish context, the context of other Jesuanic material pertaining to purity, the context of Jesus' overall message, and purity in early Christianity.

3. A Specific Jewish Context

Intriguingly, in his dealings with the unclean Jesus seems to construe (im)purity in a way that presupposes an inversion of a basic rule. The rule is succinctly expressed by the Old Testament prophet Haggai:

---

Oxyrhynchus Papyri: Part 5 (London: Egypt Exploration Fund, 1908), 3. Less understandable is how F. Bovon, "Fragment Oxyrhynchus 840, Fragment of a Lost Gospel, Witness of an Early Christian Controversy over Purity," JBL 119 (2000): 705–728, still comments on the statement only by referring to the structure of an early Christian baptistery (717).

<sup>50</sup> All in all, we can disassemble the interpretation as follows: (a) prior to his dealings with these people, Jesus perceived them as unclean; (b) he affirmed their regained state of purity after his dealings with them; (c) he saw himself as having caused the change that had occurred and (d) interpreted this as cleansing.

Thus says the Lord of hosts: Ask the priests for a ruling: If one carries consecrated meat in the fold of one's garment, and with the fold touches bread, or stew, or wine, or oil, or any kind of food, does it become holy? The priests answered, "No." Then Haggai said, "If one who is unclean by contact with a dead body touches any of these, does it become unclean?" The priests answered, "Yes, it becomes unclean" (Hag 2:11–13).

As commentators state, "an obvious point has been made by this series of inquiries."<sup>51</sup> "Although defilement is contagious...holiness in contrast is not."<sup>52</sup> Uncleanness was transferable, cleanness was not, and the mere act of touching sufficed to defile. There was only one exception to this general rule of the transferability of (im)purity: The altar of the temple (and some of its utensils) could render those of clerical parentage pure or holy.<sup>53</sup> They, however, could not communicate their purity further.

In this way, purity needed protection, and the more or higher purity there was, the more it had to be guarded. Therefore everything sacred was to be carefully kept free from defilement. This applied particularly to the temple, but even to other "areas,"<sup>54</sup> such as the holy feasts of Israel (e.g., the Sabbath),<sup>55</sup> priests,<sup>56</sup> and theophanic experiences.<sup>57</sup> The different attitudes in handling corpse impurity illuminate the point in question: Ordinary people were allowed to touch and be in close

<sup>51</sup> D. L. Petersen, Haggai and Zechariah 1–8: A Commentary, OTL (London: SCM Press, 1985), 79.

<sup>52</sup> C. L. Meyers and E. M. Meyers, Haggai, Zechariah 1–8: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary, AB, 25 (Garden City: Doubleday, 1987), 56. See also e.g., Petersen, Haggai, 79; R. L. Smith, Micah-Malachi, WBC, 32 (Waco: Word Books, 1984), 160; D. Kellermann, "Heiligkeit II: Altes Testament," TRE 14 (1985): 697–703 (702). B. A. Levine, Leviticus ויקרא: The Traditional Hebrew Text with the New JPS Translation (The JPS Torah Commentary; Philadelphia: The Jewish Publication Society, 1989), 38 states: "The point is that whereas impurity is transferred through physical contact alone, substances do not become holy merely through contact with sacred materials. An act of consecration is required."

<sup>53</sup> Exod 29:37; 30:29. See Petersen, Haggai, 75–76, 78–79. However, it is probable that יקרא in these verses (as in Lev 6:11.20) merely implies that those who touch the holy things must themselves be in a holy state; Levine, Leviticus, 37–38, 40; Tg. Ps.-J. ad loc.; Tg. Onq. ad loc.; cf. N. M. Sarna, Exodus שמות: The Traditional Hebrew Text with the New JPS Translation, The JPS Torah Commentary (Philadelphia: The Jewish Publication Society, 1991), 191; but see ibidem, 259.

<sup>54</sup> See Kellermann, "Heiligkeit," 700–702.

<sup>55</sup> Neh 13:191, 22.

<sup>56</sup> Lev 21; Ezek 4:14; 44:31.

<sup>57</sup> Of these, we have a prime example in the people at Sinai receiving the commandments; Exod 19:10–25. The list could go on with blood, the product of trees in their first three years, etc.

contact with their deceased relatives in order to take care of them and bury them. Though a human corpse was regarded as the most serious of all sources of impurity, and rigorous purification was required after touching a corpse, the living had an imperative duty to give a person a decent burial.<sup>58</sup> In comparison, priests, holy men as they were, could take care of the dead bodies of the most nearest of their kin only, namely of the mother and father.<sup>59</sup> And the high priest, logically, was denied even this deed,<sup>60</sup> which was thus otherwise considered an indispensable act of piety and reverence.<sup>61</sup>

Hence, impurity transferred to the pure and holy, contaminating them. Not even the high priest could communicate his holiness to render even the most slightly unclean thing, let alone a human corpse, pure. On the contrary, he had to be protected all the more. Jesus, however, seems to have dealt with (im)purity in a way that utterly inverts the general rule described by Haggai. Coming into contact with unclean people does not make Jesus impure; that is, their uncleanness is not transferred to him. Instead, it is the unclean who become clean—that is, purity is transferred to them.<sup>62</sup> With regard to Jesus, purity has

---

<sup>58</sup> In the Old Testament, being denied burial is pictured as the ultimate punishment and horror (Deut 28:26; Jer 7:33; 8:1–2; Ezek 6:5; 29:5). Tobit is mocked because of his eagerness to bury all the dead “brothers” he comes across (Tob 1:16–19, 2:3–8). And Josephus tells that the Jews “were so careful about funeral rites” that even crucified criminals used to be taken down and buried (War 4.317; cf. 3.377). See also 4 Ezra 2.22–23.

<sup>59</sup> Lev 21:1–2. The exact list also encompasses the priest’s son, daughter, brother, and virgin sister (who is without a husband to care for her in the case of her death).

<sup>60</sup> Lev 21:10–11. A temporary denial to bury even the closest relatives was also issued to Nazirites: Num 6:5–12.

<sup>61</sup> Especially the parents were worthy of burial, and this was the imperative duty of the son. For example, Abraham and Isaac are favored by their sons’ arrangement of their burials (Tob 4:3–4; 14:11–12; Jub. 23.7; 36.1–2, 18–19). Being denied this service is seen as a particular misfortune (Tob 6:14; 2 Macc 5:10; War 5.545; see also 1 En. 98.13). See also e.g., m. Ber. 3.1.

<sup>62</sup> Similarly Borg, Holiness, 135, explaining the healing of the leper: “it was not Jesus who was made unclean by touching the leper—rather, the leper was made clean... holiness was understood to overpower uncleanness rather than the converse”; Evans, “Jesus and the Ritually Impure,” 368, expounding the story about the woman with hemorrhage: “[i]nstead of conveying uncleanness to Jesus, whom she touches, cleanliness is conveyed to her”; and Berger, “Pharisäer,” 240: “offensive Reinheit/Heiligkeit ist...eine Reinheit, die sich von ihrem Träger aus verbreitet, die ‘ansteckend’ ist, die Unreines rein machen kann...Diese Reinheit/Heiligkeit wirkt so, wie früher Unreinheit wirkte. Die Machtverhältnisse sind jetzt und hier umgekehrt worden” [“offensive purity/holiness is...a purity which spreads out from its bearer, which is ‘contagious,’ which can make pure that which is impure... This purity/holiness works in the same way as impurity worked in the past. In this time and place, the power relationships become contagious.<sup>63</sup> Jesus thus appears to be pursuing a kind of inverse strategy, which, in reality, holds two remarkable notions: (a) the diametrical change of the transferability of (im)purity and (b) Jesus' special role in being the one who is the stem of the change which has taken place—in other words, his purity has become contagious. In the following, I shall refer to this as the inverse strategy of ritual (im)purity, or often simply as the inverse strategy.

As such, alterations and new viewpoints were nothing unusual in early Judaism. Matters of purity, in particular, aroused a multitude of varying interpretations. As I have maintained, debates concerning purity can even be regarded as a central factor in the history of Jewish sectarianism. Even within this diversity, however, the view of (im)purity implied by Jesus' dealings with the unclean must be characterized as exceptional and radical. Instead of this common model of how the state of purity should be restored:

“dealings with the means of purification → pure”

we must assume this kind of scheme:

“dealings with Jesus → pure”

—although one should notice that in contacts with Jesus, uncleanness is not actually dealt with as it is with the means of purification. That is, Jesus does not act as a priest attending to the means of purification.<sup>64</sup> Nor does he acquire impurity, so that he needed to dispose of it afterwards. Instead, purity simply conquers impurity; it behaves contagiously, in the way impurity used to do. Jesus thus seems to be a holy man without a correspondent in the living representatives of Israel's holiness.<sup>65</sup> As a matter of fact, he appears to function just like have been reversed”; eng. trans. B. McNeil]. See also n. 9 above for other proponents of this interpretation.

---

<sup>63</sup> Nothing suggests that Jesus had thought of someone else as possessing capabilities similar to his own or that he had seen the inversion of the transferability of (im)purity as a general phenomenon taking place through and through at his time. If Mark 6:7–13 can be utilized in a historical assessment, it rather reveals the “authority over the unclean spirits” as an ability of individuals and of exceptionally gifted persons other than Jesus himself (see esp. v. 7). The pericope may, however, have had further meaning for the Palestinian Jesus movement. See the discussion below in section 6.

<sup>64</sup> Cf. Dunn, “Jesus and Purity,” 459.

<sup>65</sup> Cf. Job 14:4: “Who can make the unclean into the clean? No one!” The translation is according to D. J. A. Clines, Job 1–20, WBC, 17 (Dallas: Word Books, 1989), 277.

the altar of the temple which by mere touching could render people clean, but I do not wish to press this analogy too much now.

Considering all this, then, it should not go without notice that the inverse strategy of ritual (im)purity in reality entails a major change in the whole purity thinking of Judaism. At issue here are not merely questions such as what the substances that defile are, how contagious different substances can be, how long the defilement caused by them lasts, how various defilements are to be purged, etc., which were common topics of quarrels and conversations. Instead, it is the fundamental view of how ritual (im)purity behaves, i.e., the basic idea of the contagiousness of impurity, that undergoes a radical change. This was precisely what made impurities so threatening: their ability to multiply themselves, some more easily than others.<sup>66</sup> This was why questions of (im)purity kept surfacing in the debates of the learned as well as in the daily lives of common people. Close to the temple, the elaborate system of miqvaot, ritual baths, served precisely to work against the contagiousness of impurity.<sup>67</sup> However, such structures, both miqvaot and various stone vessels meant for purification, have been found not only in the vicinity of the temple, but even at greater distances.<sup>68</sup> This strongly suggests that the miqvaot in question were used for maintaining purity for its own sake. We may gather that delays in purification particularly in the case of severe and highly communicable impurities would have begun to threaten the purity of entire communities, as the impurities would have had more time to spread and multiply.<sup>69</sup> Hence, even when not with the aim of entering the temple, people tried to retain their status of purity and to regain it if lost. For this constant concern, the miqvaot furnished an indispensable help.<sup>70</sup>

Against this background, it is easy to fathom the remarkable change that the inverse strategy of (im)purity would anticipate. For someone who would have believed that he had the ability to invert the transfer-

<sup>66</sup> See n. 32 above.

<sup>67</sup> E. P. Sanders, Jewish Law from Jesus to the Mishnah: Five Studies (London: SCM Press, 1990), 214–227.

<sup>68</sup> R. Reich, “Ritual Baths,” in The Oxford Encyclopedia of Archaeology in the Near East, ed. E. M. Meyers, vol. 4 (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1997), 430–431; A. Negev and S. Gibson, Archaeological Encyclopedia of the Holy Land (New York: Continuum, rev. ed., 2003), 71; Poirier, “Purity Beyond the Temple,” 257.

<sup>69</sup> Frymer-Kensky, “Pollution, Purification, and Purgation,” 403.

<sup>70</sup> Kazen, Purity Halakhah, 75: “The fairly wide-spread use of miqvaot made an expansionist view of impurity possible to implement.”

ability of (im)purity, the abundance of miqvaot, and even more, a whole way of life would have begun to appear irrelevant. Indeed, can we avoid thinking that the inverse strategy has the potential to bring about a major transformation of Judaism? In my view, some sort of eschatological and messianic ideas need to be regarded as lying behind Jesus' purity thinking. Otherwise, it would be difficult to account for the radicality of the change of the transferability of (im)purity on the one hand, and on the other, the particular role in this change Jesus assumes for himself. I shall return to these considerations later on.

In the eyes of beholders who would not have belonged to Jesus' close followers, his unreserved dealings with the unclean could have remained obscure. It would not always have been easy for outside observers to anticipate possible other motivations behind this unreservedness. Therefore, as I have proposed elsewhere, within the framework of contemporary covenant thinking, where the purity paradigm (inter alia) played an integral role, this behavior of Jesus could at times have appeared suspicious and most readily explainable as laxity.<sup>71</sup> The gospel reports do, however, suggest that Jesus' own aims with this behavior were not derived from indifference or negligence, but rather from a view of the inversion of the transferability of ritual (im)purity that he sees as taking place in his person and mission. Naturally, with such a conception of transferability, impurity also loses much of its threatening character. Deprived of its ability to multiply itself, it becomes easily manageable and conquerable, and can therefore be approached with a quite different—that is, relaxed—attitude. Hence, it is not so much what comes from outside a person that can defile.<sup>72</sup>

4. Other Jesus Traditions Pertaining to Purity

In these remarks, I have begun to consider the inverse strategy in the context of other Jesuanic material which carries purity overtones. I shall be content with two examples.<sup>73</sup>

---

<sup>71</sup> Holmén, Jesus and Jewish Covenant Thinking, 251.

<sup>72</sup> Cf. Mark 7:15.

<sup>73</sup> For the temple as obviously relevant to purity, see the following section.

4.1. An Odd Saying?

First, the saying in Mark 7:15, which is often regarded as providing historically reliable information,<sup>74</sup> thus reveals itself to be compatible with the inverse strategy.

There is nothing outside a man which by going into him can defile him; but the things which come out of a man are what defile him.

In fact, the saying and the strategy can remarkably illuminate each other. Why is it that defilement from outside—i.e., forbidden foods and ritual impurity in general<sup>75</sup>—cannot defile at all or cannot defile as much as defilement from the inside,<sup>76</sup> which probably means moral contamination?<sup>77</sup> Simply because of the fact that, since Jesus is now able to invert the transferability of (im)purity, nothing from the outside, not even unclean foods, can pose the kind of threat they once had. On the other hand, with respect to moral impurities, the situation is different, for their communication does not take place in the same manner! The morally defiling acts mentioned in the Torah are sexual sins (Lev 18), idolatry (Lev 19:31; 20:1–3), and murder (Num 35:33–34),<sup>78</sup> though Jesus or other contemporary Jews need not have restricted this category to these deeds alone.<sup>79</sup> While ritual impurity, as was commonly thought, was communicated by touching, moral impurity came through doing the sins in question. Moral impurity did not spread by physical contact! Still, it created a longer-standing state of impurity and was impervious to the rites of purification.<sup>80</sup> In other

<sup>74</sup> For an analysis, see Holmén, Jesus and Jewish Covenant Thinking, 237–249.

<sup>75</sup> Food seems to be implied by the verb “going into”; H. Räisänen, “Jesus and the Food Laws: Reflections on Mark 7.15,” in The Torah and Christ: Essays in German and English on the Problem of the Law in Early Christianity, ed. A.-M. Enroth, Publications of the Finnish Exegetical Society, 45 (Helsinki: Raamattutalo, 1986), 219–241 (223). Though food is in focus only by implication, the context (even if not originally the present one) may have made it explicit. At any event, reference to food can also be interpreted as a pars pro toto case, hence denoting ritual or thus “external” impurity in general.

<sup>76</sup> For these alternatives, see shortly below in the text.

<sup>77</sup> R. P. Booth, Jesus and the Laws of Purity: Tradition History and Legal History in Mark 7, JSNTSup, 13 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1986), 210; Holmén, Jesus and Jewish Covenant Thinking, 238–239.

<sup>78</sup> Wright, “Unclean and Clean,” 733–735.

<sup>79</sup> See J. Klawans, Impurity and Sin in Ancient Judaism (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000), 43–60; Regev, ‘Abominated Temple’, 250–251.

<sup>80</sup> Frymer-Kensky, “Pollution, Purification, and Purgation,” 404–409; Klawans, Impurity and Sin, 26–31; Regev, “Abominated Temple,” 245.

words, moral impurity was not conceived as being contagious in the way that ritual impurities were, and it also required different means of purification. In consequence of this, the inversion of the contagiousness of (im)purity did not apply to moral defilement and did not warrant a relaxed attitude in that respect.<sup>81</sup>

Hence, the “oddy” of the saying Mark 7:15 readily disappears when we recognize the words as an expression of the inverse strategy of (im)purity. By the same token almost can almost establish that Jesus not only acted according to the inverse strategy, but also reflected verbally on what it meant with respect to various kinds of impurity.

There is also another way that the inverse strategy of ritual (im)purity can illuminate the interpretation of Mark 7:15. As is well known, the saying can be read either as an absolute denial of the defiling power of what comes from outside or as a relative statement that stresses the greater significance of moral issues (while devaluing ritual impurities). The latter reading has gained popularity of late. The tone of Mark 7:15 is clearly reminiscent of Old Testament prophetic oracles such as Jer 7:22–23 and Hos 6:6, which by stressing what is now urgently needed seemingly dismiss the opposite. Grammatically speaking, Mark 7:15 (as well as the Old Testament passages) may be understood as a ‘dialectic negation’.<sup>82</sup> As a Semitic idiom, the formula “not A, but B” (οὐ . . . ἀλλά) can be rendered “not so much A, but rather B,”<sup>83</sup> hence, “a man is not so much defiled by that which enters him from outside as he is by that which comes from within.”<sup>84</sup>

At the same time, the absolute (and literal) interpretation has run into difficulties because of the emphasis in current research on the Jewishness of Jesus. The idea that Jesus would have abrogated the food

---

<sup>81</sup> The inverse strategy of ritual (im)purity is compatible with the Q saying Matt 23:25–26/Luke 11:39–41 as well.

<sup>82</sup> See H. Kruse, “Die ‘dialektische Negation’ als semitisches idiom,” VT 4 (1954): 385–400.

<sup>83</sup> F. Blass, A. Debrunner and F. Rehkopf, Grammatik des neutestamentlichen Griechisch, 17th ed. (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1990), 378 (§ 448 n. 1); M. Zerwick, Biblical Greek Illustrated by Examples, English ed. adapted from the 4th Latin ed. by J. Smith, Scripta Pontificii Instituti Biblici, 114, 6th repr. (Rome: Editrice Pontificio Istituto Biblico, 1994), 150 (§ 445).

<sup>84</sup> In similarity with this interpret, for instance, Westerholm, Jesus and Scribal Authority, 83; Booth, Laws of Purity, 68–71; H. Merklein, Jesu Botschaft von der Gotesherrschaft: Eine Skizze, 3rd ed. SBS 111 (Stuttgart: Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1989), 98; Holmén, Jesus and Jewish Covenant Thinking, 239–241; J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus Remembered, Christianity in the Making, 1 (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2003), 574–575.

laws or even denied the distinction between sacred and secular which was so fundamental to Judaism was earlier found appealing and, since it attests to an obvious uniqueness, also suggested authenticity.<sup>85</sup> Nowadays, however, such radicality is perceived as unsuited to Jesus the Jew, and the authenticity of the saying is often made dependent on the acceptance of the relative interpretation.<sup>86</sup>

It is clear that the relative interpretation fits well with the inverse strategy of (im)purity. Ritual impurity has not vanished, but because Jesus has the power to ward it off and revert it easily, it does not require so much attention any longer. Instead, moral uncleanness stays untouched by the inverse strategy since that type of defilement has had nothing to do with contact-contagion in the first place. However, the strategy also affords an absolute reading of the saying which eschews being non-Jewish or too radical. If the straightforward inability of any outside impurity to defile—as is literally proposed in Mark 7:15<sup>87</sup>—is understood against the background of Jesus' imperviousness to such <sup>85</sup> See, for instance, E. Käsemann, Exegetische Versuche und Besinnungen: Erster Band, 2nd ed. (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1960), 238; N. Perrin, Rediscovering the Teaching of Jesus (New York: Harper & Row, 1967), 150; H. Hübner, Das Gesetz in der synoptischen Tradition: Studien zur These einer progressiven Qumranisierung und Judaisierung innerhalb der synoptischen Tradition (Witten: Lutter-Verlag, 1973), 165–175. Even more recently, see W. Weiss, “Eine neue Lehre in Vollmacht”: Die Streit- und Schulgespräche des Markus-Evangeliums, BZNW 52 (Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 1989), 70–71; R. W. Funk and R. W. Hoover, The Five Gospels: The Search for the Authentic Words of Jesus (New York: Scribner, 1996), 69. For the use and misuse of the criteria of authenticity in assessing Mark 7:15, see T. Holmén, “Doubts about Double Dissimilarity,” in Authenticating the Words of Jesus, ed. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans, NTTS 28.1 (Leiden: Brill, 1999), 47–80 (70–73).

<sup>86</sup> See, for instance, Sanders, Jewish Law, 28; Cf., however, J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, 1: The Roots of the Problem and the Person (AB Reference Library; New York: Doubleday, 1991), 173. Further, see J. Riches, Jesus and the Transformation of Judaism (London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1980), 112; J. D. G. Dunn, “Jesus and Ritual Purity. A study of the tradition history of Mk 7,15,” in À Cause de l'Évangile. Études sur les Synoptiques et les Actes: Festschrift J. Dupont, LD 123 (Paris: Cerf, 1985), 251–276 (254). For my solution to the dilemma, see T. Holmén, “Doubts about Double Dissimilarity,” 59–62.—This is also G. Theissen's assessment of the current research; see G. Theissen, “Das Reinheitslogion Mk 7,15 und die Trennung von Juden und Christen,” in Jesus als historische Gestalt: Beiträge zur Jesusforschung: Festschrift G. Theissen, ed. A. Merz FRLANT, 202 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2003), 73–89 (73–76). However, Theissen himself interprets the saying absolutely and sustains its authenticity. He points out that the saying is indicatively formulated, not imperatively as later in early Christianity (ibid., 80–84).

<sup>87</sup> Cf. οὐδὲν ἐστιν ἕξωθεν... ὃ δύναται κοινῶσαι. See Theissen, “Das Reinheitslogion Mk 7,15,” 76–77. Cf. Holmén, Jesus and Jewish Covenant Thinking, 241.

impurities and his contagious, “defiling” purity, we obtain an absolute reading which by no means abrogates the laws of ritual (im)purity. According to this reading, ritual (im)purity does not cease to exist but—seen strictly from Jesus’ perspective—simply can no longer do any harm, i.e., defile.<sup>88</sup>

4.2. Table Fellowship with the Outcasts

As a second example, I shall look at the theme of Jesus’ table fellowship with toll collectors and sinners. Ed Sanders argues for the historicity of the theme on the following grounds: (a) the extent of the material having a bearing on this question is large; (b) there is a multiple attestation in forms: “parables, other sayings, flat declarations of purpose, reports of Jesus’ activity, and reported accusations against him”; (c) a high tolerance of sinners is dissimilar to the practice of the early church as we know it.<sup>89</sup> Sanders also maintains that the main offense of Jesus’ table fellowship was not that he ate with common people who did not observe the specific food regulations of the haverim or the Pharisees, but that he granted unrepentant sinners the legitimacy of the people of God.<sup>90</sup> I think Sanders is right on both points. Accordingly, the theme provides authentic information about Jesus’ message about the kingdom of God. Sharing the table was a cheerful event suitable for a cheerful message. In other words, here Jesus imparted his message and made sinners and outcasts heirs of the kingdom.<sup>91</sup>

However, as I mentioned at the beginning of this article, I believe that matters of purity, though perhaps less focally, were also involved

---

<sup>88</sup> The relative interpretation perhaps sees the issue from a wider perspective, taking into account that the inversion of the transferability of (im)purity concerned only Jesus and was applied to those with whom he had dealings.

<sup>89</sup> E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (London: SCM Press, 1985), 174. For the authenticity of this motif see also, for instance, Meier, A Marginal Jew, 2: 149–151; D. E. Smith, “Table Fellowship and the Historical Jesus,” in Religious Propaganda and Missionary Competition in the New Testament World: Essays honoring Dieter Georgi, ed. L. Bormann, K. Del Tredici, and A. Standhartinger, NovTSup 74 (Leiden: Brill, 1994), 135–162.

<sup>90</sup> Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 174–211.

<sup>91</sup> For a recent re-evaluation of the historicity of the table fellowship as Jesus’ means of imparting his message about the kingdom, see D.-A. Koch, “Jesu Tischgemeinschaft mit Zöllnern und Sündern: Erwägungen zur Entstehung von Mk 2,13–17,” in Jesu Rede von Gott und ihre Nachgeschichte im frühen Christentum: Beiträge zur Verkündigung Jesu und zum Kerygma der Kirche, ed. D.-A. Koch, G. Sellin, and A. Lindemann (Gütersloh: Gütersloher Verlagshaus Mohn, 1989), 57–73.

in these situations of Jesus' mission. The involvement of purity questions has been suggested for instance by Bruce Chilton and more recently by James D. G. Dunn,<sup>92</sup> and I share their opinion that the presence of mixed interests can by no means be excluded. Purity questions arose at the table at least because, in general, sinners were no better than pagans,<sup>93</sup> and in particular, toll collectors were defiled because in their profession they were likely to come into contact with Gentiles.<sup>94</sup> Therefore the table fellowship theme is also helpful in probing the applicability of the inverse strategy of (im)purity.

Indeed, the strategy can well be seen as operative behind this conspicuous feature of Jesus' behavior. Table fellowship naturally brought people into close physical contact with each other. And the purity of food is surely one point here as well.<sup>95</sup> The unreservedness towards the looming impurities that Jesus displayed by this activity can again be explained by the ability to invert the transferability of (im)purity which he assumed to possess. Yet almost equally illuminating is the fact that the inverse strategy of (im)purity cannot account for the entire situation of table fellowship, since, as I have stated, purity was not the only question that arose due to the fellowship. Thus we again encounter certain boundaries to the inverse strategy of (im)purity. Together with Sanders, I hold that the inclusion of sinners in the kingdom attracted attention to Jesus' gatherings. How could Jesus treat these people with such openness? This falls outside the scope of the ritual (im)purity strategy, if only because the sinners would probably have also committed deeds resulting in moral defilement.<sup>96</sup> The conclusive answer lies

---

<sup>92</sup> B. Chilton, "Jesus and the Repentance of E. P. Sanders," TynBul 39 (1988): 1–18. Dunn, "Jesus and Purity," 465. So also Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 187, 210.

<sup>93</sup> Booth, Laws of Purity, 110 correctly observes that through being in contact with these sorts of people Jesus was liable to be defiled.

<sup>94</sup> Antipas' main toll collectors were probably located in Tiberias, which was not only a prominently Greek city but was also founded on an old graveyard (Ant. 18.36–38).

<sup>95</sup> Josephus tells of at least two groups who so strictly kept to their own table fellowship that, when this became impossible, they starved, since they would not touch other people's food. See War 2.143–144 about some Essenes and Ant. 20.181, 206–207 about some other priests. The same pattern lies behind the prohibition that a haber should not eat together with the "people of land" (see m.Dem). The above interpretation(s) of Mark 7:15 would work purposefully in the table fellowship practiced by Jesus.

<sup>96</sup> In the gospels, the designation "sinners (ἁμαρτωλοί), used of the group Jesus kept company with (a deviant use for instance in Luke 5:8), denotes those who had intentionally broken God's commandments, as these were understood by Jews in general, not just by some isolated group or association. The designation is advanced by many in understanding Jesus' message about the kingdom of God. Somehow this enabled him to include even sinners.<sup>97</sup> That the inverse strategy of (im)purity was part of the kingdom message seems clear, but it did not make up the whole message.<sup>98</sup>

Hence, the inverse strategy represents ritual (im)purity as a matter relevant to Jesus while at the same time explaining his seemingly indifferent behavior in various situations and the relaxed attitude he voices. Though ritual impurity was a real and relevant issue to Jesus, it was not a problem or a danger, since for him, its sting (i.e., its contagiousness) had fallen away. Moreover, through Mark 7:15 the inverse strategy illuminates the fact that the relaxed attitude never applies to moral issues: Since moral defilement was "non-contagious," it could not be dealt with by means of Jesus' contagious purity. And the implications of the particular table fellowship which Jesus practiced corroborate and complement the picture: The inverse strategy of (im)purity accounts for the ritual concerns of the fellowship but in other questions some other solutions are clearly called for. Is it not natural to think that there thus were some other strategies Jesus operated with? The purpose of the next section is to look at the inverse strategy of (im)purity within the context of Jesus' overall message and activity. At the same time, however, it also takes us to the threshold of identifying other comparable strategies of Jesus.

5. The Overall Message of Jesus

The obvious question emerging from these remarks is how Jesus had arrived at such a view of ritual (im)purity. As I have stated, we must investigate the issues of the eschatological message of Jesus and the kinds of people: By the evangelist (Mark 2:15), by the Pharisees (Mark 2:16), by Jesus himself (Mark 2:17), and by people in general (Luke 19:7; Matt 11:19 par. Luke 9:34 = Q). Especially the last point shows that the people designated ἀμαρτωλοί were sinners in general respect, i.e., they were regarded as sinners by Jews in general. In fact, here probably lies the function of "the toll collectors," the regular referent of this designation. Because everyone disliked "the toll collectors," it conveniently serves to indicate that ἀμαρτωλοί is not meant just as some special grouping's judgement of other people. Further on this see, for instance, J. Jeremias, "Zöllner und Sünder," ZNW 13 (1931): 293–300; Westerholm, Jesus and Scribal Authority, 70–71; H. Merklein, Die Gottesherrschaft als Handlungsprinzip: Untersuchung zur Ethik Jesu, 2nd ed., FzB 34 (Würzburg: Echter Verlag, 1981), 200–201; Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 177–179.

---

<sup>97</sup> See the remarks in the next section.

<sup>98</sup> See the short remark on the table fellowship in the next section.

specific role within that message which he adopted for himself. In Jewish restoration eschatology, the task of the agent of God was to bring about God's rule, thereby at last establishing purity and righteousness.<sup>99</sup> The restoration of the purity of the land, the people and/or Jerusalem, envisaged by prophets, was longed for in many intertestamental writings and was usually pictured as involving the exclusion of sinners and ritually unclean people.<sup>100</sup> Maybe, in Jesus' view, it was this eschatological purity that through him now began to rule over impurity. In his view, however, the restoration of purity would not take place by excluding the ritually unclean people, but through the efficient expurgation of their uncleanness by means of the inversion of the transferability of (im)purity. Hence the statement: "O Jerusalem . . . the unclean shall enter you no more"<sup>101</sup> would indeed hold true, but because those with impurities have been made clean.

Would such a hypothesis find support in Jesus' overall message? To begin with, it would be illuminating to see whether motifs reminiscent of the inverse strategy of (im)purity can be located elsewhere in the gospels' Jesus tradition.

5.1. A General Motif of Inversion

Actually, there are quite a number of traditions that display the feature of inversion. First, the "parables of reversal":<sup>102</sup>

The Pharisee and the Publican (Luke 18:10–14), the Good Samaritan (Luke 10:30–37), the Rich Man and Lazarus (Luke 16:19–31), the Wedding Guests (Luke 14:7–11), the Proper Guests (Luke 14:12–14), the Great Supper (Matt 22:1–10 par. Luke 14:16–24), and the Prodigal Son (Luke 15:11–32).

Secondly, some short statements clearly apply here:

"The tax collectors and the prostitutes are going into the kingdom of God ahead of you" (Matt 21:32), "whoever wishes to be great among you must be your servant" (Matt 20:26), "for the Son of Man came not to be <sup>99</sup> See, for example, Isa 42:1–7; Jer 23:5–6; Ezek 37:22–28; Pss. Sol. 17.

<sup>100</sup> Ps 24:3–4; Isa 35:8; 52:1; Pss. Sol. 17.22–23. Sometimes a powerful removal of the uncleanness of the people was envisioned: Isa 4:3–4; Ezek 36:25, 29; Jub. 4.26; 50.5; Pss. Sol. 17.26; 1QS IV, 20–22. However, many of these passages can also be understood as referring to the removal of the unclean people themselves.

<sup>101</sup> Isa 52:1.

<sup>102</sup> See here J. D. Crossan, In Parables: The Challenge of the Historical Jesus (New York: Harper & Row, 1973), 53–78.

served but to serve" (Mark 10:45), "I tell you, many will come from east and west and will eat with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven, while the heirs of the kingdom will be thrown into the outer darkness" (Matt 8:11–12), "I have come to call not the righteous but sinners" (Mark 2:17).

All these texts put forward ideas that invert traditional beliefs and notions. As a third group, we have some paradoxical sayings:

"But many who are first will be last, and the last will be first" (Mark 10:31), "those who find their life will lose it, and those who lose their life for my sake will save it" (Matt 10:39; cf. Mark 8:35), "I came into this world for judgment so that those who do not see may see, and those who do see may become blind" (John 9:39; cf. Mark 4:11–12).

Naturally, the Beatitudes of the Sermon on the Mount or on the Plain can also be seen as based on inversion.<sup>103</sup>

The relatedness of the statements in the third group to those in the second is obvious, no doubt because they all involve playing with opposites. However, their relationship lies deeper. For "paradox is to language as eschaton is to world."<sup>104</sup> The sayings in the second group express in a more informative guise how eschatology means a radical change (or inversion) in the issues and beliefs in question. The sayings of the third group use a paradoxical way of speech to accentuate the radicality of the change.

I do not suggest that every item in the above lists exhibits an authentic saying of Jesus. Similarly, the explicit Christological motif found in some of them is probably secondary. Nonetheless, since the conviction that Jesus turned upside down some basic conceptions of salvation etc. is very firmly rooted in the tradition, it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that the conviction has its starting point in the genuine teaching of Jesus.<sup>105</sup> In fact, this conclusion presents itself as inevitable if we choose to follow the methodological principle that James Dunn has suggested in his recent major work on Jesus, namely that one should primarily accept the basic historicity of the general and recurrent motifs of the Jesus tradition.<sup>106</sup> Actually, there are quite a few scholars who hold that such motifs merit a high claim to authenticity.<sup>107</sup> In addition, however, some items from the lists merit claims to authenticity even as individual traditions. Among them is, for example, the oracle about people coming from the east and west to dine with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob.<sup>108</sup>

<sup>103</sup> Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 412–413.

<sup>104</sup> Crossan, In Parables, 76.

<sup>105</sup> So also for instance D. L. Bock, Luke, vol. 2: 9:51–24:53, Baker Exegetical Commentary on the New Testament, 3b (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1996), 1232; Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 412–417; J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, 3: Companions and Competitors, AB Reference Library (New York: Doubleday, 2001), 56–64.

As we can see, the inverse strategy of (im)purity appears not to have been a solitary phenomenon in Jesus' message. It forms part of a general motif of inversion that imperatively goes through the tradition and is best characterized as eschatological and closely connected to the message about the kingdom of God. This general motif of inversion finds a scriptural counterpart in texts which underline God's sovereignty over human fortunes, as for example in Ezek 17:24: "I bring low the high tree, I make high the low tree; I dry up the green tree and make the dry tree flourish."<sup>109</sup> We may note that Jesus' table fellowship with sinners and outcasts discussed above displays many themes that are central here: the imparting of the kingdom message, inversed purity concerns, as well as inversed apprehension of whom the kingdom belongs to, and Jesus' particular role of being the mediator in all of this. We can also hear echoes of the table fellowship in the oracle referred to about the consummation of the kingdom, where wholly unexpected kinds of people feast with Abraham and the patriarchs.

However, the inverse strategy of (im)purity clearly operates on a more particular level than the general motif of inversion. Perhaps the best way to describe this difference is to say that the inverse strategy of (im)purity is one of the things that enable for Jesus the general

---

<sup>106</sup> Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 332–335.

<sup>107</sup> See, for instance, H. K. McArthur, "A Survey of Recent Gospel Research," Int 18 (1964): 39–55, at 48; Perrin, Rediscovering, 46; N. J. McEleney, "Authenticating Criteria and Mark 7:1–23," CBQ 34 (1972): 431–460 (434); S. E. Porter, The Criteria for Authenticity in Historical-Jesus Research: Previous Discussion and New Proposals, JSNTSup 191 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000), 86; Holmén, Jesus and Jewish Covenant Thinking, 34–36; G. Theissen and D. Winter, The Quest for the Plausible Jesus: The Question of Criteria, trans. M. E. Boring (Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox Press, 2002), 177–179. See now also T. Holmén, "Seven Theses on the So-called Criteria of Authenticity of Historical Jesus Research," RCT 33 (2008): 343–376, at 367–371.

<sup>108</sup> See J. Schlosser, Le règne de Dieu dans les dits de Jésus: Deuxième partie, EBib, 2 vols. (Paris: Gabalda, 1980), 603–624; Meier, A Marginal Jew 2: 309–317. G. Theissen and A. Merz, Der historische Jesus: Ein Lehrbuch (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1996), 233.

<sup>109</sup> See also for example 1 Sam 2:1–8 (see Luke 1:46–53; cf. also Jas 5:1–3); Pss 75:8; 113:7–9; Ezek 17:24; 21:27; Dan 2:21.

pursuit of inversion. It makes it possible for him to bring his message about the first coming of the last comers (cf. Mark 10:31) to one particular group of last comers, namely to the ritually unclean.<sup>110</sup> In the previous section I pointed out a certain restrictedness of the inverse strategy of (im)purity. It does not apply to moral contamination, nor can it account for the openness Jesus showed towards the sinners in granting them the legitimacy of the people of God. Hence, other such strategies, or plans of action (if one wants to avoid the word “strategy”)<sup>111</sup> need to be identified, if one wishes to explain the general pursuit of inversion witnessed in the lists above of parables, sayings, paradoxes and Beatitudes. Naturally, I cannot attempt a full clarification of that now. Nonetheless, I wish to take a look at one issue which should have functioned in close proximity to the inverse strategy of (im)purity and which could help us see how further viewpoints of inversion were connected to each other: the temple.

5.2. A Cooperative Dimension: The Temple and its Cult

Issues of the temple and purity were closely connected with each other in early Judaism. The holiness of the temple was the central concern of all Jews at every period of the building.<sup>112</sup> In particular, the temple not only demanded purity but was the source of it.<sup>113</sup> The purity of the

---

<sup>110</sup> Of course, temporary states of ritual uncleanness were largely an everyday matter for people. Usually, they did not give rise to any greater tragedies. When I characterize the ritually impure as “last comers,” I obviously mean those states of impurity which would have more or less completely prevented a person from leading a normal life. Examples of such states seen in this article are: people possessed by unclean spirits, lepers, and the woman with the hemorrhage.

<sup>111</sup> E. P. Sanders’ position (“ancients in general and ancient Jews in particular formulated aims and shaped their actions so as to accomplish them”... “on my reading, the evidence points towards Jesus’ having a definite programme” [Jesus and Judaism, 20, 21; see further ibid., 18–22]), already preceded by B. F. Meyer, The Aims of Jesus (London: SCM, 1979), has been fully appropriated by the “Third Quest.” I would call the means implemented to fulfill a program “strategies.” See also B. Chilton, The Temple of Jesus: His Sacrificial Program Within Cultural History of Sacrifice (University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1992) and appendix 3: “Jesus’ Program within Early Judaic Pluralism” (181–190).

<sup>112</sup> The Halakhic Letter 4QMMT elaborates on the purity of the offerings; the purity and appropriateness of the priesthood concerns many writers of the intertestamental period (cf., for instance, T. Mos. 5–7); and Josephus describes how only pure Israelites could enter the temple (Apion 2.193–196).

<sup>113</sup> S. Safrai, “The Temple,” in The Jewish People in the First Century: Historical Geography, Political History, Social, Cultural and Religious Life and Institutions, ed. S. Safrai and M. Stern, vol. 2, CRINT 1.2 (Assen: van Gorcum, 1976), 865–907, at temple granted the purity of the chosen people who gathered there to serve their God. Notwithstanding the modesty of Zerubbabel's temple referred to in Haggai (Hag 2:9), its altar functioned as a distributor of purity; it was accepted as the "fountain opened for... the inhabitants of Jerusalem to cleanse them from sin and impurity."<sup>114</sup>

Jesus' relationship to the temple and its cult was, however, as has been noted, "notoriously problematic."<sup>115</sup> Though there is no unanimity among scholars about what exactly the problem was, many would agree that Jesus predicted and awaited the destruction of the temple.<sup>116</sup> Probably then, for whatever reason, Jesus saw the temple as not being up to its tasks. Why else would he have awaited its fall? Granted then that there was a linkage between the temple and purity in Jesus' thinking too (as in early Judaism generally), his conviction that the temple did not work and would disappear could offer at least one reason why he adopted the role of himself—instead of the temple—functioning as the distributor of purity. Some kind of parallel can be found in the Qumran community's way of regarding itself as a collective temple, in its residing in the desert in order to atone for the land and maintain purity within the community.<sup>117</sup> Nor should we forget to consider John the Baptist.<sup>118</sup>

---

876–877; Frymer-Kensky, "Pollution, Purification, and Purgation," 406. Many rites of purification included sacrifices as their integral component.

<sup>114</sup> Zech 13:1. Cf. Ezek 47:1.

<sup>115</sup> See Chilton, A Feast of Meanings, 34.

<sup>116</sup> Holmén, Jesus and Jewish Covenant Thinking, 290–303. Cf., for example, Mark 13:1–2; 14:57–58; Matt 23:37–39 par. Luke 13:34–35; Luke 19:41–44; Acts 6:13–14. For a more detailed discussion on the theme of Jesus and the temple, see Holmén, Jesus and Jewish Covenant Thinking, 275–329. See also T. Holmén, "The Temple Action of Jesus (Mark 11:15–17) in Historical Context," in A Bouquet of Wisdom: Essays in Honour of Karl-Gustav Sandelin, ed. K.-J. Illman, T. Ahlbäck, S.-O. Back, and R. Nurmela, Religionsvetenskapliga skrifter 48 (Åbo: Åbo Akademi University Printing House, 2000), 99–127. For contemporary parallels to seeing the temple as doomed, see for instance 1 En. 89.54, 56; Sib. Or. 3.270–276 (dated 163–145 BC by J. J. Collins, "Sibylline Oracles," in J. H. Charlesworth, ed., The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha, vol. 1: Apocalyptic Literature and Testaments, 2 vols. [New York: Doubleday, 1983], 317–472 [355]); T. Levi 15.1; War 6.250, 301.

<sup>117</sup> See, for instance, 1QS VIII, 4–10; 1QSa II, 2–10; L. H. Schiffman, "Community Without Temple: The Qumran Community's Withdrawal from the Jerusalem Temple," in Gemeinde ohne Tempel/Community without Temple: Zur Substituierung und Transformation des Jerusalemer Tempels und seines Kults im Alten Testament, antiken Judentum und frühen Christentum, ed. B. Ego, A. Lange, and P. Pilhofer, WUNT 118 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1999), 267–284 (272–274).

<sup>118</sup> As Dunn, "Jesus and Purity," 459 states, John "offered his own ritual as an alternative to the Temple ritual." See the references for this view in Dunn, "Jesus and Purity," nn. 48 and 49.

Jesus' view of the temple would thus fittingly accompany the inverse strategy of (im)purity in explaining (at least partly) why there was a need for such a strategy. There is also an intriguing detail which connects Jesus' views of the temple with Haggai's afore-mentioned purity saying (Hag 2:11–13) in a way characteristic of the (im)purity strategy—that is, by way of inversion. In Mark 13:1, one of Jesus' disciples is reported to have been amazed by the large stones and buildings of the temple. As can be gathered, the overwhelming grandeur of the temple could easily bring into mind the words of Hag 2:9: “the latter splendor of this house shall be greater than the former.” Immediately after these words in Haggai follows the regulation concerning the contagiousness of impurity.<sup>119</sup> And Haggai continues, “so is it with this people, and with this nation . . . and so with every work of their hands; and what they offer there is unclean” (Hag 2:14). Nevertheless, there is now a better hope with which Haggai can console himself. Though modest, the temple initiated by Zerubbabel is there and times of blessings will come. How different indeed was the time—and now come words that are unique to Haggai in the Old Testament<sup>120</sup>—“before a stone was placed upon a stone in the Lord's temple” (Hag 2:15). “Stone on another” probably refers “to the ritual manipulation of the ‘former stone’” mentioned specifically in Zech 4:7 and laid (יָדַם) by Zerubbabel,<sup>121</sup> “a stone designed to guarantee ritual continuity with the earlier holy building.”<sup>122</sup> Intriguingly, in Mark 13:2 Jesus is said to have replied to his disciple's awe with an inversion of Haggai's words about the stone: “there will not be left here one stone upon another.”<sup>123</sup> The inversion hardly applies to the verbal level alone. In addition to Jesus' disbelief in the current temple's capacity to do what people (like Haggai in the past) expected, there may also be a disbelief in a temple “made with hands,” i.e., a human temple (cf. Hag 2:14 quoted above;

<sup>119</sup> See the quotation above.

<sup>120</sup> H. W. Wolff, Dodekapropheton 6: Haggai, BKAT 14.6 (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1986), 44.

<sup>121</sup> Zech 4:9.

<sup>122</sup> Petersen, Haggai, 90 (Emphasis added). See also D. L. Petersen, “Zerubbabel and Jerusalem Temple Reconstruction,” CBQ 36 (1974): 366–372, at 368–369. See further in Holmén, Jesus and Jewish Covenant Thinking, 294–296, 301–303.

<sup>123</sup> For the arguments for regarding this tradition as authentic, see Holmén, Jesus and Jewish Covenant Thinking, 292–296, 301. These words can easily be seen as referring to the passage in Haggai; J. Schlosser: “La parole de Jésus sur la fin du Temple,” NTS 36 (1990): 398–414, at 407–408.

see also Mark 14:58).<sup>124</sup> The inversion of the words about the ritual stone could then imply the discontinuity between the coming divine (i.e., not made with hands) temple and the current one. Such a discontinuity would be necessary in order to signal and enforce the remarkable change in the transferability of ritual (im)purity already anticipated in Jesus' work.

I regard the connection between Mark 13:1–2, Hag 2:15, the temple and purity that I am proposing here as an intriguing hypothesis. I have explored the backgrounds of the hypothesis elsewhere.<sup>125</sup> Irrespective of the hypothesis and this interpretation of the stone words, however, Jesus' view of the temple, as briefly set out here, would accord with his view of the inversion of (im)purity. The analogy of the altar of the temple again suggests itself. At the same time, if we grant that this brief exposé is basically accurate and catches the gist of the issue,<sup>126</sup> we may be looking at something approximating the matrix of the general pursuit of inversion, something that furnishes the link which combines the different courses of action (or strategies) that, together with the inverse strategy of (im)purity, need to cooperate to make up the pursuit. For obviously, purity was not the only function of the temple. Jesus' openness towards the sinners in entitling them to the legitimacy of the people of (the kingdom of) God, for example, could be explained by the assumption that he considered himself to have the authority to forgive sins regardless of the temple institutions. In fact, if the present temple was already sentenced to destruction,<sup>127</sup> he would have judged his (present) authority greater than that of this doomed temple. Hence,

<sup>124</sup> Hag 2:14: מְעֵשֶׂה יְדֵיהֶם, "work of their hands." The terminus technicus χειροποίητος, "made with hands" (both χειροποίητος and ἀχειροποίητος appear in Mark 14:58), is Septuagintal (see Lev 26:1; 26:30; Isa 2:18; 10:11; 16:12; 19:1; 21:9; 31:7; 46:6; Dan 5:4.23; 6:28; Jdt 8:18; Wis 14:8; Bel 1:5) and has no exact Hebrew or Aramaic equivalent. Cf. Hag 2:14 LXX: τὰ ἔργα τῶν χειρῶν αὐτῶν. However, the formulation of Hag 2:14 can quite well have evoked the same notion. In my view, D. J. S. Clines, "Haggai's Temple: Constructed, Deconstructed and Reconstructed," SJOT 7 (1993): 51–77 has shown that these passages from Haggai can also invite a pessimistic interpretation of the temple's state; see especially Clines, "Haggai's Temple," 61–66. Clines does not, however, point out the possibility of seeing Hag 2:14 as a critique of a temple "made with hands."

<sup>125</sup> See my forthcoming study "‘No Stone Upon Another’—No ‘Temple made with Hands’? The Temple Criticism of Mk 13.1–2 in the Light of Haggai 2," in Remembering Jesus: Festschrift J. D. G. Dunn, ed. S. McKnight and T. Mournet (T&T Clark).

<sup>126</sup> For a more in-depth discussion of the issue see Holmén, Jesus and Jewish Covenant Thinking, 275–328.

<sup>127</sup> As thus is above proposed as Jesus' view.

although the sinners would not go to the temple,<sup>128</sup> forgiveness comes to them.<sup>129</sup> And so, inversely, it would be the sinners (who eat with Jesus) and not the righteous (who sacrifice in the temple) who would come first.

For now, these last suggestions must remain what they are, i.e., possibilities for further research. It seems clear, however, that Jesus' dealings with the unclean presuppose an eschatological vision on his part, a vision which reveals itself as all the more thoroughgoing, the further we follow the tracks left by the dealings.

As I suggested above, the inverse strategy held the potential to bring about a major transformation of Judaism. It proposed an understanding of purity which could render the way of life characterized by coping with impurities, trying to avoid contamination and taking care of the proper purification, as basically irrelevant. The question I present next is whether indeed such a transformation—or something like it—did take place in the emergence of Christianity.

6. Purity in Early Christianity

Jesus did not oppose the ritual purity paradigm, nor did he aim at devaluing it. Instead, he can be said to have had a positive and appreciative disposition to it. The paradigm was of relevance to him. A gradually increasing devaluation was to be effectuated, however, since the inverse strategy radically diminished the threat posed by impurity. Impurity began to demand decisively less attention. The contagiousness of Jesus' purity added to this effect. Thus a conspicuously relaxed attitude had become possible, and a major transformation was on its way. Jesus did not live to see development along these lines, but would it be possible to think that in one form or another the inverse strategy of (im)purity was indeed realized in early Christianity?

---

<sup>128</sup> Out of laxity or due to exclusion; Num 15:27–31 (see Milgrom, "Israel's Sanctuary," 393); Ps 15 (see A. Weiser, The Psalms: A Commentary, OTL [London: SCM Press, 1962], 170); 24:3–5; Isa 33:14–16.

<sup>129</sup> In this respect, I think Sanders' (see Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 174–211) characterization of the people who ate together with Jesus as unrepentant sinners is important. The characterization should be qualified, however, by B. Chilton's suggestion that at the background here lies the pattern of forgiveness leading to reformation (Matt 18:23–35; Luke 7:36–50; 16:1–9; thus, an inversion of the more common order of reformation leading to forgiveness). See Chilton, "Jesus and the Repentance," 8, 10–12.

Naturally, at least the outcome fits here neatly, viz. that ritual (im)purity did not play a role in Christianity which approximated in any way to its importance in contemporary Judaism. In general, the observation holds true that while in early Judaism the purity paradigm maintained a central position, nascent Christianity very early exhibited a surprisingly relaxed attitude to many prominent elements of the paradigm.<sup>130</sup> However, there are also some specific early Christian texts that work well with the inverse strategy of (im)purity and that therefore suggest a link between Jesus and what came after him on this very point. One of the texts is 1 Cor 7:14:<sup>131</sup>

For the unbelieving husband is made holy (ἡγίασται) through his wife, and the unbelieving wife is made holy (ἡγίασται) through her husband. Otherwise, your children would be unclean (ἀκάθαρτα), but as it is, they are holy (ἅγια).

Some other texts point in the same direction:

If the dough offered as first fruits is holy, so is the whole lump; and if the root is holy, so are the branches.<sup>132</sup>

To the pure all things are pure.<sup>133</sup>

For it is written: "Cleave unto them that are holy, for they that cleave unto them shall be made holy."<sup>134</sup>

There might therefore be a case for maintaining that at least some people in some strands of early Christianity saw themselves as having become part of Jesus' contagious purity. Hence, once they had become pure through him, they would not be contaminated any more, at least not through the same channels as before, but could even themselves become communicators of purity.

More passages can be evoked when we pay attention to the fact that there is a gap between the view that Jesus thought he could spread purity and the idea that every Christian could do the same or at least something akin to that. A tradition which at least secondarily could <sup>130</sup> The struggles seem mainly to have emerged around the food laws and eating. See Acts 10, 15; Rom 14:13–23; 1 Cor 8:7–13; Gal 2:11–14.

<sup>131</sup> See here Berger, "Pharisäer," 240–245. Berger's thesis rests mainly on the assessment of the motif of the "offensive cleanness/holiness" (see n. 62 above) in early Christianity. He considers Jesus under the last of his five points; see Berger, "Pharisäer," 246.

<sup>132</sup> Rom 11:16.

<sup>133</sup> Tit 1:15. Cf. Luke 11:41.

<sup>134</sup> 1 Clem. 46.2.

have been used precisely to bridge that gap is the sending out of the “twelve.” In Mark 6:7, Jesus grants “the twelve” an “authority over the unclean spirits.” In effect this means that they can proclaim, cast out demons, and cure the ailing by anointing them with oil.<sup>135</sup> Matthew puts somewhat more stress on purity, and has Jesus command them: “Cure the sick, raise the dead, cleanse the lepers, cast out demons.”<sup>136</sup> It is difficult to see either version as a statement originally put forward to justify a view that Christians have been endowed with Jesus’ power to make the unclean clean. Still, secondarily the tradition may have been of some considerable help in just that.

Another way by which the early Christians could have bridged the gap between Jesus’ contagious purity and theirs derives from the logic of contemporary purity thinking itself. I have already mentioned Luke 7 and the case where Jesus is said to touch the bier on which the dead young man lies.<sup>137</sup> What makes this move astonishing is the fact that unlike other sources of impurity,<sup>138</sup> a human corpse could generate new sources of impurity. For this reason it was called by the rabbis “father of fathers of uncleanness.” Therefore, although he touched only the bier, Jesus would not have been safe: since the bier had become a source of impurity, he would have acquired corpse impurity even by this act. All with elementary knowledge of the Jewish purity regulations would have understood this when seeing (if the story calls upon a historical reminiscence) or when reading or hearing what happened.

By this remark I wish to highlight a certain aspect of the contemporary purity logic. With this in mind, we turn again to the story about the woman with a hemorrhage in Mark 5:25–34. What is important now is the observation that purity is communicated to the woman from Jesus’ cloak. This would suggest that Jesus’ contagious purity could create new sources of purity, thereby emulating the logic of corpse impurity! It may well be that the story about the woman does not particularly emphasize its inherent purity aspects. Still, for any Jew telling or hearing the story, the purity implications would have been <sup>136</sup> Matt 10:8. The demons are called “unclean spirits” in Matthew as well (10:1). Luke (9:1–6) completely ignores the language of purity here.

---

<sup>135</sup> Mark 6:12–13.

<sup>137</sup> Luke 7:14.

<sup>138</sup> Besides dead human bodies, the main sources of impurity were leprosy, human discharges, and dead animal bodies. See Editorial staff, “Purity and Impurity, Ritual,” EncJud 13 (1978): 1405–1414, at 1405.

inescapable.<sup>139</sup> Furthermore, what the story does emphasize is the fact that the woman touches only Jesus' cloak. In Mark this is stated first by the narrator, then by the woman herself, and lastly by Jesus.<sup>140</sup> Matthew and Luke reduce the times the cloak is mentioned but make the point conspicuous by speaking about the "fringe" (κράσπεδον) of the cloak.<sup>141</sup> Those with some knowledge of the problematic communication of impurity, as in the case of corpse impurity, would have heard this as follows: look, his cloak had turned into a source of purity.

Allowing some applied thinking, this kind of analogy could maybe have offered basis for reasoning that those cleansed by Jesus had themselves become sources of purity. This means: they would not have got exactly the same capability as Jesus had, but they would still be understood as having obtained a permanent state of purity.<sup>142</sup> Figuratively speaking, they were now to work as Jesus' κράσπεδον. Hence, to the pure all things are pure.<sup>143</sup> This would explain the rather rapid fading away of a way of life considerably centered around the warding off of impurity without the need to postulate a categorical turning against the Jewish purity paradigm on the part of the early Christians. Therefore, my statement regarding Jesus' stance to (im)purity could well be seen to apply to some early Christians as well: Ritual (im)purity was a real and relevant issue to them, but it was not a danger, since, for them too, its sting, i.e., its contagiousness had fallen away. However, as a natural course of events it rather soon became clear that the whole ritual purity paradigm would fade away.

---

<sup>139</sup> Slightly modifying Dunn's (see Dunn, "Jesus and Purity," 461) testimony about the four stories in Mark 5:1–20; 5:21–24.35–43; 5:25–34; and Luke 7:11–17.

<sup>140</sup> Cf. Mark 5:27.28.30.

<sup>141</sup> Matt 9:20 (9:21 only "cloak"); Luke 8:44. One would not sit or lie on the "fringe" (or "tassel"). See the "fringe" mentioned in Mark 6:56 par. Matt 14:36, which has similar effects.

<sup>142</sup> As I remarked in n. 63 above, Jesus had probably not regarded anyone else as possessing capabilities similar to his. Nor had he seen the inversion of the transferability of (im)purity as a general phenomenon taking place through and through at his time.

<sup>143</sup> Tit 1:15. The locus to become part of this purity for those unable to touch Jesus physically would obviously be baptism. Cf. Rom 6, esp. v. 19.

7. Summary and Concluding Words

Jesus' dealings with the ritually unclean attest to a mode of behavior which can best be explained by an assumption of an eschatological vision on his part. This vision proposed that, with regard to Jesus, a radical change in the ways purity and impurity behave had taken place. It proposed a view of an inversion of the transferability of (im)purity, which rendered Jesus capable of cleaning the unclean without resorting to ordinary means of purification: the impurities of the unclean do not transfer to Jesus; instead, Jesus' purity transfers to the unclean. From now on, through him, this eschatological purity would start ruling over impurity. So even the ritually unclean would become part of God's kingdom.

Jesus' eschatological vision, the inverse strategy of (im)purity, did not lead him to oppose the ritual purity paradigm. He did not aim at devaluing it either. On the contrary, Jesus can be said to have had a positive and appreciative disposition to ritual purity. A gradually increasing devaluation was effectuated, however, since the inverse strategy radically diminished the threat posed by impurity. Once its contagiousness was ruled out, it demanded decisively less attention. From the other side, the contagiousness of Jesus' purity worked in the same direction. Thus a conspicuously relaxed attitude had become possible, and a major transformation was on its way. For outside observers all this would easily have seemed to be indifference and/or laxity. Indeed, in some forms of early Christianity where the inverse strategy of ritual (im)purity seems to have continued to be effective and to develop, it probably did contribute to straightforward laxity and eventually to the almost complete disappearance of the idea of ritual purity from Christian thought.

The inverse strategy of (im)purity—the reference here is again to Jesus—did not apply to moral defilement, for this was not conceived as contact-contagious. Hereby we can explain the impression given by the Jesus traditions pertaining to purity, that he stressed the moral dimensions of the law at the cost of downplaying the ritual ones. In reality, both were important for him, but different strategies were required to handle them. Similarly, in other situations where the inverse strategy of (im)purity could be found operative, viz. Jesus' table fellowship with sinners and outcasts, it showed its restrictedness as well. In this respect it is informative that the overall teaching of Jesus reveals that the inverse strategy of ritual (im)purity forms part of a general motif of inversion inherent to Jesus' kingdom message: the first will come last and the last will come first. The scope of the present article did not permit a thorough investigation of what other strategies (or plans of action) contributed to the general inversion pursuit. The affirmations about the temple and the forgiveness of sins remain suggestions at present. Still, these issues can quite naturally be linked with the ritual (im)purity strategy. Jesus' view of the temple would appear to offer a nexus for several viewpoints of inversion, and an authority to revert sins would be a convenient complement to the power to revert ritual impurity which he assumed he possessed.

Hence, in my view, taking Jesus' way with the ritually unclean as the point of departure has indeed opened a new gateway to understanding Jesus' purity thinking and even more. It has also enabled us to see what issues are involved, how to marshal them and exactly how they are relevant to the main question. Moreover, the point of departure and the ensuing understanding of the theme of Jesus and purity have provided Jesus' views with a link to the Judaism of his time that is both simple and very meaningful. Investigations should now be broadened to include and take a cue from the insights offered by the inverse strategy of (im)purity.<sup>144</sup>

---

<sup>144</sup> The germ of the ideas this essay essentially builds on were presented in a paper I read in Spring 1998 at the shared New Testament seminar of Åbo Akademi University (Finland), Helsinki University (Finland) and Uppsala University (Sweden), hosted by the exegetical department of Åbo Akademi University in Turku. The seminar was attended by many students, professors and colleagues, among them also my good friend Thomas Kazen. I received vigorous criticism from Anders Gerdmar, also a good friend of mine.

JESUS AND THE LAW

WILLIAM LOADER

A detailed discussion of the question of the historical Jesus and the Law might properly begin with a consideration of such important matters as sources, criteria of authenticity, and review of previous research. It should also include some discussion of the quest for the historical Law, which has become equally problematic. Within the brief compass of this paper it is possible to do little more than flag these issues and assume an appreciation of their significance before proceeding to the discussion of the material.

Whether to rebut Jewish criticism or to confront Christian laxity, or, more likely, both, Matthew has Jesus assert: “Do not think that I have come to abolish the Law and the Prophets; I have not come to abolish but to fulfil” (5:17). With this form of words Matthew introduces a saying in 5:18 which occurs in variant form also in Luke 16:17. 5:19 shows that Matthew intends by 5:18 total observance of the Law and that to think otherwise makes one least in the kingdom of God or perhaps even ineligible to belong. The focus on complete adherence finds confirmation also in 5:20 and in the antitheses which give a radical interpretation of the demands of Torah.

While there have been attempts to interpret 5:18 as limiting such strictness to a past era from the perspective of Matthew, the most natural reading is to see in the saying an affirmation that every bit of Torah retains its validity. This is most likely to be the point of the saying also in Luke 16:17. Some take it as an observation that setting aside Torah, which must now happen since Christ has come, is extremely difficult—but necessary. This usually depends on a reading of Luke 16:16 along the lines that the Law and Prophets were valid up until John, but are no longer valid.<sup>1</sup> It is much more likely that 16:16–17 are meant to convey the message that as the Law and the Prophets faced resistance, all the more so does the message of the kingdom.<sup>2</sup> 16:17 reaffirms that the Law remains part of God's order. 16:18 then illustrates the strictness by drawing attention to the prohibition of divorce and remarriage. Luke 16:16–18 function similarly to Matthew 5:17–48. Both affirm the Law in the context of the message of Jesus and both illustrate the point by citing an example of radical strictness.

---

<sup>1</sup> So most recently Ingo Broer, “Jesus und die Tora,” in Jesus von Nazareth—Spuren und Konturen, ed. L. Schenke et al. (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 2004), 216–254 at 228, but denying it to the historical Jesus.

<sup>2</sup> See William Loader, Jesus’ Attitude towards the Law: A Study of the Gospels WUNT 2.97 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1997; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2002), 337–338.

The saying in Matt 5:18 and Luke 16:17 belongs within material attributed to Q. The Q material shows a coherence with its stance.<sup>3</sup> This is strikingly illustrated in Matt 23:23//Luke 11:52 which affirms a hierarchy of values among the requirements of the Law, but insists nevertheless on observance of its detail, even to the extent of listing items which go beyond the written Law. This furnishes evidence that at least among communities using Q, the view prevailed that observance of Torah was to be continued. They also saw some requirements as more important than others and these, by and large, related to ethical behaviour. Matthew and Luke inherit this approach. Whether it represented a stance of Jesus himself, can be addressed only after considering the rest of the evidence, including other traditions preserved in Matthew and Luke and not least Mark.

In 1:22 Mark contrasts Jesus' authority with that of the scribes, which finds its echo in the crowd's acclamation in 1:27 that here is "new teaching with authority." 1:40–45 depicts Jesus as forcefully insisting that a leper observe the requirements of the Law. This then creates a foil for the conflicts which follow, where by implication allegations that Jesus abandons Torah are unjust and ultimately malicious.<sup>4</sup> In none does Jesus set out to address an issue of Torah. The incidental nature of Jesus' engagement with Torah is integral to the anecdotes and is doubtless pre-Markan.

In Mark 2:1–12 the issue is Jesus' authority to declare forgiveness of sins. The allegation of blasphemy has a superficial link with the Jewish trial, which may be a Markan addition. The passive indicates that Jesus declares God's forgiveness, not his own. The issue is more likely to have been similar to the irritation which John's activity caused. Mark begins his good news with the report that John baptised for the forgiveness of sins. Reflecting the kind of integration between rite of purification and inner attitude characteristic of Qumran, but also of the prophets, John's baptism offered forgiveness of sins, apparently without exception<sup>5</sup> and there and then.<sup>6</sup> He might have been even more objectionable because he used a rite, but in neither case is Law contravened, nor cult rejected, any more than this is case when other Jews made similar declarations of God's forgiveness.<sup>7</sup> John's is programmatic and universal and raises important issues to which we shall return in discussing Jesus' action in the temple, which according to Mark elicited from Jesus a response which deliberately connected his and John's authority (11:27–33). In the present context, Jesus acts in relation to an individual.

---

<sup>3</sup> Loader, Attitude, 390–431.

<sup>4</sup> Cf. Thomas Kazen, Jesus and Purity Halakhah: Was Jesus Indifferent to Impurity? ConB 38 (Stockholm: Almqvist & Wiksell, 2002), who denies it a role in Mark's strategy (101).

According to Mark 2:10 the issue of Jesus' declaration is one of authorisation. According to the riddle of 2:9, the issue is ultimately about caring for people as the criterion for behaviour, including observance of the Law. Mark may be responsible for asserting the Son of Man's authority. It fits the contrast about authority in 1:22 and the emphasis on the Son of Man's lordship in 2:28, which in cross reference to 2:10 declares the Son of Man as lord also of the Sabbath.

2:13–17 reports a dispute about Jesus' eating with toll collectors and sinners. The issue surfaces elsewhere. Both Matthew and Luke (and thus Q) report that Jesus made reference to such activity and defended it (Matt 11:17–19; Luke 7:31–35). Luke suggests that Jesus' parables about the lost respond to such accusations (15:2) and adds an instance of such conflict in the story of Zacchaeus (19:1–10). Here in Mark Jesus responds with a short twofold quip: "Those who are well do

---

<sup>5</sup> A similar universal forgiveness lies behind the saying attributed to Jesus about blasphemy (Mark 3:28–29). Steven M. Bryan, Jesus and Israel's Traditions of Judgement and Restoration (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002), notes this would surprise (159).

<sup>6</sup> So R. L. Webb, John the Baptizer and Prophet: A Socio-Historical Study. JSNTS 62 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 1991), 193; cf. Cf. John P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, 2: Mentor, Message, and Miracles (New York: Doubleday, 1994), 54–55: a rite promising future forgiveness.

<sup>7</sup> Against the notion that forgiveness was seen as exclusively the right of the temple, see Friedrich Avemarie, "Ist die Johannestaufe ein Ausdruck von Tempelkritik? Skizze eines methodischen Problems," in Gemeinde ohne Tempel: Zur Substituierung und Transformation des Jerusalemer Tempels und seines Kults im Alten Testament, antiken Judentum und frühen Christentum, ed. B. Ego, I. Lange, and P. Pilhofer; (ET: Community without Temple), WUNT 118 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1999), 395–410, who points to Num 30:6; Prayer of Azariah/Dan 3:38–40 LXX/q; Sirach 31:21–22; 28:2; 32:6–13; 38:9–11 and a wide range of other examples (399–401). John's innovation may reflect criticism of cult practices. So James D. G. Dunn, Jesus Remembered, Christianity in the Making, vol. 1 (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2003), 357–361, Gerd Theissen and Annette Merz, Der historische Jesus (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck und Ruprecht, 1997), 195–196, but hardly an attempt to replace it. Cf. Webb, John the Baptizer, 197; N. Thomas Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God, Christian Origins and the Question of God 2 (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1996), 161.

not need a doctor, but those who are sick" (2:17). It again suggests, as Did. 2.9, that people's needs assume the highest priority in determining appropriate behaviour. The verse continues with something close to the Christological focus of 2:10. Jesus declares why he has come.

The critics probably saw Jesus as flouting the wisdom of keeping away from bad company (Ps 1). The "sinners" may not have been downright wicked, but they were at least abused as transgressors of the Law by others. But Jesus' action flouts no law of Torah, even if, as Mark assumes, he too probably views them as sinners, though not in the sectarian sense.<sup>8</sup> Nor was Jesus flouting purity or food laws. Nothing suggests the eating of unclean food (such as we might fear in a Gentile context). Perhaps the concern was eating food not properly tithed,<sup>9</sup> but this is not said. The sectarian perspective probably implied that those people were in some sense unclean or lax in observing rites of purification. Nothing suggests that Jesus condoned sins of either kind, but people seeking high standards of purity would normally be expected to avoid any context which might compromise them by exposure. Jesus' presence appears motivated by other concerns, also defensible on the basis of Torah, which overrode concerns about such dangers, legitimate or otherwise. A similar overriding of concern about potential contamination lies behind Jesus' instruction in Luke 10:8 that itinerants on mission eat what their hosts offer them without scruple. In Gos. Thom. 14 this is transferred to Gentile contexts and made thus to apply to unclean foods, a blatant conflict with Torah.

The central story, 2:18–19, is not about an issue of Law, but about consistency between Jesus and John. Whether Jesus fasted or not was an issue for those for whom fasting was highly regarded. People who objected to bad company might also be engaged in the practice of fasting. Mark may be responsible for introducing the Pharisees into what might have once been a dispute between the followers of Jesus and John. A similar contrast between John and Jesus underlies the Q saying (Matt 11:16–19; Luke 7:31–35).

---

<sup>8</sup> Tom Holmén, Jesus and Jewish Covenant Thinking, BIS 55 (Leiden: Brill, 2001), notes that Jesus' positive stance to people seen as covenant breakers subverts values espoused by those who see covenant faithfulness as protecting boundaries (204–205, 220); Bryan, Jesus, similarly noting the possible implication that their sins are no longer seen as defiling the sanctuary and land (159–160). Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 529; "Jesus and purity: an ongoing debate," NTS 48 (2002): 449–467, at 465, draws attention to the abusive use of "sinners", but it would be wrong to conclude that Jesus' offence is that he associates only with the marginalised innocent.

<sup>9</sup> On such concerns see Holmén, Jesus, 110.

Mark's fivefold construction centres on sayings in 2:20–21 about new and old wine, new and old garments. They may also at one stage have addressed the contrast between Jesus and John, but might have circulated independently. Then they would have been capable of a variety of interpretations contrasting Jesus and someone or something else, including the Law, but without an original context we are left to speculation. They most likely referred to a contrast between Jesus and other teachers (as they now do in Mark), rather than to one between Jesus and the Law, whether directly or in the form of a contrast between the old and new covenants.

Mark's cluster of stories concludes with two controversies about the Sabbath. The first concludes with the assertion that the Son of Man is lord also of the Sabbath (2:28), an allusion to his authority to forgive sins in 2:10. Rather than showing that he can do what he likes on the Sabbath, even disregard it altogether, the anecdote assumes the need to argue the case for suspending Sabbath law, by citing David's overriding the law about the shewbread (2:25–26). One law overrules another.<sup>10</sup> 2:27 might then be a fitting conclusion to this argument. It declares that Sabbath is made for people, not the reverse, and so reflects similar emphases in the quips made in 2:9 and 2:17a. Sabbath is not disparaged. It is God's gift.<sup>11</sup> The lordship of the Son of Man is therefore not to reject the Sabbath, but to interpret it.

The alleged breach is not about making a path (an idiomatic expression), but about plucking and eating heads of grain. Hearers of Mark and earlier forms of the story would have recognised this as trivial. It was not trivial to those who saw such activity as a breach of Torah. Jesus rejects their stance. Nothing the disciples were doing need be seen as contravening Torah and nothing Jesus said in response should be seen as setting Torah aside. The earliest form of the anecdote probably focused not on response to human need (which Matthew asserts on the basis of the David episode to strengthen the argument along with the halakhic argument about priests),<sup>12</sup> but simply reflected Jesus' rejection of the expansionist tendency of some to apply such law to minor and trivial casual actions such as plucking and nibbling a few heads of grain,<sup>13</sup> and has a notable parallel in early Jewish tradition (m. Yoma 8:6).

<sup>10</sup> Markus N. A. Bockmuehl, Jewish Law in Gentile Churches: Halakhah and the Beginning of Christian Public Ethics (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker, 2000), 6.

<sup>11</sup> Holmén, Jesus, 101; Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 568; Herbert Basser, "The Gospels and Rabbinic Halakah," in The Missing Jesus: Rabbinic Judaism and the New Testament, ed. Bruce Chilton, Craig A. Evans, and Jacob Neusner (Leiden: Brill, 2002), 77–99, at 90.

<sup>12</sup> Kazen, Jesus, 57–58 using halakhah not just haggadah. Like Luke he omits 2:27.

The conclusions are similar for 3:1–6. We recognise Mark's careful composition in 3:6 which plays ironically on the contrast of the preceding saying about killing and making alive and points forward to the plots which bring Jesus to his death. Again we may well have a twofold response of Jesus ("Is it lawful on the Sabbath to do good or to do harm") perhaps expanded by Mark to achieve his irony ("to save life or to kill"), perhaps alluding to the controversial precedent in 1 Macc 2:27–42 (cf. Jub. 2.17–33).<sup>14</sup> Whether one should heal on the Sabbath is at least open to debate and should not be taken as evidence that Jesus set aside Sabbath law.<sup>15</sup> One might observe a certain carelessness in Jesus' not waiting till the next day,<sup>16</sup> but Jesus is shown as not deeming that level of observance to be necessary.<sup>17</sup>

Elsewhere in Mark, observance appears to be assumed. Thus crowds bring their sick to Jesus after sunset after the Sabbath in 1:32–34. Nothing in Jesus' activities on the preceding day, the Sabbath, appears to have evoked controversy according to Mark. The passion narrative also assumes regard for the Sabbath.<sup>18</sup>

Both Matthew and Luke repeat Mark's Sabbath controversy stories, Matthew in a context which portrays Jesus as expositor of Torah without imposing heavy burdens (12:1–14, cf. 11:28–30) and Luke with little change (6:1–11). In addition, both know a Q saying which argues that healing on the Sabbath should be justified on the same basis as rescuing <sup>13</sup> Dunn, Jesus Remembered: "To thus focus too much attention on 'the fence round the Torah' was itself to endanger what the fence was intended to protect" (569). Cf. Holmén, Jesus, who notes "Jesus' indifferent attitude towards the accusation" as alarming (102). Better: low level of priority. Indifference suggests no concern. The Sabbath remains God's.

<sup>14</sup> So Bockmuehl, Jewish Law, 6; Broer, "Jesus und die Tora," 224; Craig A. Evans, "The Misplaced Jesus: Interpreting Jesus in a Judaic Context," in The Missing Jesus: Rabbinic Judaism and the New Testament, ed. Bruce Chilton, Craig A. Evans, and Jacob Neusner (Leiden: Brill, 2002), 11–39, 32–33; Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 329.

<sup>15</sup> Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 329; Basser, "The Gospels and Rabbinic Halakah," 88.

<sup>16</sup> Cf. the suggested ameliorations by Theissen and Merz, Jesus—as an itinerant, Jesus may be moving on the next day (330)—and E. P. Sanders, Jewish Law from Jesus to the Mishnah (London: SCM, 1990) that the healing is only by word (21). Cf. also Luke 6:6 which makes it the right hand, important for earning a living—so Bockmuehl, Jewish Law, 7.

<sup>17</sup> Holmén, Jesus, argues: "The story either attests to something approximating Jesus' opposition to the Sabbath commandment, or then it is inauthentic" (103). This is a false antithesis. It is rather a matter of one element of Torah overriding another.

<sup>18</sup> Paula Fredrikson, Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews: A Jewish Life and the Emergence of Christianity (London: Macmillan, 1999), 106.

an animal from a ditch. Matthew has added it to his version of Jesus' healing the man with the withered hand (12:11–12). Luke has it within the second of two further accounts of healing on the Sabbath (13:10–16 and 14:1–6). It also concerns someone who might easily have been asked to wait until the following day, thus somewhat undermining the saying. The first story has the chief of the synagogue raise this very point. The counter argument, that one would water animals on the Sabbath, fits the context better. These are all, however, not attempts to set aside Sabbath law, but to interpret it.<sup>19</sup>

The situation is different in John where Mark's assertion that the Son of Man is lord of the Sabbath (2:28) would be read as justifying his setting Sabbath law aside (so 5:16–20). This reflects John's distinctive theology according to which the God-given Law is now no longer in force, because the true Light and Life and Truth which it merely reflected at the level of the flesh, and to which it pointed forward, has come.<sup>20</sup> Gos. Thom. 27 uses Sabbath (and fasting) metaphorically, but may reflect older tradition affirming both literally.<sup>21</sup>

Controversy stories occur elsewhere in Mark and reflect a similar structure to those in 2:1–3:6, including a bi-partite punch line response by Jesus, which embodies an argument expressed in an image or riddle, usually appearing in association with a Christological claim to authority and sometimes with argument from scripture. One deserving special attention is 7:1–23. Its punch line is 7:15, but this is now set in a fairly elaborate structure. It begins by reporting objections to the disciples' failure to wash their hands before food (7:1–5). Two sets of responses follow, one alleging the hypocrisy of the questioners (6–8) and another illustrating it in relation to abuse of the law of corban (9–13; addressed also in m. Ned. 9.1), before Jesus responds to the substantial allegation (15). 17–23 then depict a change of scene in which Jesus explains his response privately to his disciples. It includes Mark's explanation about Jesus' authoritative declaration that all foods are clean (7:19). For Mark, what Jesus declares in 7:15 is not a new order to replace what until then was valid, but the invalidity of such assumptions in an absolute sense. It represents a serious contradiction of Torah.

<sup>19</sup> So Bockmuehl, Jewish Law, 7.

<sup>20</sup> Loader, Attitude, 432–491.

<sup>21</sup> So Richard J. Bauckham, "Sabbath and Sunday in the Post-Apostolic Church," in From Sabbath to Lord's Day: A Biblical, Historical and Theological Investigation, ed. D. Carson (Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1982) 251–298, 265. See also Loader, Attitude, 495. Reinhard Nordsieck, Das Thomas-Evangelium: Einleitung—Zur Frage des historischen Jesus—Kommentierung aller 114 Logien (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 2004), argues coherence with Jesus' transformed values of the kingdom (123–126).

Confronted with this emphasis, Matthew and Luke, who share the Q tradition of the Law's infallibility, but who affirm Mark's Christology, make changes.<sup>22</sup> Luke omits the controversy with its supporting context in Mark altogether, but shows he is not unaware of the issue. Matthew alters the wider context, omits Mark's gloss and retains the saying (in a slightly different form)<sup>23</sup> and its explanation, but appears to have understood it in a relative sense.<sup>24</sup> Arguably, Mark (and perhaps Mark's tradition) gave the saying an absolute meaning which it did not originally have. If the saying derives from Jesus, it would then belong within a rhetorical structure similar to what we find in Hosea 6:6, "I desire mercy and not sacrifice," which was commonly understood not as a rejection of sacrifice, but as a strong assertion that prefers mercy to sacrifice.<sup>25</sup>

The Markan setting is plausible. Jesus responds to the issue of ritual hand washing, which may well have been more widely practiced than previously thought given the proliferation of miqwa'oth and stone vessels which has emerged in recent years.<sup>26</sup> The response addresses not only hand washing and halakah<sup>27</sup> and not primarily foods, but purity laws pertaining to what renders a person unclean.<sup>28</sup> Mark then relates it to food. Luke's reference to Jesus' not immersing before eating (11:38) reflects a similar context.<sup>29</sup>

As many have observed,<sup>30</sup> it is difficult to understand how there could have arisen disputes over clean and unclean food in earliest Christianity if Jesus had clearly negated that distinction, as Mark sug-

<sup>22</sup> See Loader, Attitude, 210–220, 316–324.

<sup>23</sup> So Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 574–576; Kazen, Jesus, considers it reflects an earlier form (86).

<sup>24</sup> Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 576.

<sup>25</sup> So most recently Holmén, Jesus, 237–246; Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 576. Kazen, Jesus, 86; "seemingly careless attitude" (88). Bryan, Jesus, 167; William Loader, "Mark 7:1–23 and the historical Jesus," Colloquium 30 (1998): 123–151. Cf. Jürgen Becker, Jesus von Nazaret (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1995), 381–387; Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 327, treating it as an absolute but without implying change of practice.

<sup>26</sup> So Kazen, Jesus, 60–85; Bryan, Jesus, 140. See also the reviews of the earlier Neuser/Sanders debates in Kazen, Jesus, 68–72 and Bryan, Jesus, 130–140.

<sup>27</sup> Cf. Kazen, Jesus, 65.

<sup>28</sup> Dunn, "Jesus and Purity," 463; Bryan, Jesus: "for Jesus the significance of bodily impurity was drastically attenuated" (168), though not abandoned, as Jesus' directive to the leper shows (167).

<sup>29</sup> Kazen, Jesus, 229–230.

<sup>30</sup> Most recently again Dunn, "Jesus and Purity," 263.

gests.<sup>31</sup> It is also difficult to understand why in such disputes people did not appeal to this saying or its substance. Luke's tradition in Acts 10:9–16 of Peter's vision also attacks the distinction among foods on substantial grounds—all these animals have been created by God and cannot, therefore, be unclean, though Luke applies it symbolically to people not food.<sup>32</sup> The existence of this tradition and its attribution to a post-Easter context helps confirm that, at least in the mind of the bearers of that tradition, Peter had made no connection between such a saying and food and knew no such teaching from Jesus.

If the saying was not meant originally in an absolute sense, it is not a large step from declaring laws of purity in relation to food and other matters to be relatively less important in relation to ethical goodness, to declaring them dispensable.<sup>33</sup> One might then transfer the same approach to forbidden foods, an intermediate step being to declare them unimportant and a further step to declare them all clean, which appears also to have been Paul's stance reflected in Romans 14:14, and finally to declare that such laws make no sense at all, as Mark's context now assumes.<sup>34</sup> It is clear that this trajectory stood beside others which were much more conservative.

Mark's denial of the relevance of distinctions between clean and unclean challenges fundamental principles of the Law, especially in relation to holiness and cult. When Mark contrasts the temple made with hands with the temple not made with hands (14:58) and when he has the scribe contrast love of God and neighbour with offering sacrifices (12:28–34), it is likely that Mark saw the temple's sacrificial activity as having no validity.<sup>35</sup> Yet Mark does not appear to have rejected the temple itself. Its role was to be a place of prayer for all peoples. Mark 11–13 links the action of Jesus in the temple with the destruction of the temple, seen ultimately as an action of God. The truth about the false accusation at the Jewish trial and among the mockers at the cross, alleging that Jesus said that he would destroy the temple, lies in the fact

---

<sup>31</sup> The same applies to the parallels to Luke 10:9 and Mark 7:15 in Gos. Thom. 14, where Nordsieck, Thomas-Evangelium, even argues that a reference to Gentile mission might be seen to fit the historical Jesus and that they illustrate that the values of the kingdom must override the cultic requirements where there is conflict (74–80).

<sup>32</sup> Loader, Attitude, 368–379; Peter J. Tomson, "Jewish purity laws as viewed by the Church fathers and by the early followers of Jesus," in Purity and holiness: The Heritage of Leviticus, ed. M. J. H. M. Poorthuis and J. Schwartz (Leiden: Brill, 2000), 73–91, at 89.

<sup>33</sup> Bryan, Jesus, 168.

<sup>34</sup> On Mark reflecting the Romans tradition see Holmén, Jesus, 248.

<sup>35</sup> See Loader, Attitude, 95–122.

that he said that God would do so. It finds its symbolic confirmation in the tearing of the curtain (15:29, 38). The grounds for the destruction of the temple lie with the alleged depravity of its leadership. Its systems built on sacrifice and the distinctions between clean and unclean made no sense to Mark. It had relevance only as a place of prayer. His new temple, founded on Christ the cornerstone (12:9–11), consists of the praying community (11:24–25), the new leadership of the vineyard, the Christian community (12:9).

As with Mark 7, neither Matthew nor Luke follows Mark's radical approach to the temple. Matthew sees the temple's destruction as God's judgement on its leadership, but nowhere suggests its structure and activity was invalid. 5:23–24 assumes offering as normal and acceptable.<sup>36</sup> Luke decries the tragedy to befall the temple and the people, again with no disparagement. Jesus teaches in the temple to the end and the early church continues to participate in the temple. John similarly has no words of disparagement for the "Father's house" (2:16), but deems it obsolete now that the hour has come for worship in the Spirit and Christ has been raised as the new temple (2:19–21; 4:21–24). In some ways Mark and John reach a similar conclusion, but for Mark it implies disparagement and irrelevance of the old, for John it implies intentional fulfilment and replacement of what had divine validity until Christ came.

Any rejection of the temple or of its biblically sanctioned practices was a rejection of large parts of Torah. Attempts to reconstruct Jesus' concerns about the temple range from suggesting he was offended by lax approaches to temple purity to seeing his action as a veiled statement that he was, himself, to be the sacrifice to end all sacrifices. We cannot review these in detail here. There is sufficient ground for claiming that Jesus was critical of the behaviour and attitude of temple authorities.<sup>37</sup> We see this reflected in the parable of the Good Samaritan, in Mark's traditions about exploitation of widows (12:38–44), in sayings about the rejection of God's emissaries in the past and the present (Matt 23:34–36; Luke 11:49–51) and in the warning that God would abandon the house (Matt 23:37–39; Luke 13:34–35). He was not alone in such criticism. Nor was he without precedent in predicting that God's judgement would fall on the temple.<sup>38</sup> While predictions of destruction imply something more than reform or failed reform, the grounds for destruction may well be reflected symbolically also in the activities which Jesus disrupted.<sup>39</sup> He appears also to have assumed the eschatological hope that God would replace the old temple with a new one. But none of this amounts to an attack on the temple as an institution mandated in the Law,<sup>40</sup> and certainly not to a literal take-over bid.<sup>41</sup>

<sup>36</sup> The didrachma legend of 17:24–27 assumes respect for the temple and debate about the legitimacy of the tax (see Loader, Attitude, 223).

<sup>37</sup> Holmén, Jesus, 288, 291.

<sup>38</sup> Ibid., 321–323.

This is also true of John's baptism. Whether or not Jesus also baptised or baptised for a period,<sup>42</sup> there is no indication that he saw John's (or his) rite as an exclusive alternative to temple rites. Jesus does not appear to deem the temple to be so polluted as to be avoided at all costs, as did some (cf. Matt 5:23–24 and pilgrimages). Yet he declares it sufficiently corrupted as to warrant a prediction of divine judgement.

Gaps in our knowledge at this point tempt speculation. Did Jesus propound that individuals offer their own sacrifices, but in face of resistance institute his own sacrificial meal which prompted Judas' betrayal?<sup>43</sup> Did Jesus hope for repentance from the authorities, but

---

<sup>39</sup> See Loader, Attitude, 105–116; also Hans Dieter Betz, "Jesus and the Purity of the Temple (Mark 11:15–18): A Comparative Approach," JBL 116 (1997) 455–472; Craig A. Evans, "The new quest for Jesus and the new research on the Dead Sea scrolls," in Jesus, Mark and Q: The Teaching of Jesus and its Earliest Records, ed. Michael Labahn and Andreas Schmidt, JSNTS 214 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 2001) 163–183, at 175.

<sup>40</sup> Holmén, Jesus, sees Jesus as concerned with the way the sacrificial cult functioned to give a false sense of security on the basis of which people went out to sin (296–329). Though he notes Jesus' probable observance of temple purity laws, he observes that Jesus falls outside his category of Jews who saw the temple and its cult as covenant path markers in the quest for right observance (329). Cf. E. P. Sanders, who sees the act as disrupting the system and symbolising impending judgement, but goes too far when he writes: "He challenged the adequacy of the Mosaic dispensation to provide the complete frame of reference for relations between God and human. God, in his view, would extend his mercy to include outsiders." E. P. Sanders, "Jesus from the Jewish Point of View," in Cambridge History of Judaism, vol. 3 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1999) 618–677, at 651–652, 658. This is true in the sense that Jesus looked to a renewed covenant, but not if it implies rejection of Torah.

<sup>41</sup> Jostein Ådna, Jesu Stellung zum Tempel: die Tempelaktion und das Tempelwort als Ausdruck seiner messianischen Sendung, WUNT 2.119 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2000), shows that the idea that Jesus tried to clear the entire 450 x 300 meter court, despite its defenders, is unrealistic (301–306). Holmén, Jesus, notes that Mark's conative imperfect already suggests a symbolic act (313) and his expelling the buyers, something more than cleansing (317).

<sup>42</sup> Dunn, Jesus Remembered, suggests: "Jesus may well have abandoned a practice that would have most associated him with the Baptist" (460); cf. Meier, A Marginal Jew, 2:120–129, who suggests Jesus did baptize.

<sup>43</sup> Bruce Chilton, Pure Kingdom: Jesus' Vision of God (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1996), 115–123; also "Jesus within Judaism," in Judaism in Late Antiquity. Part 2: Historical Syntheses, ed. Jacob Neusner (Leiden: Brill, 1995), 262–284, at 280–281, similarly Evans, "Jesus Misplaced," 35.

failing that, did he reject the sacrificial system, replacing it by himself?<sup>44</sup> These are variants of the claim that Jesus effectively declared himself to be the replacement for the sacrificial system,<sup>45</sup> usually framed in a typically Christian way with the focus on atonement for sins and with disregard for most of the other functions which the temple and its sacrificial system fulfilled, and informed largely by Paul's letters read in the light of Hebrews.

In all three synoptic gospels, the key passage is the account of the last meal, where such views take Jesus' words to indicate that he sees his death as an act of vicarious atonement. Matthew and Luke are here are at one with Mark. Paul, who preserves the same tradition, leaves us in no doubt that for him the event of Jesus' death and resurrection was pivotal and implied that all other sacrifices and rituals for dealing with sin were thereby rendered obsolete. In a different way John also assumes a new basis for atonement which supersedes the old.

Could it be that at the end of his life Jesus, his hopes for change dashed, resolved to present himself as an alternative, indeed, as the new covenant replacement of the old, including the temple?<sup>46</sup> Does the prominence of royal messianic motifs in the passion narrative, but their relative absence elsewhere in the Jesus tradition reflected in the synoptic gospels, indicate a similar change of tack by Jesus late in his ministry?<sup>47</sup> It would make good sense of the major role that this interpretation of Christ's death plays in Paul and in many of the traditions upon which he draws. Against this, the absence of this element in the accounts of early preaching in Acts, in the early forms of the passion narrative (beyond the last meal), and in the Q material may suggest that the interpretation arose in post-Easter reflection on the death of Jesus and only in some circles.<sup>48</sup> Evidence suggests that the first Christians

---

<sup>44</sup> Ådna, Jesu Stellung zum Tempel, 439, 444–445. See also idem, "Jesus' symbolic act in the temple (Mark 11:15–17): the replacement of the sacrificial cult by his atoning death," in Gemeinde ohne Tempel: Zur Substituierung und Transformation des Jerusalemer Tempels und seines Kults im Alten Testament, antiken Judentum und frühen Christentum, ed. B. Ego, I. Lange, and P. Pilhofer (ET: Community without Temple); WUNT 118 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1999), 461–475, where he speaks of Jesus' view of his own death as atoning as a "second option" (472).

<sup>45</sup> Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 380–383, claim Jesus offered his meal as an interim measure, which then became permanent.

<sup>46</sup> So Ådna, Jesu Stellung zum Tempel, who interprets 10:45 as ransom and notes the same word is used of the temple tax (419–421 and 424–426), thus representing the sacrificial system and implying Jesus' decision to replace it. Jesus understood his suffering as part of his messiahship linked with Isaiah 53 (416–419).

<sup>47</sup> See the discussion in Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 652–653.

<sup>48</sup> See the most recent discussion in Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 795–796.

did not abandon the temple and its cult. Even the alleged allusion to vicarious atonement in the Last Meal is contested; imagery may suggest covenant sacrifice.<sup>49</sup> Speculation about Jesus' changing his mind in this way is fraught with difficulty, especially given that the evidence is at best circumstantial and capable of alternative explanation.

One should also consider that the idea of beneficial death was not without precedent. Maccabean heroes (2 Macc 7) and the figure of the suffering servant in Isaiah 53, vicariously, were also seen as achieving benefit for others. Furthermore in neither case do we find the implication that temple rites or Law are thereby rendered obsolete or replaced. Might the same have been the case in the development of reflection on Jesus' death, including possibly his own reflections in advance shared with his disciples? This should be considered before concluding that at least at the end of his life Jesus turned to reject the temple and thus Torah in this way. It also makes better sense of the scattered indications that some Christians continued to participate in temple rites, including the Lukan Paul. Had the movement begun on the assumption that it espoused the replacement of the temple, we might expect that to surface as a major issue. In Luke's account, the rejection of the temple attributed to Stephen and the Hellenists is shown to be false, notwithstanding the assertion (shared with biblical tradition) that God does not dwell in temples made with hands (Acts 7:47–50; Isa 66:1–2; 1 Kings 8:27).<sup>50</sup>

In Mark we have passed over the controversy about divorce, partly because of the coherence of the cultic themes, and partly because it needs to be considered in the light of sayings on the theme found in independent sources.<sup>51</sup> Matthew preserves both Mark's account and an independent saying which he has incorporated within the six so-called antitheses of the Sermon on the Mount. These six sayings introduced by "You have heard that it was said to those of old, but I say to you," or some shorter form of the same, are the classical site for identifying where Jesus is alleged to take a stand against Torah. The assumption that each of the six is antithetical in a literal sense in this way stands in

---

<sup>49</sup> Dunn, Jesus Remembered, writes: "There is a clear danger that both sets of suggested allusions (Isaiah 53; Daniel 7) are more in the eye of the beholder than contrived or intended by the initial tradents" (815). See his discussion of Mark 10:45 (812–815) and the Last Meal (815–818).

<sup>50</sup> Loader, Attitude, 361–368. Cf. Becker, Jesus, who asserts it is not only true but reflects continuity with Jesus (282–283).

<sup>51</sup> For what follows I refer to my discussion in Sexuality and the Jesus Tradition (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2005).

tension with what precedes in 5:17–20, where Matthew portrays Jesus as declaring that the Law remains valid and is in no way to be diminished in its demand. Most scholars now recognise that in 5:21–48, Matthew, far from contradicting his image of Jesus by showing him as setting Torah aside, is in fact enhancing its demands.<sup>52</sup> At the same time, he is indicating where he sees that the priority lies in Jesus' interpretation of the Law. Matthew assumes a hierarchy of values within Torah, which is reflected in the immediate context in 5:19 (and with surprising affirmation of detail in 23:23). While the focus is primarily ethical, it is not exclusively so, as the extrapolations in 6:1–18 about alms, prayer and fasting show.<sup>53</sup>

To each of the so-called antithetical comments parallels exist in biblical and post-biblical Jewish writings of the time. Anger was a common theme; adultery, similarly. Already the prohibition of coveting lent itself to application in this way. Divorce was a matter of debate. Reaction to proliferation of oaths by abstention from oaths was not unknown.<sup>54</sup> Issues of retaliation and love of enemy were not foreign to exposition of Torah.<sup>55</sup> This renders earlier suggestions that Jesus sovereignly set aside Torah on oaths, retaliation, and love of enemy unconvincing.<sup>56</sup>

The anecdote in Mark about divorce may well have had a single pithy response by Jesus: "What God has yoked, let no one separate" (10:9). It rebuffs the discussion of what legitimises divorce. The biblical texts

---

<sup>52</sup> Cf. Paul Foster, Community, Law and Mission in Matthew's Gospel, WUNT 2.177 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2004), who argues that, read in the light of 5:21–48, 5:17–20 cannot intend the upholding of the Law.

<sup>53</sup> Gos. Thom. 6 alludes to fasting, prayer and giving alms. While one can argue that here and in Gos. Thom. 14 on fasting and alms Jesus places no value on them (Loader, Attitude, 492–493), the case can be made that they reflect a typical approach of Jesus which gives them a subordinate place beside ethical demands—so Nordsieck, Thomas-Evangelium, 47–50, 75.

<sup>54</sup> Holmén, Jesus, noting the tendency to reduce them (Sirach, Essenes, Philo), writes: "In the saying Jesus totally forbids taking oaths while the Jewish reflections remain critical only" (180). "Living according to Jesus' teaching would not lead to transgression, but the Law is implicitly pictured as allowing something that should not be done at all" (186). See also Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 580–581. Becker, Jesus, reminds us that refusing to do what law permits is not against the Law (296).

<sup>55</sup> Holmén, Jesus, assuming his model of covenant seeking, writes: "To love one's neighbor but to keep distance from one's enemies functions as an important general covenant path marker" (258; similarly 273–274). Jesus assumes a different approach to covenant. See also John Riches, "Jesus the Jew: His Interaction with the Judaism of his Day," in Who do you say that I am? (London: SCM Press, 1997), 52–60.

<sup>56</sup> See, for instance, the devastating review of new quest research in Karlheinz Müller, "Forschungsgeschichtliche Anmerkungen zum Thema 'Jesus von Nazareth und das Gesetz': Versuch einer Zwischenbilanz," in Kirche und Volk Gottes: Festschrift für Jürgen Roloff, ed. Martin Karrer (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 2000), 58–77.

from Gen 1:27 and 2:24 now ground marriage in the divinely created order. The saying which Mark appends and locates in private instruction to the disciples (12:10–12) has a similar structure to those found in Matthew, Luke and Paul in that it declares divorce and remarriage to constitute adultery—on the assumption that the original marriage cannot be dissolved. Matthew identifies grounds which make divorce legitimate (indeed, required), namely, adultery. In this he reflects the widespread assumption embodied in Jewish law, that a wife who has slept with another is from that point unclean for the original husband.<sup>57</sup> Very probably this is also taken for granted in the prohibition sayings in Mark, Luke and Paul.

The variant forms of the saying, including Matthew's explicit additions, Mark's (and possibly Luke's) application to women who contemplate divorcing their husbands, and Paul's exposition in relation to mixed marriages, bear witness to a common assumption that Jesus spoke against divorce (and therefore remarriage of divorced people). In the context of our discussion the issue is whether this would have been seen as a departure from Torah or a radical application of Torah. The matter of grounds for divorce was certainly subject of debate according to rabbinic reports. The material in CD IV, 20–V, 6 which also cites Gen 1:27, taken by many to be rejecting divorce, now appears more likely to concern polygamy, also reflected in the Temple Scroll (11QT LVII, 15–19). Other writings at Qumran assume the legitimacy of divorce (CD XIII, 15–17; 11QT LIV, 4–5; LXVI, 8–11). This leaves Jesus' approach standing without direct parallel. Does it derive from a departure from Torah or a will to radicalise its demands? The latter seems more probable.<sup>58</sup>

There is some further indication that Jesus took a very strict approach to matters broadly pertaining to sexuality.<sup>59</sup> While not imposing on others what was probably his own calling, namely celibacy, he extolled its worth as an option for the kingdom of God (Matt 19:11–12), and elsewhere shows that he assumes that in the age to come sexual activity

---

<sup>57</sup> John P. Meier, "The historical Jesus and the historical law: some problems within the problem," CBQ 65 (2003): 52–79 dismisses this view too quickly (78 n. 59). See the discussion in Klaus Berger, Die Gesetzesauslegung Jesu: Ihr historischer Hintergrund im Judentum und im Alten Testament, 1: Markus und Parallelen, WMANT 40 (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1972), 566–570.

<sup>58</sup> Holmén, Jesus: "Jesus probably did not intend his words to contradict, oppose or be directed against the law" (168). Ulrich Wilckens, Theologie des Neuen Testaments: Band 1: Geschichte der urchristlichen Theologie; Teilband 1: Geschichte des Wirkens Jesu in Galiläa (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 2002), 287.

<sup>59</sup> For what follows see Loader, Sexuality.

would cease (Mark 12:25). He doubtless also shared John the Baptist's very strict interpretation of incest laws in attacking Antipas for marrying his step brother's wife (Mark 6:18; cf. Lev 18:16). At the same time, his exposition of the prohibition of adultery, as Matthew presents it, does not demonise women and women's sexuality, but calls men to responsibility for their actions (5:27–28). Sexual union between a man and a woman belongs to becoming one in marriage and is affirmed (Mark 10:2–9). But responsibility for the way men handle their sexuality needs to be taken very seriously, as the sayings about excision indicate (Matt 5:29–30). Mark's tradition, which also preserves such sayings, perhaps already associated with warnings against abuse of little ones, shows sensitivity to sexual abuse (9:36–37, 42–48).

None of these values runs contrary to Torah. They expound its values. Noteworthy, however, is the image of the world to come as being without sexual activity. This may well reflect a strand of Judaism (as in Jubilees) which deemed some incompatibility between the sacred and the sexual, a logical extension of the notion that the age to come is seen as a sacred space, as a temple, where nakedness and sexual activity had no place. Such values reappear in Paul, in both his personal choices and his expositions (1 Cor 7:1, 5, 7, 34) and, in Corinth, in some one-sided extrapolations.

The discussion of sexuality, far from taking us into areas where Jesus might possibly have set Torah aside, may highlight where his stance was deeply reflective of values of Torah, even including assumptions about purity and impurity. While apologists try hard to explain Jesus' prohibition of divorce on the grounds that it would thrust women into poverty, the primary concern appears to be upholding divinely created order.<sup>60</sup> That surely must also rest on perceptions of what God intends as good for people, but the divorce sayings also assume, at least in the Matthean form, notions of clean and unclean. Notions that adultery need not destroy a marriage or that remarriage may well be a compassionate option for many people, not least in the ancient world of Jesus' time, are absent. Mark's version of the saying speaks of wronging a woman (10:11), but many see that as an addition and the other sayings assume male action and the infringement of male rights.

---

<sup>60</sup> See also Amy Jill Levine, "Jesus, divorce, and sexuality: a Jewish critique" in The Historical Jesus through Catholic and Jewish eyes, ed. Bryan F. LeBeau, Leonard Greenspoon, and Dennis Hamm (Harrisburg: Trinity, 2000), 113–129, in which she challenges the assumption that divorce was widespread and Jesus was trying to save Jewish women from their plight (115–120).

There is a conservative stance here, in which the material suggests that Jesus was far from jettisoning some assumptions about what was clean and unclean.

It is worth exploring other signs that in some ways Jesus embodied a conservative approach to biblical Law, at least as his starting point. These include the traditional names of members of Jesus' family, the wearing of tassels (Mark 6:56 Matt 9:20), and indications that Galilee was strongly Jewish and that the temple played an important symbolic role for the people.<sup>61</sup> There are signs of a conservative approach in anecdotes about Jesus and Gentiles. In Q's report of the healing of the centurion's servant (Luke 7:1–10; Matt 8:5–13), the centurion's response assumes unworthiness as a Gentile that Jesus should enter his house. Jesus appears to agree, and heals his servant from a distance, perhaps having elicited that response with a question: "Am I to come and heal him?"<sup>62</sup> Luke's Peter shares similar assumptions in Acts 10:28.<sup>63</sup> Mark also records a healing from a distance—again of the child of a Gentile (7:24–30). Also striking is Jesus' first response to the woman, which speaks of Jews as children and Gentiles as dogs.<sup>64</sup> The point is not that dogs are cute, but that dogs are unworthy. Mark employed the story to herald its outcome, not to support Jesus' response. It is difficult to imagine that Christians would have invented such a response and attributed it to Jesus, but perhaps the will to invent a contrast failed to see the possible negative implications.

John suggests that contact with Gentiles came through a special initiative of Philip, as though to this point in the Johannine story no such encounter had taken place (12:20–22). Contact between Jesus and Gentiles are few, apart from the encounters which Mark locates in Gentile territory.<sup>65</sup> Matthew has Jesus declare outright that his mission is

---

<sup>61</sup> So Jonathan L. Reed, Archaeology and the Galilean Jesus: A re-examination of the Evidence (Harrisburg: Trinity, 2002), who draws attention to the presence of stone vessels; miqwaoth; burial practices; no pork bones (43–52). See also Sean Freyne, "Archaeology and the historical Jesus," in Archaeology and Biblical Interpretation, ed. John R. Bartlett (London: Routledge, 1997), 117–144, at 132–138; Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 293–302; Kazen, Jesus, 285–292.

<sup>62</sup> So U. Wegner, Der Hauptmann von Kafarnaum (Mt 7,28a; 8,5–10.13 par Lk 7,1–10): Ein Beitrag zur Q-Forschung, WUNT 2.14 (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr [Paul Siebeck], 1985) 375–380.

<sup>63</sup> Tomson, "Purity Laws," 83–84, draws attention to the differing rabbinic views on Gentiles, including their homes. See m. 'Ohal. 18:7–10; and t. Ahil. 18:6–12.

<sup>64</sup> See William Loader, "Challenged at the Boundaries: A Conservative Jesus in Mark's Tradition," JSNT 63 (1996): 45–61, at 45–51.

<sup>65</sup> So Kazen, Jesus, 23; cf. Holmén, Jesus, 233–236, 250–251.

not to Gentiles, nor is that of his disciples before Easter (15:24; 10:5–6) and Luke assumes the same, probably for this reason withdrawing from the centurion at the cross what in Mark is a confession of Gentile faith (23:47; cf. Mark 15:39). The parable of the mustard seed may allude to the traditional expectation that ultimately the Gentiles would gather in the shade of the kingdom or nest in its branches (Mark 4:30–32; Luke 13:18–19).

Jesus probably did see his mission as directed primarily to Israel. The mission to Gentiles appears in Matthew and Luke-Acts as a post-Easter phenomenon. In Matthew it comes as an instruction by the risen Jesus (28:16–20). It also explains why the issue of circumcision appears on the scene as something new about which no instruction from Jesus existed.<sup>66</sup>

Some hesitation, based on understandings of the boundaries between clean and unclean, may also be evident in Mark's story of Jesus' encounter with a leper (1:40–45). The sternness with which he instructs the man to follow the prescriptions of the Mosaic Law, may reflect that he sees him as having flouted the Law by his approach (according to D, evoking anger).<sup>67</sup> Perhaps a similar reaction lies behind Jesus' reaction to the woman who deliberately touched him in a state of uncleanness (5:25–34).<sup>68</sup>

For Mark, the distinctions between clean and unclean have no validity. This is also true in the preceding story of the exorcism of the Gerasene demoniac (5:1–20). Nevertheless behind both sets of stories in Mark 5 are traditions in which such distinctions did once play a role. In the latter the motifs of the cemetery, the pigs, the legion, the sea, the Gentile territory and the demon-possessed man would have made the story a celebration of Jesus' victory over the unclean world of the Gentiles. Similarly the stories of the twelve-year-old girl, whose corpse Jesus touches, and the woman for twelve years suffering bleeding which rendered her unclean, would have been told as celebrations of restoration and resurrection. They still are that, although for Mark (as for Luke in the raising of the widow's son, 7:11–16) those aspects related to uncleanness no longer have valency, and he now used the stories as part of his panel depicting salvation for Gentiles and for Israel.

<sup>66</sup> Cf. Gos. Thom. 53 where Jesus addresses circumcision. Gos. Thom. 14 also appears to reflect Gentile mission. So Nordsieck, Thomas-Evangelium, 47–50, 75, 213–216.

<sup>67</sup> As original: Kazen, Jesus, 103, but comments, "The question of purity is not even implicit in the present form of the story" (120). But see Loader, "Boundaries," 51–58.

<sup>68</sup> See Loader, "Boundaries," 58–60, but cf. Kazen, Jesus, who notes that Mark's notion of power transmitted by such touching has no parallel in Hellenistic miracle stories (134).

The question is often raised whether Jesus himself flouted the Law in the context of his healing ministry. He touched a leper,<sup>69</sup> touched corpses,<sup>70</sup> and was touched by a woman who would have been unclean.<sup>71</sup> He spent some time in Gentile territory according to Mark. In daily life becoming unclean happened naturally from time to time. Men had nocturnal emissions. Women menstruated and gave birth. People died and those around them were rendered unclean for a time. People travelled to Gentile lands and returned. This has nothing to do with sin, let alone flouting the Law. There was debate about whether one should avoid contracting impurity. Generally, one should, especially if contracting uncleanness prevented one from fulfilling other duties, such as in the case of priests. In healing, Jesus touched people who were unclean. If anything, the debate might be whether becoming unclean in order to effect healing was a higher priority than avoiding uncleanness. The Good Samaritan makes the point.<sup>72</sup>

None of the extant material suggests that Jesus' healing acts raised such an issue, as for instance, his healing on the Sabbath apparently did. This is probably because it was not seen as an issue by the writers. It was certainly not disregard for the Law. The further question is whether Jesus would have observed the usual rites of purification when he was thus rendered unclean. Some suggest his power reversed the flow of contamination, so that neither he nor others would have seen his actions as making him susceptible to uncleanness.<sup>73</sup> This is possible,

---

<sup>69</sup> "Objectionable, even if the impurity incurred was a 'light' one, and could be dealt with my immersion": Kazen, Jesus, 118.

<sup>70</sup> Kazen, Jesus, notes that, assuming Palestinian tradition behind the raising of both the widow's son and the girl and of the response to John the Baptist, we can expect people to have sensed the corpse impurity issue (164–177).

<sup>71</sup> Kazen, Jesus, warns against the assumption that being touched indicated anything like a will to abrogate Torah (139).

<sup>72</sup> So Kazen, Jesus, comments that while it does address purity concerns, it cannot serve as proof that Jesus disregarded purity laws, nor is its stance unique in the Judaism of the time, but its values are controversial (189–196). See also Bryan, Jesus, who links attitudes to Samaritans with land purity (172–177). Love for neighbour overrides the purity issues (177), reflecting prophetic precedents (186).

<sup>73</sup> Klaus Berger, "Jesus als Pharisäer und frühe Christen als Pharisäer," NovT 30 (1988): 231–262 (246–247); Bruce Chilton, "An Exorcism of History: Mark 1:21–28," in Authenticating the Activities of Jesus, ed. idem and Craig A. Evans, NCTS 28.2, (Leiden: Brill, 1999), 215–245, at 234; Theissen and Merz, Jesus, 211; Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 603; "Jesus and Purity," 461; with caution: Kazen, Jesus, 300–339. Bockmuehl, Jewish Law, refers to transfer of purity reflected in Exod 29:37 and 1QapGen XX, 28–29 (exorcism).

particularly if clean and unclean is set within the context of demonology so that Jesus would have understood himself as acting with the Holy Spirit against unclean spirits.<sup>74</sup> On the other hand, had he contracted uncleanness—and he surely must have done in some ways apart from such encounters—would he have observed the usual purification rites? Here we must interpret the silence.<sup>75</sup> Either he did not and few objected, perhaps because most people gave little attention to such things in his context,<sup>76</sup> or he did and so gave no grounds for offence, assuming people in his context would have cared.<sup>77</sup> We know some cared, especially those who otherwise criticised him; so not to have observed the usual requirements would surely become known to them and become grounds for criticism,<sup>78</sup> even more so if the majority cared.<sup>79</sup>

Where we do find controversy about purification rites, it relates in each case not to observance of Torah, but to additional requirements which some espoused and with whom Jesus disagreed. This is the case with the washing of hands in Mark 7:1–5 and with the immersion before a meal in Luke 11:37. On the other hand, it seems likely that Jesus and his disciples will have immersed themselves before the Passover.<sup>80</sup>

<sup>74</sup> So Kazen, Jesus, 300–339; “...not the inherent holiness of his own person, but the power of the coming reign of God, which Jesus believed overpowered demons and impurities” (346). Bryan, Jesus, “This suggests that for Jesus the lines that divide pure from impure are indistinguishable from the lines that separate good and evil, the kingdom of God and the kingdom of Satan. And these lines cut through Israel” (16).

<sup>75</sup> On the ambiguity of the silence see Holmén, Jesus, who suggests it stems from Jesus’ indifference (236).

<sup>76</sup> Cf. John Dominic Crossan and Jonathan L Reed, Excavating Jesus: Beneath the Stones, Behind the Texts: Key Discoveries for Understanding Jesus in his World (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 2002): Jesus “observed exactly the same rules about food purity as did other Galilean peasants of his time and place” (132). Kazen, Jesus, rejects the assumption that most did not care (272–273), pointing to indications from archaeology noted above and conservatism reflected in matters like different weights, marriage laws, attitudes to work on holy days, loyalty to Jerusalem (281–284) and suggesting rural Galilee had characteristics of the little tradition and was open to Jesus because of his pragmatism and sense of loyalty to ancestral traditions (290–292). For Jesus, contagion was not menacing enough to warrant attention (338). Holmén, Jesus, suggests disinterest, although otherwise “Jesus would normally have observed the purity laws” (236).

<sup>77</sup> So Fredriksen, Jesus of Nazareth, 199–207. She cites 1:40–44 as evidence because it was an elaborate ritual (203–204) and points to Matt 5:23–24 and Jesus’ participation in pilgrimage festivals. See also Dunn, “Jesus and Purity,” who argues that as a devout Jew in Jewish Galilee Jesus would have observed purity laws (450–456). Cf. Kazen, Jesus, 181.

<sup>78</sup> Kazen, Jesus, assumes he did not purify himself and that this was “understood as seemingly indifferent” (198).

<sup>79</sup> As Kazen, Jesus, 272–273, supposes.

<sup>80</sup> The practice of immersion and thereafter only foot-washing is reflected in John 13:10 (see also 11:55). Kazen, Jesus, 255. On P. Oxy 840 which Theissen and Merz, Jesus, Generally, Jesus does not appear to have espoused the elaborations of washing rites. In Matt 23:25–26 and Luke 11:39–40 he confronts the neglect of inner purity and compassion among those who focus on external rites of purification, which he does not, however, disparage.<sup>81</sup> Some of his sayings reflect assumptions about purity, for instance grave impurity (Luke 11:44),<sup>82</sup> just as does the burial of Jesus outside the city walls. His apparent avoidance of Tiberias and Sepphoris may indicate impurity issues, particularly in relation to the former built on a cemetery, but more likely reflects pragmatic concerns.<sup>83</sup> In the same context Jesus attacks interpreters of the Law who impose heavy burdens on people by their interpretations (Matt 23:4; Luke 11:45–46) and associates them with previous generations who rejected prophets and teachers (Matt 23:29–36, 37–39; Luke 11:47–52; 13:34–35). Mark also portrays Jesus as attacking hypocrisy and grandstanding (12:38–40). None of this suggests lack of respect for Torah; on the contrary.

If we must interpret the silence in dealing with Jesus' possible contraction of impurity during healing, we face something similar with regard to some other aspects of Jesus' mission. These include his summoning disciples to leave their families and possessions to follow him (Mark 1:16–20; 10:29–30; Luke 14:25–26). This surely stands in tension with the importance of the family in biblical law and with the promise of the land, where possessions meant land. Nowhere, however, do we find the radical call to discipleship cited against Jesus as a breach of Torah. This is probably because people were aware of comparable movements in their own time and of similar prophetic movements in the biblical tradition.

Some of Jesus' most shocking sayings belong in this context, such as the challenge to hate parents, but most notably, the challenge to one would-be follower to abandon the burial of his father: "Let the dead bury the dead!" (Matt 8:22; Luke 9:60). In a cluster of three sayings which show Jesus going one degree stricter than Elijah with Elisha, the demand is radical and immediate (Luke 9:57–62). Burial of the dead take as evidence Jesus did not immerse (380–383), see Kazen, Jesus, who concludes that it is "not . . . an historical report" (260), but a memory of conscious negligence of certain required purification rituals, yet claims "it is likely that Jesus purified himself, like most other people, at large festivals" (250).

---

<sup>81</sup> Tomson, "Purity Laws," 86–87; Kazen, Jesus, 229. See also Gos. Thom. 89. Sayings such as 39 about abusing the keys of knowledge, 52 about appeals to the prophets, 43 and 45 about trees and fruit may reflect Jesus' attacks on abuses.

<sup>82</sup> Kazen, Jesus, 177–181.

<sup>83</sup> Kazen, Jesus, 180; they represented alien values 289, 292; similarly Holmén, Jesus, 237.

was a fundamental obligation. Yet nothing in the context suggests that with this demand Jesus set himself against Torah. We should probably see his demand as tolerable within Jewish tradition of the time as a charismatic exception, such as might be expected when God called people to special tasks. It should not therefore be taken as evidence of disregard of Torah.<sup>84</sup>

When asked about inheriting eternal life, Jesus' response, according to Mark 10:17–22, is not to point away from the Law, but to point to it. Unlike Paul, with whom Mark shares much in common, Mark sees observing the Law as the way to eternal life. But, as in Paul, Mark is happy to affirm the commandments of the Decalogue, particularly those concerned with ethical behaviour, but regard others as invalid. While Paul argues that he upholds the Law (minus all but mostly the ethical commandments) and sees it as more than fulfilled, but indirectly, when Christians bear the fruit of the Spirit in their lives (Rom 8:1–4; Gal 5:13–25), Mark has Jesus require obedience to these commandments in a radical manner which should not pose a problem if that entailed for someone selling his goods and giving to the poor (10:17–21). That dimension was lacking in the rich man. Following Jesus is not an alternative to keeping these commandments, but a matter of joining oneself to the one who radically interprets them.

Similarly, Mark portrays Jesus as affirming that God's greatest demand is the twofold commandment to love God and neighbour (12:28–34). In the Markan context, both stories will assume that in this some commandments are affirmed, while others do not apply. The scribe who answers Jesus by identifying the priority of the twofold command of love over sacrifices stands in an established biblical tradition and more likely reflects the way in which both stories will have been understood at an earlier stage of the tradition and, if historical, in the context of the ministry of Jesus. This assumes a hierarchy of values which coheres with sayings and stories of Jesus elsewhere, which assume compassion for the poor is a divine priority, so that to love God means to engage in such compassion. Matt 23:23 and Luke 11:42 similarly emphasise justice and mercy and faith (Matt) or “the love of God” (Luke), while espousing tithing beyond what biblical law demands.<sup>85</sup>

---

<sup>84</sup> So Bockmuehl, Jewish Law, 47: "The notion of a special religious duty transcending even basic family obligations is one that would have been culturally familiar to Jesus' audience." Cf. Sanders, Jesus within Judaism, 653–655; Holmén, Jesus, 330. See also Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 504, 581 citing Kenneth Bailey, Poet and Peasant: A Literary-Cultural Approach to the Parables of Luke (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1976), 26–27, to the effect that the saying is a known idiom about remaining at home to care for parents. But known and used in the first century?

In themselves, the two greatest commandments need not lead to this conclusion. One might argue that love for God demands meticulous attention equally to all commandments, a stance espoused, for instance, in the sectarian documents found among the Dead Sea Scrolls, and love for neighbour includes similar conscientiousness in relation to all relevant provisions, both in purity and in ethics. Such a saying as, “The Sabbath was made for people, not people for the Sabbath” would make little sense to people adopting this approach, and still does not. Surely God’s command is God’s command. This does not appear to have been the approach of the historical Jesus, but the difference is not whether or not to set Torah aside, but how to understand and interpret it.

Our survey suggests that there appears to have been nothing in Jesus’ reported approach to the Law which would warrant the conclusion that Jesus set aside Torah or even set aside parts of Torah. Controversies concern different ways of interpreting Torah, different priorities. If Jesus had abandoned Torah or set parts of it aside or in other ways breached it a major way, we might expect to have some indication of this in the accounts of his trial and execution. This is not the case,<sup>86</sup> but with two exceptions: the charges of speaking against the temple and of blasphemy.

Mark presents false witnesses as claiming that Jesus would destroy the temple and build another in three days (14:56–58). The falsity for Mark lies in the allegation that Jesus would be the destroyer. Matthew rewrites the scene so that two (and now therefore reliable) witnesses attest to Jesus’ claim that he could destroy the temple. (26:60–61). Luke transfers Mark’s false allegation to the conflicts with Stephen (Acts 6:13–14). John has a version of the saying which attributes the destruction to the Jews themselves (2:18–22). In none of these variants need we conclude that Jesus rejected the biblical foundation of the temple. His action in the temple and his threat and prediction of God’s judgement, while not anti-temple and certainly not anti-Torah, would certainly have riled temple authorities and touched Rome’s interests.

---

<sup>85</sup> Kazen, Jesus, 231; but most see 23:23c as not original. See the discussion in Holmén, Jesus, 114–115. On Luke 18:9–14, he observes that the point is not the Pharisee’s pride or hypocrisy, but his lack of something the toll collector has found (122–126). He suggests Jesus was indifferent to tithing (126).

<sup>86</sup> Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 784–786; cf. Becker, Jesus, 335; Ferdinand Hahn, Theologie des Neuen Testament, 2 vols (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2002), 1:119.

The charge of blasphemy is more complex. In Mark's trial scene, the Council gives it credence. Such charges were being levelled at Christians in Mark's time and before because of what Christians were claiming about Jesus. The same is true of John's Gospel, where we see some of the arguments to undermine allegations of ditheism (5:17–20; 10:30–38). Nevertheless the presence of royal messianic motifs in the early form of the passion narrative and the centrality of the messianic status of Jesus from early on in the Christian movement times make it probable that at least Jesus' relationship to messianic claims was an issue in his trial and execution.<sup>87</sup>

More difficult to determine, however, is whether Jesus committed blasphemy and how. To claim to be the Messiah or to have this claimed about oneself is not blasphemous. Suggestions of what was blasphemous in Mark range from agreeing to the claim of divine sonship in a literal sense to speaking of oneself as the Ancient of Days.<sup>88</sup> For our study, the charge of blasphemy would have to be deemed valid and Jesus, therefore, to have contravened Torah or ignored it, for it to have relevance. The gospels imply the charge is without ground.

In John's Gospel the grounds for the charge of blasphemy are clearer, namely, the implied claim that God is Jesus' father and that he is equal or one with God in a literal sense (5:18; 10:33; 19:7). There, too, the charges are to be rejected according to the author as based on misunderstanding, even though in John Jesus is pictured as one with God after a model of Christology rooted in wisdom speculation. In John Jesus assumes the divine epithets predicated of Torah as God's Wisdom and so is Word, bread, light and life and much else. He alone, not Torah, is the true bread and the true vine. With such developments, John takes us beyond what might be claimed as assertions of the historical Jesus.

Mark also reports charges that Jesus performed exorcisms with the aid of Beelzebul. (3:22–27). Similar accusations are preserved in so-called Q material, both in connection with Beelzebul (Matt 9:32–34; 12:27; Luke 11:14–15, 18–19) and in general where Jesus reflects on responses to John the Baptist and to himself as a recalcitrant son (Matt 11:16–19; Luke 7:31–35). The gospels depicts these as false accusations. The charge that Jesus was a charlatan and false prophet appears in later rabbinic tradition. Such accusations may derive ultimately from actual controversy surrounding the historical Jesus, but at most we can say that these were interpretations of Jesus' words and deeds. Nothing suggests he would have acknowledged such claims as true and so set himself deliberately against the Law.

<sup>87</sup> "Had no messianism been present in the pre-Easter ministry, then the resurrection would not have generated it"; Evans, "New Quest," 183 n. 41.

<sup>88</sup> See the most recent discussion in Dunn, Jesus Remembered, who thinks it possibly reflects a cynical misuse of speculation about two powers in heaven (751–752).

Conclusion

The evidence surveyed does not present a picture of Jesus setting out to dismiss Torah.<sup>89</sup> But nor does it present a picture of Jesus as primarily an interpreter of the laws of Torah. Most conflicts on points of Torah observance occur either incidentally, indeed, as interruptions and distractions or when others raise questions of interpretation with him. Jesus' focus appears to have lain elsewhere, namely in the proclamation of the kingdom and in living out its vision in the present.<sup>90</sup> If we confine attitudes to Torah in terms of seeking prescriptions for behaviour or marking out covenant identity, we may conclude that Jesus shows little interest.<sup>91</sup>

If, however, we understand attitudes towards Torah with its broader sense of telling the story and ways of the covenant, then the question is whether Jesus' mission belongs within this perspective or is something outside it. Seen in this perspective, Jesus' words and deeds appear to cohere well with a stance deeply rooted in Torah, even at times quite conservatively, and focused on future hope and with an emphasis which justified response to human need as something which might override other requirements of Torah and was bound to bring him into conflict

---

<sup>89</sup> This is notably the conclusion of most Jewish scholars in recent times. See Geza Vermes, The Religion of Jesus the Jew (London: SCM, 1993), 21–26, though lax towards purity; idem, Jesus the Jew: A Historian's Reading of the Gospels (London: Collins, 1973) 81; David Flusser, Jewish Sources in Early Christianity (New York: Adama, 1987), though differing over minutiae (22); Fredriksen, Jesus of Nazareth, 197–207; see also Beatrice Bruteau, ed., Jesus through Jewish Eyes: Rabbis and Scholars Engage an Ancient Brother in a New Conversation (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 2003).

<sup>90</sup> Broer, "Jesus und die Tora," 252.

<sup>91</sup> This is amply demonstrated by Holmén, Jesus. He concludes that Jesus had an attitude based on a new covenant (336) and that therefore observance of laws was irrelevant. "Jesus was apparently, as it seemed, not even proposing to live according to the covenant, he was not even trying to be loyal to it" (340). One could counter that he did interpret the covenant, but in a different way in the light of prophetic hope and that it gave him a set of priorities which sometimes meant he would override one part of the Law with another. Such covenant concerns are reflected in Jesus' restoration eschatology and its imagery. His last sentence, "It is likely that he—in resemblance of many contemporary figures—even saw his Judaism as the true Judaism" (343) somewhat undermines his claim about everyone else being path searchers and markers.

with those who construed the priorities differently. These include the expansionist movements of his time.<sup>92</sup> Such an emphasis, which at times sat lightly to laws which others revered, is not to be confused with blatant disregard or indifference.<sup>93</sup> Nor should it be seen as an eschatological replacement of Torah,<sup>94</sup> let alone a new Torah. It seems also unlikely to be the fruit of a pessimism one might attribute to John the Baptist according to which pollution is so total that only total repentance now matters and nothing else,<sup>95</sup> because too much of the rest (namely respect for Torah) survives.<sup>96</sup> If anything, it comes close to being the reverse: only total acceptance of the new invitation to belong matters, but this is not so radical that it ignores detailed requirements of Torah. Some, it makes more stringent. The invitation is not to a new Torah, let alone a new religion, nor to an interim ethic,<sup>97</sup> but to respond to what God requires in the present and promises in the immediate future. That sense of continuity between present and future is rooted in faith in the God of Israel and generated by Torah understood as a story of hope, which is about to be realised.

It is informed, however, by a particular understanding of God and of prophetic theology<sup>98</sup> which placed a vision of well being charac-

<sup>92</sup> Kazen, Jesus, 197.

<sup>93</sup> Kazen, Jesus, "Jesus' attitude was apparently understood as seemingly indifferent in his contemporary context" (198), but this is not same as saying it was, although he argues that Jesus "carried relativization to the point of neglect" (261).

<sup>94</sup> Wright, Jesus, 434–435; Hahn, Theologie, 1:97, claiming that Jer 31 implies a time when people no longer need Torah and some parts become superfluous (101). "Insgesamt wird damit die Tora nicht aufgehoben, aber sie wird durch die anbrechende eschatologische Wirklichkeit tiefgreifend modifiziert" (102).

<sup>95</sup> Cf. Becker, Jesus, who speaks of the "Nullpunktsituation" (50, 51). Interpreting John's rhetoric exclusively (and thus not doing justice to its prophetic heritage) he asserts covenant blessings are now invalid (91–92). The kingdom overrules Torah, which ceased to be the final authority (279; 353–354). The attractiveness of the thesis is that it would enable one to explain why minor purity laws become irrelevant given the total purity failure. Similarly Bryan, Jesus, 164, 186–168.

<sup>96</sup> Bryan, Jesus, draws attention to strands of prophetic thought which saw an end-time purity in which gradations would be irrelevant, reflected in Zech 14:20–21 and Isa 66:20–21; similarly Jub. 4.26; 1 Enoch 10.22 (153–156). "In this tradition, the anticipation is that 'the Lord will become king over all the earth' (Zech 14.9)." Similarly Scot McKnight, "A parting within the way: Jesus and James on Israel and purity," in Bruce Chilton and Craig A. Evans, eds., James the Just and Christian origins, SuppNovT 98 (Leiden: Brill, 1999), 83–129, at 87–88, speculating that people became pure by joining the movement set in motion by John and joining in commensality (90–92), following Bruce Chilton, The Temple of Jesus. His Sacrificial Program within a Cultural History of Sacrifice, (University Park The Pennsylvania State University Press 1993). The problem is lack of evidence in the tradition reflecting such a central concern with purity of this kind.

<sup>97</sup> Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 583.

<sup>98</sup> Wilckens, Theologie, 1.1:297–302.

terised by peace and justice at its centre and offers this as a hope for all, which later would find resonance beyond his own culture in the Hellenistic Roman world from which then parallels are easily drawn. This understanding appears to have provided the hermeneutical key for interpreting Torah in daily life. The radical inclusivity of this vision, at least within Israel, finds its closest parallel in John's negative inclusion of all under condemnation and one might speculate about the shift to Jesus' positive inclusivity. Both, however, offer hope to all and threaten judgement, the difference appearing to have more to do with the claim of beginning realisation in positive ways in the present. Claims issuing from such convictions that the impending kingdom warranted overriding some requirements of Torah would have been seen by insiders as coherent with Torah's promise but by outsiders as arrogant disregard. But we know almost nothing of the latter.

Controversies preserved in the tradition focus less on overriding aspects of Torah in the interests of particular eschatological demands, such as calls to discipleship (we are still guessing about Matt 8:22), and more on unwillingness to engage in more careful observance (independent of issues of human need) or on responses to human need which reflect a distinctive weighting of human well being (and sometimes strange perceptions of human well being, such as indissoluble marriage, refusal of remarriage, including concern with impurities) over against other requirements which may be overridden. In the case of the former (probably originally behind both Mark 2:23–28 and 7:1–23) this indicated a refusal to engage in strategies of extra caution. In the case of the latter (probably commensality and Mark 3:1–6 and 2:23–28 in its present form) these values are defended as God's values, as Torah values. Like any hermeneutic they are values in the eye of the beholder, but they reflect a choice within the Law and Prophets about what matters most and are therefore inevitably controversial.

Because that vision was the realisation of what was seen as God's will expressed in the Law and the Prophets, it was not seen as a new order; nor, therefore, were expositions of Torah always expressed in terms of future eschatology. But they reflected the value system which informed the vision.<sup>99</sup> The focus was not a new covenant to replace the old, but if anything, a renewed covenant, understood in the light of what Jesus apparently envisaged as the outcome when what God has always wanted would become real by divine intervention. Thus it comes to expression in familiar images, many of which reflect distinctive traits of Israel, including notions of the twelve tribes and of the gathering of Israel. It cannot be reduced either to a social political programme, Cynic-like or otherwise, or to an apolitical individualism concerned primarily with individual atonement, or to the teachings of a charismatic sage, without ignoring much of the early tradition.

---

<sup>99</sup> Dunn, Jesus Remembered, speaks of "a quality of kingdom life, the character of living appropriate for those who look for the kingdom's coming and who seek to live already in its light" (583). Similarly Kazen, Jesus, 347.

The radical generosity which extended this invitation to all without precondition set directions which would enable some to argue that in new contexts some laws of Torah itself should be permanently overridden and set aside, a stance not yet evident in what appears to derive from the historical Jesus nor required by it. This goes a long way to explaining how subsequently the followers of Jesus applied his Torah hermeneutic differently, some insisting on retaining observance of Torah in its entirety<sup>100</sup> and others insisting that some parts should be permanently overridden, and still others that the core values embodied now in central claims about Jesus effectively made those aspects of Torah which remained valid little more than confirmation of the outcomes expected of those living by these claims and the Spirit of Christ to which they bore witness.

---

<sup>100</sup> So McKnight, "A parting within the way," who claims James is hardly likely to have differed in major ways from Jesus at least at the beginning (98–125).

JESUS AND THE HOLY LAND

KAREN J. WENELL

A good starting point for a discussion of “Jesus and the Holy Land” is to open up what is meant by “the Holy Land.” If the two elements are separated, this actually highlights important contours of the matter at hand. The characteristic of holiness suggests that we are talking about the realm of the sacred and of religious belief; “the land” indicates that we are dealing with holiness that is contained within a particular location, not a temple or shrine, but an entire territory. Of course, moving beyond this general level of description, the idea of the land was highly evocative and indeed central to ancient Jewish understandings of sacred place. The foundational narratives could be articulated and defined in different ways in different periods of history, and therefore we must try to discern what this triad—God-people-land—meant in particular social and political contexts. Just as the genres and contexts of different biblical books vary, so does their understanding of the relationship between God-people-land. Norman Habel, for instance, identifies and works out the different textual connections and implications for six distinct biblical land ideologies, and yet these do not exhaust what may be said about the land. We are not looking for a single “Jewish view” of land. Habel states:

[T]here is no monolithic concept of land in the Hebrew Scriptures. There is, rather, a spectrum of land ideologies with diverse images and doctrines of land. These ideologies, moreover, are promoted by particular social groups with vested interests in promoting a given ideology to gain, regain, or maintain land.<sup>1</sup>

In order to approach what Jesus may have thought about the land, it will be important to pay careful attention to the social situation and particular interests of Jesus and his group, to see how these might relate to the issue of the land. With this in mind, we will proceed by first outlining some of the defining aspects of the land in the Old

---

<sup>1</sup> N. C. Habel, The Land is Mine: Six Biblical Land Ideologies, OBT (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1995), 148.

Testament and then consider how the symbolic resources we find in these texts are taken up and interpreted anew in Jewish writings of the Second Temple period. This will begin to give us an idea of the diverse ways that texts relating to the land were interpreted closer to the time of Jesus. Taking a “continuum approach” to the historical Jesus,<sup>2</sup> it will then be appropriate to turn to how the land promise is interpreted within emerging Christian beliefs, finally considering Jesus’ specific context in Galilee in the land to try to answer the question of what Jesus himself might have made of the relationship between God-people-land. The difficulty here (and with the rest of the New Testament) is that there are few explicit sayings in the Jesus tradition relating to the land as the holy land promised to Abraham. As we shall see, however, there are important elements of Jesus’ message, most particularly his calling of the group of the Twelve, which point to allusions to the promise of the land in the teachings of Jesus about the kingdom.

1. Old Testament and Early Jewish Views of the Land

It is impossible to highlight all of the land-related trajectories which run through the text of the Hebrew Bible. As Davies notes, here is an “embarrassment” of material in comparison to what we find in the New Testament.<sup>3</sup> Yet within this vast amount of material it is possible to identify certain principles, or models, for understanding the land. As space does not allow for a full discussion of the meanings of the land in the Old Testament, we will first outline a key model in the foundational narratives of the Pentateuch and Joshua. This model, though adapted and modified in other contexts, is an important starting place for understanding the land, because it represents an ideal formation of Israel as both land and people. We will then highlight some of the ideologies of land in the prophetic literature and royal narratives, since these will have particular relevance to the discussion of Jesus in relationship to the land and the kingdom.

---

<sup>2</sup> T. Holmén, ed., Jesus from Judaism to Christianity: Continuum Approaches to the Historical Jesus, LNTS 352 (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 2007).

<sup>3</sup> W. D. Davies, The Gospel and the Land: Early Christianity and Jewish Territorial Doctrine, The Biblical Seminar 25 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1994), 396.

1.1. Modelling the Land in the Pentateuch and Joshua

The beginnings of the promise of the land originate between God and Abraham (then Abram) in the simple statement: “To your offspring I will give this land” (Gen 12:7). Land is then part of the continuing story of the foundational patriarchal narratives and the covenant between Abraham and Yahweh, establishing a relationship between God, his people (the descendants of Abraham), and the land given to them by God. The covenant is set out in Genesis 15:

On that day the Lord made a covenant with Abram, saying, “To your descendants I will give this land, from the river of Egypt to the great river, the river Euphrates, the land of the Kenites, the Kenizzites, the Kadmonites, the Hittites, the Perizzites, the Rephaim, the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Girgashites, and the Jebusites.” (15:18–21)

Here both land and people are in view: the land is given boundaries in terms of peoples and the two rivers; Abraham’s descendants are identified as the people to whom God will give the land as promised by covenant. Within the Pentateuch (primarily in Exodus, Leviticus and Numbers), a model of the covenantal relationship emerges in the descriptions of the camp in the wilderness as the Israelite nation moves towards a permanent, fixed relationship to the land in Joshua. Seth Kunin describes this period of movement and wandering prior to entry in the land as setting out “biblical dynamic sacred space” which is ideal and not tied to any particular location.<sup>4</sup> The description of the camp and tabernacle in the wilderness and the laws that pertain to the camp provide an ideal model for the relationship between God-people-land. It is defined by different levels of opposition encountered in the model. In order to concentrate on the category of the land rather than on the distinctions between Levites, priests and the high priests (connected with the spaces of the tabernacle court, the holy place and the holy of holies, respectively), the relationship may be represented in terms of circles set in opposition to each other without the further distinctions depicted (which would be set within the category of “Israel”).

---

<sup>4</sup> S. D. Kunin, God’s Place in the World: Sacred Space and Sacred Place in Judaism, Cassell Religious Studies (London: Cassell, 1998), 11–23.

Figure 1: Seth Kunin's segmentary model of sacred space showing the widest level of opposition between Israel (land and people) and the nations (land and peoples).<sup>5</sup>

This segmentary model is a corrective to the concentric model of Israel's holy places where Israel (land and people) is understood to be holy in comparison with the nations, with the Levites, priests and high priests (with attendant spaces) placed in circles showing increasing degrees of holiness moving toward the centre. There are several advantages to the segmentary model in comparison to the concentric model, which is only able to show gradations of holiness. The segmentary model shows categories of equal cultural value (i.e., "Israel" and the "nations" are at the same level, whereas the high priest would not be set in opposition to the nations; rather, the high priest is included in the wider category of "Israel") and also shows the separation between Israel and the nations which is emphasised in the text. A text like Leviticus 18:24–30 clearly indicates a distinction between Israel, who are to keep God's law, and the people who inhabited the land before them, who committed abominations; consequently the land "vomited out the nation that was before you" (18:28). This does not suggest that circles of relative purity extend out indefinitely, but that Israel is set apart as holy, distinct and separate from the nations.

---

<sup>5</sup> The full model, including Levites, priests and High Priest, is depicted in Kunin, God's Place, 15. See the wider discussion of the model in comparison with the concentric circles model on pp. 11–17.

Figure 2: The concentric model showing Israel (land and people) as more holy in comparison with the nations (land and peoples).<sup>6</sup>

Even if we make a distinction between ritual and moral impurity in relationship to these texts,<sup>7</sup> there remains a strong sense that there must in practice be a clearly identifiable difference between Israel and the nations. The boundaries of Israel are to be maintained through the obedience of the people to God's commands. They adhere to the 'thinking of the land' and the symbolic system of purity and difference outlined in biblical law. Even in situations where there is a degree of openness to foreigners, distinctions are still made.<sup>8</sup>

The non-fixed ideal of the model in the wilderness becomes permanently located in the land in the narrative of Joshua (though the temple is not fixed in Jerusalem until the reign of Solomon in 1 Kings).

---

<sup>6</sup> See P. P. Jenson, Graded Holiness: A Key to the Priestly Conception of the World, JSOTSup 106 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1992), as well as the text of M Kelim 1:6–9. In m.Kelim, ten degrees of holiness are distinguished from the holy of holies to the entire land of Israel. Still, as Francis Schmidt notes, "Each circle, from the most interior to the most exterior, is surrounded, speaking like the Ancients, by a 'hedge' of purity that regulates the passage from one to the other and guarantees the cohesion of the whole, that separates and protects." (243). A sense of distinction from the Gentiles is still very much in place. Schmidt continues, "They [the Gentiles] were outside the system; they remain there. But an impurity status is conferred on them. Not a de facto impurity, but a conventional one." (243)

<sup>7</sup> J. Klawans, Impurity and Sin in Ancient Judaism (New York: Oxford University Press, 2000).

<sup>8</sup> This borrows Francis Schmidt's phrase the "thinking of the temple," which refers to the purity system in relationship to the temple. F. Schmidt, How the Temple Thinks: Identity and Social Cohesion in Ancient Judaism, trans. J. E. Crowley, The Biblical Seminar 78 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001). In situations where foreigners were not excluded from either the political or the symbolic borders of the holy land, boundaries of separation could still be maintained through obedience to the law and ritual practice. See Schmidt, Temple Thinks, 239–244.

The wandering tribes now receive their inheritance in the twelve tribal territories:

These are the inheritances that the Israelites received in the land of Canaan, which the priest Eleazar, and Joshua son of Nun, and the heads of the families of the tribes of the Israelites distributed to them. Their inheritance was by lot, as the Lord had commanded Moses for the nine and one-half tribes. For Moses had given an inheritance to the two and one-half tribes beyond the Jordan; but to the Levites he gave no inheritance among them. For the people of Joseph were two tribes, Manasseh and Ephraim; and no portion was given to the Levites in the land, but only towns to live in, with their pasture lands for their flocks and herds. The Israelites did as the Lord commanded Moses; they allotted the land.<sup>9</sup>

This passage which I have quoted at length highlights the symbolism of the number twelve in the settlement of the tribes in the land. In the traditions about the twelve tribes, great care is taken to keep the number of tribes (people; represented by heads of tribes) and the number of territories (land; inherited portions) both at the symbolic number of twelve. This takes some amount of effort, as the Levites are one of the tribes, but receive no inheritance; rather than this reducing the number of territories to eleven, Joseph's tribe is split into two—Ephraim and Manasseh—to compensate (this does not then increase the number of tribes to thirteen). Further complicating matters, Manasseh is split into two territories on either side of the Jordan. In this case, rather than increasing the number of territories to thirteen, Manasseh is considered to be two half tribes. There is a clear interest in the texts to keep both the number of tribes and the number of territories within the land at the symbolic number of twelve.<sup>10</sup>

1.2. Prophetic Literature and Royal Ideology

Having set out the segmentary model of the land and the ideal covenantal relationship between God-people-land, it is important to emphasise that the boundaries established by defining Israel as separate from the nations are by no means strictly geographic, and indeed different definitions of the land are used in various interpretations and biblical boundary texts.<sup>11</sup> In the experiences of exile and dispersion, the boundaries of those who belong to Israel by descent and follow the law could be established in places outside of the physical territory of the land. Similarly, within the land, in the presence of foreigners and overlords, the distinguishing practices of Israel served to set them apart from 'the nations' who were present within the land. To suggest that the boundaries may be more cognitive than geographic does not diminish the importance of the land (and temple) within Jewish belief, for these places remain firmly part of a theological understanding of the world ordered by God and the symbolic system which included the "thinking of the land" and the "thinking of the temple." This may be illustrated by Ezekiel's exilic vision (40–48), entailing ideological maps of land, city and temple.<sup>12</sup> Elsewhere in prophetic literature, there are instances where the experience of exile and removal from the land prompts concern (Jer 24:5–9), yet images of a restoration to the land recall the past promises and look toward an ideal future within the land.<sup>13</sup> In Jeremiah's letter to the exiles (chapter 29), the Lord proclaims to the people, "I will restore your fortunes and gather you from all the nations and all the places where I have driven you, says the Lord, and I will bring you back to the place from which I sent you into exile" (29:14). In the following chapter, which articulates a new covenant, the word of the Lord to Jeremiah says, "I will bring them back to the land that I gave to their ancestors and they shall take possession of it" (30:3). This return in a Joshua-like manner will restore the covenanted relationship between God-people-land. The book of Amos also promises restoration through an agricultural image: a permanent planting of Israel in the land given to them by God. (9:14–15). It is also worth noting that the prophet Zechariah was the first to apply the term holy to the land, although holiness had long been associated with Israel's existence in the land and their obedience to the law within the boundaries of the land. Robert Wilken suggests that once the term "holy land" was introduced, it gained currency, "not as a replacement for the Land of

---

<sup>9</sup> Habel's analysis of the ideology of the land in Joshua considers that it "supports the rights of each tribe, ancestral family and ancestral household to its divinely approved lot in YHWH's land. The ancestral households, as the hope of Israel, are represented as having special responsibility and are given encouragement to pursue their rights in the land allotted to them": Habel, The Land is Mine, 71.

<sup>10</sup> Z. Kallai, "The Twelve-Tribe Systems of Israel," Vetus Testamentum 47 (1997): 53–90.

---

<sup>11</sup> See the very helpful discussion in P. S. Alexander, "Geography and the Bible (Early Jewish)," ABD 2:977–988.

<sup>12</sup> J. Z. Smith, To Take Place: Toward Theory in Ritual, CSHJ (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987), 47–73.

<sup>13</sup> Davies, Gospel and the Land, 38–39.

Israel but as a way of designating the character of the land and Israelite hopes for its future.”<sup>14</sup> The promise of the land in prophetic context could serve as a vibrant and hopeful symbol for the nation.

Prophetic voices in Hebrew scripture often speak out in opposition to a king. A prophetic ideology of the land is quite different from that encountered within in a royal ideology of the land.<sup>15</sup> Under monarchical rule, the land expands to become an empire. In Psalm 2, Yahweh is a monarch ruling from heaven and the king, his son, rules from Zion; the boundaries of dominion extend beyond Israel to the nations:

He who sits in the heavens laughs; the Lord has them in derision. Then he will speak to them in his wrath, and terrify them in his fury, saying, “I have set my king on Zion, my holy hill.” I will tell of the decree of the Lord: He said to me, “You are my son; today I have begotten you. Ask of me, and I will make the nations your heritage, and the ends of the earth your possession.”

Here, a royal perspective establishes quite a different relationship between God-people-land and places the king in the position of control over the land. Israel (land and people) are still the central focus, and distinct from the nations (land and people), but the image is of land as empire, extending from “sea to sea” (Psalm 72:8). Habel describes the role of the monarch within the royal ideology of land:

In the royal ideology, the monarch separates personal rights from those of the people and claims a discrete mandate to assume ownership of the earth. YHWH is sovereign in heaven, ruling the universe from a throne on high, rather than from a place among the people. The Davidic monarch is to rule below where the “kings of the earth” rage against YHWH and the anointed one (Ps 2:2). In this chosen capacity, the monarch is designated God’s son (2:7).<sup>16</sup>

Although the monarch is the focal point of this view in relationship to the land, the implications for ordinary Israelites are not ignored. In the story of Naboth’s vineyard (1 Kings 21), we can see the implications

---

<sup>14</sup> R. L. Wilken, The Land Called Holy: Palestine in Christian History and Thought (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1992), 18. Wilken also notes that 2 Maccabees is the first Jewish writing after Zechariah to use the term, and contains the first use in Greek (2 Macc 1:1–10): Wilken, Land Called Holy, 24–25.

<sup>15</sup> Habel, The Land is Mine, 17–35 (royal ideology); 75–96 (prophetic ideology of Jeremiah).

<sup>16</sup> Ibid., 25–26.

of the royal ideology for the rights of the poor, or ordinary, Israelite. Naboth rejects the king's claims to his ancestral land, appealing to a covenantal relationship and drawing a sharp contrast between two views of land.<sup>17</sup> Yahweh sides with Naboth in Elijah's rebuke of King Ahab, and Brueggemann notes that Micah 2:1–3, where those who seize fields and oppress "a man and his inheritance" are condemned, "could well be a commentary on the Naboth episode."<sup>18</sup> Yahweh sides with the poor against those who would attempt to take their inherited land from them.

1.3. The Land in Jewish Literature

In Jewish writings from the Second Temple period, there are fewer references to the land than in the Hebrew Bible.<sup>19</sup> Still, the land is often in view, and continues to form a significant part of hopes concerning the future of Israel.

The book of Tobit dates to the second or third century BCE. Copies of the writing in Hebrew and Aramaic are found at Qumran, indicating its continuing value, at least to the community. In this writing, a "Diaspora romance," Tobit advises his son Tobias to marry from among his own tribe and not among foreigners; Tobias is told:

Remember, my son, that Noah, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, our ancestors of old, all took wives from among their kindred. They were blessed in their children, and their posterity will inherit the land. (4:12)

Here, the covenantal relationships represented in Noah, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob are highlighted, as well as the promise of inheritance of the land. Tobit's final declarations before dying verify that though "all of our kindred, inhabitants of the land of Israel, will be scattered and taken as captives from the good land; and the whole land of Israel will be desolate," nevertheless "God will again have mercy on them, and will bring them back to the land of Israel" (14:4). The vision for the future focuses on the sacred places of land and temple. Even if "all the nations in the whole world will all be converted" (14:6), these places are in view:

---

<sup>17</sup> W. Brueggemann, The Land: Place as Gift, Promise and Challenge in Biblical Faith, OBT (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1977), 93–97.

<sup>18</sup> Brueggemann, The Land, 97.

<sup>19</sup> Davies, Gospel and the Land, 49.

All the Israelites who are saved in those days and are truly mindful of God will be gathered together; they will go to Jerusalem and live in safety forever in the land of Abraham, and it will be given over to them. (14:7)

The theme of gathering appears in other literature of this time, and issues relating to the land emerge. In texts such as Baruch 4:4 and 5:5 and Psalms of Solomon 11.2, Israel's children are gathered from east and west to the land, and in particular Jerusalem. As Dale Allison notes,

In Jewish tradition "east and west" first calls to mind not the Gentile world but the Jewish Diaspora. This is because, from a Palestinian perspective, Assyria and Babylon, where there was a concentration of exiled Jews, were to the east while Egypt, which was also a centre of the Diaspora, was in the other direction.<sup>20</sup>

Geography is important to such descriptions, as the gathering happens in relationship to the central places in Jewish conceptions of place—that is, it is to the land and Jerusalem. Related to these traditions are those which envision the return of the ten lost tribes of Israel. Here we have texts such as 11QT LVII, 5–6, 4 Ezra 13.32–50, 2 Baruch 78.1–7 and Sibylline Oracles 2.170–173, as well as various references in the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs. This suggests a return of these tribes to take their rightful places within the land.

However, while noting the importance of the land to these hopes for the future, we should also note how such texts can redraw the covenantal relationship to the land and actually de-emphasize its significance. Betsy Halpern-Amaru, in her study of Land and Covenant in Post-Biblical Jewish Literature, concludes that both eschatologically oriented texts (Jubilees and the Testament of Moses) and historically oriented texts (Pseudo-Philo and Josephus' Antiquities) develop other aspects of the covenantal relationship between God and his people and actually "deemphasise the theological significance of the Land."<sup>21</sup> The present realities for the authors, and specifically the current situation in the land of their time, necessitated a reinterpretation of the connections between God-people-land in terms of the law and eschatology.

<sup>20</sup> D. Allison, The Jesus Tradition in Q (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press, 1997), 180.

<sup>21</sup> B. Halpern-Amaru, Rewriting the Bible: Land and Covenant in Post-Biblical Jewish Literature (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1994), 116. See also her "Land Theology in Philo and Josephus," in The Land of Israel: Jewish Perspectives, ed. L. A. Hoffman (Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1986), 63–93.

Still, land does not disappear, and Halpern Amaru notes how Josephus, writing from Rome for Roman readers, would have very good reason to delete any role for the land from Israel's future expectations. However,

Even Josephus, whom we know would have cause for such a deletion [of the eschatological content of the land promise], includes the Land in the divine predictions he substitutes for the covenant structure and dangerously alludes to the Land functioning as a vibrant mother country in some future time.<sup>22</sup>

From the perspective of the book of Jubilees also, Israel will be located within the land at the end time. The purity of the land is highlighted, yet new beliefs regarding impure spirits play a role in the purity of the land in the future:

And Jubilees will pass until Israel is purified from all the sin of fornication, and defilement, and uncleanness, and sin and error. And they will dwell in confidence in the land. And then it will not have any Satan or any evil (one). And the land will be purified from that time and forever (Jub. 50.5).

Here, the conventional associations of keeping purity within the land are maintained, and new beliefs about purity from evil spirits are added to the “thinking of the land” in terms of purity and an ideal future in the land.<sup>23</sup> The ideal model of Israel (land and people), distinguished from the nations (land and people), has been expanded to take into account contemporary beliefs. There is even the suggestion in Jubilees that not all who are related to the category of Israel by descent will be included. Although land is not an unproblematic symbol, and meanings may shift with other covenantal aspects being emphasised more than the land, it still had a place in the orientation of such texts.

---

<sup>22</sup> Halpern-Amaru, Rewriting the Bible, 126–127.

<sup>23</sup> See J. K. Riches, Jesus and the Transformation of Judaism (London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1980), 112–128. See also his Conflicting Mythologies: Identity Formation in the Gospels of Mark and Matthew, Studies of the New Testament and Its World (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 2000), 58–59. On the land as a model of utopia, see J. J. Collins, “Models of Utopia in the Biblical Tradition,” in A Wise and Discerning Mind: Essays in Honor of Burke O. Long, ed. S. M. Olyan and R. Culley (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 2000), 51–67; and Mary Ann Beavis’ discussion and modification of Collins’ framework in Jesus and Utopia: Looking for the Kingdom of God in the Roman World (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 2006).

2. Perspectives on Land from the Early Church

Moving from this discussion of aspects of the land in Jewish tradition, it is appropriate to turn to the context of the early church and to investigate views of the land which may be detected there. Taking this “continuum approach” will allow us to place Jesus’ proclamation (and how it may incorporate beliefs about the land) at the center of a discussion of Jewish spatial models of the land and early Christian spatial interpretations.<sup>24</sup> When we move to consider the New Testament texts and early church writings, we have a smaller amount of material which treats the land promise as part of the covenantal relationship than we encountered in our discussion of Jewish literature. W. D. Davies described the task as one of assiduous combing through the New Testament in order to look for “stray indications at least of a direct involvement with the theme.”<sup>25</sup> He is correct to state that what emerges from the New Testament texts is not a clearly developed understanding of the relationship of the new community to the land, but rather allusions to the issue and an indirect treatment. Davies concludes his study of The Gospel and the Land by attempting to draw lines between Jesus, the early Church, and Judaism’s responses to expectations regarding the land in covenantal relationship:

Jesus, as far as we can gather, paid little attention to the relationship between Yahweh, and Israel and the land. But we have seen indications that the Early Church was so concerned. This concern was part of the matrix which led to that process, often treated, whereby Jesus was increasingly draped in an apocalyptic mantle and specifically Jewish expectations developed in the Church in a form highly enhanced from that which they had assumed in Jesus’ own teaching. Where were these expectations to be fulfilled? Judaism had given its answer in terms of the centrality of the land and the indestructible connection between it and Yahweh and Israel. The Church came both to reject and to transmute this answer in various ways. After struggles which we can now only glimpse with difficulty, she remained true to the intent of her Lord.

This fairly neatly connects Jesus to the expectations of the early Church and establishes a difference vis-à-vis Judaism. However, diversity exists among the beliefs relating to the land in the early period of the church, as we seen in the case of Judaism. Land was an important issue at this time, even if direct references to the promise of the land had the potential to be problematic for Jews, Christians and indeed Jesus himself in the political context of the Roman Empire. In the second century, early chiliast beliefs, such as those articulated in Irenaeus' Against Heresies (Haer. 5.32, 5.35) and Justin Martyr's Dialogue with Trypho (25–26, 113–120), look to the promise of inheritance of the land in the future.<sup>26</sup> One particular passage in Justin's Dialogue merits particular notice:

---

<sup>24</sup> See Tom Holmén’s essay, “An Introduction to the Continuum Approach,” in idem, ed., Jesus from Judaism to Christianity: Continuum Approaches to the Historical Jesus (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 2007), 1–16, esp. 11–13.

<sup>25</sup> Davies, Gospel and the Land, 369.

And Trypho remarked, "What is this you say? That none of us [i.e., the Jews] shall inherit anything on the holy mountain of God?" And I [Justin] replied, "I do not say so; but those who have persecuted and do persecute Christ, if they do not repent, shall not inherit anything on the holy mountain. But the Gentiles, who have believed on Him, and have repented of the sins which they have committed, they shall receive the inheritance along with the patriarchs and the prophets, and the just men who are descended from Jacob, even although they neither keep the Sabbath, nor are circumcised, nor observe the feasts. Assuredly, they shall receive the holy inheritance of God" (Dial. 25–26).

Here, the traditional boundaries at the largest level of separation, between Israel (land and people) and the nations (land and people), have been completely rethought and redrawn. It is specifically stated that the Gentile Christians do not follow the distinctive practices of the Jews (Sabbath observance, circumcision, feasts) which serve as identity markers, and yet they will inherit the patriarchal promises. Through belief in Jesus and repentance of their sins, they have attained this status. Those Jews who "persecute Christ" without repenting will not receive the promised inheritance. For Justin, Christians of true faith believe that Jerusalem will be rebuilt and that Jesus—the replacement Joshua—will redistribute the holy land in a "new manner" and with eternal possession after the resurrection (117). This appropriation of the land promise indeed shows a radical reinterpretation of group boundaries. It is comparable, though strikingly different, to the notion at Qumran that even some among Israel cannot be purified because they do not follow the rule of the community (1QS III, 4–6). Here, in Justin's remarks, Israel is not excluded categorically (only those who persecute Christ), and non-observant Gentiles are included. There are still boundaries associated with the inheritance of the holy land, though these boundary lines do not fall neatly at the distinction between Jew and Gentile. Though Justin is writing at a later period than the New Testament authors, this shows that the land promise continued to hold a place in (some) Christian thought as part of the process of articulating boundaries and expectations for the new group.

---

<sup>26</sup> See Wilken, Land Called Holy, 55–62.

In Paul's writings, where obedience to the law is a major concern, the land does not feature prominently, though Seth Turner has argued that Paul's beliefs about the kingdom included an interim terrestrial reign (1 Thess 4:13–18; 1 Cor 15:22–28).<sup>27</sup> Paul does not make direct reference to the land promise, but he does refer to the promises to Abraham in Romans 4 and Galatians 3. In Romans 4, he recalls the promises and covenant with Abraham in Genesis 12 and 15. Rather than emphasising the land, however, he focuses on the promise that God will make Abraham a great nation (Gen 12:2) and that his descendants will be as numerous as the stars (Gen 15:5–6). The faith of Abraham, rather than adherence to the law, is the key to the fulfilment of the promises:

The promise to Abraham and his descendants, that they should inherit the world (κόσμου), did not come through the law but through the righteousness of faith. (Romans 4:13)

Paul changes the focus of the promise from the specific land to the broader world (κόσμος). Those who do not obey the law (traditionally associated with 'the thinking of the land') are able to benefit from the promise and to count themselves among the descendants of Abraham. Even if we agree that Paul "spoke no unambiguous word about the land,"<sup>28</sup> nevertheless the apostle clearly evokes the covenantal relationship between God-people-land, even though he redraws this significantly. Speaking of "the promise to Abraham" and the "inheritance of the world" avoids direct mention of the land; however, it does not lose its ties to the larger discourse about the relationship between God, people (however they are defined), and land.<sup>29</sup> Reinterpreting this tradition and emphasizing other aspects of the covenant more than the land is comparable to the tendency identified by Halpern-Amaru in various writings of the Second Temple period. It is important to note that the relevance of the land has not disappeared completely from such writings. In the New Testament, the land promise features prominently in Stephen's speech in Acts 7, and the recollection of Israel's history in Hebrews is ultimately concerned with the narrative of God's people in the land, even if the focus is on Jesus as high priest and son of God who cares for the "house" built by God who is also the builder of everything (3:1–6). Recalling the Joshua narrative and the rest to be attained in the land, the author of Hebrews clearly states: 'the promise of entering his rest still stands' (4:1). It is right to exercise caution about identifying any one clear interpretation of the land emerging from the New Testament in light of the few, varied and oblique ways it is mentioned in the texts. It is too simple to propose a direct replacement of Israel (people and land) by the church (the believing Jews and Gentiles, perhaps understood in some circles as the "dispersion": James 1:1, John 11:52, 1 Peter 1:1); clearly, however, the understanding of this widest category of distinction and opposition, which includes "the land," was being rethought and redrawn within emerging Christian identities. The changing relationship to the law would necessitate at the very least a new "thinking of the land" in terms of a symbolic system and associated practices. Even with an emphasis on faith in Christ over obedience to the law, the evidence of chiliastic beliefs and even the references in Paul and Hebrews suggest that the land still played some role in the future hopes of the early church.

<sup>27</sup> S. Turner, "The Interim, Earthly Messianic Kingdom in Paul," JSNT 25.3 (2003): 323–342.

<sup>28</sup> Davies, Gospel and the Land, 185.

<sup>29</sup> Jorunn Økland shows in the case of Paul's use of the term naos in 1 Corinthians that the metaphor "has kept strong ties to the original field of connotation... it evokes an extra-textual discourse which shapes the production of meaning in the text":

3. The Historical Jesus and Land

In the light of the prominent place of the land within the Jewish material regarding the land and the redrawing of boundaries which emerged within early Christianity, we now turn to consider the place of the holy land within the proclamation of Jesus. As we have seen,

---

J. Økland, Women in Their Place: Paul and the Corinthian Discourse of Gender and Sanctuary Space, JSNTSup 269 (London: T&T Clark/Continuum, 2004), 155. Though Paul does not employ metaphor here, but rather changes the language and terms of the original referent, there is still a sense of evoking the wider discourse, which shapes its meaning in this instance.

Davies concluded that Jesus was unconcerned with the covenantal relationship between God-people-land. More recently, Laaksonen's study comes to very different conclusions, arguing that Jesus did think in terms of a real, earthly restored land—God's people in God's land—in his proclamation of the kingdom.<sup>30</sup> My own study understands Jesus as a millenarian prophet who recalled the land promise in his message of the kingdom, but cautions against placing too much emphasis on the concrete nature of this promise.<sup>31</sup> If Jesus recalls the land promise in a similar manner to the sign prophets described by Josephus, there is a sense of relying on God to bring about a dramatic change to affairs. The new divine order which would be established does not necessarily require detailed mapping, though at times there may be more of an interest in this. John Collins notes that for apocalyptic literature, "the restored earthly order is never the primary focus."<sup>32</sup> Jesus' proclamation of the kingdom of God/heaven looks toward a new divine order and reign, but is critical of present society. This concept of the kingdom, though generally accepted as going back to Jesus himself, is famously difficult to define, and it is probably best to take a both/and approach to the nature of the kingdom: it is both earthly and heavenly, present and future.<sup>33</sup> The land promise does not map easily onto such a space, but it is helpful to remember the apocalyptic nature of Jesus' message of the kingdom. Like the sign prophets, Jesus could recall the promises of exodus and entry into the land without defining in detail what the future that God would bring would look like.

3.1. The Twelve and the Land

Jesus' group of twelve disciples has direct relevance to a discussion of Jesus and the holy land. Laaksonen rightly gives more prominence

---

<sup>30</sup> J. Laaksonen, Jesus und das Land: das Gelobte Land in der Verkündigung Jesu (Åbo: Åbo Akademis Förlag, 2002).

<sup>31</sup> K. Wenell, Jesus and Land: Sacred and Social Space in Second Temple Judaism, Library of Historical Jesus Studies/Library of New Testament Studies 334 (London: T&T Clark/Continuum, 2007).

<sup>32</sup> J. J. Collins, "Temporality and Politics in Jewish Apocalyptic Literature," in Apocalyptic in History and Tradition, ed. C. Rowland and J. Barton (London: Sheffield Academic Press), 2002, 26–43, at 39.

<sup>33</sup> For a full discussion of the Kingdom, see the relevant chapter in this volume. Gerd Theissen and Anne Merz, The Historical Jesus, is just one example of setting out of the different views of the Kingdom, with the indication that the best way through the different emphases is to affirm that both are firmly part of the tradition: The Historical Jesus: A Comprehensive Guide (Minneapolis, MA: Fortress Press, 1996), 240–264.

than Davies had previously to the role of the Twelve in Jesus' vision of the kingdom.<sup>34</sup> As noted in the ideology of the book of Joshua above, the twelve tribes and twelve territories were a symbolic indication of all Israel receiving their allotted inheritance in the land. Within the overall story of Israel, the tribes were under the leadership of Moses during the wandering in the wilderness, looking forward to their entry into the land. Jesus' calling of the twelve disciples is a symbolic and prophetic action, comparable to the actions of the so-called sign prophets described by Josephus. These prophetic figures recall Israel's history, in particular the themes of exodus and the entry into the promised land. The Samaritan prophet promises the restoration of the holy vessels of the Gerizim temple (Ant. 18.85–87), Theudas gathers his followers to see the parting of the Jordan (Ant. 20.97–99), and several anonymous prophets promise signs and wonders in the wilderness (Ant. 20.167–168, War 2.259). The Egyptian prophet's followers expect to see the walls of Jerusalem fall like Jericho (Acts 21:38, Ant. 20.169–172, War 2.261). John the Baptist too is a figure of this type. His baptism in the Jordan river also evokes Israel's story of entry into the land.<sup>35</sup> Craig Evans notes that the mention of "stones" in Matthew 3:9 could suggest the narrative of Joshua and the altar built of twelve stones upon crossing the Jordan river (Joshua 4:21–22).<sup>36</sup> Set in this context, the Twelve are an important group for any discussion of Jesus in relationship to the land. Though Crossan and others have argued that the Twelve arose after Jesus' death and were part of the proclamation in the early community,<sup>37</sup> it is not clear why they would have

---

<sup>34</sup> Laaksonen, Jesus und das Land, 333–371. See also my own study, where the Twelve are viewed as having a strong symbolic tie to the story of Israel in the land: K. J. Wenell, Jesus and Land, 104–138.

<sup>35</sup> On the sign prophets, Jesus and John, noting the themes of exodus and entry, see S. McKnight, "Jesus and Prophetic Actions," Bulletin for Biblical Research 10.2 (2000): 197–232.

<sup>36</sup> C. A. Evans, "The Baptism of John in a Typological Context," in Dimensions of Baptism: Biblical and Theological Studies, ed. S. E. Porter and A. R. Cross, JSNTSup 234 (London: Sheffield Academic Press, 2002), 43–71, at 50–52.

<sup>37</sup> See, e.g., J. D. Crossan, Who Killed Jesus: Exposing the Roots of Anti-Semitism in the Gospel Story of the Death of Jesus (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1996); A. van Aarde, "The Historicity of the Circle of the Twelve: All Roads Lead to Jerusalem," Hervormde Theologische Studies 55.4 (1999): 795–826. Older studies include P. Vielhauer, "Gottesreich und Menschensohn in der Verkündigung Jesu," in Festschrift für Gunther Dehn, zum 75. Geburtstag am 18. April 1957, ed. W. Schneemelcher (Neukirchen: Verlag der Buchhandlung des Erziehungsvereins, 1957), 51–79; and W. Schmithals, Das Evangelium nach Markus, vol. 2 (Gütersloh: Güterloher Verlagshaus, 1986), v.

been invented as a group when they have a limited role in the spread of the gospel, and the group do seem to be firmly placed in the earliest traditions.<sup>38</sup> Richard Bauckham points out how the Twelve as a group basically drop out of the story Luke tells in Acts after chapter 11. From this point, James and the elders replace the group.<sup>39</sup> In his most recent treatment of Jesus and the gospels, Bauckham has upheld the authenticity of the twelve, noting their importance as a group (not as individuals) and as eyewitnesses for the shape of the story of Jesus.<sup>40</sup> As for the meaning of the group of the Twelve, Scot McKnight has highlighted the role of the Twelve in evoking the themes of covenant renewal and eschatological restoration.<sup>41</sup> Dale Allison also makes a connection between the Twelve and eschatology, noting the Q tradition (22:28–30) where the Twelve judge or rule the twelve tribes of Israel: “This assumes that the twelve tribes will soon come home to the land.”<sup>42</sup> This particular tradition can also be connected with another Q tradition (13:28–29) where a gathering from east and west is indicated. This implies as well that the gathering is to somewhere, and that is the land of Israel. Although it is frequently recognized that the existence of the Twelve indicates that Jesus’ message was for “all Israel,” meaning the people of Israel, it is less common for the spatial or territorial aspect of the group to be recognized. The Twelve raise the further, related question as to whether in Jesus’ mission, the restoration of Israel alluded to a return from exile.<sup>43</sup>

3.2. Jesus and the Restoration of Israel

It is quite surprising that in a substantial work which understands Jesus as announcing the “real return from exile,” the land does not feature more prominently in N. T. Wright’s Jesus and the Victory of

<sup>38</sup> J. P. Meier, “The Circle of the Twelve: Did it Exist During Jesus’ Public Ministry?” Journal of Biblical Literature 116.4 (1997): 635–72. See also E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1985), 98–106.

<sup>39</sup> R. Bauckham, “James and the Jerusalem Church,” in idem, ed., The Book of Acts in Its Palestinian Setting (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1995), 415–480.

<sup>40</sup> R. Bauckham, Jesus and the Eyewitnesses: The Gospels as Eyewitness Testimony (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2006), 93–113.

<sup>41</sup> S. McKnight, “Jesus and the Twelve,” Bulletin for Biblical Research 11.2 (2001): 203–231.

<sup>42</sup> Allison, Jesus of Nazareth: Millenarian Prophet (Minneapolis, MA: Fortress Press, 1998), 102.

<sup>43</sup> N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God, Christian Origins and the Question of God 2 (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 1996), 299.

God. Wright gives a cursory treatment of the land, and dismisses its importance in Jesus' call to give up possessions. He says:

Closely linked with the eschatological call to cut loose from family ties was the similar call to sit loose to possessions. For most people in the ancient world, the most basic possession was land; for Jews, the land was of course the holy land, promised by YHWH to his people.<sup>44</sup>

Another comparison Wright makes is with the pearl of great price: "The kingdom was available to those who sold everything else; among the things that would have to be sold was the traditional symbol of the sacred land itself."<sup>45</sup> The eschatological promise of the kingdom was not the inheritance of the land; rather, it "swallowed up" this promise. Scot McKnight, who also views Jesus as proclaiming the restoration of Israel, more closely relates the promises of the kingdom to the promise of the land, where the message of Jesus addresses Israel's hopes: "the return from exile, the coming of God to Zion, the inheritance of the whole land, the expulsion of God's enemies from the land, the creation of a new heart for obedience to God's Torah, the reversal of injustices, and the glorious fellowship of the unified family of God."<sup>46</sup> If Jesus taps into these hopes in the context of rural Galilee, it is worth considering one aspect of Wright's statement: the role the land played in the socio-economic life in the ancient world. Jack Pastor states:

The economy of the Jewish people in Eretz Israel throughout the Second Temple period retained certain characteristics. Most lived by agriculture, so that land was the source of livelihood, wealth and power. Much of the land was owned by the ruler, whoever he was. Royal lands were an integral part of the landholding structure from the First Temple period through the talmudic age. These lands provided the crown with personal wealth, control over economically significant products, such as balsam, and a reserve of land to be allocated to whomever the ruler wished to advance. The actual work on the royal lands was performed by tenants who were either share-croppers or lessees.<sup>47</sup>

Although Morten Jenson cautions against painting a "picture of conflict" in Galilee under Herod Antipas and against viewing Jesus as

---

<sup>44</sup> Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God, 299.

<sup>45</sup> Ibid., 429.

<sup>46</sup> S. McKnight, A New Vision for Israel: The Teachings of Jesus in National Context (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1999), 154.

<sup>47</sup> J. Pastor, Land and Economy in Ancient Palestine (London: Routledge, 1997), 168.

“provoked by and opposed to” his reign, he still recognises the situation of poverty which would have existed and which is addressed in the gospels: “It is even beyond doubt that poverty was a persistent fact of life in this period and that, Antipas or not, the presence of a social prophet would not be surprising in view of the discontent that prevailed.”<sup>48</sup> John Dominic Crossan and the archaeologist Jonathan Reed consider the connections between kingdom and land. Here, both Jesus’ and John the Baptist’s ideas about kingdom were in contrast with the Herodian view of kingdom. The law was concerned with debt in relationship to the land and tried to mediate or curtail the negative implications in different ways, thus showing, in the estimation of Crossan and Reed, “what a covenantal kingdom might look like.” They highlight the fertility of the land and its value:

Actually, however, it is not the land itself, but the food it produces that is the material basis of life. The just distribution of land is about the just distribution of food. That is why those visions of the eschatological and/or apocalyptic Kingdom of God imagine not more and more land, but more and more fertility.<sup>49</sup>

They further argue that in Jesus’ context in Galilee, land redistribution could not be attempted, but redistribution of “eating and healing, of the material and spiritual bases of life” was possible and defined the kingdom of God.<sup>50</sup> Certainly, in the gospels there is a concern with the poor and with tenant farmers and day laborers who worked directly from the land. Sean Freyne describes the dominant ethos in Galilee as a “market economy which functions in favour of the ruling elite and their administrative retainers.”<sup>51</sup> Herod Antipas’ development of Galilee, and in particular Sepphoris and Tiberias, may be seen to reflect the royal ideology we encountered in the Hebrew Bible, where the monarch assumes control of the land and the mediation of its wealth (Antiquities 18.37). In this context, Jesus’ eschatological message recalled a different land ideology and a contrasting under-

---

<sup>48</sup> M. Jensen, “Herod Antipas in Galilee: Friend or Foe of the Historical Jesus?” JSHJ 5.1 (2007): 7–32, at 32.

<sup>49</sup> Crossan and Reed, Excavating Jesus, 134.

<sup>50</sup> Ibid., 135.

<sup>51</sup> S. Freyne, “Jesus and the Urban Culture of Galilee”, in Texts and Contexts: Biblical Texts in their Textual and Situational Contexts: Essays in Honour of Lars Hartman, ed. D. Hellholm and T. Fornberg (Oslo: Scandinavian University Press, 1995), 597–622, at 609.

standing of kingdom. He espouses “a prophetic critique of the dominant prevailing ethos, based on covenantal ideals for a restored Israel, within an apocalyptic framework that made it possible to imagine and propose a radically different lifestyle and values.”<sup>52</sup> We cannot separate understandings of the land as storied land (in Brueggman’s terminology)<sup>53</sup> from the social and political realities encountered within the land.<sup>54</sup> Both aspects will inform each other, so that the story of the holy land may be adapted and revised in the light of particular situations; conversely, there may be a desire for change to the structures of society in the light of how the stories of place—the land—are read.

3.3. Land and Temple: The Sower

William Herzog considers parabolic material, particularly the parable of the sower (Mark 4:3–9) and the seed growing secretly (Mark 4:26–29), in relationship to the question of the land, and suggests that “Jesus’ strategy was to separate the temple from the land and to critique the domination systems found throughout his world.”<sup>55</sup> With regard to the sower, here Jesus emphasises in the first three examples the negative verbs of devouring, scorching and choking. This is in contrast with the seed which falls onto “the good land” (τὴν γῆν τὴν καλὴν). Here, there is an affinity with the passages which mention the positive qualities of the promised land, “flowing with milk and honey” (Exod 3:8, 17; 13:5, etc.). Therefore, the problem is not with the land itself, but with forces which bring harm to the seed (birds, sun and thorns) which would have grown up in the fruitful land. Although their rulers may attempt to blame the peasants for their inability to observe the Torah by tithing on the land and paying Temple taxes, the blame belongs rightly with the elites “who take almost everything and leave almost nothing.”<sup>56</sup> Similarly, the seed growing secretly on the land which produces “by itself” indicates for Jesus a focus on the land which does not require the temple system for its productivity: “The land does not require the

<sup>52</sup> Freyne. “Jesus and the Urban Culture,” 611.

<sup>53</sup> Brueggemann, The Land, 185.

<sup>54</sup> See here also S. Freyne, Jesus, A Jewish Galilean: A New Reading of the Jesus-Story (London: T&T Clark, 2004), where he relates the stories of conquest and settlement to the Jesus story and the place of Israel and the tribes within it (60–91).

<sup>55</sup> W.R. Herzog, Jesus, Justice, and the Reign of God: A Ministry of Liberation (Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox Press, 2000), 191.

<sup>56</sup> Herzog, Jesus, Justice, 195.

sacrificial system and elaborate purity injunctions to ensure its fertility. The land produces seemingly by itself, reflecting the invisible generative power that derives from the blessings of the covenant God, a blessing unrelated to the machinations of the temple and the manipulations of the priests.<sup>57</sup> Here, Herzog detects an allusion to the sabbatical year for the land as found in the Pentateuch (Exod 23:10–11; Lev 25:2–7). He concludes:

Jesus saw the fertility of the land as a symbol of the continuing covenant of God with the people of the land, a covenant to which all had access through the brokering role that Jesus had assumed.<sup>58</sup>

If Jesus is indeed creating a wedge between the temple system in Jerusalem and the land, this could be quite a dangerous allusion to make. A comparison could be made with Jesus son of Ananias, who spoke against the temple and was considered to be a threat by Rome (War 6.300). By using the parabolic form, Jesus could tap into hopes about the land and the promise of God to his people to sustain them in the land without directly provoking sensitivities around these issues. Though the temple and the land are connected in Jewish understandings of sacred space, this does not exclude the possibility of criticizing one element in the system while affirming another. Support for the separation of the land and the temple may exist in the two major symbolic actions of Jesus. We have already noted the importance of the calling of the Twelve as a symbolic action of Jesus. This is a positive symbol which points toward a future when the promises of God for Israel would be fulfilled. The other major symbolic action of Jesus is of course the action in the temple. Though much has been said about this action in terms of its symbolism of the destruction of the temple, it should also be noted that there is no particular element in the action to symbolize restoration.<sup>59</sup> The identification of a positive symbol (related to the Twelve) and a negative symbol (related to the Temple) within Jesus' activity would fit with Herzog's interpretation of the parable of the sower.

---

<sup>57</sup> Herzog, Jesus, Justice, 196–197.

<sup>58</sup> Ibid., 197.

<sup>59</sup> J. Riches, "Apocalyptic—Strangely Relevant," in Templum Amicitiae: Essays on the Second Temple Presented to Ernst Bammel, ed. W. Horbury (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1991), 237–263, at 246. See also Wenell, Jesus and Land, 49–52.

In contrast to Herzog's view, Peter Walker considers that, although the gospels do not have a great deal to say about the land explicitly, they do have a fair amount to say about the temple. Therefore, since "the temple, the city and the land were understood as three interconnecting theological realia,"<sup>60</sup> understanding one aspect of this triad might indicate Jesus' attitude towards the others. For Walker, Jesus took the temple as his model, but himself replaced the temple, ultimately superseding these three Jewish realia. In light of the different views and emphases with regard to the land that we have noted in the relevant Jewish and New Testament literature, it would seem preferable to keep open the possibility that Jesus could have adopted different attitudes to these three aspects. Although with different conclusions and a different approach from that of Walker, William Horbury also connects land and temple, noting the links in Jewish tradition between 'land, sanctuary and worship' and argues,

[T]here is a good case for seeing in Jesus himself, together with a strongly Israelite loyalty, an ethical emphasis tending to relativize land, sanctuary and sacrifice. The gospels do suggest, however, that these things mattered in themselves whenever Jesus was regarded as messiah—during the ministry... and in any case among those who first circulated and edited these gospel traditions.<sup>61</sup>

This is not the place to examine Jesus' attitude toward the temple in detail (see the relevant chapter in this volume), but it is at least possible that Jesus did view land and temple differently in his mission and message of the kingdom (including its ethical dimensions), and Herzog's suggestion, considered above, should not be discounted merely on the basis of the (undoubtedly) strong connections between the land and the temple.

---

<sup>60</sup> P. Walker, "The Land in the New Testament", in The Land of Promise: Biblical, Theological and Contemporary Perspectives, ed. P. Johnston and P. Walker (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2000), 81–120, at 101. See also P. Walker, "Christians and Jerusalem, Past and Present," in idem, ed., The Mountain of the Lord: Israel and the Churches (Northampton: The Becket Press, 1996), 107–130.

<sup>61</sup> W. Horbury, "Land, Sanctuary and Worship," in Early Christian Thought in its Jewish Context, J. Barclay and J. Sweet (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996), 207–224, at 218.

3.4. Borders of the Land, Borders of the Kingdom

Returning to the segmentary model of Israel (land and people) and the nations (land and peoples), it is important to consider where Jesus may have drawn boundary lines for his group and for God's kingdom. In each version of the story of the Syrophoenician/Canaanite woman, both in Mark (7:24–30) and in Matthew (15:22–28), the woman is a Gentile; Matthew makes her a particular type of Gentile, one belonging to the nation which previously occupied the land. In Matthew's reworking of the story of the Syrophoenician woman (Mark 15:21–28), the boundaries of Israel (land and people) are brought to the fore. John Riches says,

Interestingly, Matthew himself underlines the sense in which this story is about precisely the boundaries which protect the Jewish group. The woman's Gentile identity is underlined by using a term rich in associations with Israel's history of occupation of the Land, a Canaanite; she in turn refers to Jesus as Son of David and Lord.<sup>62</sup>

Even recognizing this as Matthew's shaping of this particular story in a gospel where he has previously limited Jesus' mission to the lost sheep of the house of Israel (10:6), this story in both its forms calls into question the boundaries and opposition between "Israel" and the "nations." Also, as Allison points out, the gathering passage in Q (Luke 13:28–29//Matt 8:11–12) indicates that "it is those outside the borders of Israel who are redeemed whereas those inside, or at least some of them, fall under judgment."<sup>63</sup> In like manner to the prophets (e.g., Jeremiah and Ezekiel), "Jesus apparently used the restoration of the exiles to threaten those close at hand who had not supported his cause."<sup>64</sup> Thus, placement in the land does not guarantee salvation in the coming eschatological crisis. In the light of the spread of the gospel to the Gentile world, it may be best to understand some degree of weakening of this boundary in Jesus' mission. Also, Jesus' use of kingdom imagery (by Jesus himself or by his followers) could be interpreted in a manner similar to the kingdom ideology we discussed in the Hebrew Bible where the God's kingdom extends to become an empire, with Israel as land and people retaining its identity in this model.

<sup>62</sup> Riches, Conflicting Mythologies, 244.

<sup>63</sup> Allison, Jesus of Nazareth, 144–145.

<sup>64</sup> Ibid., 145.

The question of whether Jesus might have included Samaria in the borders of the land is raised by David Catchpole's discussion of Jesus and the Samaritans. Catchpole considers whether Jesus' mission strategy was open to the Samaritans to include them. He considers here the text in Luke where Jesus, on his way to Jerusalem, enters a Samaritan village (9:51–56). Though they "did not receive him" (9:53), Jesus rejects the suggestion of James and John that the Samaritans be judged with consuming fire from heaven. Catchpole identifies a pre-Lukan tradition which "drops a substantial hint that Jesus' mission was not just to unambiguous Israel but also to the ambiguous community of the Samaritans."<sup>65</sup> Therefore, as Catchpole argues, in line with the Q tradition of Luke 22:30//Matt 19:28, Jesus could well have had as part of his mission strategy an extension to the Samaritans who traced their ancestry to the two half tribes of Joseph, Ephraim and Manasseh. It may be worth noting that among the Twelve, there is no member who is designated as a Samaritan, but in the light of the broader symbolism of the number twelve, the possibility of openness to Samaritans is not out of the question.

One further point on the boundaries that are in view in Jesus' message of the kingdom relates to the Beelzebul controversy in Mark 3:20–30. Halvor Moxnes does not draw out the implications for the land in detail, but he notes that the description of Jesus' exorcisms in the Beelzebul controversy presents an image of two territories in conflict: the kingdom of God and the kingdom of Satan.

The realms of Satan and of God are, so to speak, laid on the world that Jesus and his hearers inhabit. They are figures of speech or "spaces of representation" that give to experiences of being possessed and to exorcisms a spatial dimension. Against the attempt by the community leaders to marginalize Jesus, to make him one with the possessed that he healed, Jesus brings the issue of possession and exorcisms to centre stage with spatial imagery. He does not just say that he did the exorcisms by the power of God, but that God was establishing his kingdom. The images of the realm ruled by Herod Antipas and the Romans would easily come to mind. And in this context, basileia clearly has a connotation that identified kingdom with power over a place, a territory.<sup>66</sup>

---

<sup>65</sup> D. Catchpole, Jesus People: The Historical Jesus and the Beginning of Community (London: Darton, Longman and Todd, 2006), 188.

<sup>66</sup> H. Moxnes, Putting Jesus in His Place: A Radical Vision of Household and Kingdom (Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox Press, 2003), 136.

Jesus' exorcisms indicate God's power in the present situation; as manifestations of this power, they "signal that God establishes his kingdom over the land."<sup>67</sup> As we saw in the discussion above, the Book of Jubilees looked forward to a time when Israel's land would be purified from satanic forces. Jesus associates the language of purity and impurity with spirits in the gospels, and Matthew 12:43–45//Luke 11:24–26 gives a very spatial description of demonic movement:

When the unclean spirit has gone out of a person, it wanders through waterless regions looking for a resting place, but it finds none. Then it says, "I will return to my house from which I came." When it comes, it finds it empty, swept, and put in order. Then it goes and brings along seven other spirits more evil than itself, and they enter and live there; and the last state of that person is worse than the first. So will it be also with this evil generation.

Spirits roaming the earth in this manner do not respect the boundaries of the land (Cf. 1 Enoch 16.1; Jubilees 50.5). Jesus' casting out of demons in the present is not a permanent purification of the land from the grip of demonic power. It shows two kingdoms struggling for power within the socio-political territory of the land under Herodian and Roman rule. There are large questions surrounding the interpretation of Mark 7 for the historical Jesus which we do not have the space to discuss here. It may be noted briefly, however, that whether or not Jesus obeyed the purity laws of oral and/or written law, the keeping of such laws does not emerge in the tradition as the primary boundary marker for Jesus and his group.<sup>68</sup> For Jesus, the "thinking of the kingdom" is defined in other ways.

4. Conclusion: Matthew 5.5, the Land and Group Identity

Matthew 5:5 constitutes the most direct statement about the land in the gospels. As part of the Sermon on the Mount in Matthew's gospel, the Beatitudes have been shaped, following tradition, to the form we find them in the text, and they cannot be established as authentic. The phrase κληρονομήσουσιν τὴν γῆν in Matthew 5:5 appears in the same form (though without the article) in Psalm 37 in the Septuagint, where it is normally translated into English as “inherit the land.” Scot McKnight views this and the other Beatitudes as describing the future blessings and promises of the kingdom, including land.<sup>69</sup> Even though we can not establish the particular phrase as authentic, its usefulness for group identity may be highlighted. Psalm 37.11 is also commented upon in a Qumran peshet where its interpretation is given as follows:

<sup>67</sup> Moxnes, Jesus in His Place, 141.

<sup>68</sup> See T. Kazen, Jesus and Purity Halakhah: Was Jesus Indifferent to Impurity? Coniectanea Biblica New Testament Series 38 (Stockholm: Almqvist & Wiksell International, 2002).

And the poor shall inherit the land and enjoy peace in plenty. Its interpretation concerns the congregation of the poor who will tolerate the period of distress and will be rescued from all the snares of Belial. Afterwards, all who shall inherit the land will enjoy and grow fat with everything... of the flesh (1Q171 II, 9–12).

Here, the group, “the congregation of the poor,” is clearly associated with the text and the eventual inheritance of the promise. Elsewhere, the community sees itself as a “holy house for Israel” chosen to “atone for the land” (1QS VII, 5–6, 10). The re-interpretation of this particular phrase from Psalm 37, for Qumran or for early Christianity (as evidenced in Matthew’s Gospel), opens up an opportunity for a group to fill in boundaries of their own and to make claims to the promise of inheritance of the land. It is possible to identify with the promise and to claim it for “our group” with “our boundaries” of correct behavior and belief.

The importance of the holy land for Jesus should not be underestimated or overestimated. Jesus’ message of the kingdom has several aspects that would relate to the spatial component of what it meant to be “Israel” as both land and people. We may include: the Twelve as indicative of a gathering into the land; the kingdom as a concept with royal territorial connotations; Jesus’ reputation as a “wandering charismatic” (in Gerd Theissen’s terminology) who does not have a fixed location within the land, recalling the period of wandering prior to entry into the land; Jesus’ baptism in the Jordan by John and his association of the language of purity and impurity—connected to the “thinking of the land”—with spirits and two kingdoms in conflict, that of God and that of Beelzebul. In a continuum perspective, Matthew 5:5 may be read as a valid interpretation of Jesus’ mission and message of the kingdom, extending God’s promise to Israel (land and people) to those meek—“our group”—who would be followers.<sup>70</sup>

<sup>69</sup> McKnight, A New Vision, 153–154.

<sup>70</sup> R. Bauckham, “James and the Jerusalem Church,” 428.

JESUS AND SINNERS AND OUTCASTS

BRUCE CHILTON

This is one of the few topics in the study of Jesus in which the framing of the question brought to the gospels by modern inquiry corresponds to Jesus' own framing of the issue, insofar as the texts represent his perspective (Matt 11:7–19; Luke 7:24–35):

<sup>7</sup> Yet while they were proceeding Jesus said to the crowds about John, What did you go out into the wilderness to observe? Reed shaken by wind? <sup>8</sup> But what did you go out to see? A man attired in soft clothes? See: those in kings' houses bear soft clothes! <sup>9</sup> But why did you go out? To see a prophet? Yes, I say to you, and more than a prophet. <sup>10</sup> This is he concerning whom it is written, See: I delegate my messenger before your face, who will ready your way before you. <sup>11</sup> Amen I say to you, there has not been raised among women-born one greater than John the Immerser! But the least in the kingdom of the heavens is greater than he! <sup>12</sup> Yet from the days of John the Immerser until now, the kingdom of the heavens avails itself, and availers seize it! <sup>13</sup> Because all the prophets and the law prophesied until John, <sup>14</sup> and if you want to accept, he is Elijah who is going to come. <sup>15</sup> The one having ears, Listen! <sup>16</sup> To what shall I liken this generation? It is like children sitting in the markets who shout to the others, saying,

<sup>24</sup> Yet while the messengers of John were going away, he began to say to the crowds concerning John, What did you go out into the wilderness to observe? Reed shaken by wind? <sup>25</sup> But what did you go out to see? A person attired in soft garments? Look: those among royals subsist in splendid apparel and luxury! <sup>26</sup> But what did you go out to see? A prophet? Yes, I say to you, and more than a prophet. <sup>27</sup> This is he concerning whom it is written, Look: I delegate my messenger before your face, who will prepare your way before you. <sup>28</sup> I say to you, no one among women-born is greater than John! But the least in the kingdom of God is greater than he! <sup>29</sup> All the people and the customs-agents heard and vindicated God, having been immersed with John's immersion. <sup>30</sup> But the Pharisees and the lawyers annulled the counsel of God for themselves, not having been immersed by him. <sup>31</sup> To what shall I liken the humanity of this generation: and what are they like? <sup>32</sup> They are like children in market sitting and shouting to one another, that say, <sup>33</sup> We fluted for you, and

<sup>17</sup> We fluted for you, and you did not dance, We wailed and you did not mourn! <sup>18</sup> Because John came neither eating nor drinking, and they say, He has a demon. <sup>19</sup> The one like the person came eating and drinking, and they say, Look: a glutton and a drunkard, a friend of customs-agents and sinners. And wisdom is vindicated from her deeds.	you did not dance, We wailed and you did not weep! <sup>34</sup> Because John has come neither eating bread nor drinking wine, and you say, He has a demon. <sup>35</sup> The one like the person has come eating and drinking, and you say, Look: a glutton and a drunkard, a friend of customs-agents and sinners. And wisdom is vindicated from all her children.
---	---

Contextually, Jesus' companionship with "customs-agents and sinners" is linked in both passages with issues of purity, and with Jesus' relationship to John the Immerser. Questions of the literary relationship between Matthew and Luke—or of the tradition-history of the materials they relate—do not concern us here, because the passages agree in linking the matter of companionship with the matter of purity and John the Immerser. For that reason, this essay moves in several stages: (1) the role customs-agents, and (2) their particular connection to issues of purity (and John's dedication to purity), (3) the identification of "sinners," and (4) their significance within Jesus' movement. Consideration of those four sequenced matters will then bring us (5) to a conclusion, where the role of sinners and outcasts as representative of Jesus' perspective will occupy us.

1. The Role Customs-Agents

The recent study by Fritz Herrenbrück, a detailed cultural and historical analysis, offers a suitable point of departure.<sup>1</sup> He challenges the understanding that τελωνοι in the gospels are to be equated with portitores, collectors in the service of publicani within Roman society. Herrenbrück's preferred models are the τελωνοι of the Hellenistic world (not Rome itself), local contractors ("Kleinpächter") charged with the collection of various revenues for Rome. They are "Abgabepächter," revenue contractors, rather than tax or toll collectors; "customs-agents” in English conveys this sense, signaling collectors of customary payments to government.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Jesus und die Zöllner: Historische und neutestamentlich-exegetische Untersuchungen, WUNT 2.41 (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1990), reviewed in JBL 111 (1992): 338–340.

Herrenbrück contrasts the system of auctioning local contracts (city by city and year by year) for the collection of taxes in Greece with the system of contracting with the state (on a wider scale and for a longer period) in Rome. It is of particular interest that he documents the interpenetration of state contracts and local contracts in the case of Asia Minor.<sup>3</sup> Discussion (largely on the basis of papyri) of taxation in Egypt during the Ptolemaic and Roman period takes up a considerable proportion of the book, in order to document a system of revenue contractors that was more tightly regulated than in Greece. That system, in turn, is the model Herrenbrück uses to understand the situation in Palestine during the first century. Despite tensions with at least strands of Pharisaism (a point to which we shall return), the revenue contractors were in Herrenbrück’s judgment well integrated socially and religiously within Judaism, and enjoyed a privileged position in terms of wealth and status.

The synoptic gospels (except for Matt 5:46–47; 18:17b, behind which Herrenbrück sees Syrian catechesis) are presented as generally reliable in the portrayal of Jesus as a friend of τελωῶναι. Indeed, Herrenbrück resists following the tendency of ancient and modern apologetic, which sees tribute contractors as types of sinner; he agrees rather with the translation of (οἱ) τελωῶναι καὶ ἁμαρτωλοὶ as “die sündigen Zöllner.” He insists that the τελωῶναι are to be associated with Jesus’ conscious ministry to the whole of Israel, and that attempts to invoke Zacchaeus in Luke 19:1–10 as belonging to “einer sozial niederen Randgruppe” are misguided. The text of the book closes with a stunning denunciation of what he calls socio-economic dualism, to which he prefers the conception of a common devotion to God that transcends class.<sup>4</sup>

Given the breadth of Herrenbrück’s argument and the nature of the sources involved, certain questions and caveats inevitably arise. As compared to the sources for Ptolemaic and Roman Egypt, those for Palestine are scarce and indirect. There is nonetheless good evidence

---

<sup>2</sup> Jesus und die Zöllner, 37 (cf. 225). Sometimes Herrenbrück offers English renderings that confuse the issue somewhat in my view, and I have avoided them for that reason.

<sup>3</sup> Ibid., 103–107.

<sup>4</sup> Ibid., 230, 282, 285–287, 282, 293.

(skillfully handled by Herrenbrück) for the contention that during the period of Ptolemaic hegemony, Palestine was indeed taxed under a comparable system. Inference and hypothesis, however, play a greater part in the argument when the Seleucid and Hasmonean periods are characterized; the nature of the evidence is such that any argument becomes less compelling at that stage. The Roman period brings the fresh complication that the impact of political change was frequently felt within the system of taxation, although the context and results of those changes are often unclear. Herrenbrück, greatly aided by Rostovtzeff's pioneering work, documents dramatic changes introduced by Gabinius between 57 and 54 BCE, and discusses the implications of a mixed system of publicani and pactiones, as in Asia Minor.<sup>5</sup> He also follows Rostovtzeff in characterizing Caesar's reform of 47 BCE as putting an end to the privileges of the publicani in Judaea as well as in Asia Minor, and he denies that Augustus or Tiberius changed matters dramatically in that regard. More particularly, Herrenbrück disputes Abraham Shalit's claim that Herod attempted to establish a system along Roman lines.<sup>6</sup> Herrenbrück's exegesis of Josephus, and to a lesser extent of Rabbinic sources, gives him the better of this argument at the moment, but the Herodian settlement and the introduction of prefects into Judaea after Archelaus may well have had more implications for τελώναι than Herrenbrück allows. Could that sort of complication lay behind Tacitus' notice (Ann. 2.42.5), for example, that Syria and Judaea requested a reduction of tribute under Tiberius?

Although Herrenbrück's argument is less secure than he sometimes presents it, it remains the most convincing exposition to date, and it certainly ought to lay to rest Mommsen's simple equation of τελώναι and portitores, which has had an unaccountably long life within the history of interpretation. In the application of Herrenbrück's argument to the gospels, however, certain cautions may be observed. He nicely distances himself from the apologetics of Emil Schürer, where τελῶναι are types of sinner, but he at least flirts with the apologetics of Adolf Büchler, where they are types of the ever appealing עַמְמֵי הָאֵרֶץ.<sup>7</sup>

---

<sup>5</sup> Michael Ivanovitch Rostovtzeff, The Social and Economic History of the Roman Empire, trans. P. M. Fraser (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1957); Jesus und die Zöllner, 185–192.

<sup>6</sup> Abraham Shalit, König Herodes. Der Mann und sein Werk, SJ 4, trans. Jehoshua Amir (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1969); Jesus und die Zöllner, 187–189.

The assessment of the τελῶναι within the gospels, however, should take account of the cultural context invoked by the texts, as well as the cultural history of the period. In this respect, a persistent lacuna emerges in Herrenbrück's otherwise excellent analysis. When customs-agents appear in the synoptic gospels, they persistently do so in the setting of disputes in regard to purity (Matt 9:10–13//Mark 2:15–17//Luke 5:29–32; Matt 11:19//Luke 7:34). In Matt 5:46–47; 18:17, the assumption is that the category is negative, and the τελῶναι are explicitly linked with Gentiles, while they are paired with harlots in Matt 21:31–32. In Luke 3:12 (cf. 7:29; 15:1), they are linked with soldiers. When Matthew is identified as a τελῶνης in Matt 10:3 and Levi is so identified in Luke 5:27, the obvious inference is that Jesus' pattern of association with impure people is invoked.

The assumption throughout is of an antithesis between τελῶναι and Pharisees, as this surfaces explicitly in Luke 18:9–14. This same pattern is evident from the evidence on the side of Rabbinic literature (Mishnah tractate Tohorot 7:6):<sup>8</sup>

If collectors entered the house, the house is unclean. If there is a Gentile with them, they are believed to state, We did not enter. But they are not believed when they say, We entered, but we did not touch [anything]. If thieves entered the house, unclean is only the place [trodden by] the feet of the thieves. And what do they render unclean? The foods, and the liquids, and clay utensils which are open. But the couches and the seats and clay utensils which are sealed with a tight seal are clean. If there is a gentile with them, or a woman, everything is unclean.

Both the Mishnah and the gospels suppose that customs-agents raise a particular concern in regard to the purity of households, and especially of foods. Why that should have surfaced in the case of Jesus is our next section.

---

<sup>7</sup> Theodor Mommsen, Römisches Staatsrecht (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1963); Emil Schürer, A History of the Jewish people in the time of Jesus, ed. Nahum N. Glatzer (New York: Schocken, 1978); Adolf Büchler, Studies in Sin and Atonement in the Rabbinic Literature of the First Century, JCP 11 (Oxford: Clarendon, 1928); Herrenbrück, Jesus und die Zöllner, 7, 189, 229–235, 254.

<sup>8</sup> This translation is adapted from Jacob Neusner, The Mishnah. A New Translation (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1988); for the Hebrew, see Philip Blackman, Mishnayot VI (Gateshead: Judaica, 1983), 514.

2. Their Particular Connection to Issues of Purity

Jesus' practice of commensality is still commonly treated as equivalent to "cleansing all foods" (Mark 7:19)—as if that uniquely Markan construct held for Jesus' entire program in regard to purity, and as if food were the beginning and end of the issue of purity. Neither aspect of that conventional opinion has much to offer any more as an analysis of Jesus' position, but a liberal consensus, usually speaking in a Pauline idiom, makes Jesus into a cipher for grace and purity into a cipher for law. In that way, the gospels support the argument that the Torah and anything like it have been relativized by the revelation of Christ. In its present form, the consensus appears to stretch back to Adolf von Harnack.<sup>9</sup> Many "conservative" scholars attribute such a transcendence of purity to "the historical Jesus" whom they believe the gospels attest directly. In a different idiom, some scholars who proudly insist there is not much at all to be said about the figure of Jesus nonetheless find a way to have him make all foods clean: they make the Hellenistic matrix of the Gospels into an alternative to Judaic conceptions of purity.<sup>10</sup>

The liberal paradigm encounters and creates more and more anomalies, the greater our knowledge of the New Testament's development and the better our familiarity with the anthropology of purity. "Cleansing all foods" has the sheen of a universally applicable principle, until you see it demolished as such in Acts 15:13–21. Not even the liberal Jesus of conventional opinion is up to denying the laws of kashrut, only to have his own brother invoke them afresh. That we

---

<sup>9</sup> See Wilhelm Pauck, Harnack and Troeltsch. Two Historical Theologians (New York: Oxford University Press, 1968). Pauck aptly cites (31–2) Harnack's formulation in his Wesen des Christentums, "The Christian religion is something lofty and simple and is concerned only about one point: Eternal life in the midst of time through God's power and in his presence. It is not an ethical or social arcanum for the purpose of preserving all sorts of things or of improving them." It is the burden of Pauck's study that Harnack's liberal historical approach was consciously framed to challenge ecclesiasticism, a program which is easily instanced in the literature today.

<sup>10</sup> For a searching criticism of this Pauline reading of Jesus, courtesy of the concept of purity, see E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1985), 172–187. More recently, see the cautions of Richard Horsley, "Jesus, Itinerant Cynic or Israelite Prophet?" in Images of Jesus Today, ed. J. H. Charlesworth and W. P. Weaver, Faith and Scholarship Colloquies 3 (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1994) 68–97, as well as his Archaeology, History and Society in Galilee. The Social Context of Jesus and the Rabbis (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1996).

are dealing with a gloss in Mark is commonly agreed (although who did the glossing is a perennial debate).<sup>11</sup> Had anything like the Markan policy been widely accepted as the dominical position, the early Christian centuries would have seen much less controversy regarding what might be eaten, and with whom than they in fact did.

A closer look at Mark 7 reveals a variety of policies in regard to purity, all of which are attributed to Jesus. An aphorism (7:14–15) speaks of the direction in which impurity flows. The assertion is easily construed in Aramaic attested from Jesus' period and place,<sup>12</sup> and is attractive when it is so rendered:

לא דמן בר אנשא / דאתה בה דמטמיה
ברא מן דאתן מן / בר אנשא אלן דמטמיה

Representation in English can preserve the aphorism's structure:

nothing that is outside a person / entering one defiles one, except that things coming from / a person, these defile one.

To this teaching there are attached distinct instructions about different kinds of purity: not to make the vow of qorban in order to protect one's wealth from one's parents (7:6–13), not to engage in impure thoughts (7:17–23), not to insist upon hand-washing (7:1–5), and—as we have seen—a bold gloss about the significance of the teaching as a whole in regard to foods (7:19c).

Mark 7:6–13 insists that what is owed to one's parents cannot be sheltered by declaring it dedicated to the Temple. The crucial point of such a gambit of sheltering is that one might continue to use the property after its dedication, while what was given to a person would be transferred forthwith.<sup>13</sup> Complaint about the practice, especially as stated in the simple epigram of Mark 7:11–12, is consistent with taking offense at commercial arrangements associated with the cult (see Matt 17:24–27; Mark 12:41–44// Luke 21:1–4). The epigram about qorban is also hyperbolic, involving the claim that Jesus' opponents do not permit one to do anything for one's parents (Mark 7:12). It is reminiscent of the imagery of pearls and swine (Matt 7:6), needles and camels (Matt 19:24//Mark 10:25 //Luke 18:25), outwardly clean cups that are grossly impure (Matt 23:25//Luke 11:39).

<sup>11</sup> See H. B. Swete, The Gospel according to St Mark. The Greek Text with Introduction, Notes and Indices (London: Macmillan, 1913), 152.

<sup>12</sup> For a discussion of the Aramaic mashal and its wider setting, see Chilton, "A Generative Exegesis of Mark 7:1–23," The Journal of Higher Criticism 3 (1996): 18–37; also in Chilton with Craig A. Evans, Jesus in Context. Temple, Purity and Restoration, AGJU 39 (Leiden: Brill, 1997), 297–317.

<sup>13</sup> Cf. m. Ned. 1:2; 3:2; 5:6; 8:7; 9:1; Z. W. Falk, "Notes and Observations on Talmudic Vows," HTR 59 (1966): 309–312; E. Bammel, "Gottes DIATHHKH (Gal. III.17–17) und das jüdische Rechtsdenken," NTS 6 (1959–60): 313–319; K. H. Rengstorff, "korban, korbanas," TDNT 3: 860–866.

The hyperbolic epigram has here been enveloped in a much more elaborate argument, which makes the policy about qorban seem different from the aphorism about defilement in rhetoric as well as in substance. Mark 7:6–13 is a syllogism, developed by means of scriptural terms of reference. Isaiah's complaint<sup>14</sup> frames the entire argument: the people claim to honor God, but their heart is as far from him as their vain worship, rooted in human commandments (Mark 7:6b–7). That statement is related in Mark 7:10–12 to the tradition of qorban, taken as an invalidation of the Mosaic prescription to honor parents, in both its positive<sup>15</sup> and its negative<sup>16</sup> forms. The simple and unavoidable conclusion is that the tradition violates the command of God (Mark 7:8–9, 13).

There is nothing complicated about the logic of the argument, and it can easily be structured in a different way. Matthew, in fact, takes us from the conclusion, through the Mosaic prescription in its contradiction by qorban, and on to the citation of Isaiah (see Matt 15:3–9). The association of similar passages is reminiscent of the rabbinic rule of interpretation, that a principle expressed in a text may be related to another passage of Scripture, without identity of wording between the two passages.<sup>17</sup> But the scriptural syllogism by no means requires the invocation of any such formal principle. The fundamental argument is that the Law and the Prophets (the latter in a Septuagintal form, referring to the "commandments of men" in Isa 29:13) are antithetical to the practice of authorities in the Temple.

The next change in rhetoric and setting, however, is of far greater importance in shaping the received meaning of the passage. The rhetorical moves involved are, to begin with, private comment and

<sup>14</sup> In Isa 29:13; the form of the quotation is closest to that of the Septuagint, but is identical to no known ancient version.

<sup>15</sup> See Exod 20:12; Deut 5:16.

<sup>16</sup> See Exod 21:17; Lev 20:9.

<sup>17</sup> See Chilton and Craig A. Evans, "Jesus and Israel's Scriptures," in Studying the Historical Jesus. Evaluations of the State of Current Research, ed. Chilton and Evans, New Testament Tools and Studies 19 (Leiden: Brill, 1994), 281–335, esp. 294–295.

catalogue (Mark 7:17–23).<sup>18</sup> In a house, apart from the crowd, the disciples ask Jesus what he means in his parabolic aphorism concerning what defiles (7:17). He replies in a way that makes “what goes into a person” the exact equivalent of food, passing through the stomach and into the latrine, where its risible lack of importance at last becomes obvious even to the uninitiated (7:18–19). What proceeds from a person, however, is equated with a list of “bad thoughts”: fornications, thefts, murders, adulteries, covetings, evil, deceit, debauchery, envy, blasphemy, arrogance, and foolishness, these are the evils which are said to defile a person (7:20–23).

The two forms of rhetoric, the comment and the catalogue, are symmetrical. The comment, in response to a question (vv. 17–19), specifies that Jesus’ original saying had refuted the impurity of foods. The explicit gloss at the end of v. 19, “cleansing all foods,” draws out the logic of the comment. The catalogue insists, on the other hand, that defilement is to be taken seriously, once it is understood to be moral instead of alimentary (see the references to defilement, by means of the verb κοινῶω, in v. 20 and in v. 23). The list of intellectual vices defines them as the most dangerous impurities. The two rhetorical forms correspond to two complementary redefinitions of purity. It can no longer be a matter of what is eaten, but must be seen as a matter of what is thought.

Both of those concerns are characteristic of Hellenistic Christianity. Paul reports favorably on the practice in Antioch before emissaries from James came, when meals could be conducted with common fellowship among Jewish and non-Jewish followers of Jesus (see Gal 2:12). According to Paul, the arrival of those emissaries caused Peter to separate from non-Jews, and even his partner Barnabas acceded to the separation (Gal 2:12–13). The tendency of Hellenistic communities of Christians to mix their Jewish and non-Jewish constituencies, and therefore to relax or ignore issues of purity in foods, is here documented by Paul (ca. 53 CE).<sup>19</sup>

<sup>18</sup> It is common to see the section as offering an interpretation of Jesus’ aphorism; cf. W. L. Lane, The Gospel According to Mark (NIC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1974), 255–256.

<sup>19</sup> Cf. Lane, Mark, 256; and B. Chilton, A Feast of Meanings: Eucharistic Theologies from Jesus through Johannine Circles, NovTSup 72 (Leiden: Brill, 1994), 109–130; Rabbi Paul. An Intellectual Biography (New York: Doubleday, 2004), 147–170.

Vincent Taylor long ago pointed out that the vocabulary of the list of vices in Mark 7 is more typical of the Pauline corpus (in the broadest sense) than of any other body of literature in the New Testament.<sup>20</sup> What is even more interesting is the express connection between such vices and the term “impurity” in Rom 1:24; Gal 5:19; Eph 4:19; 5:3; Col 3:5. It appears that early Christianity (which Paul and the deutero-Pauline corpus reflect together with Mark) saw a shift in the understanding of the medium of impurity: no longer foods, but moral intentions, conveyed the danger of defilement.

In order to recast the whole of the tradition as an assertion of a new medium of impurity, defined on Jesus’ authority, a rhetorical method needed to be found which would point all of the arguments in the same direction that the latest developments indicated. The solution was a synthetic device of enormous power: narrative context. The arguments generally—with their varying rhetorics and different topics—are presented in the context of a dispute. Pharisees and scribes observe that Jesus’ disciples do not wash their hands before meals; they object, and Jesus goes on to reply by means of the material already described (Matt 15:1–2; Mark 7:1–2, 5).<sup>21</sup>

The new context, of course, has nothing precisely to do with the arguments that are then attributed to Jesus. Qorban, the direction of defilement, the comparative danger of foods and vices are all interesting matters, more or less related by a common interest in what true purity is, but none of those arguments actually answers the Pharisaic/scribal objection to not washing prior to a meal. The narrative context proceeds on the supreme and laconic assurance that the readership already understands that all Pharisaic/scribal practices are to be grouped together, and accorded the same sort of weight one would attribute to washing one’s hands. How the community eats, and with whom, is the central concern, which then determines one’s stance in respect of all that pertains to purity. The context assumed is very much like that of Gal 2, although the position taken is different from Paul’s, insofar as a positive place is found for purity.

---

<sup>20</sup> V. Taylor, The Gospel According to St. Mark (New York: St Martin’s, 1966), 347. A comparative table of usages appears on p. 346.

<sup>21</sup> In Luke 11:37–38 the narrative context is developed further. A single Pharisee invites Jesus to dine, and is astonished when his guest does not wash. Luke permits us to see an alternative development of this cycle of tradition at the time of that Gospel’s redaction in Antioch.

The power of the new rhetorical device is demonstrated by the fact that Jesus never answers the question that is posed to him by the Pharisees concerning the washing of hands. The response needs to be filled in by the hearer or reader, who has been catechized to the point that it seems evident that there is a new, inner purity of moral intention that supersedes the usual practices of Judaism.<sup>22</sup>

What is striking about all these policies is that in their different ways they map the territory of the clean and unclean, and explain how to negotiate the boundary. It is quite true that the territory looks increasingly “moral,” and less “cultic,” the closer one approaches the preferred idiom of Mark, but that in no way diminishes the sense of the contagion which an impure thought can provoke. Indeed, The Shepherd of Hermas opens with just the sort of disturbing thought-experiment which a serious reading of Mark 7 encourages:<sup>23</sup> what happens when one of the proscribed designs actually does proceed from one’s heart? That is to say: moving from the “cultic” to the “moral” realm does not by itself entail a denial of purity. Such moves rather map a fresh territory of the clean and unclean. Mark 7 in any case deals not only with the map of the moral “heart,” but also with the map of the household, the map of the Temple, and the map of the human body.

If Jesus and his movement are to be understood within practices of purity rather than against them, our liberal myth is evidently in trouble. An alternative is at a fledgling stage, where much remains to be worked out. Fortunately, that task has been undertaken vigorously. One of the inhibitions against seeing Jesus in the context of purity was that, especially in North American scholarship during the 1980’s, Galilee was virtually annexed in Athens. If pig bones were found in Sepphoris, the surmise has sometimes run, why would Jesus not have eaten a ham sandwich? Eric Meyers has commented:

Why so many scholars have associated the rural landscape of Galilee with all its towns and villages as being devoid of Jewish learning as well as lacking in the everyday accoutrements of a Greco-Roman lifestyle is hard to understand, and I leave it for others in the discipline of New Testament to reflect on.<sup>24</sup>

---

<sup>22</sup> In a recent thesis discussed below, Jonathan Klawans correctly observes that both sorts of purity are at issue in Judaism, but he does not take account of variegations and shifts within Christian practice; see Impurity and Sin in Ancient Judaism (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000) 136–157.

<sup>23</sup> See Chilton, “Christianity,” in Women and Families, ed. J. Neusner, The Pilgrim Library of World Religions (Cleveland: Pilgrim Press, 1999), 26–49.

More reflective archaeology has indeed stressed the regionalism of Galilee, evinced by artifacts and architectures that relate to the practice of purity. Marianne Sawicki's "cognitive archaeology"<sup>25</sup> and continuing study of synagogues and miqvaot<sup>26</sup> are especially eloquent in this regard, although the earlier contributions of Sean Freyne, James Strange, Eric Meyers and Richard Horsley are also very much a part of the same reevaluation.<sup>27</sup>

The immersion of John the Baptist has obvious implications for the study of Jesus, and my own address of that topic has been ancillary to other concerns.<sup>28</sup> So it was a delight for me to be involved as series editor with the rich treatment of Joan E. Taylor, which establishes that John is chiefly to be understood as a purifier. At long last the apologetic picture of John as a prophet of Jesus has been replaced with an appropriate emphasis upon his practice of repeated immersion with repentance.<sup>29</sup> This, in turn, roots Jesus' own practice within the issue of purity.

Of course, shifts in practices of purity as reflected within Christian sources are never likely to be understood apart from an appreciation of cognate shifts within Judaic sources. For this reason, the social-historical work of Craig Evans and the systemic analyses of Jacob Neusner have been immensely helpful, and collaborating with them on several

---

<sup>24</sup> "Jesus and His Galilean Context," in Archaeology and the Galilee. Texts and Contents in the Graeco-Roman and Byzantine Periods, ed. D. R. Edwards, and C. T. McCollough, SFSHJ 143 (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1997), 57–66, esp. 65–65.

<sup>25</sup> Crossing Galilee. Architectures of Contact in the Occupied Land of Jesus (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 2000).

<sup>26</sup> See D. Urman and P. V. M. Flesher, eds., Ancient Synagogues. Historical Analysis and Archaeological Discovery, SPB 47 (Leiden: Brill, 1995, 1998).

<sup>27</sup> See especially in Archaeology and the Galilee: Texts and Contexts in the Byzantine Period, ed. D. R. Edwards and C. T. McCollough, (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1997), and R. Horsley, Archaeology, History and Society in Galilee: The Social Context of Jesus and the Rabbis (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1996).

<sup>28</sup> "Yochanan the Purifier and His Immersion," Toronto Journal of Theology 14.2 (1998): 197–212; Jesus' Baptism and Jesus' Healing. His Personal Practice of Spirituality (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1998); "John the Purifier," Forum 2.1 (1999): 125–139.

<sup>29</sup> The Immerser: John the Baptist within Second Temple Judaism, Studying the Historical Jesus 2 (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1997).

volumes has taught me more than I can say.<sup>30</sup> Recently, books by Paula Fredricksen,<sup>31</sup> Elizabeth Schüssler Fiorenza,<sup>32</sup> Jostein Ådna,<sup>33</sup> and Christian Grappe<sup>34</sup> represent positive engagement with the issue of purity, and in that, they are taking up the clear if less emphatic leads in the earlier works of James D. G. Dunn,<sup>35</sup> Ben F. Meyer,<sup>36</sup> Marcus Borg,<sup>37</sup> E. P. Sanders,<sup>38</sup> and N. T. Wright.<sup>39</sup> Indeed, I would suggest that an adjustment to the cultural issue of purity, together with a willingness to correct the positivism often associated with “the historical Jesus,” represent genuine advances during the past thirty years. So having learned so much from scholars who have contributed within the field of purity, what do I believe we can say, and what questions remain to be answered? By referring to some texts that have featured centrally in discussion, I will attempt both questions.<sup>40</sup>

The analogy of a map, readable in cultural rather than literally historical terms, may prove useful again at this point. Rural Galilee defines Jesus’ characteristic activity in the gospels, and Jerusalem is the only major city that concerns him. His venture east of the sea of Galilee is a disaster for a local herd of swine, and for any probability

---

<sup>30</sup> See, for example, Chilton and Evans, Jesus in Context. Temple, Purity and Restoration, AGJU 39 (Leiden: Brill, 1997); Chilton and Neusner, Judaism in the New Testament. Practices and Beliefs (London and New York: Routledge, 1995).

<sup>31</sup> Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews: A Jewish Life and the Emergence of Christianity (New York: Knopf, 1999), reviewed in Bible Review 16.4 (August, 2000): 54–58.

<sup>32</sup> Jesus and the Politics of Interpretation (New York: Continuum, 2000), reviewed in Anglican Theological Review 83.4 (2001): 886–887.

<sup>33</sup> Jesu Stellung zum Tempel. Die Tempelaktion und das Tempelwort als Ausdruck seiner messianischen Sendung, WUNT 119 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2000).

<sup>34</sup> Le Royaume de Dieu. Avant, avec et après Jésus, Le Monde de la Bible 42 (Geneva: Labor et Fides, 2001), reviewed in Bulletin for Biblical Research 12.2 (2002): 287–290.

<sup>35</sup> Jesus and the Spirit: A Study of the Religious and Charismatic Experience of Jesus and the First Christians as Reflected in the New Testament (London: SCM, 1975).

<sup>36</sup> The Aims of Jesus (London: SCM, 1979).

<sup>37</sup> Conflict, Holiness and Politics in the Teachings of Jesus, Studies in the Bible & Early Christianity 5 (New York: Edwin Mellen Press, 1984). Klawans, Impurity and Sin, 144–145 attacks Borg for globally distancing Jesus from any system of purity, but it is a credit to Borg’s scholarship that he develops evidence that disconfirms the liberal paradigm he defends in the end.

<sup>38</sup> Jesus and Judaism.

<sup>39</sup> Jesus and the Victory of God, Christian Religions and the Question of God 2 (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1993, 1996).

<sup>40</sup> For a fuller discussion, and citation of the associated passages, see my The Temple of Jesus. His Sacrificial Program Within a Cultural History of Sacrifice (University Park: The Pennsylvania State University Press, 1992), and Rabbi Jesus. An Intimate Biography (New York: Doubleday, 2000).

that he would find accommodation in Decapolis (Mark 5:1–20); his venture west of Nazareth, into Syro-Phoenecian territory, finds him comparing a Gentile and her sick daughter to dogs (Mark 7:24–30). His exorcisms target unclean spirits (Mark 1:21–28), while his theory of healing is the forgiveness of sin (Mark 2:1–12). Although he keeps his distance from the Temple except for pilgrimage, his cleansing a “leper” allows for a sacrifice demanded by the book of Leviticus (Mark 1:40–44).

The last case deserves a second look, however, because Jesus famously truncates the Levitical procedure. He tells the scabby man to go directly to the Temple, not to the local priest for the preliminary sacrifice of cleansing mandated in the book of Leviticus (Lev 14:1–20). Within the Levitical map, then, Jesus keeps his bearings, but also takes a short cut. And this is not the only one. He also travels through Samaria (John 4:1–42), sends followers to eat in towns and villages in Galilee on the assumption that what is set before them to eat is pure (Luke 10:1–12), and commends a local centurion near Capernaum for his faith (Matt 8:5–13). When he makes his final visit to Jerusalem, he attacks the merchants of the Temple to insist upon the short cut that ends them all (Mark 11:15–18): Israelite offerings in the sanctuary, without commercial mediation.

As Cecil Roth suggested long ago,<sup>41</sup> Zech 14 is central to the events in Jerusalem (at least from the perspective of Jesus’ movement). But the prophetic text accounts for more than that. It almost goes without saying—although T. W. Manson did say it, and very convincingly<sup>42</sup>—that the entry into Jerusalem is accounted for by Zech 14, because so many of the elements of Zechariah and its connection with the festal procession of Sukkoth are taken up in the narratives. But beyond that, we also have in Zechariah the forgiveness of sins before the Throne of God (Zech 3:1–5, 9–10; 13:1), the promise of Spirit (4:6; cf. 7:12), criticism of fasting (7:2–7; 8:18–19), the prophecy of bad shepherding in the Temple (11:1–12:9), as well as the removal of an unclean spirit (13:2) and the climactic vision of a Sukkoth of universal range and terrible violence in a Temple cleared of merchants (14:1–21). From the present perspective, what is most startling is that Jesus shares with

<sup>41</sup> “The Cleansing of the Temple and Zechariah xiv 21,” NovT 4 (1960): 174–181.

<sup>42</sup> “The Cleansing of the Temple,” Bulletin of the John Rylands Library 33 (1951): 271–282.

Zechariah and Haggai (1:14; 2:4–5, 10–19), the book with which it was closely associated, a principle of contagious purity, such that impurity could be overcome by the presence of God's Spirit (see Matt 12:28// Luke 11:20).<sup>43</sup>

To deny the relevance of this prophetic and apocalyptic scenario to an understanding of the likely motivation of Jesus is possible only by setting aside many levels of tradition in the New Testament. I understand that the liberal myth would like us to do that, reducing resonances with “the Old Testament” to proof texts, and discounting cultural resonance with Judaism—even as attested in the Dead Sea Scrolls—on the alleged grounds of the chronology of Rabbinic sources. But were concerns for purity a figment of later authors, that would not account for their rich representations within different layers of the gospels, nor for the policies later attributed to teachers such as James and Paul. These policies and their variants support the inference of Jesus' Zecharian program of purity, a practice suited to the conviction that God's Spirit was transforming the world so as to establish the divine kingdom. That warranted the inclusion of even customs-agents within Jesus' movement, since defilement moved from the inside out, rather than the outside in according to his judgment. That basic orientation emerges as a secure finding of the current generation of research. The remaining challenge is to understand how Jesus' principle was applied practically, and “the sinners” are a good guide to that application.

3. The Identification of “Sinners”

Cleanness and holiness are of irreducible or systemic importance within the Mishnah: there is no future in attempting to decipher the two conditions, of being clean and being holy, as metaphors of moral station or of accessibility to redemption. The issue naturally emerges, however, whether that Judaism evinced by Mishnah is the milieu in which the movement that resulted in the New Testament unfolded. Methodological skepticism is warranted, but an undifferentiated exclusion of the evidence of Mishnah would be most unwise. Early, pre-Mishnaic Judaism is not substantially recoverable from sectarian,

---

<sup>43</sup> Jesus' Baptism and Jesus' Healing. His Personal Practice of Spirituality (Harrisburg: Trinity Press International, 1998) 5, 71–78.

Hellenistic, and apocalyptic writings alone. They are no more “normative” than Rabbinica were once taken to be. The rabbis and their predecessors contributed to the mix of early Judaism, although their dominance later brought about a distinctive phase, a Judaism in which purity was a matter of fidelity to halakhah, as defined by the dual Torah, and no longer a matter of what actually could occur in association with worship in the Temple. But the issue of purity is inherent within the gospels, that is to say, within that development of Judaism—shaped by Jesus and his followers—which produced the gospels.

If we may limit our attention, for the moment, to one thematic example from the synoptic gospels, the matter of purifying leprosy proves to be of systemic importance. Jesus cleanses a leper, as we have seen, and orders him to see a priest and bring an offering (Matt 8:1–4//Mark 1:40–44 //Luke 5:12–14). Sometimes by the presentation of comparable material (cf. Matt 11:5//Luke 7:22), sometimes by employing differing rhetorical tactics and materials altogether (cf. Matt 10:8; Luke 17:12–19), Matthew and Luke contrive to present cleansing from leprosy as a characteristic and paradigmatic feature of Jesus’ ministry.

When Ed Sanders deals with the question of sayings of Jesus in which practices of purity are commended or condemned, he makes short shrift of them, as being inauthentic in their present form.<sup>44</sup> He is not loath, in principle, to dismiss entire pericopae, such as the story concerning what happened when Jesus’ disciples plucked grain on the Sabbath, as “creation(s) of the church.”<sup>45</sup> It is possible that the pericope of the cleansing of the leper might be dealt with in that way (although that has not been the trend in recent scholarship), but Sanders’ index gives no trace of such a treatment. It is interesting, in this context, that the eight “almost indisputable facts” about Jesus upon which Sanders sets out to base his work contain no reference at all to any of Jesus’ disputes concerning purity and holiness.<sup>46</sup>

---

<sup>44</sup> E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (London: SCM; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985) 260–261, 276–277 (on Matt 23:25–26), and 266 (on Mark 7:15). Luke 11:39 is not cited in the index.

<sup>45</sup> Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 266, on the same page on which Mark 7:15 is discussed.

<sup>46</sup> Ibid., 11.

His closest approach to that nexus of issues is in his discussion of Jesus' occupation of the Temple. In that discussion, however, Sanders consciously dispenses with an approach based upon a sensitivity to purity,<sup>47</sup> and instead argues that "Jesus' action is to be regarded as a symbolic demonstration,"<sup>48</sup> in respect of the destruction of the Temple. The idea is that Jesus predicted the end of the extant Temple, and the establishment of a new one, as a prophet of restoration, after the pattern of Essene and apocalyptic literature.<sup>49</sup> Instead of serving as a focus of sanctity, in Sanders's judgment the Temple is simply where Jesus chooses to engage in a symbolic act. The category of cleanness is simply left to the side.<sup>50</sup>

There appear to be two reasons why Sanders proceeds in the manner he does. First, he genuinely believes that matters of purity, in the Judaism of the first century, were expendable. He conceives of the Pharisees, for example, as a party devoted to the oral law and its explication, rather than as a movement concerned systemically with issues of purity.<sup>51</sup> "Ritual" and "trivia" are to Sanders's mind a natural association,<sup>52</sup> so that a concern with such matters would not, on his assessment, characterize a group as important as the Pharisees undoubtedly were. Second, Sanders has a consistent interest in portraying Jesus as a teacher who accepted, not merely the impure, but the wicked into his fellowship. Indeed, the latter concern amounts to

<sup>47</sup> Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 67–68.

<sup>48</sup> Ibid., 69–71.

<sup>49</sup> Ibid., 77–90.

<sup>50</sup> Consistent with his disregard of Jesus' concerns with purity, Sanders (Jesus and Judaism, 364 n. 1) dismisses Mark 11:16, saying that it is "probably a later addition" and therefore "plays no role in our analysis."

<sup>51</sup> Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 188, 388–389. Sanders leaves out of consideration Neusner's Judaism: The Evidence of Mishnah (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1981), in which a systemic concern for sanctification is established. Two recent works, by scholars of the New Testament, accept the Pharisaic focus upon purity, cf. M. J. Borg, Conflict, Holiness and Politics in the Teaching of Jesus, SBEC 5 (New York: Mellen, 1984); and R. P. Booth, Jesus and the Laws of Purity: Tradition and Legal History in Mark 7, JSNTSup 13 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1986). Sanders appears not to have observed that the Pharisaic and rabbinic movements did not regard their traditions as ends in themselves, but as instrumental. What distinguished them from the covenanters of Qumran, Philo, and the teachers of Wisdom in the Diaspora was not a concern for traditions of the elders, but what they did with such traditions.

<sup>52</sup> The linking of the two words in several forms appears in Jesus and Judaism, 180, 187, 210. Sanders first refers to "ritual and trivia" when he characterizes the tendency of scholarship to equate ritual and trivia as Pharisaic preoccupations. In his defense of the Pharisees, he seems inadvertently to consign the issue of purity to puritanical "minutiae" (187).

a driving force within Jesus and Judaism, and requires some explanation in respect of the present question.

In his longest consideration within Jesus and Judaism of the place of purity in Judaism,<sup>53</sup> Sanders accepts without demur that cleanness was fundamentally related to the suitability of persons or objects to approach the Temple. Once the issue is placed in that context, of course, the pericopae in which Jesus is said to engage in disputes concerning purity are naturally associated with those in which Jesus pronounces on cultic matters. His cultic teaching in Matthew includes reference to the taking of oaths (23:16–22), instructions for the offering of sacrifice (5:23,24), and an elaborate story that relates to the payment of the half shekel (17:24–27; cf. 23:23; Luke 11:42). All of those passages are uniquely Matthean, and yet are widely accepted as relating to the substance of Jesus' attitude towards the Temple. Multiply attested traditions—Jesus' teaching in respect of a widow's offering (Mark 12:41–44; Luke 21:1–4), his occupation of the holy precincts (Matt 21:12, 13; Mark 11:15–17; Luke 19:45,46), his discourse concerning the destruction of the Temple (Matt 26:61; Mark 14.58)—consistently reinforce the impression that the Temple was no mere symbol, but a focus of active, practical concern within Jesus' movement. But Sanders ignores the natural association of purity with the Temple, and deconstructs purity, in terms of moral wickedness.

The collapse of purity, from a cultic category of integral meaning into a subset of moral stature, is accomplished by means of dubious exegesis. Proceeding from a reading of Lev 7:22–27 (the prohibition against eating fats and blood), Sanders comes to the conclusion that “A few purity transgressions, such as eating blood, are in and of themselves sins; that is, they require atonement.”<sup>54</sup> The sole justification for the finding is (a) that the penalty for the act in Leviticus is that the transgressor “shall be cut off from his people,” and (b) that “In the later Rabbinic interpretation, ‘cutting off’ puts the transgression strictly between human [sic!] and God, and is atoned for by repentance.”<sup>55</sup> The simple fact of the matter is, that the phrase only appears in Leviticus within the nexus of purity and sacrifice (7:20, 21, 24, 27; 17:4, 9, 14; 18:29; 19:8; 20:17.18; 22:3; 23:29).<sup>56</sup> That Sanders should cite a few verses in isolation, ignore their literary setting, impute a foreign meaning to them, and then transfer that meaning to the whole of “the later Rabbinic interpretation,” is astonishing.

<sup>53</sup> Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 182–85.

<sup>54</sup> Ibid., 183.

<sup>55</sup> Ibid., 183.

The basis of Sanders’ perspective, of course, is less any text or group of texts than a global view of Judaism: “wickedness comes not from impurity as such, but from the attitude that the commandments of the Bible need not be heeded.”<sup>57</sup> Sanders’ intentionalist construal of Judaism is also apparent in his earlier work;<sup>58</sup> the grounds of his confident generalization are less so. It is nonetheless used as a hermeneutical category that links early Judaism and rabbinic Judaism.

Ultimately, what is required according to Sanders is that one intends to remain in the covenant, intends to be obedient.<sup>59</sup> Sanders’s conclusion therefore requires a faulty exegesis of Leviticus, an excessively unitary view of Judaism, and a hypothetically invoked myth of intentionalism. Only so can impurity be equated with wickedness. The thematic importance of that equation pervades Jesus and Judaism. Sanders treats “the sinners” as a primary category through which Jesus’ ministry is to be approached.<sup>60</sup> Within that treatment, the category of impurity dissolves into that of sin, and sin in turn becomes wickedness. Sanders relates the term “sinners,” in the accusation that Jesus’ fellowship included the unacceptable, to the word “wicked” in Hebrew (resha'im), which Sanders construes to be a technical term for those outside the pale of Judaism. No argumentation whatever is offered for the equation with ἀμαρτωλοί (“sinners”) in the Gospels, apart from a reference to Paul and Palestinian Judaism.<sup>61</sup> The discussion in that work also does not substantiate a reading of ἀμαρτωλοί in terms of רשעים, although it does establish that “the wicked” are, on the whole, scheduled more for punishment than for repentance.

---

<sup>56</sup> Lev 20:17 may appear to be an exception, in that the issue is sexual, but the context of the chapter, and particularly the material which follows, establish the normative perspective of Leviticus.

<sup>57</sup> Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 185.

<sup>58</sup> Sanders, Paul and Palestinian Judaism. A Comparison of Patterns of Religion (London: SCM, 1977), 147. Sanders here calls the intentionalism on which he bases his scheme “all-pervasive.” But the “intention” to which he appeals as a rabbinic category is not defined or defended.

<sup>59</sup> Sanders, Paul and Palestinian Judaism, 177.

<sup>60</sup> Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 174–211.

<sup>61</sup> Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 386 n. 16, citing Paul and Palestinian Judaism, 142–143, 203, 342–345, 351–355, 357–358, 361, 399–404, 414.

The central, linguistic equation of Sanders' case, however, remains unexamined. From the point of view of ordinary, exegetical practice, that is the Achilles' heel of the thesis under consideration.

Within the Septuagint ἀμαρτωλός corresponds to five roots in the Masoretic Text (חטא, חנף, חרש, רע and רשע), only the last of which would support the equation proposed by Sanders.<sup>62</sup> When the probabilities of translation into Aramaic are also taken into account, that equation appears difficult to sustain. The root רשע does appear, for example, in the Isaiah Targum, both adjectivally and as an abstract noun. The Hebrew roots רשע and חנף are represented by the Aramaic usage, but the other three equivalents of ἀμαρτωλός are not.<sup>63</sup> Clearly, the linguistic range of רשע in Aramaic is not as wide as that of ἀμαρτωλός in Greek. By contrast, the roots רשע, חנף, חטא and several others are presented by appropriate forms of the Aramaic term חובא (and its verbal counterparts): “debtor,” or “sinner,” is the functional equivalent of words covering a variety of defects in the Masoretic Text. When the semantic range of Targumic חובא is considered, two features of the usage are immediately striking from the present point of view. First, because Hebrew רשע can be included within a wider list of roots for representation by a form of חובא, the argument that “the wicked” is a technical term appears strained. (There is, of course, no question but that “the wicked” is a harsh designation; only its technical meaning, as putting someone beyond the pale of the covenant, is at issue here.) Second, the Aramaic usage חובא, which may or may not represent (or correspond to) רשע in Hebrew, is the natural counterpart of ἀμαρτωλός in the Septuagint. As a simple matter of fact, “debtors” can be seen in the Targum of Isaiah as punished by the Messiah (11:4), destroyed by the LORD (14:4, 5), but also as capable of repentance (28:24, 25), as a species of wicked Gentile (34:2), or another enemy of Jerusalem (54:17).<sup>64</sup> Such various usages make any appeal to a univocal or exclusive meaning of the Aramaic term incredible. Quite evidently, only a contextual construal of living instances of the word will produce an accurate appraisal of its meaning.

<sup>62</sup> E. Hatch and H. A. Redpath, A Concordance to the Septuagint (Oxford: Clarendon, 1897; repr. Graz: Akademische Druck- und Verlagsanstalt, 1975), 64–65. Sanders' review of the evidence of the Septuagint is so incomplete as to be misleading; cf. Jesus and Judaism, 342. The simple fact is that hamartolos is used too flexibly to be equated with a “technical term” of restricted meaning, as Sanders claims in Jesus and Judaism, 177.

<sup>63</sup> J. B. van Zijl, A Concordance to the Targum of Isaiah, SBLAS 3 (Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1979), 182–183.

<sup>64</sup> Cf. van Zijl, A Concordance to the Targum of Isaiah, 57–58; A. Sperber, The Bible in Aramaic, III. The Latter Prophets (Brill: Leiden, 1962); and Chilton, The

Within the gospels, a coherent language of "debt" is attributed to Jesus. When, in the Matthean version of the Lord's Prayer, Jesus instructs his followers to ask God, "forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors," there is no doubt but that the New Testament is preserving an Aramaic idiom (6:12). Luke only partially preserves the usage: "Forgive us our sins, as we also forgive everyone who is indebted to us" (11:4). Jesus' recourse to the Aramaic idiom is not a mere matter of convention: several of his parables turn on the metaphorical and literal senses of "debt," much as in the Targum of Isa 50:1, where the term refers in one breath to money owed, and in another breath to sins before God.<sup>65</sup>

Several instances of parabolic presentation of "debt" in this sense are especially striking. In Matt 18:23–35, a debtor is said to owe the astronomical sum of ten thousand talents (18:24). When it is borne in mind that the annual imposition of tax by Herod Antipas upon the whole of Galilee and Peraea amounted to merely two hundred talents (cf. Ant. 17.319), the hyperbole involved in the parable becomes readily apparent. The debtor is in no position to repay such a debt, nor is there any credible way in which he could have incurred it. He behaves astoundingly, after his debt is forgiven (v. 27), in a manner all but calculated to trivialize such forgiveness: he refuses to deal mercifully with a colleague who owed him one hundred denarii (vv. 28–30). The latter amount is by no means insignificant: a single denarius has been estimated as the going rate for a full day of labor.<sup>66</sup> But the

---

Isaiah Targum: Introduction, Translation, and Notes, ArBib 11 (Wilmington: Glazier, 1987).

<sup>65</sup> The passage reads as follows: "Thus says the LORD, 'Where is the bill of divorce which I gave your congregation, that it is rejected? Or who had a debt against me, to whom I have sold you? Behold, for your sins you were sold, and for your apostasies your congregation was rejected.'" As in The Isaiah Targum, italicized words represent innovative departures of the Aramaic rendering from the Hebrew text which underlies it. The first usage of "debt" corresponds well to the underlying idea in the MT, which refers to creditors. The second usage (here rendered "sins") represents "iniquities" in the Hebrew text, and is also a straightforward, formally correspondent rendering. The point is, however, that both usages together produce a uniquely Targumic juxtaposition of "debt" in its literal and metaphorical senses.

<sup>66</sup> J. Jeremias, The Parables of Jesus (London: SCM, 1976), 136–139.

contrast with the king's incalculable generosity cannot be overlooked, and the close of the parable makes it unmistakably plain that God's forgiveness demands ours (vv. 31–35). To fail to forgive one's fellow, even when what needs to be forgiven is considerable, is to betray the very logic of forgiveness that alone gives us standing before God.

Two other parables portray, in an apparently paradoxical fashion, the inextricable link between divine forgiveness and our behavior. Within the story of Jesus at the house of a Pharisee named Simon (Luke 7:36–50), a parable explains why Jesus chose to forgive a sinful woman (vv. 40–43). Of two debtors, the one who has been released from the greater debt will obviously love his creditor more. The sinful woman's great love, therefore, in an outlandish display of affection and honor (vv. 37–38, 44–46), is proof that God had forgiven her (v. 47). Her love is proof of her capacity to be forgiven.<sup>67</sup> She had succeeded precisely where the unforgiving servant of Matt 18 had failed: her actions displayed the value of forgiveness to her. The same logic, developed more strictly in respect of debt, is evident in the otherwise inexplicable parable of the crafty steward (Luke 16:1–9). The lord praised the steward for his cleverness (v. 8) in reducing the debts of those who owed commodities to the lord (vv. 5–7). The scheme was devised so that the lucky debtors would receive the steward (v. 4) after his lord had followed through on the threat of dismissing the steward for dishonesty (vv. 1–2). On any ordinarily moral accounting, the steward had gone from bad to worse, and yet his lord praises him (v. 8). Because God is the lord, what would be bribery in the case of any ordinary master's property turns out to be purposeful generosity. The effect of the steward's panic is to fulfill the lord's desire,<sup>68</sup> because the lord is the same as the unforgiving servant's king, the God who forgave the sinful woman.

The usage of "debt" attributed to Jesus in the gospels, therefore, is initially to be understood as an Aramaism. But he appears, on the evidence prima facie, to have exploited the metaphorical possibilities of the term in a way that is precedented in the Targum of Isaiah, but in a characteristically parabolic fashion. The general activity of telling parables, of course, is well attested among early rabbis;<sup>69</sup> at issue here is not absolute uniqueness, but the relative distinctiveness that distinguishes any significantly historical figure from his contemporaries. A well-established theologoumenon of early Judaism spoke not only of debts, but also of credit in respect of God.<sup>70</sup> Jesus appears to have exploited the latter metaphor, as well as the former (cf. Matt 6:19–21; 19:21; Mark 10:21; Luke 12:33, 34; 18:22). But it was in his adaptation of an idiom and theology of “debt” that Jesus developed a systemic aspect of his message as a whole.

---

<sup>67</sup> Cf. C. F. D. Moule, "'...As we forgive...': A Note on the Distinction between Deserts and Capacity in the Understanding of Forgiveness," in idem, Essays in New Testament Interpretation (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1982) 278–286, 282–284. See also J. A. Sanders, "Sins, Debts, and Jubilee Release," in Luke and Scripture: The Function of Sacred Tradition in Luke-Acts, ed. C. A. Evans and J. A. Sanders (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1993), 84–92.

<sup>68</sup> Cf. Chilton, A Galilean Rabbi and His Bible: Jesus' Use of the Interpreted Scripture of His Time, GNS 8 (Wilmington: Glazier, 1984), 117–123.

Jesus’ usage of the language of debt has provided an opportunity to test the adequacy of Sanders’s thesis. It has elsewhere been doubted whether the aspect of repentance can be eliminated from the message of Jesus as easily as Sanders would have it,<sup>71</sup> but the focus here is upon his attempt to use “wickedness” as an over-arching concept, inclusive of impurity and sin, and more powerful than either. Jesus, as portrayed by Sanders, “could truly be criticized for including the wicked in his ‘kingdom.’”<sup>72</sup> That portrayal is possible, as we have seen, only by tendentiously reducing impurity and sin to an artificial definition of “wickedness,” as an intention to put oneself outside the covenant. Sanders has provided us with a definition of Judaism as “covenantal nomism,” in which the law is an instrument of remaining within a graciously bestowed covenant. But having offered that useful insight, Sanders persists in understanding Jesus and Paul as in polar opposition to a central tenet of Judaism: Jesus includes the wicked, and Paul includes anyone who accepts participation in Christ.<sup>73</sup> Where earlier scholarship portrayed the polarity as between works and grace (utilizing the language of Paul), Sanders transposes

---

<sup>69</sup> Cf. Chilton and J. I. H. McDonald, Jesus and the Ethics of the Kingdom, Biblical Foundations in Theology (London: SPCK; Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1987), 31–43.

<sup>70</sup> Cf. F. Hauck, TDNT 5 (1978): 559–566.

<sup>71</sup> Cf. Chilton, “Jesus and the Repentance of E.P. Sanders,” Tyndale Bulletin 39: (1988) 1–18; Chilton and McDonald, Jesus and the Ethics of the Kingdom, 40–41.

<sup>72</sup> Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 323.

<sup>73</sup> The plainest exposition of Sanders’ overall picture is available in “Jesus, Paul, and Judaism,” ANRW II 25.1 (1982): 390–450. The similarity with the romanticism of Adolf von Harnack is striking; cf. W. G. Kümmel, The New Testament: The History of the Investigation of Its Problems (London: SCM, 1973), 178–184.

it between the concepts of covenant and universal inclusiveness. Moreover, Sanders pairs Jesus and Paul in contrast to early Christianity generally, and so provides—in effect—a new account of the essence of Christianity in the manner of Adolf von Harnack: the radical, practically antinomian teaching of the founders is rejected by Judaism and subverted by Christianity.

4. Their Significance within Jesus' Movement

Jonathan Klawans argues a bold thesis concerning purity and sin with considerable sophistication.<sup>74</sup> He derives his basic orientation from a reading of Lev 15 and 18. He sees in the chapters two different sorts of defilement: one—deriving from “the priestly source”—is ritual and involves bodily functions, while the other—deriving from “the Holiness Code”—is moral and involves certain sins that resulted in exile. He contends that both run through the literature of ancient Judaism. To make his case within that considerable corpus, his approach is chronological, except when it concerns the New Testament.

Particular and appropriate deference is accorded to Adolf Büchler's Studies in Sin and Atonement, whence Klawans derives the idea of two kinds of defilement.<sup>75</sup> In trenchant opposition to Jacob Neusner's The Idea of Purity in Ancient Judaism, he insists that sin possesses “its own distinct and nonmetaphorical defiling force.”<sup>76</sup> As he develops the history of the approach he prefers, Klawans provides a useful résumé of discussion.

He differs from David Wright in insisting on the terms “ritual” and “moral” as referring to two kinds of impurity, rather than to “abstract categories of permission and prohibition.”<sup>77</sup> Yet because, in Klawans' own assessment, the “texts use the same terminology of defilement to describe two distinct phenomena,” he admits to having

<sup>74</sup> Jonathan Klawans, Impurity and Sin in Ancient Judaism (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000), reviewed in RRJ 4.2 (2001): 350–355.

<sup>75</sup> Adolf Büchler, Studies in Sin and Atonement in the Rabbinic Literature of the First Century, JCP 11 (Oxford: Clarendon, 1928); 5–7.

<sup>76</sup> Jacob Neusner, The Idea of Purity in Ancient Judaism (Leiden: Brill, 1973); Impurity and Sin, 11.

<sup>77</sup> David P. Wright, The Disposal of Impurity. Elimination Rites in the Bible and in Hittite and Mesopotamian Literature, SBLDS 101 (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1987); Impurity and Sin, 17.

a problem.<sup>78</sup> He might have helped his argument at this point, had he observed that impurity itself is multivalent in the Hebrew Bible. What is unclean to Israelites is not only what is intrinsically defiled, but also what is too holy for them (as in the paradigmatic case of blood). This basic adjustment of Mary Douglas's position is now over a decade old.<sup>79</sup> Purity's referents are elastic in dimensions other than the distinction between ritual and moral.

Recognition of this wider elasticity might have helped Klawans to explain the apparent anomaly, to which he repeatedly returns, that ritual impurity is contagious, while moral impurity is not. He makes much of Jacob Milgrom's analogy of the sanctuary and The Picture of Dorian Gray to speak of the pollution which idolatry, incest, and murder bring.<sup>80</sup> But further reflection on the theme of Oscar Wilde's short story might have been appropriate: moral corruption degrades invisibly but ineluctably. In other words, the fact of the involvement of the human will brings defilement to a place outside of sight, but it is all the more important for that. Dorian Gray is uglier than a man who ages normally, whatever he may look like, and a murderer pollutes the land, whether or not he immerses after contact with the corpse. Wilde himself observed in his preface to The Picture that "All art is at once surface and symbol," and that may apply to the art of sacrifice, as well.

The catastrophic impact of these sins is exile in the prophetic tradition, with the result that Ezekiel speaks of pouring water on Israel, as Klawans says "figuratively describing the ease with which God will be able to bring about a change in the people's moral status." This language, as well as Ezekiel's simile of the menstruous woman, might just have alerted Klawans to his own resort to the language of metaphor under a new name. Still, he objects to that name in itself, on the grounds that as it is deployed, scholars mean to say that "when purity language is used metaphorically, then no defilement or purification is actually taking place." To be sure, some people do speak of metaphor as if they did not refer to what is real or important, but I cannot say that I find this "rather traditional way" of using the term is as ubiquitous in the scholarly literature as Klawans suggests it is. Moreover, if

---

<sup>78</sup> Impurity and Sin, 22–25.

<sup>79</sup> See The Temple of Jesus. His Sacrificial Program Within a Cultural History of Sacrifice (University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1992), 3–87.

<sup>80</sup> Impurity and Sin, 29.

the usage of metaphor is as complex and as perplexing as he repeatedly claims, it is difficult to see what is elucidated by insisting that language involving moral impurity is “nonmetaphorical” (italics his).<sup>81</sup>

That assertion becomes increasingly problematic, the more Klawans limits its applicability:

I am not denying that there are metaphorical or figurative uses of purity language in the Hebrew Bible. What I am suggesting is that the usage described here, which has commonly been assumed to be metaphorical, is not.<sup>82</sup>

We seem to be in the face of a problem of language that this book never resolves, and perhaps should not be expected to resolve. Still, it does not seem probable that religionists and exegetes will agree to forego the use of “metaphor” on the grounds that they do not understand it very well.

In his urgent stress on the material reality of moral impurity, Klawans misses the focused importance of agency which idolatry, incest, and blood contamination involve:

In the case of ritual impurity, a real, physical process or event (e.g., death or menstruation) has a perceived effect: impermanent contagion that affects people and certain objects within their reach. In the case of moral impurity, a real, physical process or event (e.g., child sacrifice or adultery) has a different perceived effect: a noncontagious defilement that affects persons, the land, and the sanctuary.<sup>83</sup>

It is quite startling (and not a little perplexing) that such a commendable interest in the pragmatics of impurity should fail to take account of the difference between an impurity which arises in the course of the natural world and the impurity which a human being intends or knowingly indulges. In that Lev 4 and 5 reflect awareness of the issue of intentionality in both the types of purity Klawans speaks of, this omission is very harmful to his argument.

To help to resolve this problem, Klawans suggests that we are dealing with overlapping systems of purity, but he then overturns his own suggestion by stating that really there is only the “single system,” namely “Israelite religion as a whole.” Systems are explicated rather less than metaphors are. Nor is it adequately explained why “ancient

---

<sup>81</sup> Impurity and Sin, 11, cf. 31–36.

<sup>82</sup> Ibid., 35.

<sup>83</sup> Ibid., 34.

Israelite women probably did not find themselves ritually impure on a regular basis as a result of the menstrual taboo.”<sup>84</sup> The special role of women as bearers of blood is not explored, and Klawans also—without reference to recent discussion—falls into the equation of the modern definition of male homosexuality with the proscription of Lev 18:22.

The Second Temple period is treated on the basis of the books of Ezra-Nehemiah, where the application of the impurity of menstruation to moral defilement is acknowledged. The focus of Jubilees and the Holiness Code on the concern with idolatry, incest, and bloodshed is well developed, and the treatment of the Temple Scroll is excellent, showing how bribery was added to the sources of moral defilement.<sup>85</sup> That is especially striking, because the Damascus Document—also taken as a “nonsectarian” text<sup>86</sup>—is explained as moving to the notion that the sanctuary rather than the land is defiled by sexual sins. He discusses 1 Enoch, the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, and the Psalms of Solomon on that basis.

Philo of Alexandria’s position, in his concern for purification of the soul, is reviewed competently, although Klawans gets into something of a tangle in arguing that although this is “analogical,” “allegorical,” “nonphysical,” even “symbol,” it is “by no means metaphorical.”<sup>87</sup> He then turns to the “Qumran sectarian documents,”<sup>88</sup> and finds that ritual and moral purity are identified there quite strongly, so that atonement and purification were also identified at Qumran.

But here is the big surprise of the book. That usage, it is said “is best understood as a metaphor: The image of purification is used figuratively to illustrate God’s redemptive power.” If purification is a metaphor for atonement, then defilement looks like some sort of metaphor for sin. Klawans finds that there was a “compartmentalization of purification and atonement” among the Tannaim after the destruction of the Temple;<sup>89</sup> that might have led him to the consideration of the body of analytic literature that suggests that the destruction of the

---

<sup>84</sup> Impurity and Sin, 38–40.

<sup>85</sup> Ibid., 44–60.

<sup>86</sup> Ibid., 68.

<sup>87</sup> Ibid., 64–65, 149.

<sup>88</sup> Ibid., 68–85. This analysis can now be supplemented by the recent article by Meir Bar-Ilan, “The attitude toward mamzerim in Jewish society in late antiquity,” Jewish History 14 (2000): 125–170.

<sup>89</sup> Impurity and Sin, 115.

Temple made a difference in the perception of the relationship between purification and atonement.

The last chapter is devoted to cataloging what Klawans writes of as errors and misconceptions about purity in scholarship of the New Testament.<sup>90</sup> Most of the alleged mistakes have already been corrected in past contributions, for example by E. P. Sanders (although the contributions of Craig Evans are ignored here). Such works are cited in the volume, but Klawans here chooses to showcase the work of Marcus J. Borg, although his contributions have mostly been of a popular nature. That enables Klawans to portray scholarship of the New Testament as outdated and jejune in relation to the issue of purity. He is more current in the literature of John the Baptist, and he admits Joan Taylor's claim that immersion was a ritual practice applied to repentance. Otherwise, however, this concluding chapter is weak. Mark 7 is treated as a homogenous text, although discrete kinds of purity have been described there in the secondary literature. Paul is accepted as the principal of the New Testament, without discussion that in Acts 15, incest, blood, and idolatry are specifically banned from the church.

A theoretical contribution such as this should be clear about its theory. Leviticus, after all, does imagine that sacrifice should be offered for certain sins, and that sacrifice should be offered following impurity and its purification. Should not that be dealt with? Would it not be reasonable to suppose that the relationship between impurity and sin might be elucidated there? Is it not of some interest that all the texts which treat of exile as a punishment for grave sin—including “the priestly source” and “the Holiness Code”—have been interpreted by most scholars over the years as reflecting the experience or memory of exile? Exclusion of the whole issue of sacrifice might be the reason why Klawans can only struggle against metaphor and deny system in his claim that impurity and sin were always seen as different. Yet if those at Qumran and John the Baptist identified sin and impurity more than the rabbis did after the destruction of the Temple, is that really likely to be just because the rabbis read Tanach better?

In the end, the attempt by Klawans to resuscitate the approach of Büchler against the direction set in motion by Neusner's The Idea of

---

<sup>90</sup> Impurity and Sin, 136–157.

Purity in Ancient Judaism does not succeed. There are not two kinds of impurity, but two ways of becoming impure: by means of sin, and as a result of contagion. Oddly, if Klawans' views were to be accepted, they would vindicate the Hellenistic source in Mark 7, which indeed vindicates the separation of morality and contagion. A friendlier account of Israelite purification in Greek is offered by Josephus, who speaks of John's immersion as "for sanctification of the body, with the soul indeed also already cleansed by righteousness" (Jewish Antiquities (18.116–117)). Josephus shows it is possible to describe purity from a theoretical perspective without dissolving the practice into insignificance. From the point of view of Jesus' practice, his disagreements with John concern when contagion occurs and especially whether there is a reverse contagion, of purity into the realm of the impure. That is what made Jesus incorporate "sinners" as well as customs-agents into his movement, on the assumption that they had repented.<sup>91</sup>

5. Towards a Conclusion

The gospels and their sources perform the service of distancing us from the received pictures of who the customs-agents and sinners were, and of what their impurity meant within the Judaisms of the period. By the nature of their work, customs-agents became impure by contagion, and might well have been involved, by illegal appropriation, in the equivalent of theft. Sinners, on the other hand, are an ill-assorted group whose behavior or reputations made them impure, such that both repentance and purification were the way for them back to worship in the Temple and into regular contact with other Israelites such as the Pharisees. By his contact with such people, and his willingness to include some of them within his movement, Jesus exemplified his teaching that, as the prophets Zechariah and Haggai had declared would occur, Spirit had become a countervailing, purifying source that reversed the usual flow of contagion.

Naturally, discussion of the customs-agents and sinners within Jesus' movement and their relationship to Jesus' teaching in regard to purity does not by itself tell us how Jesus personally related to these groups. The sources do not directly inform us in regard to history. A similar problem is acknowledged by Ulrich Bubenheimer in his recent biography of Thomas Müntzer.<sup>92</sup> Even with the evidence of letters and notes from Müntzer, it is notable not only that there are very large lacunae, but also that the estimates of his dates of birth vary within a spectrum even wider than those usually posited in the case of Jesus. On the basis of plausible dates for beginning of one's studies (between the ages of 12 and 26) Bubenheimer whittles the spectrum down to 1480–1494, but then observes that a Ratsrechnung from Stolberg in the year 1484 can be read to back the first date up a full decade.<sup>93</sup>

---

<sup>91</sup> See Chilton and Jacob Neusner, "Uncleanness: A Moral or an Ontological Category in the Early Centuries A.D.?" Bulletin for Biblical Research 1 (1991): 63–88.

As Bubenheimer observes, the social description of Müntzer is not achievable on a genealogical model: "Daher ersetze ich den Begriff 'Herkunftsfamilie' durch den weiteren Begriff 'Herkunftsmilieu', der nicht genealogische, sondern die sozialgeschichtliche Fragestellung betont."<sup>94</sup> On the basis of that sort of consideration, Bubenheimer is able to trace Müntzer's relations with craftsmen in metals and merchants. He is also able to show that the influence of Leipzig was deeper than that of Frankfurt an der Oder, although Müntzer qualified from the latter university rather than the former. The issue of his mobility is contextualized within this network, as well as in the influence of humanism on his intellectual development, and this to Bubenheimer's mind distinguishes Müntzer from Luther.<sup>95</sup>

Differences of network, in other words, correspond to differences in directions of leadership, and Bubenheimer consciously takes up this communal aspect of his Verflechtungsanalyse from Wolfgang Reinhard.<sup>96</sup> The gospels also attest Jesus' network. Even their varia-

---

<sup>92</sup> Ulrich Bubenheimer, Thomas Müntzer. Herkunft und Bildung, Studies in Medieval and Reformation Thought XLVI (Leiden: Brill, 1989).

<sup>93</sup> Thomas Müntzer. Herkunft und Bildung, 16–19.

<sup>94</sup> Ibid., 26–27 ["This is why I replace the concept of 'family of origin' by the wider concept of 'milieu of origin,' which emphasizes not the genealogical question, but rather the question of social history." (Eng. trans. B. McNeil)]

<sup>95</sup> Thomas Müntzer. Herkunft und Bildung, 41–65, 141–144, 145–193, 230–236. For the application of such a method to Jesus, see Chilton, "Friends and Enemies," in The Cambridge Companion to Jesus, ed. M. Bockmuehl (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001), 72–86.

<sup>96</sup> Wolfgang Reinhard, Freunde und Kreaturen: "Verflechtung" als Konzept zur Erforschung historischer Führungsgruppen. Römische Oligarchie um 1600, Schriften der philosophischen Fachbereiche der Universität Augsburg 14 (München: Vögel, 1979).

tions of attestation are instructive. The names of Jesus' disciples vary in the New Testament (see Matt 10:1–4; Mark 3:13–19; Luke 6:12–16; Acts 1:13). That is not surprising: the people who composed the gospels a generation after Jesus' death naturally wanted to remember their teachers as among the Twelve.

But there are two more profound reasons for this variation, as well. First, there was a confusion between the large group who followed Jesus around Galilee to learn his halakhah as thoroughly as they could, and the select twelve whom at a later stage Jesus delegated to speak and act on his behalf. (Luke estimates the select group at around 70 people [Luke 10:1], but that is a symbolic number, corresponding to the traditional number in Judaism of all the non-Jewish nations of the world; Luke's Gospel manifests a particular interest in the promise of Jesus for the Gentiles.) A reasonable estimate is that twenty or thirty talmidim, some with wives and children, followed Jesus as best they could. But of course, not all of them could follow him all the time, and the identity of the group would change. That brings us to the second reason for the variation of the names: his disciples came and went, some defecting because they came to disagree with Jesus' halakhah.

Jesus acknowledged such defections in his parables according to the gospels. The parable of the sower includes a theology of failure, the recognition that the word of the Kingdom would not always prove productive after sowing (Matt 13:1–9; Mark 4:1–9; Luke 8:4–8). He even trenchantly spoke of some who sowed bad seed in the midst of good (Matt 13:24–30), and of fish caught, only to be destroyed (Matt 13:47–50). These are parables of harsh judgment, directed to those once associated with him, who he felt had proved themselves useless, or even as hostile as his growing opposition.

Opposition from other Jewish teachers, and defections within his own group, made Jesus more extreme in his judgment, but also more vociferous in his insistence about the joy of the Kingdom he was celebrating. Notoriously, he accepted women as disciples, implicitly proclaiming that their purity was as great as any male Israelite's. Forgiveness made them so, despite the uncleanness of their menstrual cycle. Rabbinic discussion in ancient Judaism did include women. Some studies have falsely claimed women did not associate with rabbis, although Mishnah indicates the reverse (see Nedarim 10:1–11:12). What distinguished Jesus was not speaking with women and valuing them (a generic trait of Judaism); rather, women traveled with him, appearing dangerously like the camp followers of the Romans (wives, aspiring wives, and prostitutes). Their presence with him underscores both his radical commitment to purity as the inherent trait of all Israel and the doubt expressed by many of his contemporaries whether he ever really understood the danger of uncleanness.

His practice of accepting female disciples in this way opened him to the charge of sexual impropriety. Now he was called not only a glutton and drunkard, but also a friend of customs-agents and sinners (Matt 11:19; Luke 7:35), the last category referring especially to women of suspect sexual behavior. Simply remaining with a man in a private place (that is, without a third party present) made a woman suspect to some (see Sotah 1:2 in the Mishnah and, in the Jerusalem Talmud, Sotah 3:4). The anonymous woman in the house of Simon the Pharisee who touched Jesus (Luke 7:36–50), and whose touch Jesus accepted, probably belongs to that category. Being in the status of a mamzer,<sup>97</sup> suffering a broken betrothal, or even having a meager dowry could all give a woman the reputation of sinfulness.

Some, but certainly not all, of Jesus' women disciples should be seen in that way. Luke names three as a representative sample, Miriam from the village of Magdala in Galilee, Joanna, who had relatives in Herod's administration, and Susanna (8:1–3). Miriam, Luke states, had seven demons from which she was healed (Luke 8:2), and was evidently among the sinners. The seven demons suggest that Jesus exorcised her repeatedly.

---

<sup>97</sup> Since I identified Jesus as a mamzer in Rabbi Jesus, 3–23, a considerable literature on this subject has emerged: Meir Bar Ilan, "The attitude toward mamzerim in Jewish society in late antiquity," Jewish History 14.2 (2000): 125–170; Shaye D. Cohen, "Some thoughts on 'The attitude toward mamzerim in Jewish society in late antiquity,'" Jewish History 14.2 (2000): 171–174; Marianne Sawicki, Crossing Galilee, 171–173; Andries van Aarde, Fatherless in Galilee. Jesus as Child of God (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International 2001); "Jésus, le mamzer (Mt 1.18)," New Testament Studies 46 (2001): 222–227; Scot McKnight, "Calling Jesus Mamzer," Journal for the Study of the Historical Jesus 1.1 (2003): 73–103; Charles Quarles, "Jesus as Mamzer: A Response to Bruce Chilton's Reconstruction of the Circumstances Surrounding Jesus' Birth in Rabbi Jesus," Bulletin for Biblical Research 14.2 (2004): 243–255; "Recovering Jesus' Mamzerut" in Jesus and Archaeology, ed. James H. Charlesworth (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2006), 84–110. For an earlier approach, based upon assuming that a mamzer is a bastard in the modern sense, see Jane Schaberg, The Illegitimacy of Jesus. A Feminist Theological Interpretation of the Infancy Narratives (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1987); John J. Rousseau and Rami Arav, Jesus and His World. An Archaeological and Cultural Dictionary (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995), 223–225.

Jesus apparently reveled in his reputation for consorting with allegedly loose women ("loose" being applicable to any woman who did not bear her husband's or her father's name). There were many unattached women among Jesus' disciples; when people called him "the friend of customs-agents and sinners" that was not a compliment, and Jesus' critics ranked these female disciples among the "sinners." Jesus damned his opponents in his defense of his female followers: "Amen I say to you, that customs-agents and whores precede you into the kingdom of God!" (Matt 21:31). That is obviously not a general endorsement of tax collection and prostitution as methods of salvation, but a tough rejoinder to people who despised his followers and called his females disciples "whores." In this case, we encounter perhaps the clearest example of what we have observed generally in the gospels: Jesus' contacts with sinners and outcasts, and his flaunting of those contacts, signified to his movement how God was extending the range of purity through Israel.

JESUS AND ISRAEL'S ESCHATOLOGICAL CONSTITUTION

STEVEN M. BRYAN

1. Introduction

In his justly praised book, Jesus and Judaism, E. P. Sanders argued the influential thesis that Jesus was a prophet of Israel's imminent national restoration. He set this thesis against his perception that scholarship had moved decisively toward the conviction that the uniqueness of Jesus lay in his assertion that the kingdom was now present in his exorcisms, healings, and miracles, even if there remained a sense in which the kingdom of God was yet to come.<sup>1</sup> Twenty-five years later, it would perhaps be fair to say that the pendulum has swung the other way. For while there remains a very significant portion of scholarship which maintains that for Jesus the kingdom was in some sense present, it is also the case that a broad swath of historical Jesus studies now places the emphasis on the futurity of the kingdom in the ministry of Jesus. This is seen not so much in a groundswell of support for an eschatology that is as "consistent" or "thoroughgoing" as Sanders', though there are those who argue the case.<sup>2</sup> Rather, it is seen in the fact that for most of those who see in Jesus' eschatology a tension between the already and the not-yet, the emphasis falls unmistakably on the not-yet, particularly as measured by a comparison between indications of the kingdom's

---

<sup>1</sup> E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (London: SCM, 1985), 150–156.

<sup>2</sup> Those who believe that Jesus' eschatology was wholly futurist include Dale C. Allison, Jesus of Nazareth: Millenarian Prophet (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1998), 417–430; Richard H. Hiers, Jesus and the Future (Atlanta: John Knox Press, 1981); C. C. Caragounis, "Son of Man," in Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels, ed. Joel Green, Scot McKnight, and I. Howard Marshall (Downers Grove: Intervarsity Press, 1992); Paula Fredriksen, Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews: A Jewish Life and the Emergence of Christianity (New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1999); Bart D. Ehrman, Jesus: Apocalyptic Prophet of the New Millennium (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1999); Erich Gräßer, Die Naherwartung Jesu, SBS (Stuttgart: KBW Verlag, 1973). The early and still influential works from this perspective are those of Johannes Weiss, Jesus' Proclamation of the Kingdom of God, from the 1st German ed., translated, edited and with an introduction by Richard H. Hiers and D. Larrimore Holland, reprint 1892 (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971), and Albert Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus: A Critical Study of Its Progress from Reimarus to Wrede, with a preface by F. C. Burkitt (New York: Macmillan, 1968).

presence in Jesus' ministry and Jewish expectations of the time when God would restore the kingdom to Israel.<sup>3</sup> And so it is common for scholars to use terms such as "pledge" or "foretaste" or "proleptic realization" or "preliminary"<sup>4</sup> or to use analogies such as "a train drawing into a station" or of "the day beginning to dawn."<sup>5</sup> Such descriptions place unmistakable emphasis on future realities which Jesus believed were merely anticipated in his ministry.<sup>6</sup> This development is to a very significant degree a measure of the influence of Sanders.

As with much of contemporary New Testament scholarship, Sanders perceived the central issues in the study of Jesus with such clarity that the questions he posed continue to set the agenda today.<sup>7</sup> For Sanders, the key problem related to Jesus' understanding of the kingdom is simply this: if for Jesus, as in Second Temple Judaism generally, the kingdom of God is identified with the concrete social order to be introduced by God through a cataclysmic intervention on behalf of Israel, then Jesus could hardly have considered that the kingdom of God

---

<sup>3</sup> Note, for instance, the view of J. P. Meier, who argues that though Jesus believed that "the kingdom was already present for at least some Israelites by his exorcisms and miracles of healing," it is nevertheless evident "that his message focused predominantly on the imminent future." A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, ABRL (New York: Doubleday, 1994), 2:452, 454. A similar tendency is seen in many works which emphasize Jesus' role as a prophet of the imminent action of God while minimizing in some way the distinctiveness of Jesus' announcement of the kingdom's presence.

<sup>4</sup> Meier, Marginal Jew, 2:453.

<sup>5</sup> James D. G. Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 1: Christianity in the Making (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003), 479.

<sup>6</sup> George Beasley-Murray, who, more than most, asserts the significance of the presence of the kingdom in Jesus' eschatology, complains about the tendency of many to subordinate the presence of the kingdom to its futurity, a tendency "evident when, for example, the work of Jesus is regarded only as a 'sign' of the coming kingdom, or an 'adumbration' of it, or 'dawning' of the kingdom (an ambiguous term, apparently intended to exclude the light of day)". "Matthew 6:33: The Kingdom of God and the Ethic of Jesus," in Neues Testament und Ethik, ed. Helmut Merklein (Freiburg: Herder, 1989), 93.

<sup>7</sup> It is perhaps true that Sanders' study of Jesus has not had quite the impact of his study of Paul, Paul and Palestinian Judaism: A Comparison of Patterns of Religion (London: SCM Press, 1977). Nevertheless, in his study both of Paul and of Jesus, Sanders' lasting influence has been the result of his knowledge of the Jewish sources which have enabled him to set the parameters with particular clarity. As with his study of Paul, Sanders' innovative proposals concerning Jesus—e.g., that Jesus did not call sinners to repentance and that priority must be given to Jesus' actions over his sayings—have not been so widely accepted as has his interpretation of the context within which Jesus must be interpreted. As with his interpretation of Paul within the context of Jewish conceptions of the covenant, Sanders' interpretation of Jesus within the context of Jewish restorationism was not wholly without precedent. See especially G. B. Caird, Jesus and the Jewish Nation, Ethel M. Wood Lecture (London: Athlone Press, 1965), and Ben F. Meyer, The Aims of Jesus (London: SCM Press, 1979).

was present in this sense. This point is often missed in contemporary discussions of Jesus' eschatology which are framed in some form of the familiar dichotomy between "the now and the not-yet". The problem is that the already of such an eschatology is not the already of an eschatology which is identifiably Jewish. That is to say, the already of Jesus' eschatology is often portrayed in ways that bear little resemblance to the realities associated with Israel's restoration—realities to which Jesus' unexplained use of "kingdom of God" language most readily refer. For Sanders, the idea that Jesus might also have talked about the kingdom in ways that suggested that it was already present as God's dynamic, though abstract, sovereignty in the world is no more than possible.<sup>8</sup> However, Sanders argued, even if Jesus did speak of the kingdom in this way, the actions of Jesus—especially his action in the Temple and his calling of Twelve disciples—so clearly evoke an imminent expectation of a concrete social order that it must have dominated his thinking.<sup>9</sup> For Sanders, the key elements of this social order expected by Jesus were a reconstituted tribal federation and a new temple. And the absence of these constitutional features associated with Israel's restoration serves as prima facie evidence that the kingdom did not arrive during Jesus' lifetime.<sup>10</sup>

Though Sanders' somewhat inconsistent bracketing of the sayings of Jesus has been subjected to vigorous criticism, his fundamental perception of the disconnect between an understanding of the kingdom of God as the social order established by God's restoration of Israel and the idea that the kingdom was present in the ministry of Jesus must still be addressed. Given the essential accuracy of Sanders' perception that Second Temple Jewish eschatology focused on the concrete social order which would emerge when God restored Israel, any assertion that Jesus believed the kingdom to be present in his ministry must

---

<sup>8</sup> Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 140.

<sup>9</sup> Evident here is Sanders' well-known reliance on the actions of Jesus over against the sayings of Jesus. For Sanders, the problems surrounding the authenticity of Jesus' sayings are so great that no portrait of Jesus which depends on Jesus' sayings can be trusted.

<sup>10</sup> I draw the use of the term "constitutional" from William Horbury, "Constitutional Aspects of the Kingdom of God," in The Kingdom of God and Human Society, ed. Robin Barbour (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1993), 60–79. Horbury uses the term as an alternative to "political" because he does not want to suggest that the kingdom of God is identical to the kingdom of Israel. Such a concern is less germane to discussions of the eschatological kingdom. I have used the term as a way of focusing attention on the structural features which would characterize the kingdom of God when it arrived with eschatological finality on behalf of Israel.

explain the way in which the various elements of the concrete social order associated with Israel's restoration fit within Jesus' vision of the kingdom. It is my contention that an examination of Jesus' words and actions suggest that the non-negotiable in Jesus' proclamation was, in fact, the presence of the kingdom and that Jesus, like his contemporaries, did conceive of this kingdom as a new social order in a way that was broadly consistent with the widespread expectation that the outcome of God's eschatological action would be a restoration of Israel's national life. However, Jesus did not tie the perception of the kingdom's presence to specific forms taken by various constitutional features of restored Israel's national life. Rather, Jesus believed that if the present forms of such features were not already consistent with his vision of God's rule over Israel, the present forms must come under the judgment of God and new forms be found, whatever those new forms might be. For Jesus, there are no conditions yet to be fulfilled by the nation and no thought of further delay: the kingdom of God has arrived and everything, including expectations that certain constitutional features of the eschaton would take particular forms, must give way to that reality with all its threat and promise to Israel's national life. It is only in this way that we can reconcile two otherwise contradictory features of Jesus' proclamation: the announcement of both impending judgment on Israel and national restoration.

To demonstrate this thesis, I wish first to sketch the evidence that Jesus announced impending and unavoidable judgment on the nation and then second, to examine the message of Jesus in relation to certain constitutional elements in the social order proclaimed by Jesus.

2. Kingdom and Judgment in the Message of John the Baptist

Though many studies of Jesus have stumbled at this point, any credible understanding of Jesus must make sense of the relationship between Jesus and the one with whom Jesus most closely identified his own message and mission—John the Baptist. John's message (and that of Jesus after him) differed substantially from many of his contemporaries inasmuch as he did not condition God's eschatological intervention on the repentance of Israel. Rather, the nearness of the kingdom was stated as an unconditional fact;<sup>11</sup> what John made conditional was

---

<sup>11</sup> Only Matthew attributes the proclamation that "the kingdom of heaven has come near" to John as well as to Jesus (Matt 3:2; 4:17), though Luke indicates that John like Jesus preached the good news (3:18) and Mark positions John as "the beginning of the good news" (Mark 1:1). The parallel suggested by Matthew is not unlikely given the participation of individual Israelites in the kingdom. Those who repented would participate; those who did not, would not. No one expected that every Jew would participate, but John's approach turned on its head the common supposition that Israel as a whole would be established in the kingdom when Israel as a whole repented. Instead, John declares the unconditional imminence of God's purging and renewing work in Israel.

One implication of John's proclamation of the unconditional nearness of God's decisive action on behalf of Israel is that John envisioned the possibility, even necessity, of redefining who belonged to Israel: John directs his warning against those who claim Abraham as their father but do not bear the fruit expected of the penitent Israel that God restores (Matt 3:8–9/Luke 3:8). The coming action of God would effect a separation that would cut through Israel (Matt 3:10, 12/Luke 3:9, 17). John's language excludes the possibility that he was thinking of a judgment directed only against a few apostate individuals or against a corrupt Jewish leadership; rather John anticipates a judgment that would fall on Israel as a whole; participation in John's own baptism of repentance identified recipients as Abraham's children on the last day.

It must be emphasized that both the judgment and renewal anticipated by John are national in scope. It is still remarkably common to read discussions which simply assume that John's warning of impending judgment was a warning of the impending universal final judgment of individuals.<sup>12</sup> In the face of such a judgment, "John views Israel as having reached the end."<sup>13</sup> But John's message is emphatically addressed to the nation<sup>14</sup> and depicts the outcome of God's impending action not as an ill-defined state of affairs somehow beyond the limits of history but as the formation of a purged and Spirit-renewed nation at the climax the links between the ministries of John and Jesus attested by the gospel traditions, links which include even the potentially embarrassing facts that Jesus identified with John's message through baptism and that Jesus, like John, made baptism a part of his own mission (John 3:26; 4:1–2). John's expectation of a coming baptism of spirit and fire would have been readily associated with the expectation of God's coming action to effect the renewal of Israel. See Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 368. See also Sanders' affirmation of the comment of Walter Wink that the evangelists' "theological use of the Baptist depends on a 'historical fact, that through John's mediation Jesus perceived the nearness of the kingdom...': Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 371 n. 6.

---

<sup>12</sup> Note, for example, the comment of Joachim Gnilka: "Central to John's proclamation of judgment is the expected end of history": Jesus of Nazareth: Message and History, translated by S. S. Schatzmann (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1997), 72.

<sup>13</sup> Gnilka, Jesus, 72.

<sup>14</sup> This national focus is recalled in Acts 13:24, where we read that before the coming of Jesus, "John had already proclaimed a baptism of repentance to all the people of Israel."

of God's purposes for Israel within history. What relationship, if any, John perceived between the judgment about to fall on the nation of Israel and the final judgment of the people and nations of the world cannot be said. However, there is certainly little precedent for the expectation that Israel would be judged as part of God's final judgment of the world. Rather, the general expectation of the prophets and within Second Temple Judaism more generally was that final judgment would be the moment of Israel's vindication. If John expected an impending final judgment of the world, this would not have been an implication of his message of impending judgment on Israel but of his message regarding the restoration of Israel.

John's message does not envision the end of Israel as a nation but the renewal of Israel by God's eschatological forgiveness and the endowment of the eschatological Spirit. Apart from the suggestion that the terms of Israel's election would be recast, the material concerning John preserved for us in the gospel traditions does not indicate what John's expectations were regarding specific constitutional features of Israel's restoration. It would seem, rather, that for John the focus of his expectations fell on the qualitative ethical change that God's coming action would bring to Israel, now defined and delimited by identification with John's baptism of repentance. We see then in John the framework of a movement in which the non-negotiable nearness of God's kingdom and the renewal of Israel's ethical life in association with its arrival take priority over expectations of specific constitutional forms, and even presuppose the necessity of divine judgment on those constitutional features of Israel's national life which were inadequate within the arriving kingdom.

3. National Judgment in the Proclamation of Jesus

3.1. National and Final Judgment in the Message of Jesus

In E. P. Sanders' view, so fully does Jesus participate in Jewish expectations of the restoration of Israel that it is impossible for Sanders to conceive of any way in which Jesus might have anticipated judgment on Israel. For Sanders, restoration occurs on the far side of judgment,<sup>15</sup> and

---

<sup>15</sup> In the prophetic tradition, national restoration, often of a remnant, follows on from national judgment. In this regard, Sanders comments that "in the post-biblical literature there is not the same emphasis on the sifting or winnowing of Israel which one sees in some of the biblical prophets. That is not to say, however, that the themes of judgment and punishment for transgression recede. What recedes is the theme that Jesus is fixed so firmly in the mold of a prophet of imminent national restoration that he cannot think of Jesus as a prophet of national judgment. Consequently, any element of judgment which might be detected in Jesus' message—and these are very few by Sanders' accounting—is directed against certain individual Jews but not against the nation. Jesus, as with the Second Temple Jewish literature generally, may anticipate the judgment of wicked Jews but he does not anticipate a further round of judgment against the nation.<sup>16</sup> Thus, Sanders allows that Jesus may have occasionally referred to the judgment of the wicked within Israel, and interprets such sayings as the parables of the tares and the fish-net as parables of “selection” or “separation”.<sup>17</sup>

The interpretation of Jesus' message of judgment exclusively in terms of final judgment has a venerable pedigree. The degree to which scholars still find it difficult to escape its sway is reflected in the recent work of James Dunn. Dunn asserts that “the expectation of impending judgment can scarcely be excluded from the core memories of Jesus' preaching,” but concludes that “the judgement in view is consistently final in overtone”.<sup>18</sup> Dunn's conclusion sits rather awkwardly alongside his view that John's warning of impending judgment was directed against the nation, with no necessary suggestion of “the imminent coming of final judgement.”<sup>19</sup> This awkwardness is particularly evident since Dunn places Jesus' message of judgment in continuity with that of John.

However, the expectation of national judgment cannot be excised from the Jesus tradition. A sizable body of evidence indicates that Jesus anticipated not simply a judgment in which wicked Jews as well as Gentiles would be destroyed but also a judgment of the nation of Israel as a whole.

3.2. Parables of Judgment or Selection?<sup>20</sup>

Though a sizable majority of scholars are content to subsume the whole of the judgment material in the Jesus tradition under the rubric of a

---

Israel as a nation needs the sort of punishment which leads to the survival of a faithful remnant”: Jesus and Judaism, 113.

<sup>16</sup> Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 113–116.

<sup>17</sup> Ibid., 111, 115.

<sup>18</sup> Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 420, 425.

<sup>19</sup> Ibid., 365.

<sup>20</sup> For a detailed discussion of Jesus' parables of national judgment, see Steven M. Bryan, Jesus and Israel's Traditions of Judgement and Restoration, SNTSMS (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002), 46–81.

final, universal judgment of individuals, Sanders work is notable for the fact that he raises the question of whether Jesus expected a judgment on Israel as a nation. Nevertheless, in answering the question, Sanders fails to deal with a significant block of tradition which does seem to threaten judgment against Israel. For example, we find in the tradition multiple attestation of the fact that Jesus told parables in which the setting was a vineyard.<sup>21</sup> In each of these parables, it is likely that the vineyard functions as a stock image to represent the nation of Israel.

The identification of the vineyard as Israel is clearest in the parable of the tenants (Mark 12:1–11) with its clear allusions to the Song of the Vineyard in Isaiah 5. The connection between the parable of the tenants and Isaiah 5 is not particularly controverted, but it is crucial because of the way the vineyard imagery is used in Isaiah 5 to pronounce impending judgment on the nation because of its fruitlessness.

That this motif of divine judgment against the nation carries through the other vineyard parables is indicated most clearly by an often overlooked feature of the parable of the barren fig tree (Luke 13:6–9). In certain respects, this parable is the most interesting of the four vineyard parables. Sanders, who all but ignores the four vineyard parables and pays no attention whatever to the motif of the vineyard, does briefly identify the parable of the barren fig tree as the sole parable of destruction. But isolated as it is and capable of association with only two other parables which imply destruction by affirming selection (the parable of the tares and of the drag-net), the material in no way suffices as “evidence for a message about the coming judgement of Israel.” And so the material is set aside by Sanders, since it does not reflect a message of judgment on Israel but simply the unremarkable fact that “Jesus was not opposed to the idea of judgement,” i.e., against individuals.<sup>22</sup> Sanders’ demurral notwithstanding, the probability that the parable does relate to the judgment of Israel rises considerably when one notes that the parable is a vineyard parable which, from all appearances, has nothing to do with a vineyard. Rather, its plot focuses entirely on a fig tree and the threat of destruction which hangs over it because of its fruitlessness. Since the action of the parable hinges wholly on a fig tree, Jesus’ placement of the fig tree in a vineyard is the element of the parable which is most unexpected. “This is not to say that fig trees never grew in the vineyards of first-century Palestine, only that it is odd to place a fig tree over which one has narrative control in a vineyard when its placement there is irrelevant to the parable's plot."<sup>23</sup>

---

<sup>21</sup> There are four vineyard parables: the parable of the tenants (Mark 1–9); the parable of the two sons (Matt 21:28–32); the parable of the workers in the vineyard (Matt 20:1–16); and the parable of the barren fig tree (Luke 13:6–9).

<sup>22</sup> Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 114–115.

Once it is seen that the parable is a parable about Israel, it becomes clear that the parable does not merely threaten the destruction of individual Jews who fail to repent but threatens the nation of Israel and its misplaced confidence in its national election. The issue of Israel's election had already been the focus of the narrative context to which the parable is tightly tied. The parable is told as an elaboration of Jesus' comments on the deaths of the Galileans whose blood Pilate had mixed with their sacrifices and of another eighteen people who had died when a tower in Siloam had collapsed. Jesus rejects the explanation that the deaths of these Jews were to be explained as the deaths of people who had sinned so egregiously as to place themselves outside the protective shield of the covenant. Rather, those who had died were still very much a part of the nation—a nation which, with the exception of those who repented, would soon experience a fate similar to those who had died.

The other vineyard parables likewise signal the expectation of divine judgment on the nation. As in the parable of the barren fig tree, the vineyard plays a relatively minor role in the action of the parable of the tenants (Mark 12:1–9/Matt 21:33–41/Luke 20:9–16). If the vineyard in the parable of the fig tree signals to the hearer that the fig tree stands for Israel, so too in the parable of the tenants, the vineyard signals that the tenants represent Israel. This is confirmed by the parable's indication that the reason for the judgment on the tenants is their rejection of the envoys of the vineyard's owner. This is in line with the univocal indictment of the nation as a whole within the Jesus tradition for the rejection of God's prophets.

In the parables of the workers in the vineyard (Matt 20:1–16) and the parable of the two sons (Matt 21:28–32), there is again, initially, little to indicate that the vineyard serves as anything more than a convenient setting for the parable. But if the parables make use of the vineyard as a stock image for Israel, they must be read as parables which address the situation of the nation. This immediately calls into question a common reading of the parable of the workers in the vineyard as a parable about rewards. Instead, the motif of the vineyard signals to the hearer that the parable is a parable about the freedom of God to determine who will or will not receive the eschatological blessings promised to elect Israel and to give these blessings even to those within Israel “who by all accounts do not deserve it and who by the accounts of some at least had already cut themselves off from elect Israel.”<sup>24</sup> Similarly the parable of the two sons sent to work in their father’s vineyard suggests that the two sons correspond to two different types of people within Israel. The claim that tax collectors and prostitutes who had responded to John’s message of repentance were entering the kingdom ahead of the chief priests and elders of the people who had refused John’s baptism strongly implies a striking reversal by which those thought least likely to be included in restored Israel were included, while those whose participation had not been questioned were now at risk. If these two parables do not directly raise the specter of divine judgment on Israel, the threat of judgment is nevertheless implied in the way the parables critique accepted notions of Israel’s election.

---

<sup>23</sup> Bryan, Jesus, 48.

3.3. The Judgment of the Twelve Tribes

One particularly influential part of Sanders’ argument has been his assertion that Jesus’ calling of twelve disciples was intended to evoke the hope that the twelve tribes would be reassembled in the land and reconstituted as a tribal league.<sup>25</sup> At the same time, Sanders argues the authenticity of Matt 19:28 (par. Luke 22:28–30) in which Jesus says that the twelve disciples will judge the twelve tribes of Israel. It has been insufficiently noticed, however, that these two conclusions stand in considerable tension with one another. On the one hand, Sanders believes that the calling of the twelve symbolizes the imminent regathering and refederation of the twelve tribes, i.e., of all Israel. On the other hand, he allows that in Matt 19:28 the twelve represent those who act in judgment against the twelve tribes.<sup>26</sup> Given the evidence that Sanders

<sup>24</sup> Bryan, Jesus, 68.

<sup>25</sup> Sanders was not the first to argue such a view—see e.g., Joachim Jeremias, New Testament Theology (London: SCM Press, 1971), 234–235—but it is central to his understanding of Jesus.

<sup>26</sup> A number of scholars have followed Richard Horsley in his view that the twelve judge the twelve tribes in the sense of ruling over them, Jesus and the Spiral of Violence: Popular Jewish Resistance in Roman Palestine (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1987), 203. Dunn (Jesus Remembered) appears to be of two minds on the issue. At 416 n. 178, he comments, “The thought [of Matt 19:28] may be of the twelve ‘ruling over’ the twelve tribes” (citing Horsley), only to call the view into question at 420 n. 205, noting rightly that “the thought of the twelve judging Israel is a reversal of Israel’s hope of judging the nations.” Both Dupont and Luz note the “philological fairytale” (Luz) which props up the idea that κρινω can mean “rule”. The perception of Luz is that the himself musters to indicate the way in which Second Temple expectations regarding the twelve tribes were focused on the reconstitution of all Israel, it is at least odd that Jesus would refer specifically to the "twelve tribes" as the object of eschatological judgment.

The tension between these two ideas becomes unsustainable when viewed against the backdrop of a significant set of texts which anticipate that vindicated Israel will act as the agent of God's judgment against the nations. The development of this tradition in Matt 19:28 subverts it, first by suggesting that all Israel will be the object rather than the agent of God's judgment and, second by asserting that the agent of judgment will not be Israel as a whole but Israel understood as a smaller group from within all Israel—a group whose number symbolically identifies them with Israel in restoration.<sup>27</sup> In effect, Matt 19:28 suggests that restored Israel will sit in judgment against all Israel. If so, Matt 19:28 serves not as an indication that Jesus expected the imminent regathering and reconstitution of Israel as a federation of twelve tribes in their traditional territorial allotments, but as a repudiation of that notion in favor of a belief that Israel's reconstitution had taken a wholly different form.

A similar conclusion should be drawn from Matt 8:11–12 (par. Luke 7:28–30), another text which has been understood as suggesting that Jesus expected the imminent regathering of the scattered tribes of Israel; Jewish expectations regarding the regathering of the scattered tribes would certainly have identified diaspora Jews as among "the sons of the kingdom." So it is only with difficulty that Jesus' declaration that "the sons of the kingdom" will be cast into outer darkness while many from east and west come to eat with the patriarchs in the kingdom can be taken narrowly as a reference to Palestinian Jews or their leaders.<sup>28</sup> Rather, "the sons of the kingdom" must be understood as a reference to interpretation of "judge" in Matt 19:28 to mean "rule" is based on the confusion of the historical fact that the judges of Israel ruled and the kings judged with the semantic meaning of κρίνω. Ulrich Luz, Das Evangelium nach Matthäus, 3. Teilband Mt 18–25, EKKNT (Zürich: Benziger, 1997), 129; Jacques Dupont, "Le logion des douze trônes," Bib 45 (1964): 355–390.

---

<sup>27</sup> Dunn (Jesus Remembered, 510 n. 103) avers that "'twelve' implies restoration rather than remnant theology," but the dichotomy is false. The prophetic tradition to which Dunn refers to demonstrate the expectation of a regathered and reunified tribal league can portray this restoration as a restoration of the remnant of survivors. So e.g., Isa 49:6: "It is too light a thing that you should be my servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob and to restore the survivors [remnant] of Israel..."

<sup>28</sup> Against W. D. Davies and Dale C. Allison, Jr., The Gospel According to Saint Matthew, 3 vols., ICC (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1988–97), 2.27–28.

Israel, the heir-apparent to the kingdom. Just as Matt 19:28 can be read as a critique of the standard form of the expectation that Israel would be the agent of God's judgment on the nations, so too, Matt 8:11–12 can be seen as "a striking variation on Israel's hopes for the return of the exiles with the eschatological pilgrims from the nations."<sup>29</sup> The expectation of eschatological pilgrimage remains but the correlation of that expectation with the hope of reassembly of the scattered tribes has been cut by the threat of judgment against the "sons of the kingdom." For readers of Matthew, Jesus' shocking words are easily recognized as a continuation of the Baptist's threat that the children of Abraham may find themselves excluded from participation in the fulfillment of God's promises to Israel.

It should be noted that in such texts as Matt 19:28 and 8:1–12 Jesus does not deduce from Israel's judgment that the eschatological constitution of God's people has been delayed. Jesus' calling of twelve disciples does not symbolize the future reconstitution of the tribal league but rather the belief that with the arrival of the kingdom, the failure of the twelve tribes to be eschatological Israel meant that the twelve tribes must themselves come under divine judgment and a new way of constituting Israel as the twelve be found.

3.4. Temple Judgment

A growing body of scholarship supports the idea that Jesus predicted the destruction of the temple, that Jesus' action in the temple was an enactment of this expected judgment and that the provocation of this prediction and action contributed directly to his death. All of this was argued forcefully by Sanders and is not now widely disputed.<sup>30</sup> However, the explanation of Jesus' words and actions against the temple remains contested. Much of the scholarship on these issues arose as a direct response to the argument of Sanders that Jesus merely predicted and enacted the temple's non-punitive destruction in preparation for the eschatological temple to be erected with the imminent arrival of the kingdom. For Sanders, Jesus did not fault the Second Temple; he simply asserted its impending replacement by a far more glorious temple.

---

<sup>29</sup> Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 415.

<sup>30</sup> A notable exception is Paula Fredriksen, who appears to doubt that Jesus ever performed an action in the temple and thinks that if he did perform some such action it would have gone unnoticed and been unrelated to his death. Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews: A Jewish Life and the Emergence of Christianity, 225–232.

However, as Bauckham astutely observes, in Sanders' view, "Jesus did no more than prophesy as an event of the near future what most Jews believed would happen some day. Indeed it was their devout hope." Sanders' explanation thus fails to explain how Jesus' prediction and enactment of the Temple's destruction could have led to his death.<sup>31</sup>

Bauckham and others have argued that Jesus' words and actions against the temple indicate that Jesus expected judgment to fall upon the Jewish authorities, particularly the temple establishment, whom Jesus regarded as corrupt. There is certainly evidence that some Second Temple Jews regarded the temple establishment as corrupt. However, to put the matter baldly, given the massive role played by the destruction of the first temple in biblical and Jewish tradition and its univocal interpretation as an act of divine judgment on the nation of Israel, the simplest explanation for Jesus' verbal and enacted prediction of the temple's destruction is that he believed the prophetic tradition announcing impending and unavoidable judgment on the temple as the central element in God's judgment of the nation was a tradition wholly applicable to "this generation." The centrality of this tradition within Israel's story renders wholly unproblematic the assumption that Jesus' himself cited Jer 7:11—a key text in prophetic tradition which understand temple destruction as national judgment—as the explanation for his action in the temple.

4. Restoration and Kingdom in the Teaching of Jesus

The two crucial elements in Sanders' portrayal of Jesus as a prophet of imminent national restoration were the expectations of a new temple and a regathering and reconstitution of the twelve tribes. But as I have argued above, Jesus' proclamation of national judgment was framed precisely as a message of judgment against the twelve tribes and against the temple, i.e., against precisely those constitutional features of Israel's national life in terms of which Sanders had perceived a message of imminent restoration. If that is the case, then one might expect that Jesus would have declared that the time of fulfillment of God's eschatological promises to Israel would have to be delayed until Israel was made ready through judgment. Such a pattern would fit entirely with the pattern evident in the prophets whereby Israel's restoration follows its judgment. It is striking then that the expectation of further delay is absent from Jesus' message to the nation. Rather, the gospel traditions suggest that Jesus believed that the terms and conditions of the eschaton were already coming into existence.

---

<sup>31</sup> Richard Bauckham, "Jesus' Demonstration in the Temple," in Law and Religion: Essays on the Place of the Law in Israel and Early Christianity, ed. Barnabas Lindars (Cambridge, England: James Clarke & Co, 1988), 86–87.

4.1. The Ethical Reconstitution of Israel

For many, the perception of eschatological inauguration in the teaching of Jesus is based on the close tie between Jesus' ethical demands and his proclamation of the kingdom. So, for instance, many regard the Sermon on the Mount not so much as a call to repent in view of the imminent arrival of the kingdom but as a declaration of kingdom norms applicable to Jesus' followers in the present. Such an understanding of Jesus' ethical instruction is then taken as evidence that for Jesus the kingdom was present "in some sense," that is, as an abstract power or spiritual reality already present in the lives of individuals who believe in advance of the concrete arrival of the kingdom on behalf of Israel.

The impression that this initial coming of the kingdom is understood as a non-national abstraction is confirmed by frequent assertions that Jesus is not a new "law-giver" and that the norms of the kingdom are not to be understood as new law. This may be true, but Jesus does stipulate a way of life that characterizes not merely the conduct of individual followers of Jesus but also life within the eschatological kingdom. The perception that Jesus differed from the teachers of the law was correct inasmuch as his ethical teaching is not easily categorized as a new law or as exposition of the law of Moses (Matt 7:29). However, this fact should not be taken to mean that Jesus' intent was to inaugurate a denationalized kingdom. Rather, the significance of the fact that Jesus' ethical teaching does not function as legal code or exposition is that the nature of Israel's national existence has been conceived on entirely different terms. Israel's existence as an eschatologically constituted nation has, by definition, no precedent.

It is for this reason that we struggle to find adequate categories to describe this national existence, but despite the difficulties, we must not revert to the familiar tact that steers Jesus clear of national aspiration and into the domain of pure spirit. The tension which defined the existence of Palestinian Jews in the first century was a tension that arose because of the difficulty of reconciling Roman imperial claims with the imperial claims of Israel itself—claims born of Israel's monotheism and eschatological hope.

The tension is palpable in the challenge to Jesus regarding the propriety of paying taxes to Caesar (Mark 12:13–17). The response of Jesus must not be understood as a suggestion that Caesar's kingdom belonged to a realm that differed so wholly from God's kingdom that the two could co-exist in a way that was fully compatible. Nor should the saying be understood as though Jesus advocated an understanding of God's sovereignty that implied a defiant stance of non-payment of the tax to Caesar. Rather, the issue is taxation itself. God's kingdom is not maintained or sustained by the payment of the tax. Yet Caesar's kingdom requires it. The fact that Israel's situation still necessitated the payment of the tax to Caesar in view of the arrival of God's kingdom suggested that the nation had failed to become what it should already have been. If the nation had been fully committed and faithful to the God whose kingdom is not sustained by taxation, they would no longer have been subject to Caesar's tax. Though framed as a riddle, Jesus' call for the coin bearing Caesar's image highlights the obvious fact that his interlocutors were still liable to pay tax to a pagan king. In paying taxes to Caesar, they were fulfilling what the king of any kingdom like Rome's demanded. However, whatever it is that must be rendered to God, it is certainly not a tax. This was precisely the point made by Jesus when asked about the temple tax: the king does not tax his children (Matt 17:25–27). If the Sermon on the Mount and the vineyard parables are any indication, that which must be rendered to God as king is the ethical fruit appropriate to Israel's eschatological existence. Israel's ongoing liability to taxation and its failure to produce the ethical fruit expected of Israel in the eschaton both suggest that Israel had failed to become what it should have already been.

This does not mean that Jesus was simply uninterested in the fact or continuation of Roman rule, as if its existence was compatible with an understanding of God's kingdom that was so radically new and otherworldly as to render Roman domination irrelevant. Rather, Roman rule was fundamentally incompatible with the arrival of Israel's kingdom. But this fundamental incompatibility is not in the first instance an indication that Rome must be judged. Rather, it is an indication that Israel must be judged: the continued existence of Roman rule in the face of the arriving kingdom demanded Israel's judgment—a judgment which, ironically, would take place at the hands of the Roman imperial authority which Israel should have already replaced. If Israel had failed to become what it should already have been with the arrival of the kingdom—the agent of God's sovereignty and judgment over all creation—then the arrival of the kingdom itself would fashion a people who would function in this way.

Matt 21:43 is frequently attributed to Matthew, but, even so, it should be pointed out that Israel's judgment does not result in a non-national entity even for Matthew, though this would likely have been a reasonable way to interpret the situation of Jesus' followers in Matthew's day. Rather, the kingdom will be given to a nation (ἔθνος) which will produce the fruit of the kingdom.<sup>32</sup> This is no denationalization of Israel's kingdom but its ethical constitution.

This construal of Israel's restoration along ethical lines which did not condition or associate the kingdom's arrival on the emergence of certain specific constitutional elements may be directly traced to John the Baptist. In one striking saying, Jesus suggests that Israel's restoration, understood as its ethical reconstitution, had already been accomplished: "Elijah is indeed coming first to restore all things... But I tell you that Elijah has come, and they did to him whatever they pleased, as it is written about him." (Mark 9:12–13). Jesus thus rejects an understanding of Elijah's restoration as a future regathering of the twelve tribes as in Sir 48:10 and associates this restoration instead with the ethical renewal initiated by John's call to repentance.<sup>33</sup>

4.2. Jesus and Constitutional Features of the Eschaton

If there is an important sense in which Jesus' proclamation of the kingdom was focused on Israel's ethical reconstitution rather than on concrete constitutional features of the eschaton, this should not be taken to mean that Jesus had nothing to say about these matters. We focus in this section on the two features isolated by Sanders: the temple and Israel's election.

As noted above, it is widely agreed that Jesus predicted the destruction of the temple. However, too little attention has been given to the correlation of such a prediction to his message of eschatological fulfillment. It is one thing to cast the prediction of the temple's destruction as an anticipation of God's punishment of a corrupt temple establishment, but it is quite another to explain how such a prediction fits with <sup>32</sup> See especially the recent work of Wesley J. Olmstead who refutes the argument of Saldarini and others that ἔθνος refers only to new leaders for Israel, Matthew's Trilogy of Parables: The Nation, the Nations and the Reader in Matthew 21.28–22.14, SNTSMS (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2003), 89–95.

<sup>33</sup> See further Bryan, Jesus, 88–129.

Jesus' message of Israel's restoration. Sanders' suggestion was that Jesus anticipated the temple's non-punitive destruction and replacement by an eschatological temple built by God himself. This explanation has not met with acceptance, but it at least recognizes the incongruity of a message of restoration with a prediction of the temple's destruction.

Apart from the difficulty of suggesting that Jesus anticipated a non-punitive destruction of the temple, there is also a marked absence of evidence that Jesus expected a physical structure as its replacement. And yet it does seem that Jesus spoke not only of the temple's destruction but also of its rebuilding. In both the triple tradition and John, the temple was to be rebuilt "in three days." But did Jesus associate this rebuilt temple with himself (as John 2:21 suggests) or with his followers or possibly even with both?<sup>34</sup> The evidence is sufficient to tantalize but no more—sufficient to suggest that Jesus believed a new form would emerge or was emerging but not to define absolutely what he thought that new form would be.

Similar comments may be made with regard to Jesus' beliefs concerning the shape of eschatological Israel. The subject of Israel's election in the message of Jesus is vast, but it is possible to set forth in broad terms the way in which Jesus' eschatology shaped his understanding of Israel's constitution.<sup>35</sup> I have noted that Jesus' use of the vineyard motif in the parable of the workers in the vineyard (Matt 20:1–16) signals to the hearer that the story he tells is about Israel and its status before God. The parable addresses notions of election which exclude those "sinners" whose willful rejection of Israel's covenant have cut them off from the covenant and its remedies for sin. The synoptic gospels' frequent references to the resentment stirred up by Jesus' association with tax collectors and prostitutes bears witness to the fact that this understanding of Israel's election was held by at least some of Jesus' contemporaries. Against this assessment of who belonged to Israel, <sup>34</sup> See Dunn's brief assessment of the "rather sketchy" data, Jesus Remembered, 514–515. A great deal of attention has been given to the Qumran community's probable self-conception as a temple community, replacing the corrupt Jerusalem cult. However, for the Qumran community, this did not rule out a future physical temple in Jerusalem (11QT XXIX, 8–10). By contrast, if the early Christians viewed themselves as a temple, this did not evidently rule out worship at the Jerusalem temple (e.g., Acts 2:46) but neither was it coordinated with an expectation of a future physical temple in Jerusalem. Since many of the New Testament writers reflect in various ways on the significance of the temple, the fact that the synoptic gospels do not attribute to Jesus a clearly determined understanding of the nature of the eschatological temple very likely suggests that he did not set one forth.

---

<sup>35</sup> For a fuller development of the discussion which follows, see Bryan, Jesus, 56–72.

Jesus tells the parable of the workers to assert God's absolute freedom to determine who would participate in eschatological Israel, who would inherit the blessings of the kingdom. Whether this determination is understood as a new act of election (cf. 1 Enoch 93.9–10; CD I, 5–9) or as God's eschatological forgiveness of Israel (cf. Jer 31:31–34; Ezek 36:22–27) or both, the shape of eschatological Israel is determined only by God's free and gracious action. Such a view is entirely consonant with Jesus' willingness to suggest that those who submitted to John's baptism, even if widely regarded as apostate, were entering the kingdom ahead of those whose participation in eschatological Israel was conventionally thought beyond question (Matt 21:31–32). Jesus' calling of twelve disciples suggest both that Jesus identified the community being called into existence by God's eschatological action as Israel and that participation in that community was possible even now.

5. Conclusion

In the ubiquitous references to the tension between the already and the not yet in Jesus' eschatology, too little notice is paid to the fact that much of what is commonly perceived as "already" to Jesus was also "already" to his contemporaries. If Jesus believed that the rule of God was breaking in, his fellow Jews believed that God already ruled the world. If Jesus intuitively asserts the assertion of divine sovereignty, then other Jews believed that the sovereignty of God already governed human affairs so absolutely that to describe the arrival of God's kingdom as the beginning or arrival of God's rule would not only have made little sense, it would have bordered on blasphemy. The expectation was not of a time when God's rule would be ramped up, but of the assertion of God's rule on Israel's behalf. It is in this sense that a shift in the discussion concerning Jesus' proclamation of the kingdom of God to a focus on Israel's restoration is to be welcomed. But even this is inadequate if "the restoration of Israel" does not evoke the concrete social order and political reconfiguration envisioned by the prophets of Israel, ending with Jesus. If Jesus differs from others in the band of Israel's prophets it is in his steadfast refusal to cast this new social and political order into the familiar forms of Israel's theocratic past and to gauge the assertion of God's rule on Israel's behalf in terms of the emergence of those forms. The kingdom of God has come near, it can be entered, but with the failure of Israel and its institutions to be what they should already have been, Israel must now be judged and the kingdom's constitutional forms are broadly open to the determination of a God who exercises his sovereign rule with complete freedom.

If the kingdom of God is in some sense not yet, it is not because the kingdom now present has for Jesus become a formless abstraction, still awaiting the real coming of the kingdom in concrete form. Rather, in the wake of the failure of Israel and its constitutional features to conform to the terms and conditions of the eschaton, new forms are coming into existence, among them the form of Israel itself. This is why Jesus' ethical teaching remains the best index of the degree to which Jesus' eschatology may be said to be realized. If a people conformed to the eschatological expression of God's will was already coming into existence, then Israel's restoration was already to that degree a reality—a reality effected by John and extended by Jesus. However, if this kingdom is, in the first instance, ethically constituted, it is still given to a nation, a nation through whom God's sovereignty over all creation would be asserted. As those who claim to be Jesus' followers and heirs to privileges which have come to them because of Israel's judgment, Christians must still come to grips with the theological, social and political implications of the fact that Jesus' aims were focused on the national restoration of Israel.

JESUS, SATAN, AND COMPANY

DARRELL BOCK

One of the more interesting and controversial aspects of Jesus' ministry for modern readers has been Jesus' engagement with the devil and demons, as well as the role of exorcism in that ministry. Dealing with a world of spiritual beings, entities assumed in first-century Judaism but widely doubted in the modern world, has always pushed the modern historical method to its limits. This essay is divided into three basic parts: (1) the linguistic data and first-century background, (2) a discussion of how Satan and the demons, including the issue of exorcisms, have been read by interpreters, and (3) a look at key individual texts. A solid summary of where things stand comes from the recent work by James D. G. Dunn, Jesus Remembered.<sup>1</sup> Speaking of the "extraordinary deeds" tied to the Jesus tradition, deeds which include exorcism, he says, "They form a major part of the Jesus tradition, and prior to the Enlightenment's problematizing the very category of 'miracle' they constituted weighty proof that Jesus was from (or of) God. Since then the probative value (and therefore the market value) of these traditions has fallen through the floor, and it has not recovered much in recent years. But the records of Jesus' 'mighty works' are too important a feature of the Jesus tradition for us to ignore." Our survey will show that although many scholars have a great deal of skepticism about confirming the details of particular events in historical Jesus study, there is at the macro-level an acceptance of the fact the ancients perceived Jesus to have performed extraordinary works. That perception was a result of events Jesus performed. His confrontation with evil forces was an important dimension of his work and message that is deeply rooted in the tradition. As a result, it has become more common to recognize or at least be open to the fact that something of substance took place, even if the details are hard to corroborate by the limits of the modern historical method.

---

<sup>1</sup> James D. G. Dunn, Jesus Remembered (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2003), 667.

1. Linguistic Elements and First Century Jewish Background

By the first century, the existence of an arch-enemy of God and a host of opposing spiritual beings was a fixture in Judaism.<sup>2</sup> In the Hebrew Scripture, Satan was a figure in the divine court who “accused” humanity, as he did Job (Job 1:6–12; 2:1–7; so also Zech 3:1–2). In fact, the name Satan means “accuser.” The first use of the term as a personal name appears in 1 Chronicles 21:1. The LXX often translates the term by ὁ διάβολος (Sir 21:27, along with the texts already noted; the Greek term is used 21 times in LXX with 13 appearances in Job 1–2; only twice does it not translate the Hebrew term for Satan). The figure is prominent as well in intertestamental literature (T. Dan. 3.6; 5.6; 6.1; T. Gad. 4.7) and at Qumran (1QM XIII, 11; CD XVI, 5; 1QS III, 23) as an angel of enmity. He also is called Mastema (Jub. 10.8) and Belial, angel of darkness (1QS I, 18; II, 5, 19; III, 20–23), a name which equals Beliar of the Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs. Beelzebul is another name used for this figure, but the origin of that name is not clear. Sammuil is yet another name for this figure (Jub. 19.28). In Jewish literature, this leader of evil has various functions: (1) he tests (T. Job. 4.4–9; Jub. 16.17), (2) accuses (Jub. 1.20, a key text where he accuses and seduces so as to lead one to perish), and (3) leads astray, often into idolatry (Jub. 11.4–5; 22.16–17; Mart. Isa 1.9; 2.4; T. Job 2.2–3.5; CD XII, 2b–3; Life of Adam and Eve 9.1; 11.3; T. Job 23.11; 26.6). He is called “Lord of the Demons” (Jub. 10.7–13). In the end, Satan will be bound, so he cannot work his destructive power (1 En. 10.4; Jub. 5.6; 10.7–11; T. Levi 18.12).

References to demons are also common in the period.<sup>3</sup> They also are often associated with idolatry (Mart. Isa 1.8–9; Jub. 48.9–11; CD V, 17b–19). Demons injure and destroy (1 En. 15.11–12; Jub. 10.5), are often called unclean spirits (Jub. 10.1; T. Sim. 4.9; T. Ben. 5.2), defile (Tobit 3:7–8; 8:1–3; T. Reuben 2.8–9; 3.3; 1QM VII, 5), can produce illness (Ps 91:5–6; Life of the Prophets 16:38–42), and death (Jub. 10.1–2; 49.2; Wis 1:14). Their demise also comes at the end (Jub. 23.29; 50.5; 1 En. 69.27–29; T. Moses 10.1; 1QM I, 1; IV, 1b–2; XI, 8; XIII, 11–16;

<sup>2</sup> For the following, see Susan Garrett, The Demise of the Devil: Magic and the Demonic in Luke's Writings (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 1989), 127, n. 4; G. Foerster, σατανᾶς A–B, TDNT 7:151–163; O. Böcher, EDNT 3:234; H. Bietenhard and C. Brown, DNTT 3:468–473.

<sup>3</sup> G. Foerster, TDNT 3:1–20; O. Böcher, EDNT 1:272; Garrett, Demise of the Devil, 129 n. 15.

XV, 2–3, 15–18; XVII, 5b–6; XVIII, 1, 3, 11; T. Simeon 6.6; T. Levi 18.12–13; T. Zebulon 9.8–9; T. Dan. 5.11; T. Asher 7.3; 1QS III, 24–25; IV, 20–22; 1QH III, 18; 1QM I, 10–11; VII, 6; XII, 7–8.). This Jewish view appears rooted in a particular reading of Genesis 6:1–4, where the initial destructive impact of such beings was seen to have involved their cohabitating with women (1 En. 6–11; 15.3–12; 18.13–6; 19.1–2; Jub. 5.1–10; 10.5–11; T. Reuben 5.5–7; T. Naph. 3.5 Philo, Gig. 6–18). The sheer variety of sources that refer to Satan and the demons in Judaism, especially in intertestamental literature, shows the wide acceptance of such entities within Second Temple Judaism.

There are examples of exorcism and exorcists discussed in Judaism. Most prominent are Tobit 6–8, 1QapGen XX, 16–29 (involving Abraham), Josephus, Ant. 8.46–48 (Solomon/Eleazar); 6.166–69 (David and Lyre), War 7.185 (root of Baaras), and 4Q560 (not exorcism but prevention of possession).<sup>4</sup> Later texts include b. Me'il 17b (which although an exorcism is too late a text to be of use), and Num R. 19.8 (use of roots and smoke like the Eleazar account in Josephus, but with a Gentile idolater context). In the church fathers, Justin (Dialogue 85) thought Jewish exorcists were successful by magical means like the pagans. Origen's Celsus (Cels. 1.68) sees Jesus as a magician in this regard. In 5.45 Origen notes that the use of the name of the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob causes the demons to be vanquished. All of these texts show that Jesus' exorcisms are not unusual for his milieu. However, it also should be noted that evidence for exorcism among Jews was not widespread.<sup>5</sup> Either a charismatic leader or an inspired prophet would perform such a role. Eric Eve, in assessing the significance of this background, notes that Jesus is unique in the amount of exorcisms he performs and in being a "Bearer of numinous power" (one through whom God's Spirit works).<sup>6</sup>

Some texts related to demons or the devil involve eschatological hope (4Q521, T. Moses 10, and Jub. 23.23–31). However, they are not tied to exorcism but either to healing or to Satan's defeat in the end

<sup>4</sup> Eric Eve, The Jewish Context of Jesus' Miracles, JSNTS 231 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2002), 339–349, 375–376, and 379–380. Eve questions if 1QapGen XX is an exorcism, but says the procedure is the same as one.

<sup>5</sup> Eve, Jewish Context, 339–349, makes this point explicitly.

<sup>6</sup> Ibid., 378–380. This stands in contrast to those who appeal for God to work.

(1 En 10: primordial evil defeated). The distinct role exorcism plays for Jesus eschatologically will be an important point to note later.

Jewish association with exorcists that might relate to the eschaton include connections to David and Solomon (David: 1 Sam 16:14–16, 23; Josephus, Ant 6.166–68; L.A.B. 60; 11Q5 [11QPsa] XXVII, 9–10 [a very fragmentary text with little detail]; Solomon: 1 Kgs 4:33; Wis 7:20; Ant 8.45). Prophets like Elijah and Elisha also had such ability (1 Kgs 17–19; 2 Kgs 4–8). Intriguing but without detail is 4Q521 II, 1, 8, 12, where the “anointed one” heals in the new age, an important point as sickness and demonic association could overlap in this period.

In sum, the references to Satan and the demons are part of the rich fabric of the Jewish worldview. This worldview sees the world as not just a physical creation but a place where spiritual beings exist and work largely unseen, except for their effect.

The New Testament usage associated with Jesus fits this perspective. The term Satan appears in the Gospels 16 times out of 36 New Testament uses (Matt. 4:10; 12:26 [2x]; 16:23; Mark 1:13; 3:23 [2x], 26, as a strong man who guards his goods, images of his power on earth; 4:15; 8:33; Luke 10:18; 11:18; 13:16; 22:3–4; 22:31–32; John 13:27). Synoptic uses in Mark 1:12–13; 3:22–27 and 8:31–33 and parallels make up 10 of the 15 synoptic uses.<sup>7</sup> Of these texts, only Mark 1:13, Luke 22:3–4, 31–33 are narrative comments by an evangelist. The term is used interchangeably with “the devil” (ὁ διάβολος). Synonyms include evil one (Matt 13:19), enemy (Matt 13:39); Beelzebul (Mark 3:22 par); and “ruler of [this] world” (John 12:31; 14:30; 16:11). In the gospels, Satan is an anti-divine power (Mark 3:23, 26; Matt 12:26; Luke 11:18), sometimes tied to a disease (Luke 13:16), who works as a tempter (Mark 1:13; Matt 4:1–12; Luke 4:1–13 like his function in Job 1, except that here there is a face to face encounter with the one Satan tests; Matt 16:23; Mark 8:33; Luke 22:31, seeks to sift Peter). Satan is tied to wickedness (Mark 4:15; Luke 22:3; John 13:27) and his demise is indicated by work the disciples perform (Luke 10:18, 20). As Foerster says, “The power of evil is regarded as a single power working towards a single objective. This objective is the destruction of man in every respect. In particular, there is war against Jesus of Nazareth as the bringer of the redeeming lordship of God.”<sup>8</sup>

<sup>7</sup> Foerster, TDNT 7:151–163; Böcher, EDNT 3:234.

<sup>8</sup> Foerster, TDNT 7:160.

As was noted above, the devil (ὁ διάβολος) is the Greek term equivalent to Satan in LXX. There are 37 New Testament uses, with 14 in gospels, eight of those in the temptation account (Matt 4:1, 5, 8, 11; 13:39, 41; Luke 4:2, 3, 6, 13; 8:12; John 6:70; 8:44; 13:2).<sup>9</sup> The devil is the ruler of his angels (Matt 25:41), tempts (Mark 4 par), sows weeds (Matt 13:39), steals the Word of God (Luke 8:12), causes sin (John 8:44), causes Judas to betray (John 13:2), has children who follow his way (John 8:44; 6:70), causes disciples to think improperly (Matt 16:23; Mark 8:33), is destroyed at the judgment along with his angels (Matt 25:41), is defeated already (John 12:31; 14:30; 16:11), and abrogates to himself authority for this world, which is recognized to a degree (Matt 4:1–11; Luke 4:1–13; John 12:31; 14:30; 16:11, ruler of this world in John). Of all of these references, only John 13:2 is a narrative comment by an evangelist. The temptation references describe the interplay between Jesus and Satan. The other texts show up in discourse or in parabolic contexts.

When it comes to demons, the key term is δαιμόνιον. It is used 51 times in the gospels (Matthew 11 times; Mark 11 times [longer ending has 2 more uses]; Luke 23 times; John 6 times).<sup>10</sup> In the gospels, healings and possession comprise the largest number of references. A reference to unclean spirits functions as a synonym. There is an overlap between disease and demons, although this is not always the case. Thus, demons cause dumbness (Luke 11:14), muteness (Mark 9:17, 25), and weakness (Luke 13:11). The gospels have 13 references to demon possession (Matt 7 times; Mark 4 times; Luke once; Luke; John once: Matt 4:24; 8:16, 28, 33; 9:32; 12:22; 15:22; Mark 1:32; 5:15, 16, 18; Luke 8:36; John 10:2). However, John's Gospel does not record an exorcism. There are 7 exorcisms in the synoptics ([1] Demoniac in Capernaum [Mark 1:23–28; Luke 4:31–37]; [2] Gerasene Demoniac [Mark 5:1–20/Matt 8:28–34/Luke 8:26–39]; [3] Possessed Boy [Mark 9:14–29/Matt 17:14–21/Luke 9:37–43a]; [4] Mute/Blind Demoniac context for Beelzebul [Matt 12:22–23a/Luke 11:14/Mark 3:22–27, Beelzebul charge only]; [5] Mute Demoniac [Matt 9:32–33]; [6] Mary

<sup>9</sup> G. Foerster and G. vonRad, TDNT 3:72–81; Böcher EDNT 1:297–98; Bietenhard and Brown, DNTT 3:468–473.

<sup>10</sup> Böcher, EDNT 1:271–274. Matt 7:22; 9:33–34(2x); 10:8; 11:18; 12:24(2x), 27–28; 17:18; Mark 1:34(2x), 39; 3:15, 22(2x); 6:13; 7:26, 29–30; 9:38; [16:9.17]; Luke 4:33, 35, 41; 7:33; 8:2, 27, 29–30, 33, 35, 38; 9:1, 42, 49; 10:17; 11:14(2x)–15(2x), 18, 19, 20; 13:32; John 7:20; 8:48–49, 52; 10:20–21.

Magdalene [Luke 8:2]; [7] Syro-Phoenician Woman [Mark 7:24–30/Matt 15:21–28]). This means that exorcisms are multiply attested.<sup>11</sup> Eric Eve suggests that the uniqueness of Jesus' exorcisms, given that he is always the bearer of numinous power who drove out demons in his own name, may have contributed to the implicit Christology of the early church that saw Jesus as more than a prophet.<sup>12</sup>

This interaction with demons has a meaning for these accounts. Healings, of which exorcisms are a part because of the occasional overlap between disease and possession, fulfill prophecy (Matt 11:4–6 par Luke 7:22–23). They point to Satan's defeat (Mark 3:27 par; Luke 13:32) and the kingdom of God (Matt 12:28a=Luke 11:20a). To misunderstand this witness to God's power is to commit blasphemy against the Spirit (Mark 3:28–30 par). The demonology assumed here is that of ancient Judaism, but Jesus transcends it in the portrait given in the gospels.<sup>13</sup> The exorcisms show that the demons know the identity of Jesus as Holy One. They also know their fate and can be silenced by him. Unlike Jewish exorcists, Jesus does not pray to make this take place. Most often he merely speaks.

In sum, Jesus' involvement with the devil and demons is a key element of his ministry and a window to what Jesus is seeking to accomplish in his ministry according to the New Testament portrayal. How has this material been read and interpreted? What does this material show us about the historical Jesus? It is to those questions we now turn.

2. The Interpretation of Jesus, Satan, and Company in New Testament Study

How to interpret miracles and discussions of spiritual beings was not a matter of controversy until the philosophical developments of the modern worldview. As Bruce Chilton says, "Pre-modern hearers of Mark would have required no tradition critical consideration to be convinced that story tellers intended to speak of an occurrence, and

---

<sup>11</sup> Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 670.

<sup>12</sup> Eve, Jewish Context, 386.

<sup>13</sup> Forester, TDNT 7:160.

that they accomplished their intention.”<sup>14</sup> By contrast, Chilton notes that modern hearers are put in a different position, not by their understanding of the text, but by their understanding of the world. The issue here, either for or against such entities, is an a priori judgment. As Chilton says, “To say, for example, that the story is true and our view [the modern view] of the world too narrow, is a perfectly respectable philosophical reflection, but it can hardly be commended on strictly textual or historical grounds. Similarly, to say that demons do not exist and stories which suppose they do are misleading, has the attractive ring of rational consistency about it, but it would seem to reduce history to a priori notions of what is possible.”<sup>15</sup> Here is the great divide in reading such texts and assessing them. Historical method really does not and cannot address such questions, as the view of reality impacts on how such events are perceived and how historical method is applied.

An examination of the history of interpretation confirms this divide, although there are indications that the substantial skepticism of centuries from many modern interpreters is dissolving. Chilton goes on to note that alternate explanations, i.e., explanations which attempt to explain exorcism in naturalistic or psychological terms, leave the text behind, where exorcism is taken for granted in favor of a phenomenology of exorcism. Chilton chooses to leave the limits of historical method at what people perceived and how they acted on that perception, rather than at the level of what “reality” may be at work. This solution can be viewed in one of two ways. It can be seen either as a compromise solution out of the impasse or as a recognition of the limits of historical method as often defined by those who use it. The more basic question for those who believe in the existence of God is whether anything can be ruled out a priori. To put this another way, for those who see a resurrection as possible as an activity of the powerful God of creation, can something like exorcism or the existence of other spiritual beings be ruled out?

Nevertheless, the history of discussion over the last few centuries shows that these accounts have been doubted and explained in a variety of ways.<sup>16</sup> This survey concentrates on continental reaction as it often drove such discussions in the West. The note of skepticism started with Baruch Spinoza in 1670. In his Tractatus theologico-politicus, Spinoza spoke of events run by laws and rules that operate out of eternal necessity. Miracles run counter to such natural law. In English, the classic case was made by David Hume in his Inquiry Concerning Human Understanding, section 10 on “Of Miracles” (1748). He added to Spinoza’s direction some arguments against miracles at a sociological level.<sup>17</sup> He made four key arguments. (1) No miracle has had a sufficiently large witness base; (2) People crave the miraculous and believe fables more readily than they should; (3) Miracles occur only among barbarous people; (4) Miracles stories exist in all religions and cancel each other out. Now points (3) and (4) are demonstrably false, as many intellectuals have accepted the possibility of miracles and most religions do not give the place to miracles that Christianity does. Point 2 has merit but this simply means claims of miracles need to be examined with care. Point 1 could be debated, as the witness base of the New Testament claims is broader than Hume implies.

---

<sup>14</sup> Chilton, “An Exorcism of History: Mark 1:21–28,” in Authenticating the Activities of Jesus, ed. idem and Craig Evans, NTTS 28.2 (Leiden: Brill, 1999), 215–245 (230).

<sup>15</sup> Chilton, “An Exorcism of History: Mark 1:21–28,” 231. The full discussion covers 231–33.

Nonetheless, later rationalists elevated this “natural law” claim to a stated conviction that miracles were “impossible.” Such was the claim of Carl Friedrich Bahrdt (1741–1792).<sup>18</sup> Another twist on this issue was Schleiermacher’s claim (1768–1834) that everything God does is a miracle and so any event could be described in this light. In 1835–1836, D.F. Strauss in his Das Leben Jesu took the view that miracles do not happen and that mythology and symbolism explain what is taking place. This opened the door for reading miracles at a merely symbolic level. Harnack in 1913 argued that these events were either natural events understood in an exaggerated manner, projections, attempts to argue the Scripture was fulfilled, or something we can no longer explain.

---

<sup>16</sup> Maier, “Zur neutestamentlichen Wunderexegese im 19. und 20. Jahrhundert,” in Gospel Perspectives. The Miracles of Jesus, ed. David Wenham and Craig Blomberg, Vol. 6 (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1986), 49–87, has a detailed survey of this history, which I summarize here. Much of Maier’s information on the period up to the first third of the twentieth century comes from G. Marquardt, Das Wunderproblem in der deutschen protestantischen Theologie der Gegenwart (München: Hueber, 1933).

<sup>17</sup> For this discussion, see William L. Craig, “The Problem of Miracles: A Historical and Philosophical Perspective,” Gospel Perspectives, vol. 6, 9–48, esp. 17–19, 22–27, and Craig Blomberg, The Historical Reliability of the Gospels (Downers Grove, IL: Inter-Varsity Press, 1987), 77–79.

<sup>18</sup> Maier, “Zur neutestamentlichen Wunderexegese im 19. und 20. Jahrhundert,” 51.

By the time the History of Religions school came along in the early twentieth century, the use of parallels from other cultures came into the picture. In 1911, Paul Fiebig raised the issues of parallels from Judaism. Finally came Form Criticism. In 1921, Rudolf Bultmann in his History of the Synoptic Tradition argued that the miraculous tradition grew and did not exist at the oldest levels of Christian tradition, as it was rooted in Hellenism and Hellenistic Christianity. He also doubted whether a modern man could believe in such occurrences. His program of demythologizing was born out of an attempt to redeem what message was left. It largely read the text along symbolic lines, merely giving an older style of reading, reaching back to Strauss, a newer name.

There were some who did not go in this skeptical direction. They took various tacks. In 1908, Wilhelm Hermann on the theme of "Offenbarung und Wunder" suggested that miracles were a "metascientific reality" (metawissenschaftliche Wirklichkeit). They can be experienced but not proved. In 1910, Johannes Wendland in his Der Wunderglaube im Christentum maintained that to allow scientific method to be ruled by natural science (i.e., the appeal to laws of nature) is to define the scientific method too narrowly. The world of nature and spirit should not be handled in such a dualistic manner. Others such as Hermann Cremer (1900) spoke of the necessity of the breaking of causality to picture God's redeeming a fallen creation. Adolf Schlatter saw the God of creation as possessing the capability to perform miracles. In his Geschichte des Christus (1923), he specifically challenged Bultmann's claim that the oldest level of the tradition was miracle-free.

The divide in worldview and reading we have just traced has not changed greatly in the last half-century. But as we shall see, the form of argumentation has taken on a layer that adds considerations of parallels or textual inconsistencies to make its case. Often the claim is made that at a macro-level Jesus was perceived as an exorcist and "did exorcisms," however that is conceived. However, at a micro-level, we are left uncertain about how to verify details of particular accounts. The clearest recent presentation of this approach is found in John Meier's A Marginal Jew.<sup>19</sup> He confidently makes the global assertion about Jesus performing exorcisms and his opponents perceiving that he did so, but is far more nuanced in looking at specific passages. Of the seven miracle accounts, Meier sees three as historical (possessed boy, Mary Magdalene remark, and Gerasene demoniac), one as representative but recast (Capernaum synagogue healing), one as uncertain (mute demoniac of Matt 12), one as redacted by Matthew (mute demoniac of Matt 9) and one as a Christian creation (Syro-Phoenician woman and her daughter). He explains that the existence of parallels, forms of convention, the possibility of introducing detail in telling, the importance of the theme for the early church, the vagueness of description, not to mention the cultural gap between the first century and our time, complicate such historical work.

---

<sup>19</sup> John P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, 2: Mentor, Message and Miracles, The Anchor Bible Reference Library (New York: Doubleday, 1994),

The issue of parallels also is complex. Two suggestions that seem to be falling out of favor should be noted. First, the appeal to Jesus as a type of Hellenistic “divine Man” (θεῖος Ἄνθρωπος) has fallen on hard times as a result of work by David Tiede, Carl Holloway, and Barry Blackburn.<sup>20</sup> Blackburn’s essay summarizes the history of the divine man tradition in Greco-Roman literature. He looks at all the examples and shows there was no “fixed type” for this theme on which first-century writers could draw, nor was there any standard designation for the category.<sup>21</sup> In the end, Blackburn argues three obstacles to the connection: (1) many parallel examples are late, (2) it is “almost universally recognized that the tradition of Jesus’ exorcistic and healing ministry is rooted in his own activity,” and (3) all the parallels also exist in Old Testament, Jewish, or rabbinic contexts, pointing to a potential Jewish background.<sup>22</sup>

The second, unlikely suggestion is the one by Morton Smith that Jesus was a magician.<sup>23</sup> Here Graham Twelftree makes the argument

---

646–677. Meier says it is one thing to make the global assertion, quite another to “descend to particular types of miracles and individual miracle stories” (646).

<sup>20</sup> David Tiede, The Charismatic Figure as Miracle Worker (Missoula, MT: SBL, 1972); Carl Holladay, Theios Aner in Hellenistic Judaism (Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1977); Barry Blackburn, “Miracle Working ‘ΘΕΙΟΙ ΑΝΔΡΕΣ’ in Hellenism (and Hellenistic Judaism),” Gospel Perspectives. The Miracles of Jesus, vol. 6:185–218. This theory is most classically expressed in L. Bieler, ΘΕΙΟΣ ΑΝΗΡ (Vienna: Oskar Hofels, 1935–36).

<sup>21</sup> Blackburn, “Miracle Working ‘ΘΕΙΟΙ ΑΝΔΡΕΣ,’” 188–189. In fact, he notes that how the figure was viewed as “divine” was not consistent either. Such figures engaged in 14 distinct kinds of activity (190–191). Exorcisms are particularly rare, being found in Philostatus of the third century and one Indian sage, Iarchas (192).

<sup>22</sup> Blackburn, “Miracle Working ‘ΘΕΙΟΙ ΑΝΔΡΕΣ,’” 195–196.

<sup>23</sup> Smith, Jesus the Magician (New York: Harper & Row, 1978).

against Smith.<sup>24</sup> The key argument Twelftree makes is that Jesus was not seen so much as a magician by his opponents; rather, he was charged with being a sorcerer, i.e., his power came from the devil. Secondly, charges that refer directly to magic for Jesus are late and are not accepted by those who seek to explain what he was doing. E. P. Sanders, who has some sympathy for Smith's view, sees it ultimately as inadequate because "it leaves largely out of account the pervasive evidence which makes us look to Jewish eschatology as defining the general contours of Jesus' career."<sup>25</sup>

In sum, the assessment of miracles, and hence also of exorcisms, is hindered by many factors once the text is brought into doubt. Philosophical and historical issues abound. Interpreters are divided on how to assess and synthesize all of these factors into some type of workable method. Worldviews impact on the reading and assessment of what is possible. Still, this has not stopped the discussion. Two recent options seem unlikely: that Jesus was presented as a "divine man" or that he was a magician. So we turn to the recent treatment of such issues. We will work through global issues first and then turn our attention to particular texts before summarizing the results.

3. Global Considerations: Why Most Accept Jesus Was an Exorcist

However it is conceived in terms of reality, it is fair to say that most interpreters regard Jesus' reputation as an exorcist as established with both his followers and his opponents. N. T. Wright speaks of Jesus engaged in a "head on war" with Satan.<sup>26</sup> Joachim Gnilka says that "it is hardly a matter of debate that he [Jesus] was also active as an exorcist."<sup>27</sup>

---

<sup>24</sup> Graham Twelftree, Jesus the Exorcist: A Contribution to the Study of the Historical Jesus, WUNT 2.54. Tübingen (Mohr/Siebeck, 1993), 190–207. See also Joel Marcus, "The Beelzebul Controversy and the Eschatologies of Jesus," in Authenticating the Activities of Jesus, ed. Bruce Chilton and Craig A. Evans, NTTS 28.2 (Leiden: Brill 1999), 247–277, at 264–265.

<sup>25</sup> E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (London: SCM Press, 1985), 169. Eve, Jewish Context, 4–5, criticizes Smith as "privileging the perspective of his opponents and discovering forced parallels between Jesus' actions and those of magicians regardless of context."

<sup>26</sup> N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 1996), 195.

<sup>27</sup> J. Gnilka, Jesus of Nazareth: Message and History, trans. by Siegfried Schatzmann (Peabody, MA: Hendricksen, 1997), 120.

Craig Evans has laid out the detailed arguments that lead to such a conclusion for miracles.<sup>28</sup> We apply these arguments to exorcisms. (1) The miracles are multiply attested in Mark, Q, L, M, and John. Exorcisms hold almost a similar level of attestation in Mark (Gerasene Demoniac), Matt=Luke (Blind Demoniac for Beelzebul controversy), M (Mute Demoniac), and L (Reference to Mary Magdalene). This attestation extends outside the biblical materials to records of others. Josephus is aware that Jesus performed unusual works (Ant 18.63). Celsus in Origen's Against Celsus (1.6, 38 and 63) accepted that Jesus did such works. The Talmudic tradition in b. Sanh 43a also accepts that Jesus performed such works. (2) The miracles are dissimilar in how they are portrayed. They do not involve prayer as with Jewish holy men, nor are they like magic. They are not a key element in early Christian preaching, appearing only now and again. (3) The Beelzebul charge does not look invented, since it meets the criteria of embarrassment. Would the church invent such a charge against Jesus? (4) Exorcisms were not an explicit part of first-century Jewish messianic expectation, although healings were seen as a part of what the eschatological era would bring. (5) We can see the effect of Jesus' ministry that led to large crowds. Jesus' miracles, including exorcisms, would have been part of what attracted these crowds. As E. P. Sanders said, "But if it is true that large crowds surrounded him in Galilee, it was probably more because of his ability to heal and exorcize than anything else."<sup>29</sup> (6) The principle of coherence fits here. Many sayings regarded as authentic point to such a ministry (Beelzebul saying; Satan's house divided; binding the strong man parable; Luke's exorcism saying in Luke 13:32). (7) The embellishment of later sources points to authenticity as well. All of this makes it likely that Jesus performed exorcisms and that this element of his ministry was embedded in the earliest layers of the tradition about him.

This finding is important because a ministry of exorcism assumes a worldview that involves Satan and the demons. In a world where there are demons to be exorcized, Satan is also present. Jesus' sayings that link exorcisms to the world of Satan say as much. So we turn our attention now to specific key texts, affirming that the global case for

<sup>28</sup> C. Evans, "Jesus and Jewish Miracles Stories," in Jesus and His Contemporaries: Comparative Studies (Leiden: Brill, 1995), 213–243.

<sup>29</sup> Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 164.

Jesus having performed exorcisms and being recognized for doing such is strong.

4. Key Sayings and Events Involving Jesus, Satan and Demons

4.1. Eschatology and the Beelzebul Saying

Another element of near consensus involving Jesus' exorcisms is that he made an eschatological point from them. He presented them as an indication that the new era of promise, what he called the kingdom, was breaking. These acts were evidence of Satan's defeat. Two key passages make this point. The first is the saying where Jesus proclaims, "If I cast out demons by the finger of God (Luke)/Spirit of God (Matthew), then the kingdom of God has come upon you" (Matt 12:28=Luke 11:20). The second is Jesus' parable of the strong man overcome and bound (Mark 3:27; Matt 12:29; Luke 11:21–22). To this, some add the passage where Jesus replies to John the Baptist's query about whether Jesus is the one to come. In the response, Jesus notes a series of different kinds of healings, but we shall not treat this saying as it does not mention exorcisms directly. However, it does cohere and fit into the same kingdom context.

One prominent dissenter in making this connection to the historical Jesus is E. P. Sanders.<sup>30</sup> He doubts that one can establish this association on historical grounds. His initial objection is that ancient Judaism does not have an example of exorcism bringing in the kingdom. However, this difference is precisely the point, for the fresh connection is an example of dissimilarity. The idea does not match Judaism nor does it fit the normal early church emphasis that the cross, resurrection, and descent of the Spirit are the keys to kingdom arrival. His second objection is that we cannot know exactly what Jesus said, so that the determination cannot be based on a saying. However, the fact that multiple sayings make this kind of a point means we can be confident of the kind of thing Jesus said. When Sanders makes this argument by saying he "can imagine other possibilities," he sounds like a defense attorney trying to surface other options in the face of other more solidly established evidence.<sup>31</sup> Such arguments from imagination are less evidential than statements from actual texts. One of the possibilities Sanders considers more likely is the charge that Jesus did magic, but it is not clear why the view of opponents forms a kind of either/or option for the interpreter about what Jesus said about his own work. In sum, the case against the authenticity of the Beelzebul saying and the related strong man parable is weak.

---

<sup>30</sup> Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 134–138.

<sup>31</sup> Ibid., 134.

Ben Meyer has made the case for these sayings.<sup>32</sup> He begins by arguing (1) that the offensiveness of charge of sorcery would not be invented. It fits the criteria of embarrassment. (2) The charge against Jesus is also corroborated in later Jewish materials as was already noted, so this part of the saying is multiply attested. (3) He observes that there is a risk of relativizing Jesus' work by mentioning exorcisms of others in the saying. Here Meyer alludes to the previous remark in the saying where Jesus raises the question of how the sons of the Pharisees can perform exorcisms. (4) There is an implicit allusion to a rather obscure Scripture (Exod 8) in the reference to the "finger of God," an expression more likely to be original to the saying, since had the Spirit of God been original Luke would have likely used it, given that he often refers to the Spirit. (5) There is the already noted distinctive combination of exorcism and apocalyptic eschatology. This is a point also made by Rudolf Pesch.<sup>33</sup> (6) There is evidence of the style of Jesus in the antithetic parallelism of question and answer (Mark 3:33–34; 8:12; 10:18; 11:17; Matt 7:3–5; Luke 12:51; 22:25). (7) Becker adds an additional argument by suggesting that the "I form" of the saying points to authenticity.<sup>34</sup> This combination of arguments for the passage indicates that this Beelzebul saying is one of the more solid pieces of material in the Jesus tradition. As such it is a key text for discerning what Jesus thought of his exorcisms. First, it was evidence of his battle with Satan and his forces. Second, it represented the in-breaking of the divine presence associated with the promised kingdom. In Matthew and Luke, this saying is attached to the healing of a mute/blind demoniac. Although it is hard to see this healing as a part of "Q" tradition, since Q material is almost exclusively teaching material, the fact that this healing is attached to this saying by both Matthew and Luke, possibly independently of each other, may show that this linkage is made in the tradition that predates either evangelist. Whether the event had that original connection or an evangelist has associated the saying with the healing as a type of this activity, the saying still gives us the most important passage for determining what Jesus aimed to show through his work.

<sup>32</sup> B. Meyer, The Aims of Jesus (London: SCM Press, 1979), 155.

<sup>33</sup> R. Pesch, Das Markusevangelium, 1 Teil, Herders theologischer Kommentar zum Neuen Testament 2.1 (Freiburg: Herder, 1984), 219.

<sup>34</sup> J. Becker, Jesus of Nazareth, trans. by James E. Crouch (Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 1998), 108–109.

4.2. Mute Demoniac

This uniquely Matthean exorcism is found in Matt 9:32-33. It largely parallels the healing that introduced the Beelzebul saying. In fact, many see it as a doublet account.<sup>35</sup> It lacks much detail and is almost a summary healing account. Although the judgment that this is a doublet discounts the option that Jesus did perform a variety of miracles on many occasions, it is also the case that this account is so sparse of detail that it does not add much to what other accounts tell us.

4.3. The Exorcism of Mary Magdalene

A second key passage comes from "L" material. It is the offhand remark that Mary Magdalene was the beneficiary of an exorcism of seven demons (Luke 8:1-3). Fitzmyer argues that his remark is stereotyped and inherited.<sup>36</sup> So he does not think much can be made of it. But is it really stereotyped? The remark appears in a setting where nothing is being made of exorcisms. It introduces a character from a locale (Magdala) that has no biblical significance. The almost casual manner of the aside about her encounter with demons makes the remark more of a side remark, not terribly relevant to the mention of the three women who follow Jesus. The remark does set up Luke 24:10, but the detail of her exorcism does not add anything to that link. So, all in all, this remark also has the feel of being authentic.

---

<sup>35</sup> U. Luz, Matthew 8-20, trans. by James E. Couch (Philadelphia: Fortress, 2001), 50; E. Lohmeyer, Das Evangelium des Matthäus, Meyer Kommentar (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1967), 180; H. Frankemölle, Matthäus: Kommentar I (Düsseldorf: Patmos, 1994), 1:328.

<sup>36</sup> J. A. Fitzmyer, The Gospel according to Luke I-IX, AB, 28 (Garden City, NJ: Doubleday, 1981), 695-696.

4.4. The Gerasene Demoniac

The most elaborately described exorcism involves the demoniac whose exorcism leads to the death of a herd of swine (Mark 5:1–20 par). This exorcism involves a third strand of tradition, namely sources that Mark used. The scene is treated with a kind of schizophrenia, in that many regard the exorcism as authentic but see the section involving the swine as secondary.<sup>37</sup> Reasons include the fact that the visual element of the swine being possessed serves as a proof of Jesus' success and so has a clear analogy in healing scenes (e.g., Josephus, Ant. 8.46–48; Philostratus, Vit. Apoll. 4.20, where an exorcism leads to the spirit occupying a statue).<sup>38</sup> Ådna discusses the pigs as a symbol of uncleanness which represents paganism, but he does not consider this so crucial to a decision about historicity. However, what is important to Ådna and Meier, as well as to most of those who reject this part of the account, is the uncertainty over the tradition's description of the locale of the miracle, the difference between Gerasa and Gadara. This difference shows up between the Markan version and its parallels in Matthew 8:28 and Luke 8:26. Gerasa is about thirty miles east of the Sea of Galilee, while Gadara is over six miles from the Sea. Some like the reading Gergasa for this event, putting it right on the edge of the Sea. It is clear that there is uncertainty in the manuscript tradition about the locale and part of the reason is likely the fact that two of the locations are some distance from the water which is so central to the swine element of the healing. Gerasa qualifies as the difficult reading for this story, but as such it brings into question, for many, the swine element.

Those who support the swine element are not without responses. Gundry accepts Gergasa as the original locale, but also argues that the swine element is central to the account.<sup>39</sup> Others suggest that the difference over locale is the difference between more exact locations and

---

<sup>37</sup> Meier, Marginal Jew, 651; J. Ådna, "The Encounter of Jesus with the Gerasene Demoniac," in Authenticating the Activities of Jesus, 279–301 (290–298); F. Annen, Heil für die Heiden: Zur Bedeutung und Geschichte der Tradition vom besessenen Gerasener (Mk 5,1–20 parr.), Frankfurter Theologische Studien 29 (Frankfurt am Main: Josef Knecht, 1976), 192–193.

<sup>38</sup> However, Ådna does not find this reason convincing ("Gerasene Demoniac," 292), in part because he agrees with Twelftree that the pig scene is not proof of success but evidence of a banishment that is a part of the cure; Jesus the Exorcist, 74–75.

<sup>39</sup> Robert Gundry, Mark: A Commentary on His Apology for the Cross. (Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1993), 255–257. He argues that the combination of water and cemeteries fits and that the large number of demons exorcized assumes the herd as a part better known regional locales or other associations that cause the difference.<sup>40</sup> As already noted, Twelftree argues that the swine element is a part of the account of the cure, rather than the proof of healing. It should also be noted that Mark 5 stands in contrast to Vit. Apoll. 4.20 in that in the Apollonius account the dialogue explicitly indicates that the movement to the statue is a proof of the healing. Twelftree also points to the unusual, destructive nature of the act as being otherwise unlike Jesus. Interestingly, Bultmann argued that this account was always one unit.<sup>41</sup> All of this means that the secondary character of the swine section is less than certain, as the account looks too unified to be divided.

Even if the swine section were secondary, the account is still regarded by most as reflecting at its core a real event. This would mean that a third strand of tradition testifies to Jesus performing exorcism.

4.5. Exorcisms at the Capernaum Synagogue and of the Epileptic

Although Meier doubts the specific connection between this account and an event in Capernaum, he again argues that the account does fit globally with the type of thing Jesus did.<sup>42</sup> However, others disagree. Gnilka argues for the Palestinian character of this tradition and as a result for its age.<sup>43</sup> The reference to the destruction of demons is also unlike other accounts. As a result, it is not so clear why one would hesitate to see such work in Capernaum, especially given the acknowledgement that Jesus spent much time here and the seemingly solid indications that he did much healing activity there, such as the healing of Peter's mother-in-law.

---

of the account. Although I do not agree with Gundry on the textual decision, the other points have merit.

<sup>40</sup> I have covered this textual issue in Luke in detail in D. Bock, Luke 1:1-9:50, Baker Exegetical Commentary of the New Testament (Grand Rapids, MI: Baker, 1994), 782-784. I do not opt for a particular solution but note that either a regional reference or the issue of the man's home versus the locale of the healing may be at play in the difference. Twelftree's failure to discuss this issue is a glaring omission in his discussion of this scene.

<sup>41</sup> Rudolf Bultmann, The History of the Synoptic Tradition, trans. by J. Marsh; New York: Harper & Row, 1963), 210.

<sup>42</sup> Meier, Marginal Jew, 2:648-650.

<sup>43</sup> Gnilka, Das Evangelium nach Markus (Mk 1-8,26), EKK 2.1 (Zürich/Neukirchen-Vluyn: Benziner/Neukirchener, 1978), 77-78. He sees the reference to the Sabbath, Jesus of Nazareth, the Holy One of God, the demon's "I know who you are", the reference to crying out in a loud voice versus the use of adverbs, and the reference to a "man with an [evil] spirit" as indicators of this setting.

However, this text adds little to what we have already seen, being more corroborative and also coming from Markan sources. Another miracle from a Markan source is the healing of the epileptic, which has claims to authenticity because of the harsh manner in which the disciples are portrayed. Would the church invent such a story about its leaders? This story seems to meet the criteria of embarrassment. However, it also adds little to what has already been said.

4.6. Syro-Phoenician's Daughter

The last of the seven exorcisms in the gospels involves the healing from a distance of the daughter of a Syro-Phoenician woman. What makes this account so unusual is that the account is more about the dialogue between the woman and Jesus over Gentiles seeking blessing than about the healing or its details. In fact, the dialogue dominates so much that Taylor calls the account more like a pronouncement story than a miracle account.<sup>44</sup> Those who question the account argue that the account's concern with Gentile relations is an early church concern; it reflects the church's theology of mission.<sup>45</sup>

Twelftree argues that the account gives evidence of historicity in the following points: the Gentile location; his hesitation to minister is uncharacteristic of his ministry; his presence in a region, not a specific city; the remark about Gentiles being like dogs, which is not a Markan expression, pointing to a pre-Easter origin and perspective; and the healing from a distance.<sup>46</sup> What is important about the reference to Gentile as "dogs" is that it does not seem to be the kind of remark someone in the early church would invent, as the embarrassment of the remark for the potential unity of the church argues against it, unless it had a sanction in Jesus' speech. The retort also neutralizes the remark. But the idea of Jesus "being bested" in a dialogue is also out of character for such scenes, especially by a Gentile woman. In addition, it is not clear how the theology of mission is affirmed in a text where Gentile blessing is given grudgingly and viewed almost as an

---

<sup>44</sup> Taylor, The Gospel according to St Mark, 2nd ed. (New York: MacMillan, 1966), 347–348. He argues for a "primitive" stamp to the account because of the location of the incident, Jesus' vain quest for privacy, the woman's witty reply, the pleasure her reply gives Jesus, the passing reference to a cure, and signs of Aramaic style and vocabulary (e.g., redundant expressions in v. 25).

<sup>45</sup> R. Pesch, Das Markusevangelium, 1:368; Meier, Marginal Jew, 661.

<sup>46</sup> Twelftree, Jesus the Exorcist, 289–290.

exception. This final observation undercuts the claim that the dialogue affirms a theology of mission, rendering the key rationale for an early church text suspect. These factors mean a good case can be made for this scene being rooted in Jesus' ministry. That said, this event also does not add much to the portrait in the clearly authentic material. We already have ministry in a Gentile context with the Gerasene demoniac.

4.7. Summary on Exorcisms

The evidence of these exorcism texts argues that the historical Jesus operated in a Jewish context and ministered with a worldview that involved the world of demons. He tied this work to evidence of an eschatological in-breaking of the kingdom. A final text that coheres with this portrait is the remark Jesus makes when his disciples minister in missionary groups during his ministry. Jesus says that he saw Satan fall like lightning as they report that demons obey them (Luke 10:18). This fits with the exorcism-Satan connection of the Beelzebul charge and strong man texts. It also coheres with the implication that the work surrounding Jesus' ministry points to the eschaton and indicates the defeat of evil. The "battle" Jesus had with forces opposed to God and to humanity is evident in all of this interaction. Exorcisms were important to Jesus not only because they led to healing, but because these exorcisms pointed to divine power and presence of the in-breaking of the kingdom. Another evidence of this battle is Jesus' prediction of Peter's denial, namely, that it is associated with a Satanic effort to cause Peter's fall (Luke 22:31). We have not made much of this text because it is uncorroborated, but it does fit into this portrait as well.

4.8. A Final Event: The Temptations

This event reinforces what has already been shown. In one sense it is the foretaste of "the battle." It is a difficult event to corroborate, being a private, unique confrontation between Satan and Jesus.<sup>47</sup> There is the suggestion of parallels of the testing of the righteous Holy Men.<sup>48</sup> Texts in this category include: Gen 22 (God of Abraham), Job 1–2 (Satan of Job with God’s permission), Wisdom 2:12–24 (Unrighteous testing of the righteous man/Son of God), T. Abraham 12–13 (Death challenges Abraham in a dream), Jubilees 17 (Mastema and God of Abraham to sacrifice Isaac with God’s “permission,” with Mastema is the “accuser” here), T. Job, esp. 27.1–7 (Satan of Job, where the righteous man confronts Satan who admits defeat), and later texts such as Martyrdom of Isaiah 5 (Sammuel of Isaiah, leading to his martyrdom), b. Sanh 89b (Satan of Abraham), and Genesis Rabbah 56.4 (Sammael of Abraham). However, a close look at these texts shows they are not so parallel. There is an examination of faithfulness, but in none of the early texts is there a face-to-face encounter. Usually, the test is done with the evil one as the accuser behind the scenes or working through tests involving suffering. This means the text is not so much “to form” as sometimes is suggested.

---

<sup>47</sup> W. D. Davies and Dale C. Allison, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Gospel according to Saint Matthew, ICC, vol. 1 (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1988), 351–353, note that the evidence that the baptism and temptation are both in Q and were connected to each other early in the tradition as part of the "call" of Jesus. They regard it as a Haggadic tale spun from Deut 6–8 and paralleled by haggadic disputations

The event looks like the report of a special defining event in the life of Jesus, where his faithfulness to his call as Son is being challenged.<sup>49</sup> Is this the type of call Jesus passed on much as many Old Testament prophets did in noting their entry into the vocation? What the account clearly shows and portrays is the sense of “battle” we see elsewhere in texts that are easier to corroborate. It is clear that Jesus saw in Satan and the demons an opponent to be overcome, whether they stood opposed to the path of Jesus himself, as at the temptation, or stood opposed to humanity, as in the exorcisms.

---

(b. Sanh 97b, 89b), though these texts are late. Allison addressed the issue again in “Behind the Temptations of Jesus,” in Authenticating the Activities of Jesus, 195–213. He notes that the event possibly does “retain something of Jesus’ own interpretation of a foundational religious experience” (213). He goes on to say that even if nothing like it took place, the event does describe “with a fair sense of several things that characterized Jesus.” Interestingly, E. P. Sanders, The Historical Figure of Jesus (London: Penguin, 1993), 117, argues that it is likely Jesus did fast and pray before beginning his ministry and that the temptations are “mythological” elaborations on that fact. In other words, at the least there is a historical kernel here.

<sup>48</sup> Bultmann, History of the Synoptic Tradition, 253.

<sup>49</sup> J. B. Gibson, The Temptations of Jesus in Early Christianity, JSNTMS 112 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995), focuses on the various biblical versions of this account.

5. Conclusion

Despite the controversy surrounding the issue of exorcisms and the hurdles the category brings to the modern worldview, there is good evidence that suggests that the roots of such events run deep into the Jesus tradition and that there was recognition by both supporters and opponents that Jesus performed such unusual works. A case can be made for almost every exorcism text that it reflects an event in Jesus' life. In this, ministry was portrayed as the spiritual battle on behalf of humanity that Jesus undertook against the forces of evil. The evidence of divine power coming through Jesus pointed to the victorious presence of God in salvation and to the in-breaking of God's promised rule. By casting out demons, Jesus pointed to the in-breaking presence and power of the kingdom with its ultimate defeat of evil yet to come. The defeat of Satan and company meant that no longer did the forces of evil have a stranglehold on the destruction of humanity. In this, Jesus' interaction with Satan and the demons showed that with victory in the battle, a powerful audio-visual of victory and salvation had come.

JESUS AND APOCALYPTICISM

CRISPIN FLETCHER-LOUIS

In an article in the second volume of this Handbook, there is a survey of the history of the study of Jewish Apocalypticism. The discussion of Jesus and apocalypticism here depends in large part on that survey along with its treatment of the primary sources and their interpretative issues. In that article the study of Jewish apocalypticism is divided into two phases which are roughly coterminous, first with the (First and) Second or New Quest and secondly, with the Third Quest. It is hoped that a better understanding of the developments in the study of the Jewish phenomenon can clarify the reasons for the current sharp divergence of opinions on the subject of Jesus' relationship to apocalypticism. And in that piece there is laid out, in broad brush strokes, an emerging new perspective on Jewish Apocalyptic that promises fresh insights and perhaps solutions to vexing problems in the study of the historical Jesus.

Prior to the 1970's, Jewish apocalyptic literature is thought to reflect a thoroughly dualistic theology centred on a transcendent end to history. After the 1970's, advances in understanding are made, though two distinct approaches have emerged. The work of John J. Collins and other North American scholars attempts a more nuanced analysis of apocalyptic literature that tries to separate out literary genre, apocalyptic eschatology, worldview and social setting. By contrast, Christopher Rowland has championed an approach which marginalises the role of a particular eschatology in apocalyptic literature whilst drawing attention to the role of religious experience in the central claim for the disclosure of heavenly secrets. The former approach stands in considerable continuity with the older view that apocalypticism is a dualistic theology quite different from biblical religion, whilst Rowland's work reflects a British aversion to the idea that the apocalypses manifest a new worldview in the history of Israelite thought.

Both the Collins and Rowland contributions have their weaknesses, although Rowland's work contains seminal insights that point towards an altogether new perspective on Jewish apocalyptic literature with further implications for our understanding of Second Temple eschatologies.

Jewish apocalyptic literature is best understood as a distinctively Jewish and biblical claim that the one true God reveals the secrets of heaven—the reality that transcends space and time—through and to the image of God, the true humanity present in the nation’s righteous representatives (Enoch, Abraham, Daniel and others). Revelation is not mediated by the idolatrous mechanisms of mantic wisdom present in other religions, though communication between God, his angels and humanity does take place within the cosmological framework that is symbolised by, and present in, Israel’s temple-as-microcosm. That temple cosmology is decidedly holistic, not dualistic. This understanding of apocalyptic texts provides a new understanding of Daniel 7. That apocalyptic scene assumes Israel’s temple-centred cosmology and the “one like a son of man” (of Dan 7:13) coming to God with heavenly clouds looks forward to the coming to God, in the clouds-of-incense-filled sanctuary, of Israel’s true (therefore both human and divine) high priest on an eschatological Day of Atonement that removes all impurity and restores cosmic order.

Temple cosmology is vital for a proper understanding not just of the apocalypses, but of Jewish eschatology in general. Visions of the end, cosmic cessation or transformation, particularly in Palestinian and (properly) “apocalyptic” texts, are not easily understood apart from the belief that Israel’s temple symbolises and/or sacramentally guarantees the stability and order of the cosmos. Since, within the non-dualistic worldview of Second Temple texts, including the apocalypses, there is a shared conviction that God acts synergistically through the righteous—his divine humanity—there is barely any evidence for the kind of “interventionist” eschatology that has so often been judged the essence of Jewish apocalypticism.

1. Jesus and Apocalypticism: The Sources

Insofar as apocalypticism has been deemed a particular kind of eschatology, the synoptic gospels present a Jesus thoroughly immersed in his Jewish world.<sup>1</sup> The material can be organised as follows:

---

<sup>1</sup> For what follows see the surveys in G. Theissen and A. Merz, The Historical Jesus: a Comprehensive Guide (London: SCM Press, 1998), 252–274; J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus remembered (Christianity in the Making vol. 1; Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2003), 406–487.

(1) Several texts seem to evince the expectation of a dramatic imminent and transcendent intervention in history; that reflects what has unhelpfully been called an “apocalyptic eschatology.” Here, the principal witnesses are three: (a) Mark 13 (and parr.) has a prediction of cosmic meltdown (vv. 24–25) followed by the coming of the Son of Man on clouds in glory (v. 26), the sending forth of the angels to gather the elect (v. 27); and verse 31 speaks of the passing away of heaven and earth. Verse 30 states all these things will happen within the lifetime of the first disciples;<sup>2</sup> (b) in Mark 9:1 (and parr.) Jesus says some disciples will not taste death before they see the Kingdom of God coming in power; (c) in Matt 10:23 Jesus tells his disciples their mission to Israelite towns will not be completed before the Son of Man comes. Whilst these passages give a definite time frame for fulfilment, several others are less definite but still expect something very soon. Mark 1:15—“the Kingdom of God has drawn near”—and the parallel in the Q missionary discourse (Q 10:9) that summarize Jesus’ preaching are usually taken to mean the final manifestation of God’s rule is around the corner. Luke 18:1–8 expects the imminent arrival of the heavenly Son of Man to vindicate the elect and punish their oppressors.<sup>3</sup> Jesus’ message of imminence is also to be seen in continuity with the message of the Baptist: “the axe is already laid at the foot of the tree” (Q 3:9). Another tradition should also probably be added, although it has not figured prominently in the discussion: the three Markan passion predictions (Mark 8:31; 9:31; 10:34 & parr.) cannot lightly be dismissed as evidence that Jesus believed his unjust death would be followed by divine vindication—resurrection—and that this would happen quickly.<sup>4</sup>

(2) Then there are passages which do not explicitly refer to an imminent event, but which seem clearly to envisage a transcendent eschatology. In view of the material that speaks of Jesus’ expectation of

---

<sup>2</sup> There are important parallels to the synoptic eschatological discourse in the Thesalonian correspondence (cf. Mark 13:26–27 with 1 Thess 4:13–17 and 2 Thess 2:1; Mark 13:5–26 with 2 Thess 2:3–9). See also Luke 21:34–36. Does the surprising arrival in Q 17:24.26–30.34–35.37 mean imminent arrival (cf. Q 12:42–46)?

<sup>3</sup> Sanders has also found in the traditions surrounding Jesus’ alleged prediction that he would rebuild a destroyed temple, further evidence of imminent transcendence (E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism [London: SCM Press, 1985], 71–90).

<sup>4</sup> See e.g., Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 796–824. Dunn assumes that the historical Jesus spoke of his participation in the general resurrection.

imminent transcendence, these too are usually treated as potential witnesses to an imminent eschaton.

Q 17:22–37 speaks of the coming of the heavenly Son of Man to judge. That Matthew included such material in his version of Mark 13 (Matt 24:27–28, 37–41) shows he took it to mean something within the disciples' lifetime. A similarly punitive appearance of the Son of Man is present in Matt 16:27 (cf. Mark 8:38 and Luke 9:26) and all other future Son of Man sayings are usually included here (Q 12:8, 39–40; Matt 13:41; 19:28; 24:30; 25:31; Luke 21:36, cf. Rev 1:13 with 14:14). Such transcendent expectations however are not limited to Son of Man sayings. In some texts he thinks of a general resurrection (Mark 12:18–27; Q 11:31–32, cf. Q 12:5), which perhaps includes the belief that there will, at that time, be a physical ingathering of the diaspora to the Promised Land (Q 13:27–30).<sup>5</sup> He promises his disciples that they will sit enthroned as judges of the twelve tribes (Q 22:28–30); a prophecy that, coupled with his choice of twelve disciples, has been taken to mean he looked forward to the miraculous, end-time restoration of the nation.<sup>6</sup> More generally, various passages speak of coming judgement (Q 6:46–49), of a harvest that sorts out the righteous from the wicked (Mark 4:26–29; Matt 13:24–30, 47–53; Q 10:2, cf. Gos. Thom., Q 3:17), and of reversal with rewards and punishments in the age to come (Matt 5:3–12; Luke 6:20–26; Mark 10:29–30; Q 10:13–15; Matt 22:1–14; 25:1–13, 31–46; Luke 13:24–30, cf. Q 12:42–46).

(3) Some material is obviously not, in isolation, a statement of a transcendent eschatology, but it certainly attests to an imminent expectation. In Q 11:50–51 “this generation” is to be held accountable for the accumulated guilt of bloodshed from Abel to Zechariah: the historical scope is total; the judgement would appear to be imminent, but will it take place outside of history? We might compare Mark 13:33–37; Luke 12:35–38 and Luke 19:11.

(4) Then there are passages which express the belief that the eschaton has already arrived in Jesus' ministry; through his exorcisms (Mark 3:22–26; Q 11:19–23, cf. Luke 10:18), in the joy that accompanies his table-fellowship (Mark 2:18–20, 21–22 and parr.), in his healing power and attention to the poor (Luke 4:18–21; 17:20, cf. Gos. Thom. 113; Q 7:18–23)<sup>7</sup> and his ministry in general (Q 10:23–24; 11:31–32; 16:16, cf. Q 7:28; Matt 13:44–46 parr. Gos. Thom. 109, 76). The parables of growth in Mark and the double tradition provide further commentary on these claims: in Jesus the Kingdom is now already at work (Mark 4:2–32; Q 13:18–21, cf. Gos. Thom. 9; 21; 20, 96), the time is fulfilled (Mark 1:15).<sup>8</sup>

<sup>5</sup> Dale C. Allison has convincingly demonstrated that this text must have in view Israelites not the Gentiles: D. C. Allison, The Jesus tradition in Q (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1997), 177–192.

<sup>6</sup> The interpretation is distinctive of E. P. Sanders' historical Jesus reconstruction (The Historical Figure of Jesus [Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1993], 98–106).

(5) There are texts that have in mind future—in the broad sense of the word “eschatological”—events which are neither necessarily imminent nor necessarily transcendent, but which are regularly judged in the context of Jesus’ life to be both imminent and transcendent. If Matt 5:5 is heard without the references to the Kingdom of Heaven in 5:5, 10 then its promise that the meek will inherit the earth (or “land”) is thoroughly this-worldly. And, of course many of the Kingdom sayings could have intended no otherworldliness: they could envisage simply a social and political reorganisation following a divinely instigated victory over the enemies of the elect. There are a number of parables that in no way demand a transcendent referent, but which are regularly assumed, if original to Jesus, to pertain to his “apocalyptic eschatology”: Parable of the Pounds (Matt 25:14–30; Luke 19:11–27); Two Men on the Way to Court (Q 12:58–59); Unforgiving Servant (Matt 18:23–35); Unjust steward (Luke 16:1–8). Does Jesus’ prayer—the Lord’s Prayer—ask for a manifestation of divine presence within history; perhaps like the angelic world that Wisdom says Jacob encountered at Bethel (Wis 10:10) and that participants in the Qumran liturgy had available every Sabbath (4QShirot ‘Olot Ha-Shabbat)?<sup>9</sup> Or did Jesus want his disciples to devote themselves to prayer for a world-ending new order beyond history-as-we-know-it?<sup>10</sup>

<sup>7</sup> The sense of realised eschatology in Q 7:18–23 has come sharply into focus with the recent publication of Qumran text 4Q521 (see Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 447–450).

<sup>8</sup> The classic study of these as evidence of “realised” eschatology is C. H. Dodd, The Parables of the Kingdom (London: Nisbet, 1961 [1935]). See also Gos. Thom. 3.

<sup>9</sup> Matthew’s “on earth as in heaven” (Matt 6:10) sounds a striking echo to the theological framework of the Sabbath Songs and the context in the Sermon on the Mount speaks of the present realization of Kingdom ethics in the Jesus movement (cf. 6:33). Luke seems to think that a prayer for the Kingdom’s coming is fulfilled—at least partially—in exorcistic power (11:20).

<sup>10</sup> So, for example, D. C. Allison, Jesus of Nazareth: Millenarian Prophet (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1998), 151; J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus (New York: Doubleday, 1994), 2:291–302.

At the Last Supper Jesus vows he will not again drink wine until he drinks it anew in the Kingdom of God (Mark 14:25, cf. Luke 14:15–23; 22:30). If Jesus said this, he either thought of an imminent but not transcendent worldly banquet when he and his men would take their rightful place in God's dominion or he thought of an otherworldly, but not imminent celebration after his own death and later resurrection. But then again, perhaps he thought of both an otherworldly banquet and one that would follow shortly upon his martyrdom. Ambiguity abounds. In quite a few sayings it is not at all clear whether the Kingdom belongs to this or another world; only that Jesus has some particular point to make about the qualities of those to whom it belongs (Q 7:28; Mark 10:14–15; Matt 18:1–4; Mark 10:23–25).

(6) Lastly, there are passages which must refer to future social, political and intra-historical events that have to do with the coming destruction of the temple in 70 CE.<sup>11</sup> This is how the misnamed “little apocalypse” in Mark 13 (and its parallels) begins (vv. 1–2). Luke has an additional passage in which Jesus weeps over the coming fate of the city, not just the temple (Luke 19:41–44). The upheavals in the years that led up to the destruction are in view in Mark 13:5–23. Several other passages are also most plausibly taken as warning of the temple's destruction (Q 6:47–49; Matt 22:7; Luke 13:1–5, 6–9, 34–35, cf. Mark 11:12–22 and Matt 26:52).<sup>12</sup> These prophecies, of course, are regularly taken to be entirely ex eventu and, in any case, they are assumed to have nothing to do with Jesus' properly eschatological perspective.

None of this material is generically apocalyptic, though all of it one might well find in an apocalypse. Insofar as Jesus' life is described in properly apocalyptic terms there are other texts that come to the foreground.

(7) At his baptism Jesus' vision (Mark 1:10 and Luke 3:22 “he saw”) of the “heaven opened” is thoroughly apocalyptic and there are a number of important connections here to Jewish mystical traditions.<sup>13</sup>

<sup>11</sup> Cf. the table in M. J. Borg, Conflict, Holiness and Politics in the Teachings of Jesus, Studies in the Bible and Early Christianity 5 (Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen Press, 1984), 279.

<sup>12</sup> On Q 6:47–49 see N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God (London: SPCK, 1996), 292, 334, cf. O. Betz, “Felsenmann und Felsengemeinde (Eine Parallele zu Mt. 16.17–19 in den Qumranpsalmen),” ZNW 48 (1957): 49–77 (60, 71).

<sup>13</sup> See C. Rowland, The Open Heaven: A Study of Apocalyptic in Judaism and Early Christianity (New York: Crossroad, 1982), 359–363. Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 374–

These connections continue in the Temptation story, especially the Q version where Jesus has a kind of heavenly journey; only, his guide is no angel, but Satan.<sup>14</sup> These two stories play a decisive role in the narrative of Jesus' life and mission as told by the synoptics. So too does the Transfiguration where apocalyptic elements are even stronger: the mountain appears as a means of ascent to heaven; a human being is transformed to a divine or angelic form; there is a theophanic cloud; the appearance of heavenly personae (Elijah and Moses); a divine voice and the revelation of mysteries restricted to a few, at least for a certain time.<sup>15</sup> Furthermore, the synoptics indicate that this event is bound up with Jesus' claim to fulfil Daniel's vision of an eschatological "one like a son of man."<sup>16</sup> In Luke 10:18 Jesus has a vision of Satan falling like lightning—whether because his end is nigh or perhaps to wreak havoc upon the earth.<sup>17</sup> And in Matthew's version of the Gethsemane arrest he boasts that he has at his heavenly Father's disposal twelve legions of angels (26:53, cf. Luke 22:43–44).

Besides these obvious examples of a well-established belief that Jesus functioned as an apocalyptic visionary there are others that are woven more subtly into the texture of the gospels. Chief amongst these is the way in which Jesus expounds the "mystery" of the Kingdom through parables that, like the riddles, dark sayings and fantastic visions of the apocalypses, require elucidation. Where the apocalypses

---

77, discusses the experience sympathetically, though without explicit attention to the apocalyptic features.

<sup>14</sup> Jesus' fasting is typical of the asceticism that accompanies visionary experience, and the role of scripture in the Q version reflects the fact that meditation on and interpretation of scripture figures prominently in the apocalyptic-mystical tradition.

<sup>15</sup> The apocalyptic character of the Transfiguration was asserted in a seminal article by H. C. Kee ("The Transfiguration in Mark: Epiphany or Apocalyptic Vision?" in Understanding the Sacred Text, ed. J. Reumann [Valley Forge, PA: Judson, 1972], 137–152). See further C. H. T. Fletcher-Louis, Luke-Acts: Angels, Christology and Soteriology, WUNT 2.94 (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1997), 27–29, 38–50.

<sup>16</sup> See C. H. T. Fletcher-Louis, "The Revelation of the Sacral Son of Man: The Genre, History of Religions Context and the Meaning of the Transfiguration," in Auferstehung—Resurrection. The Fourth Durham-Tübingen-Symposium: Resurrection, Exaltation, and Transformation in Old Testament, Ancient Judaism, and Early Christianity, F. Avemarie and H. Lichtenberger, WUNT 135 (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 2001), 247–298.

<sup>17</sup> The most recent treatment is S. J. Gathercole, "Jesus' Eschatological Vision of the Fall of Satan: Luke 10,18 Reconsidered," ZNW 94 (2003): 143–163.

have interpreting angels, the gospels, particularly Mark, has Jesus unveil to the chosen few the plot of coming history.<sup>18</sup>

1.1. The Absence of Apocalyptic and Eschatological Matter in the Sources

Historical analysis of all this potential evidence for Jesus' apocalyptic and eschatological character should not ignore the fact that some motifs are conspicuous by their absence in the gospels.<sup>19</sup>

We never hear of a punitive destruction of the nations nor, for that matter, a gathering of the scattered Israelites to the Land, Jerusalem and temple.<sup>20</sup> Jesus is not remembered to have had any interest in a periodisation of history; indeed at one point he denies the possibility of knowing God's eschatological timetable (Mark 13:32). Nor does he ever speak of a new temple with the kind of architectural detail that features frequently in apocalyptic visions.<sup>21</sup> This is surprising, not just because as a craftsman he might have taken a personal interest in such matters, but also because he speaks of the temple's destruction. In Luke 19:41–44 he weeps over the city's fate: did he not think it would need to be rebuilt? Nor does he offer a survey of past history, as the apocalypses are wont to do.

Whilst the Baptism and Transfiguration reflect the apocalypses' vertical axis—the interest in revelation of God's immediate perspective and the world above—other speculative and mystical concerns are missing: there is no meteorology, no astronomy or concern for the

---

<sup>18</sup> See J. Marcus, The Mystery of the Kingdom of God (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1986), 229–233, and N. T. Wright, The New Testament and the People of God (London: SPCK, 1992), 390–396, who nevertheless fails to follow through the full significance of his insight: it is Jesus the heavenly Son of Man who accompanies the disciples on their journey through the Kingdom's mysteries.

<sup>19</sup> The New Quest tried to make theological capital of these apocalyptic lacunae (e.g., P. Vielhauer, "Apocalyptic in Early Christianity: 1. Introduction," in New Testament Apocrypha, ed. E. Hennecke and W. Schneemelcher [London: Lutterworth, 1965 (1964)], 608–642 [608–609]), but they have hardly figured in the Third Quest.

<sup>20</sup> Cf. Theissen and Merz, The Historical Jesus, 255–256. There is talk of an eschatological banquet (Q 13:28–29; Matt 22:1–14; Luke 14:15–24; 15:3–10, 20–23) that in a Jewish context one might assume is to be held at Zion, but in the Jesus material this is never explicitly stated. At least in the texts peculiar to Luke, the point seems to be that the banquet is happening already in Jesus' table fellowship.

<sup>21</sup> The vision-of-a-new-temple motif starts in Ezekiel 40–48, is anticipated in Exod 25–40, and emerges vividly in later apocalyptic passages: The New Jerusalem (1Q32; 2Q24; 4Q232; 4Q554–555; 5Q15; 11Q18); 2 Baruch 59.4 and cf. Rev 21.

right calendar, nor cosmic cartography—the number and contents of the heavens, the throne of God, paradise and the lower regions (Luke 16:19–31 is hardly an exception)—nor developed angelology.<sup>22</sup> It should also be noted that Jesus and his disciples never have dream visions and no angel ever appears as an agent of revelation during the ministry. This apocalyptic common-place appears only after Jesus' death when angels play this role at the empty tomb and, according to Acts, when night visions (Acts 16:9; 18:9, cf. 2:17) and angelophanies (Acts 8:19, 26; 12:6–17; 16:9; 27:23, cf. Rev passim) characterise early Christian spirituality.<sup>23</sup>

How has this data been evaluated? No two scholarly assessments are the same: authentication and interpretation are a complex business. However, it is possible to group scholars according to broadly similar positions and to lay out the arguments that cause division. Some assume the old dualistic paradigm that was reviewed in this Handbook's article on Jewish apocalyptic and continue to speak in these terms of "apocalyptic(ism)." Some have paid attention to the work of Collins. Several have taken stock of Rowland's approach. No one seems yet to have brought to the Jesus Quest the fruit of those recent developments which can be brought under the banner of a "new perspective" on apocalyptic.

2. Thoroughgoing Dualism and the "Non-Apocalyptic" Jesus

For those who have taken Jewish apocalyptic to be a coherent dualistic theology, the fact that the synoptic Jesus material so obviously locates Jesus in that Jewish context creates both possibilities and problems.

In the New Quest—taken up by a group of Bultmann's pupils—a virtue is made of historiographical necessity: Jesus is an existentialist

---

<sup>22</sup> However, the tradition has it that he was aware of the cosmological and apocalyptic significance of Mount Hermon: see the important study of the Caesarea Philippi episode by G. W. E. Nickelsburg, "Enoch, Levi, and Peter: Recipients of Revelation in Upper Galilee," JBL 100 (1981): 575–600 and further Fletcher-Louis, "Sacral Son of Man," 254–282. In some apocalypses (esp. 1 and 2 Enoch, and Jubilees) there is interest in the succession of (priestly) revelation from one generation to the next. This perhaps has an echo at Matt 16:16–19.

<sup>23</sup> B. Witherington III, The Jesus Quest: The Third Search for the Jew of Nazareth (Downers Grove, IL: IVP, 1995), 101: "Jesus had visions, but it is a mistake to paint him as a sort of Julian of Norwich or, for that matter, a John of Patmos."

preacher whose message is clothed in a world-ending Jewish idiom.<sup>24</sup> And this apocalypticism is inextricable from Jesus' transcendence of the Mosaic Law.<sup>25</sup> Though this argument is no longer canvassed and Bultmann's existentialism is out of vogue, one still finds sympathy for an apocalyptically-based transcendence of Torah. For Bultmann and his followers the virtue of apocalyptic "mythology" is that it speaks of a divine intervention that is all grace, no human work;<sup>26</sup> a theological appropriation of the dualistic apocalyptic paradigm that persists and no doubt explains why Jesus-the-otherworldly-apocalypticist remains attractive for some.<sup>27</sup> Indeed, perhaps this rather sixteenth-century theological paradigm has contributed a good deal to the modern misunderstanding of Jewish apocalyptic itself.

But reasons to doubt the Schweitzerian "consensus" have long hampered the attempt to render the Jesus of the gospels a plausibly historical character. Material that looks to a totally transcendent future Kingdom is surely incompatible with claims in the gospels that already in his life and ministry—on this earth and in ordinary historical time—there is a realisation of God's Kingdom.<sup>28</sup> Similarly, Jesus cannot be a homeless (Q 9:58), thoroughly human (Mark 2:10, 28; Q 7:34) and suffering (Mark 8:31; 9:31; 10:33; 10:45) Son of Man and, simultaneously, a transcendent, heavenly figure who rides around on clouds in divine Glory (Mark 8:38; 13:26; Q 17:24). Whilst the Schweitzer tradition judges the transcendent Kingdom and Son of Man sayings historical at the expense of any full appreciation of material that might indicate a "realised" eschatology, the New Quest started a fashion for

<sup>24</sup> See the survey in Theissen and Merz, The Historical Jesus, 242–245.

<sup>25</sup> See the discussion of the work of Käsemann and Hengel in J. S. Kloppenborg, "As One Unknown, Without a Name? Co-opting the Apocalyptic Jesus," in Apocalypticism, Anti-Semitism and the Historical Jesus, ed. J. S. Kloppenborg and J. W. Marshall (London: T&T Clark International, 2005), 1–23.

<sup>26</sup> E.g., R. Bultmann, Kerygma and Myth: A Theological Debate (London: SPCK, 1957 [1941]), 15: "The mythology of the New Testament is in essence that of Jewish apocalyptic and the Gnostic redemption myths. A common feature of them both is their basic dualism... Man cannot achieve this redemption by his own efforts; it must come as a gift through a divine intervention."

<sup>27</sup> See e.g., Meier, Marginal Jew, 2:330–331.

<sup>28</sup> Vielhauer, "Apocalyptic in Early Christianity," 608; E. Käsemann, "The Beginnings of Christian Theology (1960)," in idem, ed., New Testament Questions for Today (London: SCM, 1969), 82–107 (101–102). The tension can be overcome if both present and future Kingdom sayings are given an existential interpretation (e.g., H. Conzelmann, An Outline of the Theology of the New Testament, New Testament Library [London: SCM Press, 1969], 114).

a “non-apocalyptic” Jesus according to which only present material is authentic; the future Son of Man and future Kingdom sayings are the product of later church creativity.

The inheritors of the New Quest’s legacy are concerned not just that he be theologically coherent, but that Jesus be fully incarnate in his material (social, economic and political) world. Those who have continued to follow Schweitzer produce a Jesus who is rather otherworldly or “next worldly”;<sup>29</sup> lacking interest in politics and social realities. In the words of one such Schweitzerian, J. P. Meier: “Jesus seems to have had no interest in the great political and social questions of his day. He was not interested in the reform of the world because he was prophesying its end.”<sup>30</sup> Nor, of course, is this Jesus much interested in the formation of a movement, let alone something that would anticipate the Christian communities that formed after his death. To this reconstruction of an apolitical Jesus it is objected, by the likes of R. A. Horsley, J. D. Crossan and M. Borg, that so much in the primary sources indicates Jesus strove for social justice and freedom from the dominant systems of oppression; that he was concerned for the welfare and future of the nation within history. In this he was both prophet and sage, his parabolic teaching articulating a subversive, counter-cultural vision. When that data is put centre-stage it is scarcely credible that Jesus was simply waiting for the great escape from history.<sup>31</sup> Rather, he was setting about either to reform society or to create an alternative movement and communities within it.

So there are now various members of the Jesus Seminar producing portrayals of “a non-Apocalyptic (i.e., non-transcendently eschatological) Jesus”. Their historical arguments are principally these.<sup>32</sup> As the New Questers had seen, there is an essential incompatibility between the future and present Son of Man and Kingdom sayings. Although John the Baptist had an “apocalyptic eschatology,” there are fundamental

---

<sup>29</sup> The phrase is Borg’s in his review of E. P. Sanders’ contribution (M. J. Borg, Jesus in Contemporary Scholarship [Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1994], 21).

<sup>30</sup> J. P. Meier, “Reflections on Jesus-of-History Research Today,” in Jesus’ Jewishness: Exploring the Place of Jesus within Early Judaism, ed. J. H. Charlesworth (New York: Crossroad, 1991), 84–107 (92), cf. Meier, Marginal Jew, 2:331–332.

<sup>31</sup> Borg, Contemporary Scholarship, 78, 82–83.

<sup>32</sup> For an overview see S. J. Patterson, The God of Jesus: the Historical Jesus and the Search for Meaning (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1998), 164–184, and idem in R. J. Miller, The Apocalyptic Jesus: A Debate (Santa Rosa, CA: Polebridge Press, 2001), 70–74.

differences between Jesus and his mentor; John expected an imminent fiery conflagration, Jesus proclaimed an immanent divine presence. And a strict application of the criterion of multiple attestation leaves the future Son of Man sayings without firm historical foundation.<sup>33</sup> In any case, at the historical Jesus level, the present Son of Man sayings are best interpreted as some form of non-titular Aramaic idiom.<sup>34</sup> Eschatological features of the gospel parables have long been judged the product of post-Easter allegorisation without which they stand out for their subversive but timeless wisdom. As it turns out the Gospel of Thomas and several other non-canonical Jesus sources also attest a Jesus devoid of futurist eschatology and these are earlier, more reliable witnesses to the historical Jesus than the canonical gospels. Alongside Thomas there now stands the earliest stratum of Q (Q1), which, as reconstructed by John S. Kloppenborg, is entirely sapiential; eschatological material enters the Q tradition only at a subsequent redaction (Q2).<sup>35</sup> And, similarly, Stephen Patterson has found a stratification of sources common to Q and the Gospel of Thomas.<sup>36</sup> In the distinctive case of Borg much of the threatening language in the synoptics can be allowed to stand; but it intends not transcendent eschatological hopes, but prophecies of coming destruction of Jerusalem and the temple by Rome.<sup>37</sup>

Despite an energetic and multi-pronged attack on the traditional view, Jesus the prophet of transcendent eschatological expectations remains a widely held opinion, especially when one includes the European scholarly community. The reasons why most are not persuaded by the challengers are not hard to see.<sup>38</sup> In brief: The rather

---

<sup>33</sup> See J. D. Crossan, The Historical Jesus: the Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1993), 243–255, 454–456, and the discussion of Crossan's analysis in Allison, Millenarian Prophet, 115–120. Cf. Borg, Contemporary Scholarship, 84–86, who appeals also to the minimalist interpretation of the gospel Son of Man sayings in D. R. A. Hare, The Son of Man Tradition (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1992).

<sup>34</sup> The secondary literature on this question is ever-growing. For an overview see D. Burkett, The Son of Man Debate: a History and Evaluation, SNTSMS 107 (Cambridge: CUP, 1999), and Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 726–728.

<sup>35</sup> J. S. Kloppenborg, The Formation of Q (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987).

<sup>36</sup> S. L. Patterson, "Wisdom in Q and Thomas," in Search of Wisdom: Essays in Memory of John G. Gammie, ed. L. G. Perdue, B. B. Scott, and W. J. Wiseman (Louisville, KY: John Knox/Westminster, 1993), 187–221.

<sup>37</sup> Borg, Conflict, 213–238.

<sup>38</sup> For criticisms see D. C. Allison, "A Plea for Thoroughgoing Eschatology," JBL 113 (1994): 651–668; Allison, Millenarian Prophet, 10–39; Wright, Jesus, 28–82; A. Hult-

un-Jewish Gospel of Thomas is with great difficulty accepted as a source earlier and more trustworthy than Mark and his successors. The Kloppenborg reconstruction of Q's earliest layer is a hypothetical reconstruction of a hypothetical document.<sup>39</sup> As it is, the double tradition (Q) is shot through with eschatology. The Jesus movement was apparently birthed in the context of eschatological fervour, first the preaching of John the Baptist, and then, after Jesus' death, the proclamation of his followers, had a strongly eschatological content. At the centre of Jesus' disciples' proclamation there stood the claim that Jesus had transcended death in his resurrection. In particular, early in Paul's letters there is an expectation involving a strongly transcendent and imminent eschatology (1 Thess 4:13–17, c. 50 CE). Historical probability is stacked high in favour of the supposition that the bridge between John's eschatology and that of the church was Jesus himself. A Jesus devoid of eschatology is a thin figure of the man portrayed in the most reliable sources available: the hypothesis struggles to explain swathes of the gospel texts. Even if the Son of Man sayings present insurmountable problems, they are not the only base on which the eschatological edifice is founded.

But more critical than all these considerations is the fact that the “non-Apocalyptic Jesus” rests on a fundamentally false construal of Jewish eschatology and the genre “apocalypse”.<sup>40</sup> Since this Jesus is currently a distinctively North American phenomenon we should not be surprised to find that, where there is attention to recent hard-nosed study of the Jewish apocalypses and eschatology, it is the Semeia 14 definition and the work of J. J. Collins that is used.<sup>41</sup> But even that is not much in evidence. The Jesus Seminar's publications have definitions which exemplify the problem: “Apocalyptic” is “A type of religious thinking characterized by the notion that through an act of divine intervention, the present evil world is about to be destroyed and replaced gren, “Eschatology in the New Testament: The Current Debate,” in The Last Things: Biblical and Theological Perspectives on Eschatology, ed. C. E. Braaten and R. W. Jenson (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2002), 67–89, at 84–89. E. P. Sanders, Historical Figure, 183: “Such views merely show the triumph of wishful thinking.”

---

<sup>39</sup> See assessment in Wright, People of God, 435–443; Wright, Jesus, 41–43; Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 467–470.

<sup>40</sup> As Wright has seen: Jesus, 29–82, esp. 33. See also E. M. Humphrey, “Will the Reader Understand? Apocalypse as Veil or Vision in Recent Historical-Jesus Research,” in Whose Historical Jesus?, ed. W. E. Arnal and M. Desjardins (Waterloo, ON: Wilfrid Laurier University Press, 1997), 215–237.

<sup>41</sup> See e.g., B. B. Scott, “After the Destruction: From Mad Max to the Destruction of the Temple,” Forum 8 (1992): 313–336, for reliance on Semeia 14.

with a new and better world in which God's justice prevails".<sup>42</sup> "Apocalypticism is the view that history will come to an end following a cosmic catastrophe and a new age will begin."<sup>43</sup> Here there is perhaps evidence of Semeia 14 since the definition concludes: "Such views are frequently expressed in an 'apocalypse': a revelation through a heavenly vision of events to come." But Collins' attempt to distinguish between genre—"apocalypse"—and apocalypticism has not, it seems, had much success since one frequently finds texts labelled an "apocalypse" that are categorically not.<sup>44</sup> For Crossan, all eschatology—whether apocalyptic or not—is a matter of "world negation".<sup>45</sup> Even though the consistently dualistic conceptualisation of so much older (particularly continental European) scholarship may not be present, the framework is intact.<sup>46</sup>

3. A Not-So-Dualistic Jesus the Eschatological Prophet?

Most recent comprehensive studies of the historical Jesus take the synoptic presentation to be the most reliable and conclude, therefore, that Jesus was eschatologically concerned, if not eschatological through and through.<sup>47</sup> Following the work by E. P. Sanders it is also possible

---

<sup>42</sup> R. W. Funk, R. W. Hoover and T. J. Seminar, The Five Gospels: The Search for the Authentic Words of Jesus (New York: Macmillan, 1993), 542, italics added (repeated in R. J. Miller, The Complete Gospels: Annotated Scholars Version [Sonoma, CA: Polebridge Press, 1992 (1991)], 460).

<sup>43</sup> Funk, Hoover and Seminar, Five Gospels, 542.

<sup>44</sup> For example: "Mark 13 is an apocalypse" (Funk, Hoover and Seminar, Five Gospels, 107); Sibylline Oracles 1–2 is an "apocalypse," J. D. Crossan, "Eschatology, Apocalypticism, and the Historical Jesus," in Jesus: Then and Now. Images of Jesus in History and Christology, ed. M. Meyer and C. Hughes (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 2001), 91–112, at 96.

<sup>45</sup> See Crossan, Mediterranean Peasant, 109, 238, 287, 292.

<sup>46</sup> For Crossan's reliance on Collins see his index to Mediterranean Peasant and note also his regular citation of Nickelsburg. In a recent piece Crossan shows his full hermeneutical colours in seeking to redefine the word "apocalyptic" in a way that describes accurately his own, theretofore "non-apocalyptic" historical Jesus (Crossan, "Apocalypticism," roughly equivalent to Miller, Debate, 48–69). His conceptual distinctions are highly illuminating and in some respects his preferred sense of "apocalyptic" is much closer to the historical truth of the Jewish phenomenon which he does not discuss explicitly.

<sup>47</sup> It should be noted that Crossan talks of his Jesus as an "eschatological" one (e.g., The Birth of Christianity: Discovering What Happened in the Years immediately after the Execution of Jesus, 1st ed. [San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1998], 257–292; Miller, Debate, 119). However, for Crossan "eschatology" need not have the temporality and the transcendence evident in the Jewish sources.

to identify a distinctive set of judgements that, more or less, unites those who advocate the view originally championed by Schweitzer. Those who have taken up Schweitzer's cause in the last quarter-century adopt a much less dualistic eschatology than the New Questers. Five stand out: E. P. Sanders, J. P. Meier, D. C. Allison, G. Theissen and A. Merz, and J. D. G. Dunn.

Sanders, first of all, waters down the transcendence that had been hitherto ascribed to Jewish eschatology: Jews were expecting national restoration, not the end of the world.<sup>48</sup> He thus challenges the dualistic structure of the Schweitzerian tradition, whilst remaining committed to its seminal insight: Jesus' expected a divine intervention and transformation that never came.<sup>49</sup> Sanders knows not just the work of J. J. Collins, but also of Rowland, and so not surprisingly, he avoids talk of "apocalyptic eschatology"<sup>50</sup> Like some of his fellow Jews, Jesus expected "an otherworldly-earthly kingdom."<sup>51</sup> He was a prophet of national restoration. He expected the destruction and miraculous rebuilding of the temple (see the evidence of Mark 11:15–19; 13:1–2; 14:58; 15:29 and parallels Acts 6:15; John 2:19), a divine intervention that would bring about the gathering of the lost tribes (reflected in his symbolic choice of twelve disciples, Matt 16:27; Q 22:28–30 and Mark 14:25) in an earthly, if transformed, Kingdom (see also Mark 10:35–45; Matt 16:27). Sanders is at pains to stress that there is not, in principle, any reason to doubt that Jesus could also think that already during his ministry the Kingdom was manifest: Jesus is not a systematic thinker with a dualistic apocalyptic theology. Sanders, it is true, is reluctant to declare the "present" Kingdom sayings authentic. But this is because in each case he finds reasons to doubt reliability and, it seems, because he is averse to their potential for making Jesus "unique".<sup>52</sup>

---

<sup>48</sup> See Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 61–156; Sanders, Historical Figure, 169–204. And note Collins' criticism of Sanders on this point in J. J. Collins, The Apocalyptic Imagination. An Introduction to Jewish Apocalyptic Literature (2nd and revised edition; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998), 260–261.

<sup>49</sup> He accepts, in part, T. F. Glasson's criticisms of Schweitzer (T. F. Glasson, "Schweitzer's Influence: Blessing or Bane?" JTS 28 [1977]: 289–302, discussed in Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 124–125). Sanders' distinctively non-Schweitzerian view of Jewish eschatology is first laid out in E. P. Sanders, "The Genre of Palestinian Jewish Apocalypses," in Apocalypticism in the Mediterranean World, ed. D. Hellholm (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1983), 447–459 esp. 456–458.

<sup>50</sup> See Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 375–76, n. 3.

<sup>51</sup> Ibid., 237.

<sup>52</sup> Ibid., 131–140; 154–155; idem, Historical Figure, 177.

Sanders' conceptualisation is followed, to one degree or another, by Meier, Allison and Dunn. All three lack Sanders' doubts about the present sayings. Meier painstakingly analyses a core set of eschatological sayings whose authenticity is hard to dismiss.<sup>53</sup> Dunn, like Sanders, is sensitive to the misuse of the word "apocalyptic." In an endorsement of Rowland's arguments, he decides to speak simply of "eschatology,"<sup>54</sup> and is uncertain that in any given case we have the kind of transcendent eschatology that previous discussion has assumed.<sup>55</sup> He has also mounted a strong case against the common view that eschatological prophecies could have been added to the Jesus tradition as a result of prophecies pronounced in the name of Jesus by prophets in the post-Easter church.<sup>56</sup>

Of this group the most old-fashioned reconstruction of Jesus the eschatological prophet is that of Allison.<sup>57</sup> It is old-fashioned inasmuch as Allison insists on the presence within Judaism and Jesus' teaching of both expectations of cosmic catastrophe and a transcendent (if this-worldly) hope. He continues to speak of "apocalyptic eschatology", regards Isa 24–27 and Zech 9–14 as "apocalyptic," and thinks that a very great deal of Jesus' life and teaching can be explained in relation to his eschatological enthusiasm. However, in other respects, Allison's work reflects the recent developments that have taken place in the field of Jewish studies (particularly in North America).<sup>58</sup> Where Schweitzer and the New Questers took Jewish eschatology to be a consistent, systematic theology, Allison thinks it more pragmatic: Jewish eschatology reflects a cross-cultural, sociological phenomenon.<sup>59</sup> Jesus is a millenarian prophet, and a wealth of cross-cultural material from Mediterranean antiquity and world history is brought in to illuminate the contours of

---

<sup>53</sup> Meier, Marginal Jew, 2:288–351: the oldest version of the Lord's prayer and three of the extant beatitudes; Q 13:28–29; Mark 14:25. This set is taken up and slightly expanded in Theissen and Merz, The Historical Jesus, 253–256.

<sup>54</sup> Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 401.

<sup>55</sup> Ibid., see esp. 393–396, 398–404 and 478–479.

<sup>56</sup> Ibid., 186–192.

<sup>57</sup> Allison, Millenarian Prophet; subsequently restated in D. C. Allison, "The Eschatology of Jesus," in The Encyclopedia of Apocalypticism, vol. 1: The Origins of Apocalypticism in Judaism and Christianity, ed. J. J. Collins (New York: Continuum, 2000), 267–302, and put into a larger context in Miller, Debate.

<sup>58</sup> For authoritative judgments on the Jewish material Allison is reliant on: J. J. Collins et al. (see index to Allison, Millenarian Prophet, note p. x and, perhaps, D. C. Allison, "A Response," in The Apocalyptic Jesus: A Debate, ed. R. J. Miller [Santa Rosa, CA: Polebridge Press, 2001], 83–105, at 92.

<sup>59</sup> See Allison, Millenarian Prophet, 115, for criticism of Schweitzer on this point.

his character. Because Jesus is not a logically consistent thinker and because the millenarian type is as much interested in social transformation as in cosmic destruction,<sup>60</sup> Allison is happy to accept the present Kingdom texts and the evidence for Jesus' social agenda and sense of the Spirit.<sup>61</sup>

Theissen and Merz start with the traditional, rather dualistic understanding of apocalyptic as a theological entity quite different from biblical prophecy.<sup>62</sup> However, they bring a distinctive contribution to the table: the role of the cult in holding together present and future perspectives on God's Kingdom. In reliance upon the recent study of kingship in the Psalms and an important article by Anna-Maria Schwemer on the Qumran Sabbath Songs, Theissen and Merz observe that "in a liturgical context Jews in the time of Jesus could equally praise the rule of God and ask for its coming without seeing an irresolvable contradiction."<sup>63</sup> Schwemer rightly saw that in the Sabbath Songs "in heaven what on earth is expected in the future is eternally present."<sup>64</sup> In view of our comments above, the point can be taken further: in the cult as perfected world-order, worship takes place in heaven-already-on-earth, divine rule is enacted through God's representatives—the

---

<sup>60</sup> See Allison, Millenarian Prophet, 61–64, 78–94, for Allison's list of defining characteristics of apocalyptic eschatology. He resists the notion that an end to history must mean necessarily a wholly negative assessment of the present world (Allison, Millenarian Prophet, 213): "In Genesis 1–8, the created world is said over and over again to be good, and yet things get so bad that everything must be destroyed. Jesus' view of things was no doubt similar."

<sup>61</sup> Allison, Millenarian Prophet, 89–92, 105, 108–110. In an earlier discussion Allison explicitly contrasts the pessimism of apocalyptic eschatology with Jesus' affirmation of the present Kingdom and notes that Jesus "directed attention away from a mythological, other-worldly redeemer to his own historical person" (D. C. Allison, "Apocalyptic," in Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels, ed. J. B. Green and S. McKnight [Downers Grove: IVP, 1992], 17–20, at 19. But latterly he has drawn attention to the combination of future and present eschatologies in Jewish material: Allison, "Eschatology of Jesus," 274–275.

<sup>62</sup> Theissen and Merz, The Historical Jesus, 240–280.

<sup>63</sup> Ibid., 252. See generally 246–252.

<sup>64</sup> A. M. Schwemer, "Gott als König und seine Königsherrschaft in den Sabbatlidern aus Qumran," in Königsherrschaft Gottes und himmlischer Kult im Judentum, Urchristentum und in der hellenistischen Welt, ed. M. Hengel and A. M. Schwemer, WUNT 55 (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1991), 45–118, at 117. The idea seems to have influenced Sanders, Historical Figure, 169, though he does little with it. For a fuller study of the theology of the Sabbath Songs and also the dialectic between eternal cultic realities and their extension to the whole of creation in the Qumran War Scroll see C. H. T. Fletcher-Louis, All the Glory of Adam: Liturgical Anthropology in the Dead Sea Scrolls, STDJ 42 (Leiden: Brill, 2002).

priestly community; and as such there is “eschatology” inaugurated.<sup>65</sup> It is therefore not at all surprising to find that, as Theissen and Merz argue, one recorded piece of Jesus’ distinctive “liturgical” creativity—the “Our Father”—has both a strongly present and a future dimension.<sup>66</sup> Although they accept the traditional view that Jewish apocalyptic dualistically divides human and divine activity, they ultimately conclude that Jesus believed instead in human collaboration with God: Jesus’ vision demands a particular ethical will; concern for the weak and sick reflects God’s own eschatological action; in the performance of exorcisms human beings participate in God’s victory over Satan; “when they forgive one another’s sins, they are taking part in God’s forgiveness of sins; when they move others to accept salvation, they are taking part in the establishment of God’s saving will.”<sup>67</sup>

With a variety of different methodologies these contributions and others in the same vein make a formidable case that must be answered by those who would have a non-transcendentally eschatological (or “non-apocalyptic”) Jesus. No one can now argue, for example, that a Jewish eschatological prophet cannot believe both in a present and in a future Kingdom. Nor is justice done to Jesus’ eschatology without proper regard for the fact that Jewish eschatology is essentially the conclusion to a story; the story being the one told in the Hebrew Bible that is retold and expanded in all extant Second Temple literature.<sup>68</sup> However, there are serious weaknesses in the arguments and presuppositions of these five contributions, which mostly have to do with the lingering shadow of the old dualistic paradigm.

Despite the cogency of the arguments for Jesus-the-eschatological-prophet, the followers of the “non-apocalyptic” Jesus still throw up objections. For example, the argument that Jesus was consumed with a transcendent and imminent expectation that in fact never was fulfilled looks unlikely from what we know of the social character of early Christianity. Crossan makes the point forcefully: “As the decades of the first hundred years passed without millenarian consummation,

---

<sup>65</sup> Compare, for example, the theology of Ben Sirach, which both celebrates God’s kingship in the cult-as-microcosm—laid out in Ben Sirach 50 (esp. v. 15 and the portrayal of the priesthood as the true Adamic vicegerent in 49:1, 50:11–13)—and looks for the future fulfillment of God’s promises to the nation in 36:1–22.

<sup>66</sup> Theissen and Merz, The Historical Jesus, 261–264.

<sup>67</sup> Ibid., 275.

<sup>68</sup> Compare Allison, “Eschatology of Jesus,” 275 for criticism of Crossan’s view that Jesus had in view an “always available divine dominion” and see, further, Wright, Jesus, 207–208, 224–225.

tiny ripples of surprise appear on the surface of the tradition, but I see no evidence of profound doubt or massive loss of faith. I do not find what I might have expected: profound defensive strategies, desperate explanatory interpretations but, despite them, slow and steady attrition in faith. I would have expected, in other words, a steadily decreasing number of converts and communities and I find instead a steadily increasing number of both converts and communities.<sup>69</sup> Furthermore, an eschatology that requires an utterly transcendent causality sits uncomfortably with the early Christian lifestyle. Crossan again: “I think their intense missionary activity came from people who believed in ‘incarnation’ and concluded that... [this] meant active cooperation and not just passive expectation.”<sup>70</sup> If Jesus and his followers both pursued an active engagement with the world and looked for imminent, transcendent divine intervention then he and they are unavoidably inconsistent, if not irrational.<sup>71</sup>

There is the continuing complaint that the eschatological Jesus has no real political and social stance—despite the evidence of the gospels and early Christianity that he did. J. S. Kloppenborg takes up Allison’s point that millenarian movements frequently engage in social experimentation and alternative lifestyles in anticipation of the future state and asks “if this is so, and it surely is, then it is all the more peculiar that many of those advocating an apocalyptic Jesus—I take E. P. Sanders and John Meier as examples—arrive at a Jesus who has pronounced beliefs about the future but practically nothing to say about the present.”<sup>72</sup> And insofar as Allison allows a social dimension to Jesus’ agenda it is one largely conditioned by the future, not the present.<sup>73</sup> In view of the recent advances in the study of Jewish apocalyptic surveyed in the article in Volume Two of this Handbook, we can add a further criticism. Allison does nothing with the evidence that “heaven” as a reality in which God’s will is already done is always available in the

---

<sup>69</sup> Crossan, “Apocalypticism,” 95 (= Crossan in Miller, Debate, 54), cf. Borg, Contemporary Scholarship, 79; Wright, People of God, 462. For “tiny ripples of surprise” the principal evidence is 1 Thess 4:13–17; John 21:21–23 and 2 Peter 3:3–8. For Allison’s response to this complaint see Miller, Debate, 102–103.

<sup>70</sup> In Miller, Debate, 65–66.

<sup>71</sup> For Allison’s insistence that we should not be surprised by this inconsistency and irrationality see Miller, Debate, 89–93, 110, cf. 120–121.

<sup>72</sup> Kloppenborg, “As One Unknown,” 22.

<sup>73</sup> See Borg in Miller, Debate, 44–48, with Allison’s reply; 101–101; Kloppenborg, “As One Unknown,” 22 n. 62.

temple, in worship and in the distinctive religious experiences to which the Jewish apocalypses bear witness. Discussion of the Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice and Schwemer's important study is conspicuous by its absence.<sup>74</sup>

It is not enough to dismiss the desire for a political Jesus as mere "wishful thinking."<sup>75</sup> To his modern (scholarly) believers the reconstructed "eschatological historical Jesus" also has plenty to offer theologically and politically.<sup>76</sup> No Jesus scholarship is pursued in a vacuum. And in several respects the eschatological Jesus offered by Schweitzer's heirs remains (however unconsciously) indebted more to the dualistic proclivities of a particular theological tradition than to the first-century sources themselves. Take, for example, Sanders' central thesis: Jesus expected the "miraculous" rebuilding of the temple and a divine intervention that would restore the nation and its lost tribes. For this scenario Sanders appeals to Jewish sources which expected the same kind of thing. Unfortunately, these do not bear the weight of interpretation asked of them.<sup>77</sup> Many texts speak of a divinely enacted gathering in of scattered Israelites, but none says this is going to happen in the "miraculous," "interventionist" fashion Sanders claims.<sup>78</sup> One of

---

<sup>74</sup> One might have expected this material to enter his otherwise valuable discussion of Jesus' millenarian spirituality (Allison, Millenarian Prophet, 172–216). But then his treatment of the Essenes and the DSS (ibid. 191–93) is also a strained attempt to find a futurist eschatological rationale for a millenarian spirituality where the texts themselves lay far greater stress on present cultic realities as the basis for ethics.

<sup>75</sup> Cf. Sanders, Historical Figure, 183.

<sup>76</sup> See Kloppenborg, "As One Unknown," and D. C. Allison, "The Problem of Apocalyptic: From Polemic to Apologetics," in Apocalypticism, Anti-Semitism and the Historical Jesus: Subtexts in Criticism, ed. J. S. Kloppenborg and J. W. Marshall (London: T&T Clark International, 2005), 98–110, at 98–104. Behind so much twentieth-century talk of Jesus as (dualistic) eschatological prophet there stand the two giants of Western political theology, Augustine and Luther, whose aversion to concrete Christian political commitment is coupled with the tendency to oppose the divine against the human.

<sup>77</sup> The relevant primary sources are laid out in Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 78–87, 96–97; Sanders, Historical Figure, 185, 261–262. The clearest illustration of Sanders' misreading of the evidence is his view that in the War Scroll it is the angels who "fight on behalf of the Jewish armies, but the final blows [are] struck by God himself" (Sanders, Historical Figure, 262). The War Scroll actually has the human fighters do the killing as God's agents, with the messiah at their head (see Fletcher-Louis, All the Glory of Adam, 395–475).

<sup>78</sup> Of the additional texts supplied by Allison (Allison, Millenarian Prophet, 140, n. 167) only one (1 Enoch 57.1, cf. Isa 60:8), if read woodenly, has in mind an ingathering wrought only by divine power. 4 Ezra 13.39–47 is clear that the lost tribes will have to return through ordinary means of transport, even if the crossing of the Euphrates will be possible by the recapitulation of the miracle at the Red Sea and the Jordan.

Sanders' texts (1QM) specifically highlights the role of human agents in mustering the tribes and organising them in their eschatological fight.<sup>79</sup> Although the sources do speak of God building a future temple, it is never said that he will not use human agents. The assumption that he will not is born of an unwarranted dualistic interpretative framework: in several key passages we are expressly told that God uses human construction workers who, in doing his work, are, therefore, more than simply human.<sup>80</sup> "Unless the LORD builds the house, those who build it labour in vain" (Ps 127:1) eloquently sums up the idea of human-divine synergy. That Jesus did not, in fact, expect a new physical temple to drop from the skies is consistent with other evidence. On the one hand, the Jesus tradition and the earliest Christian texts lack any interest in such a physical structure, even where they have distinct, "eschatological" hopes for the future.<sup>81</sup> And on the other, there is some evidence that in fact Jesus thought his community and his "sacrificial" death were to function as a fulfilment of, and replacement for, Israel's cultic institutions.<sup>82</sup>

In this case, perhaps Jesus in fact thought that the divine "intervention" was already happening in and through his ministry, within history. Allison insists that Jesus' "vision of the Kingdom cannot be identified with anything around us. God has not yet brought a radically new world"; he has not yet gathered the scattered Israel (Q 13:28–29), and the saints do not yet have an angelic nature (Mark 12:18–27).<sup>83</sup>

<sup>79</sup> See 1QM II, 1–9; III, 1–4, 13; V, 3–4, 16; VII, 9–IX, 7; X, 2–8, and so on.

<sup>80</sup> This theological anthropology goes back at least to Exodus where Moses is a divine agent of architectural revelation (Exod 24:15–18; 34:29–35) and his chief artisan, Bezalel, is the veritable image of God, endowed with the creative wisdom (cf. Ps 104:24) and the "divine spirit" (Exod 31.1–3) necessary to create the cult-as-microcosm. The idea is evoked in Josephus, Ant. 3.179, where Moses' construction of the tabernacle makes him a θεῖος ἄνθρωπος (cf. 1 Enoch 89.36), and in Sib. Or. 5.414–433, where it takes a heavenly man to rebuild a glorious temple after the disaster of AD 70. Compare the claim in 2 Baruch 7 and 80 that it was not in fact the heathen who destroyed the First Temple (and by implication also the Second Temple) but God himself by the hand of his angels.

<sup>81</sup> Cf. T. Holmén, Jesus and Jewish Covenant Thinking, Biblical Interpretation Series 35 (Leiden: Brill, 2001), 297, 329.

<sup>82</sup> See Mark 2:1–10; Luke 7:48–49; Matt 18:20; Luke 14:25–33 (discussed in C. H. T. Fletcher-Louis, "Jesus Inspects His Priestly War Party [Luke 14:25–35]," in The Old Testament in the New Testament. Essays in Honour of J. L. North, ed. S. Moyise, JSNT-Sup 189 [Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000], 126–143) and the evidence and recent voices discussed in Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 514–515, 786–787, 795–818.

<sup>83</sup> D. C. Allison, "Jesus & the Victory of Apocalyptic," in Jesus & the Restoration

Now it is true that, unless Jesus believed in the communion of the saints, the vision of resurrected patriarchs in Q 13:28–29 is yet to happen. But other passages indicate Jesus could employ metaphorical reinterpretation of such eschatological expectations. In the Prodigal Son the forgiveness of sins and joy in Jesus' company is interpreted as the real return from exile.<sup>84</sup> In Q 11:23 Jesus claims his exorcisms bring about the real ingathering of those otherwise scattered.<sup>85</sup> So perhaps when we hear of the twelve sitting on thrones judging Israel (Q 22:28–30), Jesus had in mind an Israel redefined around himself—something not unlike the community of believers that followed him after his death and “resurrection.” And there is much to suggest that the earliest Christians believed the angelic nature for which others awaited, was theirs already: God had already brought a radically new world; “if anyone is in Christ there is new creation” (2 Cor 5:17).<sup>86</sup> In view of the evidence from Qumran for a heaven-on-earth and transformation-of-the-righteous-through-cult there is the real possibility that, as Luke 20:34–36 would have it, Jesus thought his followers were already, during his ministry, “isoangelic.”<sup>87</sup>

An insistence on a literal interpretation of “necessarily” otherworldly eschatological language has the effect of shielding Jesus from any responsibility for a parting of the ways between Jews and Christians. But the evidence need not be taken with flat-footed literalism and ironically, that literalism is parasitic upon a now questionable view of

---

of Israel: A Critical Assessment of N. T. Wright's Jesus and the Victory of God, ed. C. C. Newman (Carlisle: Paternoster, 1999), 126–141, at 129.

<sup>84</sup> See Wright, Jesus, 125–131.

<sup>85</sup> The logion is strangely ignored by N. T. Wright. A glance at the use of “gather” and “scatter” in the concordances shows immediately that Q 11:23 makes metaphorical use of return-from-exile language. And for the use of new exodus language in Q 11:21–22 cf. C. H. T. Fletcher-Louis, “The Gospel Thief Saying (Luke 12.39–40 and Matthew 24.43–44) Reconsidered,” in Understanding, Studying and Reading: New Testament Essays in Honour of John Ashton, ed. C. Rowland and C. H. T. Fletcher-Louis, JSNTSup 153 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998), 48–68.

<sup>86</sup> For Jesus' followers already angelic or heavenly see Acts 6:15; Phil 2:15–16 (with Dan 12:1–3); Eph 2:16; Col 3:1–4 and see further Fletcher-Louis, Luke-Acts, 72–107, 216–222. From another angle, Crossan makes a similar point: the early Christians had a “durative”, not an “instantive” eschatology (in Miller, Debate, 66–68).

<sup>87</sup> Compare Allison's own discussion of this text (Allison, Millenarian Prophet, 209). Crossan espouses a Jesus who believed in “heaven on earth” (e.g., Miller, Debate, 56). The proper—liturgically particular—context for such a notion is the kind of experience described in the Qumran Sabbath Songs and the Jewish apocalypses. This has barely figured in the debate, presumably because, on all sides, the discussion remains within the parameters set by an anachronistic understanding of Jewish “apocalypticism.”

Jewish “apocalyptic” as something essentially different from the religion of the Hebrew Bible: according to that view there was a parting from the way of Moses and the Prophets, but of course it took place long before Jesus, viz. at the dawn of “apocalyptic”. The assumption that Jesus expected God to intervene at the expense of human agency also means we need do little with those gospel passages in which Jesus predicts political catastrophe for the temple and Jerusalem (Category (6) above); these this-worldly concerns are of a different order to Jesus’ other-worldly interests. Those who argue for an eschatological Jesus have virtually nothing to say about the role these temple destruction sayings have in Jesus’ aims and vision; though they do see that they probably contributed to his trial and condemnation.<sup>88</sup> They are not related to any particular social-political programme or vision, nor are they born of any prophetic discernment and critique of the political impulses that eventually led to the disastrous war with Rome. Nor, of course, have they anything to do with the essentially transcendent character of Jewish (“apocalyptic”) eschatology. Sanders presents the choice clearly: “As a good Jewish prophet, [Jesus] could have thought that God would employ a foreign army for [the Temple’s] destruction; but, as a radical first-century eschatologist, he probably thought God would do it directly”.<sup>89</sup> Jesus, in other words, was not an heir to the biblical pattern of politically engaged prophecy; he was a failed prophet of apocalyptic eschatology (what Sanders means by “radical eschatologist”) whose vision was essentially apolitical in its denial of divine involvement in the ordinary processes of history.

In the discussion of Jewish apocalyptic in volume 2 of this Handbook we have already noted the way in which the use of social theory has caused much misunderstanding in the recent study of the apocalypses. Allison’s application of this heuristic tool is not, in principal, unwarranted. However, as an alternative, all-encompassing, metanarrative the “millenarian prophet” threatens to occlude Jesus’ distinctive personality.<sup>90</sup> For Allison, Jesus comes to us as one already very well known: “He is Wovoka. He is Mambu. He is Birsá. What we <sup>88</sup> There is considerable agreement that Jesus did predict the temple’s destruction, not least because the gospel accounts do not seem to know key features of the actual event, such as its burning.

---

<sup>89</sup> Sanders, Historical Figure, 259.

<sup>90</sup> For a cautionary critique of the application to Jesus of pre-existing metanarratives see Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 470–477.

think of the least of these, his brethren, we think, to a large extent, also of him.”<sup>91</sup> So, can we not think anything of Jesus that we do not think of these other millenarian prophets? Does appeal to social theory function to inoculate us against any possibility that Jesus was “unique”? Whilst the theory has potential explanatory power, it is not clear whether it is being used to determine the meaning of the texts or to further elucidate their meaning and function in an already established history. At times the theory smothers Jesus’ particularity. For example, Allison thinks Jesus’ pacifism is a stance taken “in expectation of a divinely wrought deliverance.”<sup>92</sup> But this is not the explanation given in the sources: they rather ground this ethic in a particular understanding of the imitation of God (Matt 5:43–48; Luke 6:35–36).

Lastly, we should note in criticism particularly of Allison the continued adherence to the idea that John the Baptist, upon whose shoulders Jesus stands, had a fully “apocalyptic” eschatology.<sup>93</sup> This is the assumption also of members of the Jesus Seminar, who think Jesus consciously rejected this part of his former teacher’s programme.<sup>94</sup> But others rightly see that, aside from the misuse of the word “apocalyptic” here, nothing in John’s preaching goes beyond what we might expect from a biblical prophet: whilst the coming judgement is imminent, the preaching is aimed at Israel only—the nations are not in view, there is no cosmic catastrophe, and nothing in John’s recorded preaching demands a transcendence of history.<sup>95</sup>

4. A Non-Dualistic Jesus the Eschatological Prophet?

N. T. Wright has a view of Jewish apocalyptic and the historical Jesus that stands aloof from the discussions surveyed so far: with Rowland, he thinks apocalyptic is essentially a matter of the revelation of heavenly secrets.<sup>96</sup> But where most have taken the cosmological language

---

<sup>91</sup> Allison, Millenarian Prophet, 216: these are the opening words of Allison’s hermeneutically oriented “Epilogue.”

<sup>92</sup> Allison, Millenarian Prophet, 63, cf. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism, 231.

<sup>93</sup> The idea is widely adopted in North American discussion. See e.g., Miller, Debate, 18.

<sup>94</sup> E.g., Crossan, Mediterranean Peasant, 231–232, 235, cf. A. Y. Collins, “Apocalypses and Apocalypticism: Early Christian,” ABD 1 (1992): 288–292, at 288.

<sup>95</sup> G. B. Caird, Jesus and the Jewish nation (London: Athlone Press, 1965), 265; Sanders, Historical Figure, 92–93; Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 365, 368–369.

<sup>96</sup> Wright, People of God, 268–338, 390–396: Mark’s whole story of progressive unveiling is an apocalypse.

of Jewish eschatology literally, (following the British tradition exemplified by G. B. Caird) for Wright “eschatology is the climax of Israel’s history, involving events for which end-of-the-world language is the only set of metaphors adequate to express the significance of what will happen, but resulting in a new and quite different phase within space-time history.”<sup>97</sup> Politics and theology are inseparable. Apocalyptic literature does not represent a new worldview; rather, it takes up the burden of the biblical prophets to interpret social and political realities.

Jesus is an eschatological prophet—here Wright is with Schweitzer—who expected not a dualistic divine intervention (so Schweitzer and the majority of his followers), but the same kind of action within history, through human agency, envisaged by Jeremiah, Ezekiel and Isaiah.<sup>98</sup> On the one hand, Jesus believed that the Kingdom was being inaugurated in and around himself—through his mediation of divine forgiveness, his deliverance from the demonic, and in his subversive social, religious and political vision—and that this inauguration would come to climactic fulfilment at his death and resurrection. On the other hand, Jesus warned that those who rejected him and his ministry—his generosity, mercy, forgiveness and peace—would suffer the same kinds of consequences as those Israelites who in the sixth century BCE had ceased to be faithful to their covenant god. Those Jews would take the road of idolatrous and violent nationalism that led inevitably to the temple’s destruction. The tragedy of 70 CE would also be the Son of Man’s—Jesus’—vindication; the moment he would be revealed enthroned as Israel’s true king, the time when his message and his way of being Israel would be shown, through the events of history, to be the right one.

Reading the gospels this way not only gives maximum significance to Jesus’ predictions of the temple’s destruction, but also enables Wright to incorporate passages in our Categories 1, 2, 3 and 5 within Category 6, so that Jesus is not a failed “millenarian” prophet, but the last in the line of true biblical prophets. The arrival of the Kingdom—but not the end of the space-time universe—and the coming of the

---

<sup>97</sup> Wright, Jesus, 208. Wright, People of God, 280 n. 1 can give the misleading impression that Wright’s views accord with the work of J. J. Collins.

<sup>98</sup> Wright, Jesus, 94–98, 182–186, 198–243, 320–612–662, 467–474, 510–528, 594. There is some agreement here with the approach taken by Marcus Borg, another of Caird’s pupils (see esp. Borg, Conflict, 163–229, 265–276).

Son of Man—not literally descending on clouds—did happen within the lifetime of Jesus’ hearers. Jesus’ vindication is also possible because Wright locates within the sphere of realised or inaugurated eschatology what the likes of Sanders and Allison think Jesus looked for in the transcendent future. For Wright, the restoration of the nation and, in particular, the long awaited real return from exile takes place already in Jesus’ ministry (as Jesus spells out in the Sower and Prodigal Son parables). And in various ways there is a new temple being built in and around Jesus (e.g., Mark 2:1–12; Q 6:46–49; Matt 16:17–19; 18:15–20; Luke 15:11–32).<sup>99</sup> This means that Jesus’ eschatology entails not just affirmation of Israel’s hopes, but also their redefinition; a possibility that, hitherto, Schweitzerians have little considered.

Wright’s non-dualistic understanding of apocalyptic and eschatology is not without its detractors.<sup>100</sup> In particular, it is objected that Wright’s non-literalist reading of cosmological language is without foundation: it is asserted rather than demonstrated.<sup>101</sup> Unfortunately, this matter is now more complicated than either Wright or his critics imagine because temple cosmology and symbolism inform apocalyptic imagery. Consider, for example, a point in D. C. Allison’s recent criticism of Wright. Allison establishes that ancient Jewish interpreters were willing to take cosmological language at face value, a point that tells against Wright. However he then asks: “do we really have suitable reasons...for holding that, when the Jesus tradition speaks about the Son of man coming on the clouds of heaven, this was not meant literally” (i.e., as a reference to real meteorological phenomena)?<sup>102</sup> To which we must now answer: Yes, we do, because within temple cosmology talk of such clouds is polyvalent. Besides cumuli nimbi, incense

<sup>99</sup> Wright, Jesus, 108, 129–130, 338, 343, 362, 432–438.

<sup>100</sup> For criticisms see the essays in C. C. Newman, ed., Jesus & the Restoration of Israel: A Critical Assessment of N. T. Wright’s Jesus and the Victory of God (Carlisle: Paternoster, 1999); Allison, Millenarian Prophet, 152–171; C. H. T. Fletcher-Louis, “Jesus, the Temple, and the Dissolution of Heaven and Earth,” in Apocalyptic in History and Tradition, ed. C. Rowland and J. Barton (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2002), 116–141.

<sup>101</sup> No doubt some, like M. Casey, “Where Wright is Wrong: A Critical Review of N. T. Wright’s Jesus and the Victory of God,” JSNT 69 (1998): 95–103, at 97, will charge Wright with a theologically motivated distortion of history that rescues Jesus from failure. But even if we could know Wright’s (and Caird’s) motives, that need not mean their history is wrong: it could be both right and theologically convenient.

<sup>102</sup> Allison, Millenarian Prophet, 159. For Allison’s defense of a literal reading of apocalyptic language see ibid. 153–171.

clouds and the aura of divine glory that incense represents may also be in view. In isolation, Mark 13:26 may literally refer to the officiation (following consecration) of the true eschatological high priest in the God-ordained temple at a decisive (glorious and powerful) Yom Kippur. What Jesus might have meant by these words would then depend on his vision of the true high priesthood, temple and Day of Atonement.

What Jesus would have meant had he said Mark 13:26 would also depend on how Jesus understood the transcendence of the eschaton in relation to the climactic coming of Israel's true high priest. And here Wright pays too little attention to the specifics of Jewish eschatology and its transcendent character. Wright repeatedly chastises those who have imagined that Jews expected the end of the space-time universe and assumes that the alternative is simply that they expected the continuation of history. It may well be that the position he rejects fairly describes the thoroughgoing dualistic "apocalypticism" of the Bultmannians which still lingers in the minds of some who beat the "non-apocalyptic Jesus" drum. However, it is unlikely that this was the position of Weiss and Schweitzer and certainly, it unfairly caricatures the position of their most recent disciples.<sup>103</sup> Though Wright lists various formulations of the Jewish eschatology of Jesus' day, one which accurately characterizes a common pattern in the sources is not considered: Eschatology as the climax to Israel's story and the story of the cosmos, involving the transcendence or transfiguration of ordinary space and time.<sup>104</sup> Wright makes much of the claim that Jesus' aims and vision belong to a grand salvation-historical metanarrative: sin-exile-and-return. In so doing, and with some older Old Testament scholarship exemplified by the work of G. von Rad, he drives a wedge between history and creation: the cosmos has no other role in the historical drama than to provide the staging. Old Testament scholarship has since moved on and it is increasingly clear that history and creation <sup>103</sup> For Weiss and Schweitzer, see Allison, "Victory of Apocalyptic," 129–130; S. J. Gathercole, "The Critical and Dogmatic Agenda of Albert Schweitzer's The Quest of the Historical Jesus," TynBul 51 (2000): 261–283, at 278–282. Dunn may also therefore misrepresent Schweitzer (Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 398).

---

<sup>104</sup> For Wright's presentation of the options see Wright, Jesus, 208. The problem is exemplified in Wright's oft-repeated statement that Jews expected the "defeat of evil" (e.g., Wright, Jesus, 470). No doubt many did. But many also expected Satan's elimination, the removal of all evil, along with all disease and sickness. "Defeat" and "removal" (with its utopian consequences) are not quite the same.

are a tightly-knit whole in the biblical worldview: that there remains “persistent evil” within creation—to use J. D. Levenson’s phrase,<sup>105</sup> that creation (time and space) is not what it should be, but that the cult inaugurates a transcendence of ordinary space and time to which creation’s story, with Adam’s and Israel’s stories, was always headed.

These criticisms aside, Wright’s is the only exposition of the historical Jesus that really breaks free from the spell of Schweitzer’s “interventionist” and always-incipiently-dualistic “apocalypticism”. Wright’s tightly drawn connections between Jesus’ Kingdom programme and his temple destruction prophecy is persuasive, not least because it takes seriously the politically engaged character of Jewish eschatology. Criticisms of Wright are remarkably silent at this point. And parts of his reading of Mark 13 are by no means as fanciful as they might seem. For example, his claim that the ἄγγελοι sent out to gather the elect in Mark 13:27 are in fact Christian missionaries is a possibility which must now be treated with the utmost seriousness, given the considerable body of evidence that Jews could speak freely of the righteous in angelic terms.<sup>106</sup> Even if Wright is wrong to collapse the cosmological language of the gospels into history, this need not mean that he is wrong to claim Mark 13 is really all about 70 CE, since the cosmological significance of the temple means that its desecration and destruction would have serious implications for the rest of creation.<sup>107</sup>

5. The Son of Man

Schweitzer made the future Son of Man sayings central to his argument that Jesus expected an imminent glorious and utterly transcendent divine intervention. The sayings were problematized in the New Quest and have never recovered the pride of place Schweitzer gave them, even amongst those who advocate an eschatological Jesus. Here there is a crisis of scholarly confidence, particularly in the English-speaking world.<sup>108</sup> Yet Schweitzer was surely right: if we are going to

<sup>105</sup> J. D. Levenson, Creation and the Persistence of Evil. The Jewish Drama of Divine Omnipotence (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1988).

<sup>106</sup> Wright, Jesus, 363–364, 515; cf. 361 n. 152.

<sup>107</sup> See further Fletcher-Louis, “Dissolution of Heaven and Earth”.

<sup>108</sup> For a survey of the different positions see Theissen and Merz, The Historical Jesus, 541–563; Dunn, Jesus Remembered, 724–737.

treat the synoptic gospels seriously, the Son of Man's presence shines from beginning to end, throughout the Jesus material; from ministry, through suffering and beyond. The inability to make sense of the Son of Man sayings continually calls into question confidence in the synoptic tradition as a whole and justifies the search for surer historical footing in other material. And yet it is extremely unlikely that the Son of Man expression has been introduced to the tradition without a basis in the ipsissima verba Jesu.

But this is also where the "new perspective" on Jewish apocalyptic and our temple-centred reading of Daniel 7 has most to offer. Here we are confined to the following general observations:<sup>109</sup>

1. The scholarly assumption that Jesus cannot have simultaneously thought of himself as the future, glorious and heavenly Son of Man and also the frail, human, about-to-suffer Son of Man is a nonsense born of the short-sighted failure to reckon with the full and complex range of theological anthropologies available to Jewish theology in general and the understanding of priesthood in particular.<sup>110</sup> This is, of course, no more short-sighted than the agonising arguments over whether in the Similitudes of Enoch the divine Son of Man and Enoch are one and the same: they clearly are, just as in 4 Ezra the Son of Man is both pre-existent divine warrior and very human messiah.

2. In its first-century context, what is striking about the gospel Son of Man portrayal is not the combination of future and present, glorious and frail Son of Man sayings with singular reference to Jesus (as if this were possible only at the end of a long process of scriptural and theological reflection in the light of the Easter event). What is striking is that Jesus the Son of Man is situated—at least until his final hours—so far from the Jerusalem temple; its ritual time, space and boundaries. And where the comparable Jewish texts present the Danielic Son of Man only in transcendent triumph over the sinful vicissitudes of earthly reality, in the gospels he is also, first, rootlessly at home in that world below and outside the purity of heaven.

---

<sup>109</sup> For more detail see Fletcher-Louis, "Sacral Son of Man," and "Jesus as the High Priestly Messiah: Part 1," JSHJ 4 (2006): 155–175; "Jesus as the High Priestly Messiah: Part 2," JSHJ 5 (2007): 57–79.

<sup>110</sup> For suffering and glory combined in the Qumran passages on priesthood see J. D. Tabor, "Are You the One? The Textual Dynamics of Messianic Self-Identity," in Knowing the End from the Beginning, ed. L. L. Grabbe and R. D. Haak (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2003), 179–189.

3. The Son of Man comes and goes. In Daniel 7:13 he comes to the Ancient of Days; from earth to heaven. In the majority of gospel sayings he comes from heaven to earth. The ambiguity arises directly from the temple and atonement context. The high priest both goes into the sanctuary, the holy of holies that is heaven, and comes out again having achieved atonement, in receipt of divine authority and power (cf. Dan 7:14), to act as God's agent and divine warrior on earth. The coming from heaven to earth need not have anything to do with reflection on Jesus' role in the light of post-resurrection faith. Indeed, it need have nothing to do with Jesus' death either. If Jesus thought or spoke of himself as Son of Man, that would have meant automatically ascent to and descent from heaven in the cultic, Jerusalem temple sense at the very least; and in any number of other possible senses that might be evoked by that particular temple cosmology. The "coming" of the Son of Man, as in Matt 10:23, might also, presumably, mean the long-awaited appearance of Israel's true eschatological high priest, on the cultic and historical stage, his ordination(?) and liturgical officiation achieving one or more climactic acts of atonement.

Of course, this remains a hypothesis until individual sayings are examined in turn. Is there enough in the Son of Man sayings collection to confirm that Jesus used the title to claim a high priestly identity? Does the hypothesis have explanatory power? This will be established only once we understand fully the breadth and depth of theological meaning that was attached to the high priest, that was available to be evoked at any one instance.

6. Jesus the Apocalyptic Visionary: A Desideratum

Since we have argued that apocalyptic is essentially a matter of a particular anthropology—the image of God—as the basis for particular religious experiences—dreams, visions, angelophanies, the ascent to heaven (and so forth) free of the trappings of pagan idolatry—within a particular cosmology—the one defined by Israel's temple, it is beholden upon us to end with a few brief comments on the evidence that Jesus was one such apocalypticist.

The serious study of the Baptism, Temptation, Transfiguration and related passages that claim for Jesus an apocalyptic spirituality has played a very minor role in the quest for the historical Jesus. Morton Smith, Marcus Borg, Bruce Chilton and Sean Freyne are among the few who have given this material any space in considering Jesus' aims, vision and self-consciousness.<sup>111</sup> To the extent that these passages claim an objectively transcendent reality they are not, of course, patient of authentication within the historiographical parameters of a modern epistemology. But that does not mean they are not historical, even precisely as described. And etic categories of analysis ("magic", the sociologist's "charismatic", for example) are no less subjectively relative than the emic category in which such experiences belong: Jewish apocalyptic. It may be possible to give thoroughgoing appreciation to these experiences in the writing of an historical account of Jesus, but that will not be an account capable of universal public assent: it will require personal assent also to the broad parameters of the apocalyptic mindset and the biblical worldview of which that mindset is a subset. Nevertheless, for any who would tread this road less travelled, the following should be borne in mind:

1. No doubt there are important continuities between the experiential realities of Jewish apocalyptic and comparative cross-cultural religious phenomena. No doubt, as Borg would insist, those continuities are as important as the discontinuity of worldview between modern and pre-modern or western and non-western societies. However, sight should not be lost of the fact that Second Temple "mysticism" is highly particular, distinguishing itself clearly from competing non-Jewish alternatives by its own literary genre—the apocalypses—with a definitely biblical theological content.

2. If Jesus was a Jewish apocalyptic visionary he cannot be understood apart from his view of the Jerusalem temple. Despite a well-established scholarly tradition, we should not imagine that an apocalyptic spirituality need nurture antipathy to the physical temple and its institutions.<sup>112</sup> Indeed, whilst there is little to connect a royal

---

<sup>111</sup> M. Smith, Jesus the Magician (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1978); M. Smith, "The Origin and History of the Transfiguration Story," USQR 36 (1980): 39–44; Borg, Conflict, 229–263; J. Borg Marcus, Jesus: A New Vision (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1987), 25–56; Borg, Contemporary Scholarship, 127–139; B. Chilton, Rabbi Jesus: An Intimate Biography (New York: Doubleday, 2000), 50–58, 93–102, 109, 132–133, 155–161, 171–172, 190–196, 281–289; S. Freyne, Jesus, A Jewish Galilean: A New Reading of the Jesus Story (London: T&T Clark International, 2004), 158–163.

<sup>112</sup> That is the position most recently developed in dependence on Nickelsburg's understanding of the Book of Watchers by S. Freyne (A Jewish Galilean, 158–163, cf. Borg, Conflict, 234).

messianic consciousness to an apocalyptic spirituality, it would be priestly categories of identity that would most accord with Jesus having dreams and visions.

3. The “mysticism” of Jewish apocalyptic literature has not yet fled from history, as it would do in later Merkabah and Hekhalot mysticism. If Jesus was a Palestinian apocalyptic mystic we should assume that he was committed to Israel’s story and that he took a lively interest in eschatology. But he is also likely to have believed, not least in view of his own experiences, that the eschaton was inaugurated already in his ministry: the Baptism speaks of new creation and the Transfiguration manifests not a proleptic glory but a real divine presence.<sup>113</sup>

4. Fourthly, the particularity of Jewish apocalyptic mysticism means that if Jesus had such experiences it is highly probable that they will have entailed a distinctive self-consciousness. The apocalyptic seer is, like the high priest, a transcendent human being: Daniel is the veritable image of God and as such worthy of both human veneration (Dan 2) and revelatory dreams; Enoch is one who has walked with the gods, whose life transcends mortality, who is exalted to a divine and glorious throne; Levi receives “glorious” garments in his dream vision (T. Levi 8.5); through her encounter with the angel, Aseneth is transformed from mortality to the radiant immortality of those who live the angelic life (Joseph and Aseneth). The early Jewish tradition does not share the rigid distinction between divine and human, creator and creature, which characterises the later Western mystical tradition.

No doubt, there are ways in which Jesus the apocalyptic visionary was unusual, distinctive, unique. He is not recorded to have had dream visions. Why? Is this irrelevant? If there is an initiatory mystical experience in the life of Jesus according to the gospels it is not the one we might expect—ascend to heaven. Rather, at the Baptism the Spirit of <sup>113</sup> For new creation in the Baptism see W. D. Davies and D. C. Allison, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Gospel According to Saint Matthew. vol. I (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1988), 333–334. For real presence in the Transfiguration see Fletcher-Louis, “Sacral Son of Man.” Allison’s lack of attention to the realised aspect of Jesus’ eschatology in his recent work is of a piece with his relative lack of interest in the visionary dimension of Jewish apocalyptic and the historical Jesus. Of the historicity of material pertaining to the latter he is sceptical: see e.g., D. C. Allison, “Behind the Temptations of Jesus. Q 4:1–13 and Mark 1:12–13,” in Authenticating the Activities of Jesus, ed. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans (Leiden: Brill, 1999), 195–213. However, Allison provides interpretative insights that could contribute to a positive appreciation of the story’s coherence with other aspects of Jesus’ actual life and ministry.

---

God descends to Jesus and he is not taken up into the open heaven for a vision of God on his chariot or throne (contrast Ezekiel 1, Isaiah 6, 1 Enoch 14).<sup>114</sup> Why is this? Study of this aspect of his character is in its infancy, but with an emerging new perspective on apocalyptic—one that puts the experiential in its rightfully central place—there is now a new opportunity to understand better Jesus' historical character. And this should pay close attention not just to the ways Jesus' spirituality is like but also to ways it is unlike that which apocalyptic literature attests.

---

<sup>114</sup> Cf. the criticism of Chilton's recent presentation of Jesus as a Merkabah mystic in C. L. Quarles, "Jesus as Merkabah Mystic," JSHJ 3 (2005): 5–22, at 17.

Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus

Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus

Volume 4

Individual Studies

Edited by

Tom Holmén and Stanley E. Porter

BRILL

LEIDEN • BOSTON
2011

This book is printed on acid-free paper.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication-Data

Handbook for the study of the historical Jesus / edited by Tom Holmén and Stanley E. Porter.

p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references and indexes.

ISBN 978-90-04-16372-0 (hardback : alk. paper) 1. Jesus Christ—Historicity—
Study and teaching. I. Holmén, Tom. II. Porter, Stanley E., 1956–
BT303.2.H364 2010
232.9'08071—dc22

2010038765

ISBN Vol. 1: 978 90 04 17091 9

Vol. 2: 978 90 04 17092 6

Vol. 3: 978 90 04 17093 3

Vol. 4: 978 90 04 17094 0

Set: 978 90 04 16372 0

Copyright 2011 by Koninklijke Brill NV, Leiden, The Netherlands.
Koninklijke Brill NV incorporates the imprints Brill, Hotei Publishing,
IDC Publishers, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers and VSP.

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, translated, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording or otherwise, without prior written permission from the publisher.

Authorization to photocopy items for internal or personal use is granted by Koninklijke Brill NV provided that the appropriate fees are paid directly to The Copyright Clearance Center, 222 Rosewood Drive, Suite 910, Danvers, MA 01923, USA.
Fees are subject to change.

PRINTED IN THE NETHERLANDS

CONTENTS

VOLUME 1

HOW TO STUDY THE HISTORICAL JESUS

Introduction: The Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus in Perspective .....	xv
TOM HOLMÉN AND STANLEY E. PORTER

PART ONE

CONTEMPORARY METHODOLOGICAL APPROACHES

How to Marginalize the Traditional Criteria of Authenticity .....	3
DALE C. ALLISON, JR.
Fourth Quest? What Did Jesus Really Want? .....	31
ERNST BAASLAND
The Search for Jesus' Special Profile .....	57
JÜRGEN BECKER
The Historical Jesus: How to Ask Questions and Remain Inquisitive .....	91
JAMES H. CHARLESWORTH
Method in a Critical Study of Jesus .....	129
BRUCE D. CHILTON
Context and Text in Historical Jesus Methodology .....	159
JOHN DOMINIC CROSSAN
Remembering Jesus: How the Quest of the Historical Jesus Lost its Way .....	183
JAMES D. G. DUNN
Jesus-in-Context: A Relational Approach .....	207
RICHARD A. HORSLEY
Sources, Methods and Discursive Locations in the Quest of the Historical Jesus .....	241
JOHN S. KLOPPENBORG
Basic Methodology in the Quest for the Historical Jesus .....	291
JOHN P. MEIER

Jesus Research as Feedback on His Wirkungsgeschichte .....	333
PETR POKORNÝ
The Role of Greek Language Criteria in Historical Jesus Research .....	361
STANLEY E. PORTER
From the Messianic Teacher to the Gospels of Jesus Christ .....	405
RAINER RIESNER
The Gospel of the Historical Jesus .....	447
JAMES M. ROBINSON
Scholarly Rigor and Intuition in Historical Research into Jesus .....	475
JACQUES SCHLOSSER
Critical Feminist Historical-Jesus Research .....	509
ELISABETH SCHÜSSLER FIORENZA
Historical Scepticism and the Criteria of Jesus Research: My Attempt to Leap Over Lessing's Ugly Wide Ditch .....	549
GERD THEISSEN
A Metalanguage for the Historical Jesus Methods:
An Experiment .....	589
TOM HOLMÉN

PART TWO

VARIOUS ASPECTS OF HISTORICAL
JESUS METHODOLOGY

With the Grain and against the Grain: A Strategy for Reading the Synoptic Gospels .....	619
COLIN BROWN
Form Criticism and Jesus Research .....	649
ARLAND J. HULTGREN
Tradition Criticism and Jesus Research .....	673
GRANT R. OSBORNE
The Criteria of Authenticity .....	695
STANLEY E. PORTER
Alternatives to Form and Tradition Criticism in Jesus Research .....	715
TOBIAS NICKLAS
Social-Scientific Approaches and Jesus Research .....	743
BRUCE J. MALINA

New Literary Criticism and Jesus Research .....	777
ELIZABETH STRUTHERS MALBON
Memory Theory and Jesus Research .....	809
ALAN KIRK
The Burden of Proof in Jesus Research .....	843
DAGMAR WINTER

VOLUME 2

THE STUDY OF JESUS

Introduction: The Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus in Perspective .....	xv
TOM HOLMÉN AND STANLEY E. PORTER

PART ONE

THE ONGOING QUEST FOR THE HISTORICAL JESUS

The Quest of the Unhistorical Jesus and the Quest of the Historical Jesus .....	855
COLIN BROWN
Futures for the Jesus Quests .....	887
BENGT HOLMBERG
The Parable of the Goose and the Mirror: The Historical Jesus in the Theological Discipline .....	919
SCOT MCKNIGHT
Historical Jesus Research in Global Cultural Context .....	953
TERESA OKURE
Diverse Agendas at Work in the Jesus Quest .....	985
CLIVE MARSH
Jesus of Nazareth and the Christ of Faith: Approaches to the Question in Historical Jesus Research .....	1021
SVEN-OLAV BACK
The Jesus Quest and Jewish-Christian Relations .....	1055
DONALD A. HAGNER
Historic Jesuses .....	1079
CEES DEN HEYER

PART TWO

CURRENT QUESTIONS OF JESUS RESEARCH

Jesus and Cynicism .....	1105
F. GERALD DOWNING
Jesus and the Scriptures of Israel .....	1137
STEVE MOYISE
Implicit Christology and the Historical Jesus .....	1169
EDWIN K. BROADHEAD
Jesus and the “Partings of the Ways” .....	1183
MICHAEL F. BIRD
Prophet, Sage, Healer, Messiah, and Martyr: Types and Identities of Jesus .....	1217
CRAIG A. EVANS
Jesus im Licht der Qumrangemeinde .....	1245
HEINZ-WOLFGANG KUHN
Jesus without Q .....	1287
MICHAEL GOULDER
Dispensing with the Priority of Mark .....	1313
DAVID L. DUNGAN
The Role of Aramaic in Reconstructing the Teaching of Jesus ...	1343
MAURICE CASEY
The Quest for the Historical Jesus in Postmodern Perspective: A Hypothetical Argument .....	1377
MOISÉS MAYORDOMO AND PETER-BEN SMIT
Why Study the Historical Jesus? .....	1411
COLIN BROWN

PART THREE

PERSISTING ISSUES ADJACENT TO THE JESUS QUEST

The Context of Jesus: Jewish and/or Hellenistic? .....	1441
STANLEY E. PORTER
The Transmission of the Jesus Tradition .....	1465
SAMUEL BYRSKOG
Pharisees, Sadducees, Essenes, Herodians .....	1495
ÉTIENNE NODET
The Son of Man in Ancient Judaism .....	1545
JOHN J. COLLINS

Jewish Apocalyptic and Apocalypticism .....	1569
CRISPIN FLETCHER-LOUIS
Anti-Judaism and the New Testament .....	1609
LUKE TIMOTHY JOHNSON
The Writings of Josephus: Their Significance for New Testament Study .....	1639
STEVE MASON
Rabbinic Writings in New Testament Research .....	1687
DAVID INSTONE-BREWER
Synagogue and Sanhedrin in the First Century .....	1723
LESTER L. GRABBE
Echoes from the Wilderness: The Historical John the Baptist ....	1747
KNUT BACKHAUS
Historiographical Literature in the New Testament Period (1st and 2nd centuries CE) .....	1787
EVE-MARIE BECKER

VOLUME 3

THE HISTORICAL JESUS

Introduction: The Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus in Perspective .....	xv
TOM HOLMÉN AND STANLEY E. PORTER

PART ONE

JESUS TRADITION IN INDIVIDUAL DOCUMENTS

The Historical Jesus in the Gospel of Mark .....	1821
JOANNA DEWEY
Jesus Tradition in non-Markan Material Common to Matthew and Luke .....	1853
CHRISTOPHER TUCKETT
The Special Material in Matthew's Gospel .....	1875
DONALD SENIOR, C.P.
Luke and Acts .....	1901
JOHN NOLLAND
The Non-Synoptic Jesus: An Introduction to John, Paul, Thomas, and Other Outsiders of the Jesus Quest .....	1933
MICHAEL LABAHN

Jesus Tradition in the Gospel of John .....	1997
D. MOODY SMITH
Jesus Tradition in the Letters of the New Testament .....	2041
DAVID WENHAM
The Thomas-Jesus Connection .....	2059
EDWIN K. BROADHEAD
Traditions about Jesus in Apocryphal Gospels (with the Exception of the Gospel of Thomas) .....	2081
TOBIAS NICKLAS
Jesus Tradition in Early Patristic Writings .....	2119
RIEMER ROUKEMA
Jesus Tradition in Classical and Jewish Writings .....	2149
ROBERT E. VAN VOORST

PART TWO

FUNDAMENTALLY ABOUT JESUS

The Historicity of Jesus: How Do We Know That Jesus Existed? .....	2183
SAMUEL BYRSKOG
Background I: Jesus of History and the Topography of the Holy Land .....	2213
JAMES H. CHARLESWORTH
Background II: (Some) Literary Documents .....	2243
MARTIN MCNAMARA
Background III: The Social and Political Climate in which Jesus of Nazareth Preached .....	2291
WOLFGANG STEGEMANN
The Chronology of Jesus .....	2315
HAROLD W. HOEHNER
The Birth of Jesus .....	2361
RICHARD T. FRANCE
The Death of Jesus .....	2383
JOEL B. GREEN
The Resurrection of Jesus .....	2409
PHEME PERKINS
Family, Friends, and Foes .....	2433
JOEL B. GREEN

The Language(s) Jesus Spoke .....	2455
STANLEY E. PORTER
The Self-Understanding of Jesus .....	2473
MATHIAS KREPLIN
The Message of Jesus I: Miracles, Continuing Controversies .....	2517
GRAHAM H. TWELFTREE
The Message of Jesus II: Parables .....	2549
ARLAND J. HULTGREN

PART THREE

JESUS AND THE LEGACY OF ISRAEL

Jesus and God .....	2575
MARIANNE MEYE THOMPSON
Jesus and The Sabbath .....	2597
SVEN-OLAV BACK
Jesus and the Temple .....	2635
JOSTEIN ÅDNA
Jesus and the Shema .....	2677
KIM HUAT TAN
Jesus and the Purity Paradigm .....	2709
TOM HOLMÉN
Jesus and the Law .....	2745
WILLIAM LOADER
Jesus and the Holy Land .....	2773
KAREN J. WENELL
Jesus and Sinners and Outcasts .....	2801
BRUCE CHILTON
Jesus and Israel's Eschatological Constitution .....	2835
STEVEN M. BRYAN
Jesus, Satan, and Company .....	2855
DARRELL BOCK
Jesus and Apocalypticism .....	2877
CRISPIN FLETCHER-LOUIS

VOLUME 4

INDIVIDUAL STUDIES

Introduction: The Handbook for Study of the Historical Jesus in Perspective .....	xv
TOM HOLMÉN AND STANLEY E. PORTER
The “Dark Side of Power”—Beelzebul: Manipulated or Manipulator? Reflections on the History of a Conflict in the Traces Left in the Memory of its Narrators .....	2911
MICHAEL LABAHN
Did Jesus Break the Fifth (Fourth) Commandment? .....	2947
PETER BALLA
Did Jesus Stay at Bethsaida? Arguments from Ancient Texts and Archaeology for Bethsaida and et-Tell .....	2973
HEINZ-WOLFGANG KUHN
Flawed Heroes and Stories Jesus Told: The One About a Man Wanting to Kill .....	3023
CHARLES W. HEDRICK
Jesus and Magic: The Question of the Miracles .....	3057
BERND KOLLMANN
Jesus and the Greeks: A Semiotic Reading of John 12:20–28 .....	3087
JOSEPH PATHRAPANKAL
Jesus and the Synagogue .....	3105
GRAHAM H. TWELFTREE
Jesus and the Ten Words .....	3135
HERMUT LOEHR
Jesus as Moving Image: The Public Responsibility of the Historical Jesus Scholar in the Age of Film .....	3155
CLIVE MARSH
Jesus’ “Magic” from a Theodicean Perspective .....	3179
TOM HOLMÉN
Jesus’ “Rhetoric”: The Rise and Fall of “The Kingdom of God” .....	3201
JAMES M. ROBINSON
Jewish Galilee .....	3221
ETIENNE NODET
On Avoiding Bothersome Busyness: Q/Luke 12:22–31 in its Greco-Roman Context .....	3245
GERALD DOWNING

Poverty and Wealth in Jesus and the Jesus Tradition .....	3269
HEINZ GIESEN
The Question of the Baptists' Disciples on Fasting (Matt 9:14–17; Mark 2:18–22; Luke 5:33–39) .....	3305
RAINER RIESNER
Riddles, Wit, and Wisdom .....	3349
TOM THATCHER
Three Questions about the Life of Jesus .....	3373
CHRISTIAN-BERNARD AMPHOUX
Why Was Jesus Not Born in Nazareth? .....	3409
ARMAND PUIG I TÀRRECH
Words of Jesus in Paul: On the Theology and Praxis of the Jesus Tradition .....	3437
PETR POKORNÝ
Index of Ancient Sources .....	3469
Index of Modern Authors .....	3605

INTRODUCTION

THE HANDBOOK FOR THE STUDY OF THE HISTORICAL JESUS IN PERSPECTIVE

TOM HOLMÉN AND STANLEY E. PORTER

A hundred years ago, Albert Schweitzer gathered the bulk of the most important (mostly German) Jesus research done during the preceding two centuries (the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries) within one cover and made an assessment of it. Today, to write a summa historica of Jesus studies is not an undertaking that one person could embark on and realistically hope to accomplish (not even two people), but requires a collaboration of a legio of the best minds from across many countries and cultures. Albert Schweitzer's Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung<sup>1</sup> marked a significant milestone in historical Jesus scholarship, a movement that has continued in various forms and in diverse ways, but in all events unabated, until today. As a result, in a 1994 article, James Charlesworth, who himself has been actively involved in the recent expansion of historical Jesus study, asserted that historical Jesus study was expanding with "chaotic creativity."<sup>2</sup> While an apt and appropriate description of the condition of the times, this characterization is all the more accurate today, fifteen years later. Since its latest renaissance in the 1980s,<sup>3</sup> historical Jesus study has continued to expand, drawing into its broadening scope more and more scholars of the New Testament and cognate areas. There is an abundance of Jesus studies today that displays an almost overwhelming diversity of methods, approaches, hypotheses, assumptions, and results. While creativity and fecundity are theoretically

---

<sup>1</sup> A. Schweitzer, Von Reimarus zu Wrede: Eine Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1906). The second edition was simply entitled: Die Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung (1913). The English translation was entitled: The Quest for the Historical Jesus: A Critical Study of its Progress from Reimarus to Wrede, trans. W. Montgomery, with a preface by F. C. Burkitt (London: Adam and Charles Black, 1910).

<sup>2</sup> J. H. Charlesworth, "Jesus Research Expands with Chaotic Creativity," in Images of Jesus Today, ed. J. H. Charlesworth and W. P. Weaver (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1994), 1–41.

<sup>3</sup> See M. J. Borg, "A Renaissance in Jesus Studies," TheoIT 45 (1988): 280–292.

to be welcomed, chaotic creativity works against the scholarly pursuit of orderly understanding, and the sheer mass of material threatens to overwhelm even the heartiest of participants in the quest. However, in some instances such creativity can spur on and nourish various forms of enquiry that result in unpredictable and unplanned results. The future of historical Jesus study rests with the community of scholars being able to harness this chaotic creativity to its service, and to create order out of a morass of growing detail.

What are the purposes of Jesus research? The first one is clearly an abiding academic purpose. This has always been regarded as important and has, together with the latest renaissance of Jesus study, only grown in importance. In fact, if “academic” and “historical” can be seen to correlate, many scholars would claim that this is what the study of Jesus today is all about. According to many representative Jesus questers, a main characteristic of current Jesus research is that it is being spurred and guided by an outspoken historical interest. Indeed, Jesus lies at the juncture of many interests and phenomena that are crucial to understanding great lines of historical development and that form the basis of understanding the world today. There is therefore no doubt about the great historical and academic value of Jesus research. However, several other purposes, motivations, and aspirations obviously feed into the historical pursuit of Jesus. Among these are religious, political, cultural, artistic, fictional, romantic, psychological, financial, apologetic, and simply personal reasons to engage in conversing about Jesus of Nazareth. We merely state this as an observable fact: such purposes for Jesus research exist and are being pursued in practice. Unfortunately, sometimes scholars too easily classify such purposes as either well- or ill-founded. In the post-colonial, post-Einsteinian, post-modern, post-structural (some say even post-human) etc. world of ours, who can be so clear as to be able to tell the difference between relevant and irrelevant motivations, not to speak of labeling them as either good or bad? Nevertheless, in all this it is vital to genuinely retain the concepts of historical Jesus and historical Jesus research around which the variegated conversation centers and revolves. How this happens and is realized may not be an easy or altogether straightforward thing to do.

The Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus (HSHJ) was designed to be one, important means of handling both the growing abundance and the increasing diversity of Jesus scholarship. Such is not an easy task, as we the editors have grown to appreciate in the course of creating this set of volumes. Putting the diversity on display in a controlled, manageable, and understandable fashion, while acknowledging the numerous and diverse major issues, and ensuring that as many as possible of the important adjacent themes are recognized, has been a significant task. The HSHJ seeks to offer a convenient, even if still circuitous, route through the maze of current historical Jesus research, so that scholars and other interested parties can appreciate the broad and diverse spectrum of current opinion.

There have been a number of recent efforts to survey the history of historical Jesus scholarship, which we have taken into account in planning these volumes. Some of these publications have included individual essays that try to cover the range of major topics, although no effort to date has included as many as this set of volumes.<sup>4</sup> Several of these studies are retrospective accounts that anthologize past statements of significance in the study of the historical Jesus, but they lack the contemporary coordinating force of the HSHJ.<sup>5</sup> Even those publications that attempt to address the contemporary issues in historical Jesus research in a coordinated fashion, because of their encyclopedic nature, are unable to provide the kind of depth and even breadth of exposure that these volumes contain.<sup>6</sup> Whatever merits such previous volumes may have, and they have many, none of them is designed to accomplish the same goals as the Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus.

There are many distinguishable features of the HSHJ. This collection of four volumes of essays first of all seeks to be thorough and inclusive. We realize that there are always other opinions that could be included in volumes such as these, but we have tried to solicit and elicit as much of that diverse opinion as was available for publication. We want this collection to serve, not only as a historical encapsulation of the topics of their day, but as a worthy expression of the range of viable thought currently available in historical Jesus studies.

Besides the inclusive nature of these volumes, we have sought for HSHJ to be international in scope, not simply for the sake of diversity,

---

<sup>4</sup> E.g. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans, eds., Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluations of the State of Current Research, NTTS 19 (Leiden: Brill, 1994).

<sup>5</sup> See, e.g., H. K. McArthur, ed., In Search of the Historical Jesus (New York: Scribners, 1969); G. W. Dawes, ed., The Historical Jesus Quest: A Foundational Anthology (Leiden: Deo, 1999); C. A. Evans, ed., The Historical Jesus: Critical Concepts in Religious Studies, 4 vols. (London: Routledge, 2004); J. D. G. Dunn and S. McKnight, eds., The Historical Jesus in Recent Research, Sources for Biblical and Theological Study 10 (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2005).

<sup>6</sup> E.g. C. A. Evans, ed., Encyclopedia of the Historical Jesus (London: Routledge, 2007).

but so that multiple voices can be ably represented in the discussion. The approximately one-hundred contributors to this project come from around twenty different countries. Some countries no doubt are represented more heavily than others, and some other important nationalities may be under-represented or not represented at all. This was not by design, as our purpose from the start has been to try to free the discussion of Jesus from regional or local agendas and schools of thought.

Besides the multiplicity of voices from a wide range of places and people, in the HSHJ we have sought to free study of the historical Jesus from the trammels of a variety of other restraints. We have been conscious that study of Jesus in the past has been directly linked to particular forms and contents of higher education, and even specific methodologies, and that such study has often gone hand-in-hand with particular religious, cultural or even political traditions and histories. This set of volumes has been created to move beyond, or perhaps even rise above, such artificially imposed constraints. As a result, though ideologies will no doubt be present in the individual contributions, the volumes as a whole are not reacting or responding to any particular local or even nationally determined situation with regard to historical Jesus study. Our primary criterion in selecting and welcoming the contributors has been their expertise and their addressing a topic of relevance. Despite our best efforts, there is no doubt that most of the contributors are still “white male western Europeans and European-Americans” (as Richard Horsley states).<sup>7</sup> We accept this comment, while acknowledging also that our best efforts were put into attempts not to fall victim to this as an inevitable conclusion. Nevertheless, it is probably a realistic observation of the situation that prevails in historical Jesus studies to this day. Whether it will be different in the future, we must wait and see.

The efforts above have been undertaken so that we could focus these volumes on what we consider the most important elements in current study of the historical Jesus. In order to do this, we have divided the essays into four structured volumes.

As a result of this process of assessment, what became evident was that one of the most important sources of continued diversity in historical Jesus study is the element of methodological divergence. Methodological diversity entails the formulation of varied and disparate conscious approaches to the study of Jesus. Questions of method are inevitably confronted at the outset of any scientific or historical investigation, and usually indicate the significant parting of the ways between differing approaches to the same body of data. Consequently, volume one of the HSHJ is dedicated to questions of method. Realizing and being knowledgeable of the different methodological starting points in historical Jesus study not only facilitates one's determination and understanding of the results, but also gives important and necessary insight into the reasons for the results and their implications. In other words, attention to method forces us to ask the question of why it is that a particular scholar comes to a specific set of conclusions, as opposed to a different set of conclusions. In this regard, the first volume of HSHJ itself speaks volumes about historical Jesus research. In this volume, we have attempted to assemble many of the world's leading experts on methodological questions regarding the study of Jesus. They present their approaches to study of the historical Jesus as a means of introducing us to the fundamental issues at stake. This is not to deny that there is some challenging reading to be had in this volume, but within this one volume the reader has easier access than before to the range of methods currently at play in historical Jesus studies. By using this volume, scholars and students alike will be able learn about methods with which they are less familiar, compare the major features of these methods, and determine how the varied hypotheses about the historical figure of Jesus are rooted in methodological choices made at the early stages of thinking and research.

---

<sup>7</sup> See his article in volume one.

The first volume is, therefore, divided into two parts. The first part includes a wide range of distinct methodological statements by advocates of those methods. This part encompasses the methods that are distinct to historical Jesus study as it has been practiced over the last twenty to thirty years. It is here that we gain further insight into the approaches that have been adopted by a wide range of scholars who have had influence within historical Jesus study, as they have tried to define the nature and characteristics of the study and its results. Part two of this volume extends the range of methodologies to the interaction between historical Jesus study and methods that have proven themselves in other areas of New Testament and cognates studies. Some of these are the traditional methods of biblical study, while others are recent innovations influenced by the rise of various types of social-science criticism. The interface of Jesus study and these methods has provided a range of results that help to ensure that the study of Jesus will not soon grow quiescent.

The second volume of HSHJ focuses on the history and future of historical Jesus research, by identifying many if not most of the specific issues of contention that have been raised in the broad and long history of Jesus study. This volume is divided into three parts. The first part deals with the notion of quests for the historical Jesus. One of the points of continued contention in study of Jesus is not only whether there are periods in such study, but how current study relates to previous study, in terms of both its methods and its results. Here various authors address the relation of Jesus study to the various quests that have been proposed. The second part of the volume brings to the fore questions that are being asked in the contemporary climate of historical Jesus studies. These include the questions that are currently and recurrently at the forefront of discussion, often suggesting in their questions an alternative to the course that previous research has taken. Part three of this volume addresses some of the perennial topics in Jesus research. In some ways, these are issues that are either assumed or regularly taken into account in formulating various hypotheses about Jesus. They form the convenient and necessary intellectual background for pursuing historical Jesus studies.

The third volume of HSHJ brings Jesus himself as a historical figure directly into the discussion. There are three parts in this volume as well. The first part treats Jesus in regard to primary documents of the ancient world, such as the canonical gospels, other portions of the New Testament, and non-canonical works. The second part of this volume takes the elements of the life of Jesus and exposes them to rigorous critical and scholarly scrutiny. Rather than examine Jesus in terms of how he is depicted in one of the biblical books (as in the previous section of this volume) or in terms of a particular issue, this section dissects the life of Jesus in terms of its logical and necessary components, from issues of historicity to his teaching and message, and many if not most places in between. It is in studies such as these that one realizes the importance of the previous studies and approaches for the explication of these subject areas. These topics bring to bear the variety of issues previously discussed. The third part of this volume relates Jesus to the legacy of Israel. Jesus' Jewish roots and relations have long been an essential item of discussion and contention in historical Jesus studies. In this part, various key elements of his relationship to Israel are scrutinized. The result of this set of studies is to place Jesus firmly within his Jewish context, a desideratum of much recent historical Jesus scholarship.

The fourth and final volume of HSHJ is a collection of individual studies by a range of scholars. It is a positive comment on the state of current historical Jesus study that, even with the best planning and intention, it is difficult, if not impossible, to plan and anticipate all of the necessary topics for such a comprehensive study. Therefore, we have designed this fourth volume to include important studies that we have solicited and have had submitted for which there was no other place in the volume, but that warranted a position in a compendium of scholarship such as this handbook attempts to be. There is a wide range of valuable research to be found in this fourth volume. Some of the studies explore areas for which there has been very little previous Jesus research but in which the author shows there is a lamentable lacking and oversight in the discipline. Others of the studies take topics on the fringe of either Jesus studies or contemporary culture and try to bridge the two in creative and insightful ways. Finally, some of the studies are designed to focus on particular and specific issues that would otherwise have been overlooked in the course of this study, but that a perceptive scholar realized would make a contribution to the final product.

The results of a project such as this are many and varied. We do not doubt that many of the significant contributions to scholarship found in these volumes will establish themselves as standards in the field and continue to have warranted influence on the study of the historical Jesus. Such studies may well be found in any or all of the volumes. We further believe that there are a number of essays that will have uncovered or discovered or even re-discovered insights that have been lost or lost sight of or not yet sighted, and that will bring these into consideration on the broader canvas of historical Jesus studies. There are other essays within these volumes that have broken some boundaries and will establish themselves as new and innovative ways forward in the discussion. The problem is that it is not easy to tell which essays are which, and what the significance of each individual contribution will be. We are confident, however, that these volumes contain, as much as is possible within the parameters of such a project, a responsible and representative, and in some cases even forthright or contrarian, presentation of the current state of historical Jesus scholarship. Such scholarship is the backbone of a project such as this, and is a mainstay of how one approaches contemporary New Testament scholarship. There are essays within this collection that will prove to be seminal for study of the historical Jesus, as they force both sympathetic and unsympathetic readers to contemplate issues and perspectives in ways that were unanticipated. Such scholarship helps to pave the way forward for further research. Its place of final repose cannot be predicted or estimated.

THE “DARK SIDE OF POWER”—BEELZEBUL:
MANIPULATED OR MANIPULATOR? REFLECTIONS ON THE HISTORY OF A CONFLICT IN THE TRACES LEFT IN THE MEMORY OF ITS NARRATORS

MICHAEL LABAHN

Dedicated to the Memory of the late Professor Martin Hengel<sup>1</sup>

1. Preliminary Reflections from the Perspectives of the History of Research

The multiple attestations of texts with agreements in contents and linguistic convergences in different documents pose among others two serious questions. First, is there a potential literary relationship between the texts? And secondly, can we trace the paths along which they may have been transmitted? In order to answer these questions in the field of early Christian texts, and especially of the literature about Jesus, scholars have recourse to various theological and historical models which offer insight into how the traditions acquired oral and written form. The “synoptic question” and the history of the models proposed for its solution offer eloquent examples of how a variety of antecedent historical and theological judgments leads to a variety of explanatory models.<sup>2</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> At the invitation of Professor Jens Schröter and Professor Joseph Verheyden, an earlier version of this essay was read at the 58th General Meeting of the Studiorum Novi Testamenti Societas in Bonn 2003 in the seminar on “Current Studies in the Synoptic Gospels.” This essay is dedicated to Professor Martin Hengel, who emphatically recommended that it be published.—The manuscript of this article was already finished in August 2005. Due to constraints of time I was only able to update some bibliographical references [English translation: Brian McNeil.].

<sup>2</sup> For overviews of this subject, cf. D. L. Dungan, A History of the Synoptic Problem: The Canon, the Text, the Composition and the Interpretation of the Gospels, ABRL (New York: Doubleday, 1999); J. S. Kloppenborg, Excavating Q: The History and Setting of the Sayings Gospel (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 2000), 11–54; W. Schmithals, Einleitung in die drei ersten Evangelien, GLB (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1985); in short: M. Labahn, “Historical Criticism (or Gospel as Sources),” in Encyclopedia of the Historical Jesus, ed. C. A. Evans (New York, London: Routledge, 2008), 280–286; idem, “Der Gekom-

In the context of the “synoptic question,” the tradition about the Beelzebul controversy in Mark 3:22–30 and Q 11:14–23 is one of those texts which are found first in the Gospel of Mark and secondly in Matthew and Luke—Mark’s recipients—in the literary context where both made use of the Q document.<sup>3</sup> This is why texts such as the Beelzebul controversy play a classic role as evidence in favor of the two-sources theory, when this is chosen as a working hypothesis.<sup>4</sup>

Until very recently, a number of attempts have been made to interpret the very small but striking field of double attestations as evidence of Mark’s dependence on Q;<sup>5</sup> we may mention here D. R. Catchpole,<sup>6</sup> H. T. Fleddermann,<sup>7</sup> J. Lambrecht,<sup>8</sup> B. L. Mack,<sup>9</sup> W. Schenk,<sup>10</sup> and mene als Wirderkommenden” (Habilitationsschrift, University of Halle, 2008), 21–33. U. Schnelle, “Synoptische Frage,” RGG<sup>4</sup> 7 (2004) 1978–1984.

---

<sup>3</sup> It suffices here to refer to U. Schnelle, Einleitung in das Neue Testament, 6th ed., UTB 1830 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2007), 202–203.

<sup>4</sup> I refer here to the presentation of the justification and the form of the two-sources theory by Schnelle, Einleitung, 190–214. For critical assessments of this theory, see Labahn, “Der Gekommene,” 27–33.

<sup>5</sup> For older scholarship, cf. the overviews by R. Laufen, Die Doppelüberlieferungen der Logienquelle und des Markusevangeliums, BBB 54 (Königstein/Taunus: Hanstein, 1980), 70–71; also J. Schüling, Studien zum Verhältnis von Logienquelle und Markusevangelium, FzB 65 (Würzburg: Echter, 1991), 170–172; F. Neirynek, “Recent Developments in the Study of Q,” in idem, Evangelica II. 1981–1991. Collected Essays, BETL 99 (Leuven: Peeters, 1991), 409–464; Schnelle, Einleitung, 233–234; C. M. Tuckett, “Mark and Q,” in The Synoptic Gospels: Source Criticism and the New Literary Criticism, ed. C. Focant, BETL 110 (Leuven: Peeters 1993), 149–175.

<sup>6</sup> D. R. Catchpole, “The Beginning of Q: A Proposal,” in idem, The Quest for Q (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1993), 60–78.

<sup>7</sup> H. T. Fleddermann, Mark and Q: A Study of the Overlap Texts (with an Assessment by F. Neirynek), BETL 122 (Leuven: Peeters, 1995); idem, “Mark’s Use of Q: The Beelzebul Controversy and the Cross Saying,” in Jesus, Mark and Q: The Teaching of Jesus and its Earliest Records, eds. M. Labahn and A. Schmidt, JSNTSup 214 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001), 17–33; idem, Q: A Reconstruction and Commentary, Biblical Tools and Studies 1 (Leuven: Peeters, 2005), 180–183.

<sup>8</sup> J. Lambrecht, “Q-Influence on Mark 8,34–9,1,” in Logia. Les paroles de Jésus. Festschrift J. Coppens, ed. J. Delobel, BETL 59 (Leuven: Peeters, 1982), 277–304; idem, “The Great Commandment Pericope and Q,” in The Gospel Behind the Gospels: Current Studies on Q, ed. R. Piper, NovTSup. 75 (Leiden: Brill 1995), 73–96; idem, “Scandal and Salt. Is Mark Dependent on Q in 9,42–50?,” in Forschungen zum Neuen Testament und seiner Umwelt. Festschrift A. Fuchs, ed. C. Niemand, Linzer philosophisch-theologische Beiträge 7 (Frankfurt a.M.: P. Lang, 2002), 223–234; on Q 11:14–16 and Mk 3:22–24: idem, “The Relatives of Jesus in Mark,” NovT 15 (1974): 241–258.

<sup>9</sup> B. L. Mack, “Q and the Gospel of Mark: Revising Christian Origins,” Semeia 55 (1991): 15–39; idem, The Lost Gospel: The Book of Q and Christian Origins (New York: HarperSanFrancisco, 1994), 177–179, etc.

<sup>10</sup> W. Schenk, “Der Einfluß der Logienquelle auf das Markusevangelium,” ZNW 79 (1979): 141–165.

W. Schmithals (in the framework of his independent model of the sources of Mark).<sup>11</sup> For various reasons, critical evaluations of these proposals have disputed the hypothesis of Markan dependence on Q. For one thing, only a very small amount of Q texts belong to the material which was allegedly received by Mark and the criteria guiding Mark's alleged selection of material from Q are matters of debate;<sup>12</sup> and besides this, there are no traces in Mark of the (final) redaction of Q material.<sup>13</sup> Further, the relative date of the traditions which have been received can be employed as evidence against dependence of Mark on Q, since the Q materials are partly later than those in Mark.<sup>14</sup>

The literary-critical approach is however not the only possible methodological access route to the phenomenon "Mark and Q." Jens Schröter emphasizes this point very strongly when he says that Q has a "Verwandtschaft mit Mk in traditions-geschichtlicher und kompositorischer Hinsicht" ("a tradition-historical and compositional relationship to Mark") and that this relationship "kann dabei als Indiz dafür gewertet werden, daß beide Entwürfe auf einem gemeinsamen Fundament zur Interpretation der Wirksamkeit Jesu aufbauen" (can be read as evidence that both works build on a common basis for the interpretation of the activity of Jesus).<sup>15</sup> In the case of the double tradition of the

<sup>11</sup> Schmithals, Einleitung, 403, etc.; idem, Das Evangelium nach Markus: Kapitel 1–9,1, ÖTBK 2.1 (Gütersloh: Gütersloher Verlagshaus und Würzburg: Echter Verlag, 1979), 57, etc.

<sup>12</sup> I. Dunderberg, "Q and the Beginning of Mark," NTS 41 (1995): 501–511.

<sup>13</sup> Cf. e.g. Schüling, Studien, 174, drawing on Neiryneck, "Developments," 425.

<sup>14</sup> Laufen, Doppelüberlieferungen, 385.—In view of more recent proposals about dating the texts, one could also consider the possibility of dependence in the other direction: P. Hoffmann, "QR und der Menschensohn: Eine vorläufige Skizze," in idem, Tradition und Situation: Studien zur Jesusüberlieferung in der Logienquelle und den synoptischen Evangelien, NTA 28 (Münster: Aschendorff, 1995), 243–278; M. Myllykoski, "The Social History of Q and the Jewish War," in Symbols and Strata: Essays on the Sayings Gospel Q, ed. R. Uro, SFEG 65 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1996), 143–199. If Q is dated to the 70's, Mark cannot be dependent on Q (at least in the form of its final redaction). However, critical objections have been made to these proposed datings.

<sup>15</sup> J. Schröter, Jesus und die Anfänge der Christologie: Methodologische und exegetische Studien zu den Ursprüngen des christlichen Glaubens, BThSt 47 (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 2001), 152 (first published as "The Son of Man as the Representative of God's Kingdom: On the Interpretation of Jesus in Mark and Q," in Jesus, Mark and Q, eds. Labahn and Schmidt, 34–68, at 47); cf. recently idem, "Die Bedeutung der Q-Überlieferungen für die Interpretation der frühen Jesusüberlieferung," ZNW 94 (2003): 38–67: "Die Beobachtungen zum Anfang von Q legen es vielmehr nahe, mit einer partiellen Überlappung von Mk und Q zu rechnen, die bei Mt und Lk notwendigerweise nur partiell in Erscheinung tritt" (Our observations about the beginning of Beelzebul controversy, this leads to the question whether the literary-critical models of dependence adequately explain the variants. We must consider the possibility that roots in a common tradition-historical milieu can generate the formation of comparable narrative or rhetorical-argumentative texts. My thesis is that the parallels and the differences between the two narratives point to a common core of tradition which has generated at least two "Gedächtnisspuren."<sup>16</sup> Despite clear differences, these traces in the memory also reveal parallel developments and analogous structures in the controversy. Accordingly, this essay is a further contribution to the study of the path taken by the remembrance of the Jesus tradition in early Christianity.<sup>17</sup>

2. Preliminary Methodological Reflections

We must distinguish the question whether Mark knew and used the document Q from the question whether the earliest evangelist received traditions which were also given a place in Q. The matter becomes more complex if we assume a literary process of growth in Q,<sup>18</sup> since Q suggest that we should assume a partial overlapping between Mark and Q, which necessarily appears only in part in Matthew and Luke).

---

<sup>16</sup> This concept (German: Gedächtnisspur) is not employed in the present essay in the technical sense of the "engram," i.e. "flüchtigen wie dauerhaften Veränderungen im Gehirn, die sich aus der neuronalen Codierung eines Ereignisses ergeben" (ET: "the changes in the brain, whether transient or lasting, which result from the codification of an event by the neurons"; M. Korte, "Engramm," in Gedächtnis und Erinnerung: Ein interdisziplinäres Lexikon, eds. N. Pethes and J. Ruchatz, re 55636 [Hamburg: Rowohlt Taschenbuchverlag, 2001], 142). I employ this concept metaphorically for the recollection anchored in the individual's memory of an event which has been personally experienced or perceived; the relationships between the two ways of employing the concept are not fortuitous. For fundamental reflections, I refer here to the comparable use of this formulation by J. Assmann, Moses der Ägypter: Entzifferung einer Gedächtnisspur (München: Hanser, 1998), 35 (on the term itself).

<sup>17</sup> On this, cf. C. Breytenbach, "MNHMONEYEIN: Das 'Sich-erinnern' in der urchristlichen Überlieferung—Die Bethanienepisode (Mk 14,3–9/Jn 12,1–8) als Beispiel," in John and the Synoptics, ed. A. Denaux, BETL 101 (Leuven: Peeters, 1992), 548–557.

<sup>18</sup> The model for a literary process of growth of the Q document that is widely in scholarly use (especially in the USA: cf. M. Ebner, "Kynische Jesusinterpretation—'disciplined exaggeration'? Eine Anfrage," BZ.NF 40 [1996]: 93–100, at 93) is that of J.S. Kloppenborg, The Formation of Q: Trajectories in Ancient Wisdom Collections, Studies in Antiquity and Christianity (Harrisburg: Trinity Press International, 1999); idem, Excavating Q, 143–145, distinguishing three layers by a stratigraphical analysis. For an overview, cf. e.g. Schnelle, Einleitung, 227–228. For critical questions, cf. e.g. J. Schröter, Erinnerung an Jesu Worte: Studien zur Rezeption der Logienüberlieferung in Markus, Q und Thomas, WMANT 76 (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag,

Mark need not necessarily have had recourse to the last stage of Q. In the latter case, the description of the relationship depends on antecedent literary-critical decisions regarding the pre-history of Q. The question whether the tradition about the Beelzebul controversy grew in stages should not be dismissed; but methodological clarity requires us to begin by concentrating on the literary final stages of the two texts, each of which follows its own model in the presentation of the Jesus tradition. The structure of Q, which is oriented to the tradition of logia, begins with the announcement by the Baptist of the one who is to come and ends by speaking of the return of the Son of Man who has come.<sup>19</sup> Mark's presentation is oriented to the passion, and the axis on which it is structured is the predictions of Jesus' suffering.<sup>20</sup>

The investigation of a literary relationship between texts endeavors to define intertextuality in the narrower sense of the term. This differs from the originally broad concept of intertextuality, which refers to a universal cosmos of texts that is brought into existence by readers;<sup>21</sup> intertextuality in the narrower sense looks at the process of reception in its orientation to production, and investigates how an earlier text is received. This involves the methodological question of markings, i.e. signals which point to the work of reception.<sup>22</sup> In addition to explicit signals of reception (e.g., "It is written in 'A'"), linguistic and

---

1997), 450, etc.; Hoffmann, "QR und der Menschensohn," 268–269; Labahn, "Der Gekommene," 106–107.

<sup>19</sup> Cf. Labahn, "Der Gekommene," passim.

<sup>20</sup> Schröter, Jesus; idem, "Bedeutung," is right to draw attention to the theological and Christological parallels between the document Q and the Gospel of Mark. Nevertheless, the total construction of the two works reveals that they are oriented to different end-points, which are expressed clearly in the works themselves.

<sup>21</sup> As is well known, this concept was coined by Julia Kristeva, Semeiotike: Recherches pour une sémanalyse (Paris: Editions du Seuil, 1969). She envisaged an open world of relationships between written texts. The concept was taken up by Roland Barthes: there is no original text, but everything is reception, and this is why intertextuality is created by the reader. Cf. the introduction by G. Allen, Intertextuality, The New Critical Idiom (London and New York: Routledge, 2000); cf. also S. Alkier, "Intertextualität—Annäherung an ein texttheoretisches Paradigma," in Heiligkeit und Herrschaft. Intertextuelle Studien zu Heiligkeitsvorstellungen und zu Psalm 110, ed. D. Sänger, BThSt 55 (Neukirchen-Vluyn; Neukirchener Verlag, 2003), 1–26; B. Kowalski, "Intertextualität als exegetische Methode," ThGl 96 (2006): 354–361, and the bibliography compiled by M. Schneider in Die Bibel im Dialog der Schriften: Konzepte intertextueller Bibellektüre, ed. S. Alkier and R. B. Hays, Neutestamentliche Entwürfe zur Theologie 10 (Tübingen: Francke, 2005), 257–264.

<sup>22</sup> On the question of "marking," cf. the fundamental work by J. Helbig, Intertextualität und Markierung: Untersuchungen zur Systematik und Funktion der Signalisierung von Intertextualität, Beiträge zur neueren Literaturgeschichte 3.141 (Heidelberg: Winter, 1996).

terminological agreements, accompanied by parallels in the contents of the texts, indicate a possible reception. But although linguistic identity is one marker of reception, it does not provide conclusive proof of a literary relationship; the structural analogy is a particularly strong argument in favor of oral transmission, appealing to the psychology of human memory.<sup>23</sup>

“Wenn mündliche Texte nicht gerade gesprochen werden, bestehen sie nur in der Erinnerung derer, die sie sprachen oder hörten.”<sup>24</sup> This is a “kognitive/gedankliche Repräsentation des Textinhaltes im Gedächtnis des Hörers”: Wenn der Hörer nun aber zum Erzähler wird, greift er nicht auf die von ihm damals gehörte Phonemkette zurück. Diese hat er nicht mehr im Ohr. Er hat sie aber beim Hören in eine semantische Textbasis, die situationell organisiert ist, umgesetzt. Er greift auf diese kognitive Repräsentation in seinem eigenen Gedächtnis zurück und formuliert mit Hilfe seiner gedanklichen Vorstellung der Situation, von der die Erzählung handelte, eine neue Erzählung, die seinem neuen kommunikativen Kontext entspricht.<sup>25</sup> Out of this inventory, the narrator formulates a new narrative which is in keeping with his own new horizon of communication. Differences and similarities are due both to the sequence of the “plot” in the narrative and to the specific parameters within which it is narrated. The structure of the “plot” also includes the “actors” and the names which they are given. We must also assume that some linguistic elements will not vary, because it is only in this way that the individual character of what is remembered can be “stored.”<sup>26</sup>

---

<sup>23</sup> Breytenbach, “MNHMONEYEIN,” 548–557, emphasizes the importance of this aspect in assessing the relationship between parallels in the synoptics and in John.

<sup>24</sup> Ibid., 554. ET: “When oral texts are not actually being spoken, they exist only in the memory of those who spoke them or heard them.”

<sup>25</sup> Ibid., 554–555. ET: “cognitive/intellectual representation of the contents of the text in the memory of the hearer”: “when the hearer then becomes a narrator, he does not have recourse to the chain of phonemes which he once heard on a particular occasion in the past, since he no longer has these in his ear. When he heard them, he transmuted them into a semantic textual basis which is organized in a situational manner. He has recourse to this cognitive representation in his own memory, and uses his intellectual picture of the situation described in the narrative to help him formulate a new narrative which is in keeping with the new communicative context in which he finds himself.”

<sup>26</sup> On the question of the mutability and the constancy of non-literary and literary tradition, cf. also M. Labahn, Jesus als Lebensspender: Untersuchungen zu einer Geschichte der johanneischen Tradition anhand ihrer Wundgeschichten, BZNW 98 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1999), 89–91.

One further aspect can help, when clear markers of intertextuality are not found. Both the Gospel of Mark and the document Q must be understood as literary compositions. This is widely acknowledged in the case of Mark, so that scholars understand him not only as a collector, but as a theologian and/or narrator.<sup>27</sup> The same tendency can be discerned in the case of Q,<sup>28</sup> e.g. when J. S. Kloppenborg investigates its argumentative structure,<sup>29</sup> E. Sevenich-Bax studies its narrative structures,<sup>30</sup> or A. Järvinen looks at its plot.<sup>31</sup> There are of course dissenting voices, e.g. M. Frenschkowski<sup>32</sup> and M. Hengel;<sup>33</sup> but I believe that we have sufficient reason to understand Q as an independent and conscious construction of meaning.<sup>34</sup> Accordingly, the <sup>27</sup> The classic work collecting path-breaking articles on Mark as narrator is Der Erzähler des Evangeliums: Methodische Neuansätze in der Markusforschung, ed. F. Hahn, SBS 118/119 (Stuttgart: Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1985); see also D. Michie and D. Rhoads, Mark as Story: An Introduction to the Narrative of a Gospel (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1982), and J. R. Donahue and D. J. Harrington, The Gospel of Mark, Sacra Pagina 2 (Collegeville, MI: Liturgical Press, 2002); F. J. Moloney, The Gospel of Mark: A Commentary (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2002), as examples of commentaries using a narrative approach; cf. T. Friedrichsen, "Reading Mark as Mark. Two New Narrative Commentaries," ETHL 79 (2003): 134–156.

<sup>28</sup> See the general conclusions made by C. Heil, "Die Rekonstruktion des Internationalen Q-Projekts: Einführung in Methodik und Resultate," NovT 43 (2001): 128–143 at 141.

<sup>29</sup> Kloppenborg, Excavating Q, 122–124.

<sup>30</sup> E. Sevenich-Bax, Israels Konfrontation mit den letzten Boten der Weisheit: Form, Funktion und Interdependenz der Weisheitselemente in der Logienquelle, Münsteraner theologische Abhandlungen vol. 21 (Altenberge: Oros, 1993); cf. also M. Hüneburg, Jesus als Wundertäter in der Logienquelle: Ein Beitrag zur Christologie von Q, ABG vol. 4 (Leipzig: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 2001).

<sup>31</sup> A. Järvinen, "The Son of Man and his Followers: A Q Portrait of Jesus," in Characterization in the Gospels: Reconceiving Narrative Criticism, eds. D. Rhoads and K. Syreeni, JSNTSup 184 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1999), 180–222.

<sup>32</sup> M. Frenschkowski, "Welche biographischen Kenntnisse von Jesus setzt die Logienquelle voraus? Beobachtungen zur Gattung von Q im Kontext antiker Spruchsammlungen," in From Quest to Q: Festschrift J. M. Robinson, ed. J. M. Asgeirsson, K. de Troyer, and M. W. Meyer, BETL 146 (Leuven: Peeters, 2000), 3–42.

<sup>33</sup> M. Hengel, The Four Gospels and the One Gospel of Jesus Christ. An Investigation of the Collection and the Origin of the Canonical Gospels (Harrisburg: Trinity Press International, 2000); cf. now more fully elaborated idem, Die Vier Evangelien und das eine Evangelium von Jesus Christ: Studien zu ihrer Sammlung und Entstehung, WUNT 224 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2008).

<sup>34</sup> Cf. M. Labahn, "Der Gottessohn, die Versuchung und das Kreuz: Überlegungen zum Jesusporträt der Versuchungsgeschichte in Q 4,1–13," ETHL 80 (2004): 402–422; idem, "Das Reich Gottes und seine performativen Abbildungen. Gleichnisse, Parabeln und Bilder als Handlungsmodelle im Dokument Q," in Hermeneutik der Gleichnisse Jesu: Methodische Neuansätze zum Verstehen urchristlicher Parabeltexte, ed. R. Zimmermann, WUNT (Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 2008), 259–272; idem, "Der Gekommene, passim.

individual texts in their literary context have a specific sequence which can scarcely be a product of chance; and they have argumentative or narrative functions in this sequence. The traces of these functions should remain in the reception as markers of intertextuality which are evidence for or against the postulated plausibility of literary dependence.

In this article, I shall begin by investigating the literary functions of the Beelzebul controversy in each specific context, to see whether we can identify additional criteria for or against a literary relationship. I shall also compare the structures of the controversies, and then examine the linguistically-oriented comparative model.

1. We will see that the hypothesis of literary dependence is unconvincing, and that the best interpretation of the linguistic convergences is the model of oral transmission, taking into account the insights offered by the psychology of the human memory. This can explain the agreement in the common core of the Beelzebul controversy in Mark and Q.
2. This model helps to identify a comparable development, thanks to the structuring power of the memory, in groups which engaged in similar Christological reflection; naturally, however, we cannot go beyond the common core to say anything about a possible interdependence of the traditions in Q and Mark.

3. The Beelzebul Controversy as a Double Transmission

With the exception of those who deny in principle the two-sources theory,<sup>35</sup> there is a general consensus—on the basis of unambiguous textual observations—that we have a double transmission here.<sup>36</sup> Despite differences on points of detail in the sequence in Matthew and Luke, we can observe the following agreements against Mark:<sup>37</sup> the Beelzebul controversy with the logion about the divided kingdom, the integration of the exorcisms into the kingdom of God, the logion about the attitude that people take to Jesus, the return of the unclean spirit, and the demand for a sign with the logia about the sign of Jonah and the queen of the South or the Ninevites. Although this is a matter of some dispute, I assign the logion about the “strong man” (Matt 12:29) or the “stronger man” (Luke 11:21–22) to Q (see section 4.1 below).

---

<sup>35</sup> A dissenting view is taken by A. Fuchs, who uses this controversy to test his hypothesis of a Deutero-Mark: Die Entwicklung der Beelzebulkontroverse bei den Synoptikern: Traditionsgeschichtliche und redaktionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung von Mk 3,22–27 und Parallelen, verbunden mit der Rückfrage nach dem historischen Jesus, SNTUB ser. 5 (Linz: Plöckl, 1980); for a critique, cf. e.g. F. Neiryck, “Deuteromarcus et les accords Matthieu-Luc,” in idem, Evangelica: Gospel Studies—Études d’Évangile: Collected Essays, BETL 60 (Leuven: Peeters, 1982), 769–780; M. E. Boring, “The Synoptic Problem, ‘minor’ agreements, and the Beelzebul Pericope,” in The Four Gospels 1992: Festschrift F. Neiryck, ed. F. van Segbroeck, C. M. Tuckett, G. van Belle, and J. Verheyden, BETL 100 (Leuven: Peeters, 1992), 587–619, at 616–618.

<sup>36</sup> The hypothesis of a double transmission is based on a number of both positive and negative minor and major agreements of the longer synoptic gospels against Mark; cf. e.g. Laufen, Doppelüberlieferungen, 126–128; Schröter, Erinnerungen, 240, 242–246.

In Luke’s Gospel, the Beelzebul controversy is not found in a Markan block, but in the so-called “travel narrative” which mostly combines material from Luke’s own sources and Q.<sup>38</sup> In Matthew 12, the evangelist brings together texts about conflicts from various sources and integrates these into the Markan sequence.<sup>39</sup>

4. The Placing of the Texts

4.1. The Immediate Context

The Beelzebul controversy displays clear terminological parallels between Mark and Q.<sup>40</sup> The continuation of the controversy, which is closely linked to it in both Mark and Q, also sheds valuable light on the

---

<sup>37</sup> Cf. the Markan parallels and their placing in Mark:

Mark 3:22–26: the Beelzebul controversy.

Mark 3:27: the house of the stronger man.

Mark 9:40: “for” and “against” us—this logion is found in the context of an exorcist who does not belong to the group of disciples, but works in the name of Jesus.

Mark 8:11–12: the Pharisees demand a sign, but Jesus refuses to give “this generation” a sign. This is inserted between the feeding of the four thousand and the dialogue in the boat about the one loaf, during which the disciples are warned against the activity of the Pharisees.

There is no parallel in Mark to the return of the unclean spirit and the logion about the queen of the South or the Ninevites.

<sup>38</sup> On the composition and the origin of the material, cf. the overview by Schnelle, Einleitung, 207–210; cf. also Schröter, Erinnerung, 243.

<sup>39</sup> Cf. e.g. U. Luz, Das Evangelium nach Matthäus 2: Mt 8–17, 3rd ed., EKK 1.2 (Zürich: Benziger, 1999), 226–227; Schröter, Erinnerung, 243–244.

<sup>40</sup> My discussion is based on the proposed reconstruction by J. M. Robinson, P. Hoffmann, and J. S. Kloppenborg, eds. and Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchen Verlag, The Critical Edition of Q: Synopsis including the Gospels of Matthew and Luke, Mark and Thomas with English, German, and French translations of Q and Thomas, Hermeneia Supplement Series (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2000).

question with which we began.<sup>41</sup> This is the context of the logion about the strong or stronger man (Mark 3:27; Matt 12:29; Luke 11:21–22). If we prescind from the facts that the Matthean form of this logion is a rhetorical question<sup>42</sup> and Mark 3:27 is formulated as a negative rule, there are extensive linguistic parallels between the two versions. On the other hand, Luke 11:21–22 displays few linguistic contacts with the logion in Matthew and Mark, and makes a different point. The Matthean/Markan logion indirectly emphasizes that the binding of the strong man is something new, something that runs contrary to all previous experience, while the starting point of the Lukan version is the success of the operation: although the strong man had protected his property (οἰκία is replaced by αὐλή) with weapons, he is forced to yield to one who is even stronger than himself. Both versions describe the effect produced by the kingdom of God, but where the Markan/Matthean perspective argues more dynamically, the Lukan variant concentrates on the outcome, and may therefore present a later reflection.<sup>43</sup> Despite their point of contact in the motifs associated with the “strong man,” however, the two logia are largely independent from a formal point of view; there is thus no direct dependence of one on the other. Because of the state of the tradition, it has been questioned whether the logion forms part of the Q material,<sup>44</sup> and it has been suggested that an independent variant existed in the specifically Lukan material.<sup>45</sup> However, the parable about the stronger man is found in Luke in the sequence of pericopae from Q, and its images from the world of power politics allude to the corresponding argumentation in Q 11:17–18.<sup>46</sup> At

---

<sup>41</sup> I find the assertion that Luke 11:27–28 betrays a prior text in Q highly questionable. This means that the attempt to argue that Q 11:27–28 is the source of Mark 3:20–21, 31–35 (Lambrecht, “Relatives,” 249–251) is an option which depends logically on the assumption that a literary relationship exists between the Gospel of Mark and Q.

<sup>42</sup> Cf. e.g. Luz, Matthäus 2, 261.

<sup>43</sup> A different view is taken by Lambrecht, “Relatives,” 247, who sees Mark 3:27 as a shortening of the parable of the stronger man. B. Kollmann, Jesus und die Christen als Wundertäter: Studien zu Magie, Medizin und Schamanismus in Antike und Christentum, FRLANT 170 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1996), 189, denies explicitly that the Q version represents an older tradition.

<sup>44</sup> Cf. F. Neiryneck, “Assessment,” in Fleddermann, Mark and Q, 263–307, at 271–273.

<sup>45</sup> D. Lührmann, Die Redaktion der Logienquelle, WMANT 33 (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1969), 33: independent variant; Schüling, Studien, 109.

<sup>46</sup> Fleddermann, “Use,” 20–22, sees the integration by means of the catchword technique as an important indication that the logion about the stronger man belongs the same time, it follows appropriately on what is said in Q 11:19–20:<sup>47</sup> if the new kingdom comes into being in the exorcisms, then one who is stronger (i.e., God or Jesus) is at work, and is seizing the property which the strong man had made secure.<sup>48</sup> There is noteworthy consistency in motifs and contents already on the level of Q, which would constitute an argument that this logion belongs to Luke 11:21–22 presents a Q-version—though doubtless reworked in the redactional process.<sup>49</sup> Because of the different point it makes, however, it cannot be considered as a Lukan revision of the Markan text.<sup>50</sup>

We must ask whether and how the logion about blasphemy against the Spirit (Mark 3:28–29) belongs to the core narrative of the Beelzebul controversy. This logion, which is oriented to the Beelzebul controversy in Mark 3:30, has a parallel in Q 12:10 with decisive differences both in vocabulary and in contents. The logion in Mark concerns all the sins of “the sons of men,” while that in Q 12:10 concerns the sin against the Son of Man. If we take the Markan context as our starting point, we could envisage a transposition made by Luke, since some scholars regard the context for Q 12:10 which can be inferred from Luke as unsatisfactory.<sup>51</sup> However, the context of judgment and the concept of to Q. He shows convincingly that the parable of the strong man is linked by its vocabulary to its context.

---

<sup>47</sup> Cf. e.g. M. Sato, “Wisdom Statements in the Sphere of Prophecy,” in The Gospel behind the Gospels, ed. Piper, 139–158, at 147–148.

<sup>48</sup> See also A. Merz, “Jesus lernt vom Räuberhauptmann (Das Wort vom Starken). Mk 3,27 (Mt 12,29 / Lk 11,21f. / EvThom 35)”, in Kompendium der Gleichnisse Jesu, ed. R. Zimmermann in collaboration with D. Dormeyer, G. Kern, A. Merz, C. Münch, and E. E. Popkes (Gütersloh: Gütersloher Verlagshaus, 2007), 287–296 at 289.

<sup>49</sup> Cf. e.g. J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew. Rethinking the Historical Jesus 2: Mentor, Message, and Miracles, ABRL (New York: Doubleday, 1991), 417; G. H. Twelftree, Jesus the Exorcist: A Contribution to the Study of the Historical Jesus, WUNT 2.54 (Tübingen: Mohr—Siebeck, 1993), 111; J. Wanke, “Bezugs- und Kommentarworte” in den synoptischen Evangelien, EthSt 44 (Leipzig: St. Benno, 1981), 52; J. Jeremias, Die Sprache des Lukasevangeliums: Redaktion und Tradition im Nicht-Markusstoff des dritten Evangeliums, KEK-Sb (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1980), 210 (reference to the composite verbs in Luke 11:22). Cf. also the remarks by Luz, Matthäus 2, 255, Fledermann, Mark, 52–54 and idem, Q: A Reconstruction and Commentary, 485–488 (Fledermann however regards the Matthean version as a text close to Q). On the discussion about whether Q 11:21–22 belongs to Q, cf. the documentation in J. S. Kloppenborg, Q Parallels: Synopsis, Critical Notes and Concordance, Foundations & Facets (Sonoma, CA: Polebridge, 1988), 92; cf. also D. Trunk, Der messianische Heiler: Eine redaktions- und religionsgeschichtliche Studie zu den Exorzismen im Matthäusevangelium, HBS 3 (Freiburg: Herder, 1994), 73–74 n. 138.

<sup>50</sup> Cf. also Kollmann, Jesus, 176–177.

<sup>51</sup> E.g. Luz, Matthäus 2, 256.

the “Son of Man” in Q 12:8–9<sup>52</sup> are probably a sufficient justification for the connection here. Besides this, it is clear that the Beelzebul controversy in Q flows smoothly without the logion about blasphemy. The redactional linkage in Mark is motivated by the accusation of demonic possessions: Mark 3:30 (πνεῦμα ἀκάθαρτον ἔχει) is thus an allusion to the accusation in 3:22 (Βεελζεβοὺλ ἔχει—cf. also v. 21: ἐξέστη). We should note that Q links the logion about the return of the unclean spirits (Q 11:24–26) with the Beelzebul controversy; although this entails an idea which is different both in vocabulary and in contents, the motif of the evil spirits means that it is not alien to the other idea. The return of the unclean spirits is attached to the exorcism (ἐξέβαλεν δαιμόνιον), but this must be filled out Christologically by Q 11:23.<sup>53</sup> Nevertheless, the logion about blasphemy against the Son of Man does not fit the context of 11:14–16.

The logion about being “for” or “against” Jesus (Q 11:23) concludes the immediate context of the controversy about the Beelzebul accusation in Q, but not the argumentative unit as a whole (cf. 4.2.1 below).

4.2. The Macrocontext

4.2.1. The Beelzebul Controversy in the Q Document

Let us begin by reconstructing the textual sequence, since there are significant differences between Matt 12:22–42 and Luke 11:14–32. In particular, we should note the position of the demand for a sign—which in Luke is part of the Beelzebul accusation, but in Matthew introduces the radically altered context of the “sign of Jonah”—and the logion about the return of the unclean spirit. Matthew, like Mark, follows up the logion about the decision “for or against” Jesus (Matt 12:30) from Q 12:10 (unlike Mark 9:40, the “scattering” [μὴ συνάγων μετ’ ἐμοῦ σκορπίζει] is a topic in Q 11:23) with the logion about blasphemy against the Spirit; here, he deviates from the sequence in Q. There is a tension between this affirmation and the logion about the return of the unclean spirit, which Matthew therefore inserts at a later place, in order to employ it as a description of “this evil generation” on whom judgment has already been pronounced (Matt 12:41f.). We assume the following underlying sequence, which agrees with the Critical Edition of Q (CEQ):

<sup>52</sup> P. Hoffmann presents weighty arguments against “the Son of Man” in Q 12:8: “Der Menschensohn in Lukas 12,8,” NTS 44 (1998): 357–379; cf. also idem, “Jesus versus Menschensohn. Mt 10,32f und die synoptische Menschensohnüberlieferung,” in Salz der Erde—Licht der Welt: Exegetische Studien zum Matthäusevangelium. Festschrift A. Vögtle, ed. L. Oberlinner and P. Fiedler (Stuttgart: Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1991), 165–202.

<sup>53</sup> Cf. M. Labahn, “Füllt den Raum aus—es kommt sonst noch schlimmer! (Beelzebulgleichnis)—Q 11,24–26,” in Kompodium der Gleichnisse Jesu, ed. Zimmermann, 126–132.

- Q 11:14,17–20 Jesus’ expulsion of the demons as an expression of the rule of God
- Q 11:21–22 The stronger man
- Q 11:23 The attitude taken to Jesus
- Q 11:24–26 The return of the unclean spirit
- Q 11:16 The demand for a sign
- Q 11:29–30 The Son of Man as the sign of Jonah
- Q 11:31–32 The queen of the South and the Ninevites at the judgment

I believe that Q 11:14–32 forms a distinct argumentative unit. The distinctive signal which links these logia is the description of Jesus’ adversaries. The text works dialogically: each critique or demand of the adversaries offers Jesus the opportunity to state his position (Q 11:15 and 11:16). Jesus replies in lengthy argumentative passages (Q 11:17–26; 11:29–32). Both substantial and formal grounds show that these were originally distinct individual logia. The presence of catchwords and ideas of the adversaries<sup>54</sup> shows the rhetorical-argumentative structure of the text; this is also indicated when they are addressed in rhetorical questions, i.e. questions which look for agreement within the text itself (Q 11:18–19). The second discourse, which follows the demand for a sign, displays the characteristics of a summary. Although it takes up the central catchword of Jesus’ adversaries—“sign”—it no longer directly addresses those who are the adversaries within the text itself. Rather, this monologic unit (Q 11:29–31) pronounces judgment on the adversaries and identifies them as belonging to a broader category:

<sup>54</sup> Βεελζεβούλ—cf. Q. 11:19.

τῷ ἄρχοντι τῶν δαιμονίων. The theme of “rule” is taken up by means of the catchwords βασιλεία (Q 11:17.18; cf. also 11:20, βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ) and ἰσχυρός/ἰσχυρότερος (Q 11:21–22).

ἐκβάλλει τὰ δαιμόνια—cf. Q 11:19–20.

“this generation.”<sup>55</sup> This integrates the episode into the total context of the document, so that this section becomes part of the comprehensive theme of the dispute with “this generation,” an expression which occurs several times (Q 7:31; 11:29, 31, 32, 51).

The dialogic passage is set within a slender narrative framework, the “narrative abbreviation”<sup>56</sup> of an exorcism in Q 11:14. The essential elements of an exorcism are set out briefly here,<sup>57</sup> but the text appeals to the readers’ knowledge about Jesus’ exorcisms. This knowledge will permit the readers to fill in any “gaps” caused by the abbreviated form of narration; accordingly, the “narrator” is free to concentrate on the essential aspect, viz. the following argumentation. The presence of basic narrative structures is also betrayed by the narrative commentary, which refers to Jesus’ ability to see into people’s hearts: “But he saw through their thoughts.”<sup>58</sup> The individual logia tell their own brief stories, and the statements about “this generation” in Q 11:29–30, 32 and 11:31 can be understood as “narrative abbreviations” of extensive Old Testament texts (1 Kgs 10:1–14; 2 Chr 9:1–12 or Jon 3:4); but there are no other narrative passages.

The linking description of the adversaries is τινές, which CEQ rightly judges to be original. They emerge from the mass of the people for the

<sup>55</sup> Cf. also M. Hüneburg, “Jesus als Wundertäter: Zu einem vernachlässigten Aspekt des Jesusbildes von Q,” in The Sayings Source Q, ed. Lindemann, 635–648, at 645–646.

<sup>56</sup> On the term “narrative abbreviation” (German: narrative Abbraviatur), cf. J. Straub, “Temporale Orientierung und narrative Kompetenz: Zeit- und erzähltheoretische Grundlagen einer Psychologie biographischer und historischer Sinnbildung,” in Geschichtsbewußtsein: Psychologische Grundlagen, Entwicklungskonzepte, empirische Befunde, ed. J. Rüsen, Beiträge zur Geschichtskultur 21 (Köln: Böhlau, 2001), 15–44, at 23.

<sup>57</sup> First of all, the fact that Jesus carries out the exorcism is mentioned. We also hear about the man who needs help; his distress is described; and we read about the confirmation or documentation of the miracle (the man who was formerly dumb now speaks), and about the admiring reaction by those who witness it. The final point is the criticism by Jesus’ adversaries. On the inventory of the miracle stories, cf. G. Theissen, Urchristliche Wundergeschichten: Ein Beitrag zur formgeschichtlichen Erforschung der synoptischen Evangelien, 6th ed., StNT 8 (Gütersloh: Gütersloher Verlagshaus, 1990), 57–59.

<sup>58</sup> F. Neiryck, “Mt 12,25a/Lc 11,17a et la rédaction des évangiles,” in idem, Evangetica II, 481–492, interprets Jesus’ insight into the criticism of his opponents not as an agreement which points to a Q text, but as the product of each specific redaction. Matt 12:25a picks up 9:4 (ιδὼν ὁ Ἰησοῦς τὰς ἐνθυμήσεις αὐτῶν); Luke 11:17a picks up the motif inspired by Ps 93:11 LXX which he also employs at Luke 5:22; 6:8; 9:47; 20:23. Ἐνθυμήσεις and διανοήματα are semantic analogies without any direct parallel in Mark; this makes it probable that they have a basis in Q.

first time at Q 11:15 and ask Jesus to show his legitimation at 11:16 by demanding that he shall give them a sign. This is surprising, since Jesus' power has been the subject of debate in the immediate context (Q 11:14–26), and a miraculous sign has been performed in the world of the text, viz. the briefly related exorcism in 11:14. Jesus' adversaries locate him on the side of the prince of the demons because of his exorcisms (11:15),<sup>59</sup> but he replies by locating himself on the side of God (11:20). He employs argumentative tricks to demonstrate the defective logic of his opponents' accusation (vv. 17–18<sup>60</sup> and 21–22). At the same time, he integrates the exorcistic activity in his Jewish environment into his own activity (vv. 19–20).<sup>61</sup> With subtle irony, the accusation of the adversaries is conducted ad absurdum. At the same time, he points to a deeper dimension of this debate: if the accusation of his adversaries was in fact correct, this would mean that the kingdom of Satan was doomed to destruction, since Jesus—who is alleged to be the representative of this kingdom—would be a witness to its inherent disunity. And according to the line of argument in Q, it is indeed correct to say that the kingdom of Satan has been handed over to destruction. Through the exorcisms, the “stronger man” appears on the scene, and his kingdom is now present.

In Q 11:23–25, warnings are uttered against taking an inappropriate attitude to the divine activity which is associated with Jesus' exorcisms. First, one who agitates against Jesus is scattering the eschatological community (11:23); and secondly, one who does not behave in accordance with the criterion proposed by Jesus is inviting the unclean spirits to return (according to Q, the demons have not yet been defeated).

The word τινές signals that Q 11:16 is referring back directly to these logia. In Q 11:15, these τινές have detached themselves from the crowd of the people, who are full of astonishment, by accusing Jesus of being <sup>59</sup> Theissen, Wundergeschichten, 99. Trunk's observations about Jesus' exorcisms can also be applied mutatis mutandis to the other exorcisms which were performed at that period: “from the perspective of a rigorous Yahwism which was authorized by scripture, the exorcist who communicated with the spirits was moving in a theological grey area” (Heiler, 243).

<sup>60</sup> On the logic of Q 11:17–18, cf. M. Labahn, “Jesu Exorzismen (Q 11,19–20) und die Erkenntnis der ägyptischen Magier (Ex 8,15): Q 11,20 als bewahrtes Beispiel für Schrift-Rezeption Jesu nach der Logienquelle,” in The Sayings Source Q and the Historical Jesus, ed. A. Lindemann, BETL 153 (Leuven: Peeters, 2001), 617–633, at 619.

<sup>61</sup> Cf. also Labahn, “Jesu Exorzismen,” 620–621; a different position is taken by J. Nolland, Luke 9:21–18.34, WBC 35B (Dallas: Word Books, 1993), 639.

in league with Beelzebul. In Q, therefore, we are explicitly told that the demand for a sign follows upon a miracle, viz. the exorcism in 11:14. This miracle is ambiguous: it can be adduced as evidence both that the exorcist is a foe of God (as the speakers claim) and that he comes from God (as Jesus claims). We see that the τινές are unimpressed by Jesus' argumentation, and this means that they personally assign themselves a place in the immediately preceding pattern of Jesus' warnings: first, because they are against Jesus; and secondly, because their behavior is inappropriate to the eschatological quality of time they live in. This opposition and ignorance is expressed through their demand for a sign, which ignores the contents of what Jesus has just said; the sign is meant to reveal the power through which the exorcism has been performed.

Jesus' answer consists in the complete refusal to give a sign. This is followed by the strange exception of the sign of Jonah. In the structure of the text, the primary intention is to punish the Beelzebul accusation, which distrusts Jesus and refuses to obey his word. This is why the τινές are identified with "this generation." The τινές represent one part of the people, and this part is now equated with "this generation" and treated in a generalizing manner: they will not be honored with a sign.

How then are we to understand the sign that will nevertheless be given? There is a correspondence between the future and the past: καθώς. As was the sign of Jonah, so will be the sign of the Son of Man. Matthew has in mind the time that Jonah spent in the belly of the fish (Matt 12:40), but this is clearly a secondary interpretation. In the case of Q, we should note the connection with 11:31. The prophet Jonah's message of judgment brought about the repentance of the Ninevites (11:32), and this is why they will have the role of accusers in the judgment against "this generation." The demand of a sign expresses "this generation's" unwillingness to repent, which is exemplified in the τινές. In the immediate context in Q, there are sufficient signals of God's action and deeds (cf. also 7:22); and according to Q, these are linked to Jesus. The demand of a sign is a refusal to accept this, and judgment ensues. This means that the reference to Jonah's activity focuses on his message of judgment (Jon 3:4).<sup>62</sup> The counterpart to the demand for a sign is therefore the reference to the eschatological coming of the Son of Man (ἔσται). There is however a clear distinction between the activity of Jonah and that of the Son of Man. The former prompts repentance in an exceptional particular instance (Jon 4:1–3), while the latter exercises judgment after repentance has been refused.

---

<sup>62</sup> M. Sato, Q und Prophetie: Studien zur Gattungs- und Traditionsgeschichte der Quelle Q, WUNT 2.29 (Tübingen: Mohr—Siebeck, 1988), 283.

A further aspect which links the debate about the Beelzebul accusation to Jesus' answer to the demand for a sign is the conceptual field of "judging"/"judgment." We read at Q 11:19 that the "sons" of Jesus' adversaries, who themselves perform exorcisms, will be judges in the future judgment (κριταὶ ἔσονται); the threat is then intensified when we are told that the function of the queen of Sheba and of the Ninevites after their resurrection will be the κατακρινεῖν of this generation (Q 11:31–32). First, therefore, the verdict pronounced by those who are disputing with Jesus makes members of their own people, indeed their own sons, servants of Beelzebul, whereas in reality these exorcists are helping to bring about the presence of the kingdom of God (11:19).<sup>63</sup> In the second discourse, Gentiles assume the role of judges of this generation.

If A. Kirk is right in asserting that "the present Q text can just as easily be viewed as the product of a single compositional initiative,"<sup>64</sup> then its "punch-line" lies in a Christological controversy in which Jesus is contrasted with "this generation," and thus probably with the opponents of the Q-group. Through the reception of tradition, the one who has come, and whose activity is at the heart of the controversies between the Q-group and its surrounding milieu, becomes himself an actor in the controversy. This serves above all to make the group sure of itself. The Beelzebul controversy is thereby made highly relevant to the contemporary situation, where it helps in the construction of meaning.

4.2.2. The Beelzebul controversy in Mark (Mark 3:22–27)

One important point of reference of the Beelzebul controversy can be found in the scenes of conflict which concern the authority to forgive sins, table fellowship with sinners, fasting, and the Sabbath (Mark 2:1–3:6). The themes and contents of these passages probably contain information about questions which were posed in the community that handed on the traditions this unit is built upon, in such a way that they were helpful in meeting contemporary needs.<sup>65</sup> In 3:7–12, Mark summarizes Jesus' activity once again by speaking of the attention which this drew even beyond the borders of Galilee. He then speaks of the formation and membership of the group of the twelve (3:13–19). These two passages form an important basis for the following stories.

---

<sup>63</sup> Cf. A. D. Jacobson, "The Literary Unity of Q," in The Shape of Q: Signal Essays on the Sayings Gospel, ed. J. S. Kloppenborg (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994), 98–115, at 107–108; idem, The First Gospel: An Introduction to Q, Foundations & Facets (Sonoma, CA: Polebridge, 1992), 162–163; Labahn, "Jesu Exorzismen," 621–622; R. A. Piper, Wisdom in the Q-Tradition. The Aphoristic Teaching of Jesus, SNTSMS 61 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989), 123. Cf. also Twelftree, Jesus, 108–109. For a different view, cf. e.g. M. Trautmann, Zeichenhafte Handlungen Jesu: Ein Beitrag zur Frage nach dem geschichtlichen Jesus, FzB 37 (Würzburg: Echter, 1980), 270.

<sup>64</sup> A. Kirk, The Composition of the Sayings Source: Genre, Synchrony, and Wisdom Redaction in Q, NTSup. 91 (Leiden: Brill, 1998), 183.

In the Gospel of Mark, the Beelzebul accusation against Jesus (3:22–27) is embedded in two texts which reflect the relationship of Jesus to his biological relatives (Mark 3:20–21; 3:31–35). Here, the relatives are contrasted with the people, who gather around Jesus (3:20) and are close to him (3:32, καὶ ἐκάθητο περὶ αὐτὸν ὄχλος). The people force him to retreat into the house, but this does not lead to a separation from the people. This success, and the closeness of the people, are the result of the impressive and authoritative proclamation of Jesus and of his public activity (cf. Mark 1:14–15, 21–22; 3:8, etc.).

The biological relatives form the counterfoil to the people who confidently throng around Jesus. This continues the theme of conflict found in Mark 2:1–3:6. In 3:21, οἱ παρ' αὐτοῦ, whose identity is not more precisely defined, attempt to seize Jesus, because he is "mad" (ἐξέστη); the context of 3:22 shows that the verb ἐξίστημι cannot be understood in a positive and/or ecstatic sense here.<sup>66</sup> A close parallel to this use of the verb could be found in the introductory description of Antiochus IV Epiphanes in the 26th book of Polybius's Histories. Polybius refers to a polemical exchange of the title Epiphanes into ἐπιμανής. In the second case, at Mark 3:31–33, the relatives who are also meant in v. 20<sup>67</sup> are explicitly named: they are Jesus' mother and his brothers, who stand "outside" (ἔξω στήκοντες) and are thus "outsiders" in the full meaning of the word.

In Mark, Jesus' activity transforms outsiders into an insider group. It is not by chance that the accusations in connection with exorcism are framed by the affirmation about Jesus' true family. In response to

<sup>65</sup> Cf. e.g. D. Lührmann, Das Markusevangelium, HNT 3 (Tübingen: Mohr—Siebeck, 1987), 56.

<sup>66</sup> Cf. J. Lambrecht, art. "ἐξίστημι," EWNT 2, 2nd ed., 1992, 17–19, at 18. The interpretation that the situation "went out of control with enthusiasm" (H. Wansbrough, "Mark III. 21—Was Jesus out of his Mind?," NTS 18 [1971/72]: 233–235, at 235) contradicts the immediately following context.

<sup>67</sup> Cf. e.g. J. Gnllka, Das Evangelium nach Markus 1: Mk 1–8,26, EKK 2.1 (Einsiedeln: Benziger and Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1978), 144; for another view, cf. e.g. Wansbrough, "Mark III. 21," passim.

this accusation, a contrasting group is formed, viz. the followers of Jesus; and it is implied that in this new group, the outsider status of those “possessed” is abolished by the exorcist, and a new fellowship is established.<sup>68</sup>

In this framework, where Jesus meets rejection and a lack of understanding on the part of his closest relatives, we now hear of an external opposition, which is clearly distinct in geographical terms. It is articulated by the scribes who have come from Jerusalem. These too form a counterfoil, since we have just been told that Jesus has come to a great crowd of the people ἀπὸ τῆς Ἰουδαίας καὶ ἀπὸ Ἱεροσολύμων καὶ ἀπὸ τῆς Ἰδουμαίας καὶ πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδάνου καὶ περὶ Τύρον καὶ Σιδῶνα who had heard about his deeds (3:7–8). In contrast to these crowds, the scribes from Jerusalem create a distance vis-à-vis Jesus, and the narrator portrays their attitude as the unforgivable sin against the Holy Spirit (3:28–30).

No immediate occasion for the scribes’ accusation is mentioned; all they do is to continue the lack of understanding already shown by Jesus’ relatives. For the Markan narrator, it is not necessary to tell the story of an exorcism here, since this activity has been both related explicitly at Mark 1:21–28 and mentioned several times in a summary fashion (1:32–34; 3:7–11).<sup>69</sup> The first accusation by the scribes takes up the related accusation of madness: Jesus is described as possessed, and thus as a man manipulated by Beelzebul. The second accusation clearly refers back to the narrative sequence in the Gospel of Mark, by recalling Jesus’ activity as exorcist, which has been mentioned several times: this means that it is he who is making use of Beelzebul, and thus manipulating him.

The opponents are summoned before Jesus, and their accusations are rejected three times by means of parables. Their accusation assumes the continued existence of the satanic kingdom, but everyone knows that a kingdom and a house that are divided cannot continue to exist. The strong man must first be overcome, so that one can break into his house: and this is what the exorcisms illustrate. Besides this, the accusation misunderstands the real power in which Jesus works (Mark 1:10; cf. 1:8),<sup>70</sup> and equates the working of the Holy Spirit with that of an unclean spirit: Beelzebul is understood to mean Satan, and is then also concretized as a demon or the prince of the demons, when he is described as an unclean spirit. In Mark, Jesus' discourse in parables is either an interrupted address to the people (4:11,12) or a way of speaking which consciously veils the meaning from his adversaries (12:1). According to J. Gnilka, "the possibility of understanding what Jesus says... exists only when one is willing to become his disciple and to follow him."<sup>71</sup> One can accept the claim made in Jesus' words if one shares the presupposition that underlies them. One who grasps that the Spirit of God is at work in Jesus knows that the dominion of Satan has been shattered by God, and he will be one of those who do the will of God and thereby belong to Jesus' true relatives (3:34–35). The appearance on the scene of Jesus' mother and brothers gives the narrator the possibility of offering a positive definition of what it means to follow Jesus, by means of the condemnation of Jesus' opponents. Through this conflict, the interest is directed to the present-day successors of the group of the twelve, i.e. to a new in-group which consists of those who are freed from the dominion of Satan and do the will of God. The conflict shows how, out of the mass of people who throng around Jesus, a new family of Jesus is formed: this family sees God at work in him, and thereby does the will of God.

<sup>68</sup> Cf. S. Guijarro, “Die politische Wirkung der Exorzismen Jesu: Gesellschaftliche Reaktionen und Verteidigungsstrategien in der Beelzebul-Kontroverse,” in Jesus in neuen Kontexten, ed. W. Stegemann and B. J. Malina (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 2002), 64–74, at 74.

<sup>69</sup> There is no obvious reason why an abbreviated narrative such as that at Q 11:14—if this remained in the tradition or in the memory of the narrator—should have been excised here.

4.2.3. Comparison

Both texts found this conflict about Jesus in the form of a conflict narrative which they then elaborated, each from its own perspective. In Q, contemporary controversies in the community are reflected upon; in Mark, the conflict narratives in 2:1–3:6 and 3:20–35 serve to clarify questions about orthopraxy and the following of Jesus. This means that the Beelzebul controversy serves different purposes in the two documents, and provides no indications of literary dependence. Nor do we find any such indications when we examine the actors involved, the geography, or the construction of the context.

In Q, the exorcism at 11:14 forms the external occasion for the discussion, and is one of the few explicitly narrative texts in the document Q. Mark, on the other hand, has no account of an exorcism in the story of the Beelzebul controversy. The parallel in Q has often led scholars to suppose that Mark consciously omits such an account here, but this inference is not necessary. There are no parallels in Mark to Q 11:24–26 and Q 11:31–32. Although the catchword “unclean spirit” is found both in Mark and in Q, this too cannot be read as evidence of a literary relationship. The divergent insertion of texts which refer to the “unclean spirit” is prompted by the mention of the demons, but here too, the structure is due not to literary dependence, but to the associative capacity of the memory.<sup>72</sup>

<sup>70</sup> Cf. also Lührmann, Markusevangelium, 77.

<sup>71</sup> Gnilka, Markus 1, 149.

In Mark, the demand for a sign is in a different context. It is made by a different group of persons, and Jesus refuses it on grounds of principle (Mark 8:12).

The analysis of the two contexts reveals no markings of literary intertextuality which would suggest either that one document directly depends on the other or else, more generally, that one document knew the other. There is only a core in the center of the conflict which generates the question whether a literary or pre-literary link between the two controversies is possible. As I shall show, this core includes the embedding of the two Beelzebul controversies in a dispute between Jesus and other persons.

4.3. The Structure of the Controversy

Let us now look more closely at the formal structure of the two controversy stories in Mark 3:22–30 and Q 11:15–23 (or v. 26). The two accounts are preceded by a dissimilar narrative preparation (see above) which leads to the formation of a group of spokesmen who utter the Beelzebul accusation.

The comparison of the two versions of the Beelzebul controversy reveals a high number of parallels in the basic structure of each conflict story. The opponents speak and formulate an accusation. Jesus, against whom this accusation is leveled, refutes it in three replies and draws a conclusion. A transitional passage, which relates the activity of the protagonist and links his answer to the accusation, leads to three replies in which the charge is refuted. The core is the accusation that Jesus is in league with “dark powers,” since he is making use of Beelzebul to

---

<sup>72</sup> For a different position, cf. Lambrecht, “Relatives,” 248.

Mark 3

Q 11

---

v. 22a: arrival of the scribes from Jerusalem they spea k (among themselves; cf. v. 23a) v. 22b: 1st accusation : possessed by Beelzebel v. 22b: 2nd accusation : Jesus makes use of Beelzebul to expel the demons v. 23a: the opponents assemble before Jesus v. 23a: Jesus speaks in parables vv. 23b–26: 1st reply : a divided kingdom and a divided house cannot stand —introduced by a rhetorical question  v. 27: 2nd reply : house of the strong man vv. 28–29: 3rd reply : the sin against the Holy Spirit is unforgivable v. 30: conclusion : the opponents describe the working of the Holy Spirit as that of an unclean spirit	v. 14: exorcism  v. 15a: “some” of the witnesses of the exorcism spea k  v. 15b: accusation : Jesus makes use of Beelzebul to expel the demons  v. 17a: Jesus reads their thoughts  vv. 17b–18: 1st reply : a divided kingdom will be laid waste and a divided house cannot stand  vv. 19–20: 2nd reply : exorcisms are one aspect of the seizing of power by the kingdom of God which is already present vv. 21–22: 3rd reply : victory of the stronger man  v. 23: conclusion : the one who is not for Jesus is against him  vv. 24–26: return of the unclean spirit
---	--

---

expel the demons; there is a very high measure of linguistic convergence between the texts here. This core is refuted by means of a parable—a kingdom and a house which lack unity are doomed to destruction—and here too, the vocabulary employed in the two texts is very similar (see section 5 below).

Outside this core area, with its formal agreements, we find clear differences in vocabulary, motifs, and contents. An initial difference between Mark and Q is that the accusation that Jesus is in league with evil powers is twofold in Mark: he is accused of manipulating Beelzebul and of being possessed, i.e. of being himself manipulated by this demonic figure. This striking doubling may indicate a secondary expansion. The accusation of demonic possession is in accordance with the Markan context, and is prepared by the assertion of Jesus' relatives that he is mad (3:21).<sup>73</sup> Besides this, the accusation is mirrored by Mark's redactional concretization of the blasphemy against the Spirit, so that this refers to those who make the Beelzebul accusation (3:30).<sup>74</sup> This means that the doubled accusation in Mark finds its explanation in the narrative shape his redaction has given to the conflict as a whole.<sup>75</sup>

We can see further significant differences, which are attributable to the Markan narrator, in the transition to Jesus' reaction. The summoning of the opponents in Mark, like the reading of people's thoughts in Q, demonstrates an authoritative attitude on Jesus' part, but its motifs and vocabulary are clearly different. The former underlines Jesus' claim to authority, the latter points to his miraculous powers. The description of his answer as a parable has Markan parallels (Mark 4:11–12; 12:1) and should be attributed to the Markan narrator, together with the typically Markan use of προσκαλεσόμενος + object.<sup>76</sup> The accusation is refuted in three answers by Jesus which diverge considerably. There is no formal parallel in Q to the rhetorical question (πῶς δύναται σατανᾶς σατανᾶν ἐκβάλλειν;) which introduces the first refutation and which accords well with Mark's theology.<sup>77</sup> Mark does not refer to the behavior of Jesus' adversaries or of their "sons" (Q 11:19), nor does he have a positive justification of the exorcisms (Q 11:20); if a literary relationship does indeed exist between Q and Mark, one must produce good arguments to explain this omission. Mark 9:38–40 makes it unlikely that Mark has suppressed the reference to the other exorcists;<sup>78</sup>

<sup>73</sup> Cf. Gnllka, Markus 1, 145.

<sup>74</sup> Cf. Laufen, Doppelüberlieferungen, 154.

<sup>75</sup> See above, section 4.1; cf. Laufen, Doppelüberlieferungen, 153; Trunk, Heiler, 66. Trunk emphasizes that Mark has recourse to the oral tradition in his formulation of this second accusation; but no further source is required. According to Lambrecht, "Relatives," 249–250, such a source is present in "Lk xi 18c; probably present in Q."

<sup>76</sup> Cf. e.g. Laufen, Doppelüberlieferungen, 154; R. Pesch, Das Markusevangelium 1: Einleitung und Kommentar zu Kap. 1,1–8,26, 5th ed., HThK 2.1 (Freiburg: Herder, 1989), 214; Trunk, Heiler, 66.

<sup>77</sup> Cf. Laufen, Doppelüberlieferungen, 154.

<sup>78</sup> This is the position of Fleddermann, "Use," 24; idem, Q: A Reconstruction and Commentary, 496 (used as argument for priority of Q's Beelzebul controversy with regard to Mark: "...the saying on 'your sons' implies that Jesus' power equals that of contemporary exorcist. The developing of the early Christian communities could not admit such equality"); A. Polag, Die Christologie der Logienquelle, WMANT 45 and I find it even less likely that he has omitted Q 11:20.<sup>79</sup> The second refutation in Mark is the logion about the house of the strong man. This corresponds semantically to the third refutation in Q, where a strong man is bound by one who is even stronger; there is however no congruence in terms of contents. The third refutation in Mark speaks of the unforgivable sin. The close link to the accusation, which is created by the conclusion to v. 30, indicates that the position of this third refutation is the work of the Markan narrator, who thereby produces a surprising agreement with the three refutations in Q. The triad can be understood as a basic scenic pattern in narratives; in view of the differences in contents, especially with regard to Q 11:20, I find the suggestion that it should be interpreted as a marker of intertextuality, in the sense of a dependence of Mark on the final text of the document Q, unconvincing. The conclusion drawn in Q—which evaluates the criticism as a fundamental opposition to Jesus, with the result that the community is scattered—is not found in the Beelzebul controversy in Mark, although the Markan conclusion performs a similar function.

A comparison of the structure of the conflict in Mark and in Q reveals once again a high measure of structural congruence, but part of this is the work of the Markan narrator. And precisely in this congruence, we can see decisive differences which are not all to be explained by the narrative intention in Q.

5. Linguistic Findings

To speak of linguistic “findings” is not to speak of absolute certainties, since the comparison between Mark and Q presupposes a reconstruction which must itself assume the influence of one of the two texts compared (i.e. Mark) on the sources from which Q is reconstructed; and we must also bear in mind the creative role of redaction or (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1977), 38n110. Cf. the arguments against this view by Kollmann, Jesus, 176.

---

<sup>79</sup> Cf. also Kollmann, Jesus, 176; Schüling, Studien, 111; Twelftree, Jesus, 106: “In the light of Mark’s evident interest in the relationship between the kingdom of God, the Holy Spirit and the exorcisms of Jesus, it is most unlikely that this saying we now have in Q was available to Mark or he would have most probably included it.” Fleddermann, “Use,” 26, sees the justification for this omission in the anticipation of Q 11:20 at Mark 1:14–15, but this is unconvincing, since Q 11:20 is much more than an affirmation that the kingdom is close at hand: it also provides a comprehensive justification of the exorcism.

re-narration in shaping the different documents we are going to compare. Nevertheless, if we prescind from points of detail and from the question of Q 11:21–22, the total picture allows us to make a comparison and to evaluate this.

In this section, when we look at linguistic convergences, we must ask whether, in view of the potential flexibility of oral transmission,<sup>80</sup> the model of independent oral transmission is preferable to that of literary dependence. We must begin by clearing up two objections to the appeal to oral transmission as an explanation of the convergences.

First, the flexibility of oral transmission does not necessarily mean a verbal discontinuity. Rather, we must assume that the memory which is responsible for the transmission<sup>81</sup> preserves not only a structure and a framework, but also constitutive linguistic signals.

Secondly, we must also examine whether the linguistic convergences are employed in the same way.

In the core of the controversy, we find the following picture:

---

Mark 3:22–26

Q 11:14f., 17–20

---

22 Καὶ οἱ γραμματεῖς οἱ ἀπὸ
Ἱεροσολύμων καταβάντες

ἔλεγον
ὅτι Βεελζεβούλ ἔχει
καὶ ὅτι ἐν τῷ ἄρχοντι τῶν δαιμονίων ἐκβάλλει τὰ δαιμόνια.

23 Καὶ προσκαλεσάμενος αὐτοὺς ἐν παραβολαῖς ἔλεγεν αὐτοῖς· πῶς δύναται σατανᾶς σατανᾶν ἐκβάλλειν;

14 Καὶ ἐ[[<ξέ>]]βαλ[[<εν>]] δαιμόνιον κωφόν·
καὶ<sup>82</sup> ἐκβληθέντος τοῦ δαιμονίου ἐλάλησεν ὁ κωφὸς
καὶ ἐθαύμασαν οἱ ὄχλοι.
ἰστινὲς δὲ εἶπον·

ἐν Βεελζεβούλ τῷ ἄρχοντι τῶν
δαιμονίων ἐκβάλλει τὰ δαιμόνια· 17 εἰδὼς δὲ τὰ διανοήματα αὐτῶν εἶπεν αὐτοῖς·

---

<sup>80</sup> Cf. e.g. G. Sellin, “‘Gattung’ und ‘Sitz im Leben’ auf dem Hintergrund der Problematik von Mündlichkeit und Schriftlichkeit synoptischer Erzählungen,” EvTh 50 (1990): 311–331.

<sup>81</sup> See section 2 above.

<sup>82</sup> According to Schröter, Erinnerung, 247, the conjunction καὶ did not form part of Q.

Table (cont.)

Mark 3:22–26	Q 11:14f., 17–20
24 καὶ ἐὰν βασιλεία ἐφ’ ἐαυτὴν μερισθῆ, οὐ δύναται σταθῆναι ἡ βασιλεία ἐκείνη·	πᾶσα βασιλεία μερισθεῖσα [[καθ’]] ἐαυτή[[ς]]
25 καὶ ἐὰν οἰκία ἐφ’ ἐαυτὴν μερισθῆ, οὐ δυνήσεται ἡ οἰκία ἐκείνη σταθῆναι.	ἐρημοῦται καὶ πᾶσα οἰκία μερισθεῖσα καθ’ ἐαυτῆς οὐ σταθήσεται
26 καὶ εἰ ὁ σατανᾶς ἀνέστη ἐφ’ ἐαυτὸν καὶ ἐμερίσθη, οὐ δύναται στῆναι ἀλλὰ τέλος ἔχει.	18 καὶ εἰ ὁ σατανᾶς ἐφ’ ἐαυτὸν ἐμερίσθη, πῶς σταθήσεται ἡ βασιλεία αὐτοῦ; 19 καὶ εἰ ἐγὼ ἐν Βεελζεβούλ ἐκβάλλω τὰ δαιμόνια, οἱ υἱοὶ ὑμῶν ἐν τίνι ἐκβάλλουσιν; διὰ τοῦτο αὐτοὶ κριταὶ ἔσονται ὑμῶν. 20 εἰ δὲ ἐν δακτύλῳ θεοῦ ἐγὼ ἐκβάλλω τὰ δαιμόνια, ἄρα ἔφθασεν ἐφ’ ὑμᾶς ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ.

Let us look first at the accusation against Jesus, where we find the following verbal agreements. The name “Beelzebul” is striking, since it is virtually unattested outside Christian texts,<sup>83</sup> and this is a strong indicator of a common core in the conflict. We also find in both Mark and Q the affirmations that Beelzebul is the ruler of the demons (ὁ ἄρχων τῶν δαιμονίων) and that it is through him that Jesus drives out the demons (ἐκβάλλει τὰ δαιμόνια). Only small divergences result from Mark’s choice of indirect speech with the ὅτι and the redactional insertion of the first accusation, viz. that Jesus is possessed by Beelzebul

<sup>83</sup> Cf. e.g. Trunk, Heiler, 46–48 (with evidence); D. D. Sheets, “Jesus as Demon-Possessed,” in Who do My Opponents Say That I Am? An Investigation of the Accusations Against the Historical Jesus, ed. S. McKnight and J. B. Modica, LNTS 358 (London: T&T Clark, 2008), 27–49, at 29. The only Jewish exception is a magical text in Greek which is noted by R. Reitzenstein, Poimandres: Studien zur griechisch-ägyptischen und frühchristlichen Literatur (Leipzig: Teubner, 1904), 75–76. The name is attested for Baal in Ugaritic; cf. E. C. B. Maclaurin, “Beelzeboul,” NovT 20 (1978): 156–160; H. Gese, “Die Religionen Altsyriens,” in idem, M. Höfner, and K. Rudolph, Die Religionen Altsyriens, Altarabiens und der Mandäer, Rdm 10.2 (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1970), 3–232, at 122.

(Βεελζεβοῦλ ἔχει). It is particularly striking that both versions speak of “Satan,” although in the accusation it is Beelzebul who is presented as the leader of the demons. This is no arbitrary coincidence; rather, it points to a common core in both versions, a stable element which survived the process of oral transmission. The strong figure of Satan, who is established by the New Testament period as the decisive opponent of God and of all who are pious,<sup>84</sup> as well as the terminological switch from the “ruler of the demons” to the name “Satan,” explain the presence of a lasting and verbally defined element in the traces in the memory.

Mark gives the first reaction conditionally, by means of the ἐάν-clause, as an individual instance; Q, by means of πάντα, envisages a general rule. In Mark, the consequence of the division within the kingdom and the house is that they cannot stand; in Q, the kingdom is laid waste, and the house cannot remain standing. In Q, the logion about Satan (Q 11:18) asks rhetorically about the impossibility for the kingdom to remain standing when it is internally divided. In Mark 3:26, Satan rises up against himself and is thus internally divided; this leads to the announcement by Jesus that he cannot remain standing, and has come to an end. This means that the accusation is consistent, since the adversaries picture the rule of Satan as unbroken (even although he is fighting against himself). There is a basic verbal element in Q and Mark which each text gives a new arrangement. There is nothing surprising in the use of the nouns βασιλεία and οἰκία, nor of the verb μερίζω and the phrase ἐφ’ ἑαυτήν. The subject under discussion and the motifs associated with it activate<sup>85</sup> the appropriate words in the linguistic storehouse of those who transmit the story.

The second response in Q (11:19–20) is not found in Mark. In the third response, the linguistic comparison meets its limits, since although there is a large measure of agreement between Mark 3:27 and Matt 12:29, this agreement against Luke 11:21–22 indicates that Matt 12:29 draws exclusively on Mark 3:27 and elaborates this text. It is possible that a Q version (older than Mark) of the “stronger” man who binds a strong man lies behind the parable at Luke 11:21, which is likewise the product of redactional elaboration.

<sup>84</sup> On the figure of Satan cf. C. Breytenbach and P. L. Day, “Satan,” in DDD<sup>2</sup> (1999): 726–732 with an introductory bibliography at 731–732.

<sup>85</sup> On the use of this term in the psychology of the memory, cf. the brief account by A. Mecklinger, “Aktivierung,” in Gedächtnis und Erinnerung, ed. Pethes and Ruchatz, 29–30.

The counterfoil to these convergences is the presence of differences in the contents of the two texts.<sup>86</sup> I believe that these need not necessarily be seen as Markan redactional revisions.<sup>87</sup> Nor should we ignore the divergences in the second and third replies of Jesus, since these constitute a decisive argument against the hypothesis of literary dependence between the two versions. The convergences in the concept of Beelzebul and his link to Satan, as well as the thematic concentration, suggest a common core of tradition. The new structuring and transformation of the material can be considered as the work of the collective memory which hands on the story.

6. Trajectories: Remembering and Transmitting as a Process of Shaping and Conserving

6.1. Summary of the Comparison

On the level of rhetorical-narrative linkage, the two versions display both parallels and differences. This begins with the linkage between the Beelzebul accusation and the exorcism. Mark does not employ the exorcism at any point in his narrative in the immediate vicinity to the controversy; rather, the reader is pointed back to the narrative context as a whole, which offers sufficient references to Jesus' exorcistic activity. The integration into a pattern of conflict corresponds to the kind of controversy about Jesus that is reflected in the Beelzebul accusation, but this pattern is applied independently by each text; both the elaboration of the conflict and its concluding point are different. In Mark, the adversaries are a counterfoil to the true followers of Jesus, who have been delivered from the dominion of Satan. In Q, those who make the accusation reveal themselves to be representatives of "this generation," and their rejection reflects the experience of those who transmitted the Q material.

A comparison of the two structures shows that the transition from the accusation to Jesus' replies is formed independently: the Markan variant is an autonomous construction which betrays no direct relationship to Q. It is only in the first reply in Mark and Q that the position and contents of the reply agree.

<sup>86</sup> Cf. e.g. Trautmann, Handlungen, 270.

<sup>87</sup> For a different view, cf. e.g. Lambrecht, "Relatives," passim.

The linguistic convergences permit the supposition of a common core of tradition, but it is very difficult for a model of literary dependence to accommodate the differences, since these can be explained only in part as the result of redactional work.

6.2. Literary-Critical Solutions and Their Dilemmas

1. This means that despite the methodologically meticulous investigation by Fleddermann,<sup>88</sup> I find the hypothesis of a direct literary dependence of Mark from Q unprovable.<sup>89</sup> The differences in vocabulary and contents can be explained only in part by the supposition that the Markan redaction has adopted Q. I believe that most of the differences, and above all the omission of Q 11:19–20, argue against a direct dependence.

2. Another hypothesis might explain these differences and omissions by means of literary criticism of the document Q. Recent scholarship envisages the addition of Q 11:19–20 at a late stage, so that a literary relationship between an early stratum of Q and Mark would be possible. Despite the rhetorical developments, the words of Jesus in Q are marked by changes of themes and motifs and by changes in the form of address. The transitions show that a variety of traditions have been combined.

It is however difficult to believe that Q 11:19–20 was formed by the redaction of Q as an addition to the logia about domination and rule. There is much to indicate that Jesus counters the accusation that he is in league with demonic powers by pointing out the inconsistency of a kingdom that is at war with its own self (11:17–18); and it is possible that the logion about the strong man who is defeated by the stronger man has been attached to this by means of linking catchwords, as a "Christological commentary."<sup>90</sup> It is certainly possible that this process of growth took place before Q had a fixed written form. The metaphorical logion in Q 11:21–22, with a parallel in Pss. Sol. 5:3a, could have been transmitted independently, as the parallel to Mark 3:27 par. Matt 12:29 in Gos. Thom. 35 shows. Q 11:19–20 was inserted between the metaphorical logia Q 11:17–18 and 11:21–22.<sup>91</sup> Verse 18 was an obvious point of linkage: here, Jesus asks how the satanic βασιλεία can endure, if the accusation of his adversaries is correct. Once again, we have a chain linked by catchwords, where the emphasis moves to the theme of the kingdom of God. An important question in the process of the history of tradition is the narrative framework. Without a narrative framework, it would scarcely be possible to transmit Q 11:19–20.<sup>92</sup> The material in Q (11:14, 19–20) which diverges from Mark 3:22–24 offers one possible explanation. The exorcism at Q 11:14, linked with an accusation like that in Q 11:15 (catchword: “Beelzebul”), could have introduced the double logion 11:19–20.

<sup>88</sup> Fleddermann, Mark, 41–66, esp. 57–59; idem, Q: A Reconstruction and Commentary, 496–500; Lambrecht, "Relatives," passim.

<sup>89</sup> Cf. e.g. Schüling, Studien, 111 etc.

<sup>90</sup> This is the view of H.-J. Klauck, Allegorie und Allegorese in synoptischen Gleichnissen, NTANF 13 (Münster: Aschendorff, 1978), 179.

To which stratum of Q does the Beelzebul controversy belong? On the basis of the conflict, which is interpreted in the light of the debates with “this generation” (Q 7:31; 11:29–32; 11:50–51), it has been argued that this section is a late addition.<sup>93</sup> However, this catchword is not actually employed in the controversy. Rather, Jesus’ discussion with his adversaries can be considered part of the basic substance of Q. It is only the polemical intensification, where the adversaries’ sons become their judges (Q 11:19), that may well belong to the later polemic against the Jewish milieu which was contemporary with those who transmitted Q.<sup>94</sup> Methodologically, the problem is whether this model identifies with certainty a literary dependence. May not the solution rather lie in pre-literary parallel developments?<sup>95</sup>

3. We must therefore look at a third definition of the relationship which takes its methodological orientation in the literary-critical paradigm. On the basis of a comparison of the two texts (just as in a syn-

<sup>91</sup> This is supported by the double tradition in Mark 3:22–24, where there is no convincing explanation of why the aphorism should have been omitted; cf. also e.g. Kollmann, Jesus, 176.

<sup>92</sup> Cf. e.g. H. Räisänen, “Exorcisms and the Kingdom: Is Q 11:20 a Saying of the Historical Jesus?,” in Symbols and Strata: Essays on the Sayings Gospel Q, ed. R. Uro, PFES 65 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1996), 119–142 (at 128–129), on Q 11:20.

<sup>93</sup> J.S. Kloppenborg, Formation, 323–324; Mack, Lost Gospel, 90, 132, 165, etc.; M. Humphries, “The Kingdom of God in the Q Version of the Beelzebul Controversion,” FORUM 9 (1993): 121–150, at 144–146: Q<sup>2</sup>. H. Schürmann, “QLk 11,14–36 kompositionsgeschichtlich befragt,” in The Four Gospels 1992, ed. van Segbroeck et al., 563–586, at 584–585, envisages a late insertion.

<sup>94</sup> Labahn, “Jesu Exorcismen,” 620–621.

<sup>95</sup> Cf. also Neiryneck, “Development,” 425: “but how do we prove Mark’s dependence on Q, and not on a traditional saying or on some pre-Q collection of sayings?”

optic comparison), an older material is distilled and traced back, on the basis of a more or less extensive discussion, to the historical Jesus.<sup>96</sup> The oldest material is inferred directly from those elements which are transmitted in common by Mark and Q. It has been argued that these include both the Beelzebul accusation and the two replies by Jesus which employ the theme of domination and rule.<sup>97</sup> It is believed that we can identify older or more recent elements in the history of tradition.

This methodological approach must pay heed to the differences in the parallel passages and ask whether a method that has been tried out on texts with a literary transmission can be applied to the specific situation in which the Beelzebul controversy was transmitted. If indeed the reconstructed unit "schon als kleine Teilsammlung schriftlich fixiert war" (was already fixed in writing as a little collection on its own),<sup>98</sup> this question becomes even more urgent, since the various differences must now be explained as products of the redaction of an originally uniform unit.<sup>99</sup> This makes it necessary to employ a methodology that understands both the controversies as separate trajectories of development from one common core, so that the diachronic question must be discussed separately in the case of each trajectory. This would lead to a differentiated total picture.

6.3. Traces in the Memory ("Gedächtnisspuren")—An Attempt at a Solution

The convergences make it indisputable that a common core lies behind the two traditions.

The best explanatory model chooses as its starting point Jesus' exorcistic activity (which is historically conceivable), which was linked to his

---

<sup>96</sup> Even according to the Jesus seminar, the Beelzebul controversy is estimated as an historical deed of Jesus: R. Funk, The Acts of Jesus: The Search for the Authentic Deeds of Jesus (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1999), 566.

<sup>97</sup> Cf. e.g. Trunk, Heiler, pp. 55–56: "Consequently, there must be a common tradition (probably an oral tradition) antecedent to Mark and Q (= T 1). The material in Q which goes beyond Mark—the exorcism which is placed at the very beginning, the second and third arguments, and the concluding logion, Matt 12:30 par.—derive from another oral tradition, or from several traditions (= T 2/3), not all of which need originally have been connected to the accusation that Jesus was in league with Beelzebul" (56). Cf. also Guijarro, "Wirkung," 65. Without Q 11:21–22: Schüling, Studien, 111–112; Kollmann, Jesus, 175–177.

<sup>98</sup> Schüling, Studien, 112.

<sup>99</sup> Thus e.g. Schüling, Studien, 113–114.

proclamation of the kingdom of God (which had an orientation to praxis). As an exorcist, Jesus was suspected of himself sharing in “the dark side of power,”<sup>100</sup> either as one who manipulated it or as one who was manipulated by it. As several strands of tradition, including the Johannine variants (John 7:20; 8:48–52; 10:20), show, the historical Jesus was accused of closeness to the demonic world. Similar accusations with regard to his followers, who were probably also active as exorcists,<sup>101</sup> will have helped keep alive the tradition of the offensive controversies, leaving a concrete trace in the memory (“Gedächtnisspur”) of various early Christian groups of followers of Jesus. The traces take on a tangible literary form in Mark and Q.

The following features are of decisive importance in evaluating the structural and linguistic nature of the core element: the atypical name “Beelzebul,” the change to the character of “Satan,” and Jesus’ reply, which is considered an unchallengeable argument, with its sapiential-rhetorical reference to the unity of the kingdom or house which is essential if it is to endure. This logic, which reveals how unreasonable the adversaries of Jesus are when they accuse him in this way, has left its traces in the memory of those who handed it on. The basic data and themes of the conflict and of Jesus’ refutation remained present in the memory of a number of “transmitters” and were developed in such a way that convergent basic structures emerged, which were variously elaborated. The linguistic uniformity owed its preservation both to the special theme and to the fact that the controversy and the motifs formed a complete unit.

In view of the free variability of the matter and the language, it is appropriate to attribute the differences between the traces in the memory to the oral tradition. We must assume that the core was developed and preserved in mutually independent processes. With C. Breytenbach, we can explain the common structures and convergences on the basis of the preservative achievement of the memory.<sup>102</sup>

---

<sup>100</sup> On the suspicion that exorcists share in the demonic power, cf. J. Marcus, “The Beelzebul Controversy and the Eschatologies of Jesus,” in Authenticating the Activities of Jesus, ed. B. D. Chilton and C. A. Evans, NTS 28.2 (Leiden: Brill, 1999), 247–277, at 263 (with bibliography).

<sup>101</sup> Cf. the texts and their exegesis in Kollmann, Jesus, 316–378.

<sup>102</sup> Breytenbach, “MNHMONEYEIN,” 554–555.

They do not compel us to accept the hypothesis of literary dependencies or connections.

The law of the triad plays a particular role in this preservative achievement along the various tracks until the texts take written form, or in the actual process whereby they took written form. The fact that the two early Christian documents have three refutations is not evidence of literary dependencies, but points to a fundamental phenomenon: the documents are structured by the preservative achievement of the memory of the authors who work on them. This is confirmed by analogous thematic sections, e.g. the texts about the strong/stronger man (Mark 3:27–Q 11:21–22) or the references to the Spirit (Mark 3:28–30–Q 11:24–26). While the first theme is prompted by the theme of the kingdom or house, the reflection on the Spirit indicates the fundamental category in which the mighty deeds of Jesus and of his followers are interpreted: they are understood against the background of the Spirit of God.

6.4. Consequences for the Search for Jesus Traditions

If then it is correct that the two versions of the Beelzebul controversy which have taken written form in Q and in Mark are not documents of a literary dependence, but represent a historical remembrance (or at least, contain a core of remembrance) which has been reflected and transmitted in various ways, this gives us a clear glimpse of the process of oral tradition in early Christianity and of the way in which the Jesus tradition was remembered. A close examination of the Beelzebul controversy reveals a dynamic in the history of tradition which offers considerable help in understanding the contexts and the developments in the formation of early Christian theology. In this light, the differences and the parallels between early Christian texts about Jesus acquire a new significance and can provide information which allows us to carry out fundamental observations about the preservation and the shaping of the Jesus tradition.

It is clear that not one original narrative can be reconstructed from the two trajectories of the Beelzebul controversy, and that there are serious limitations on the mode of re-construction of oral tradition. This is not surprising, when we bear in mind the constructive power of the memory and the productive power of recollection and of oral transmission. What is surprising is the extent to which constancy and agreement have been preserved both in the vocabulary and in the rhetorical structure.

We cannot however answer the question whether the paths of transmission led independently of each other to a simplification through additions or omissions. I believe that the present example offers little evidence to help decide such a question. The rhythm of the triad, which I have mentioned, is attributable to analogous structures in the process whereby the transmitters or authors reproduce what they remember.

These observations are significant for the work of historical reconstruction of the earthly Jesus. We may indeed accept in principle that it is impossible to get back literally to the ipsissima vox, but there is no reason to accept the utter skepticism about the possibility of reconstructing Jesus traditions which is sometimes presented on the basis of studies of oral tradition. This skepticism has sometimes led to a frontal assault on the criteria employed in historical research.<sup>103</sup> The important question is the extent to which oral traditions have a preservative character and are therefore reliable. It has long been recognized that oral tradition, with its character of a “performance,” covers a spectrum between preservation and change which is based both on its form and on its contents.<sup>104</sup> It is clear that traditions in the cultural memory of early Christianity preserve basic elements and structures, since these are handed on out of respect for the narrative protagonist of the Jesus traditions, who creates religious identity in the community which transmits his memory. This knowledge, taken together with our awareness that all historical work involves the construction of meaning,<sup>105</sup> can lead to insights that find a general consensus. The alternative to historical objectivism is not an historical agnosticism that merely registers

---

<sup>103</sup> Cf. H. W. Hollander, “The Words of Jesus: From Oral Traditions to Written Record in Paul and Q,” NovT 42 (2000): 340–357, at 354: “The oral phase behind our gospel texts and pre-gospel sources makes it, historically speaking, impossible for us to ascribe any sayings to the historical Jesus.” He draws the following consequence on the same page, n. 41: “the well-known rules of judgement that are found to be helpful in reaching a decision about what material comes from the historical Jesus . . . are highly questionable.”

<sup>104</sup> R. Thomas, Oral Tradition and Written Record in Classical Athens, Cambridge Studies in Oral and Literate Culture 18 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989), 123–125.

<sup>105</sup> On the concept of the “construction of meaning” (Sinnbildung) from the perspective of exegesis, cf. U. Schnelle, Paulus: Leben und Denken, GLB (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2003), 11–18; idem, Theologie des Neuen Testaments, UTB 2917 (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2007), 22–25.

the remoteness of the literary sources from the remembered event. The analysis of the Beelzebul controversy shows that we must assume that the object of memory continues to exist in the memory.<sup>106</sup> And this means that we have a sufficient basis for historical construction.<sup>107</sup>

---

<sup>106</sup> Cf. in general e.g. M. Moxter, “Erzählung und Ereignis: Über den Spielraum historischer Repräsentation,” in Der historische Jesus: Tendenzen und Perspektiven der gegenwärtigen Forschung, ed. J. Schröter and R. Brucker, BZNW 114 (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2002), 67–88, at 67: “Wäre da nicht das Ereignis, wir hätten nichts zu erzählen” (“If there was no event, we would have nothing to narrate”).

<sup>107</sup> On the concept of “construction” in the sense of the “construction of history,” cf. e.g. J. Schröter, “Von der Historizität der Evangelien: Ein Beitrag zur gegenwärtigen Diskussion um den historischen Jesus,” in Der historische Jesus, ed. Schröter and Brucker, 163–212, at 167–168, reprinted in: idem, Von Jesus zum Neuen Testament. Studien zur urchristlichen Theologiegeschichte und zur Entstehung des neutestamentlichen Kanons, WUNT 204 (Tübingen: Mohr—Siebeck, 2007), 105–146, at 108–109.

DID JESUS BREAK THE FIFTH (FOURTH) COMMANDMENT?

PETER BALLA

1. Introduction

My thesis in this essay is to show that the “general rule” in early Christianity is a kind of child-parent relationship which can be seen in the pagan and Jewish environment of the New Testament: honouring one’s parents is strongly expected from children.<sup>1</sup> It is argued here that the radicalism of Jesus’ own way of life (and that of the wandering charismatics in the early church) does not deny the validity of that rule; it only sets certain limits to it inasmuch as Jesus and the Kingdom he preached require that he and the kingdom receive final priority. It will be further argued that Jesus’ claim of a special relationship to God implied that ultimately it was God’s will that the disciples obeyed when they followed Jesus. If so, then even the “limits” set to the general expectation of honour toward parents were not a unique element in the Jesus movement; rather, the main reason for the limits, to which we can find parallels in the socio-historical environment, was applied to Jesus: God comes before parents. This overall thesis requires to be substantiated by close examination of a host of New Testament texts. In this paper we can only discuss a few of them.<sup>2</sup> I propose that the texts are best interpreted in the light of the expectations (and limits) found in the environment. That is why, before turning to the gospel material, we shall collect some relevant views from the pagan and Jewish background of the New Testament.

---

<sup>1</sup> I thank the Alexander von Humboldt Foundation for enabling me to carry out research on this theme at the University of Heidelberg during twelve months in 1999–2000, and to return there for a short research visit in July 2004. I thank my Gastgeberprofessor, Prof. Dr. Gerd Theissen, for commenting on the manuscript that has become my Habilitationsschrift (see note 2). The present essay is based on that research, and on some chapters of that book.

<sup>2</sup> For more detailed argumentation concerning these texts, and for a discussion of further New Testament passages, see the following monograph: Peter Balla, The Child-Parent Relationship in the New Testament and Its Environment, WUNT 155 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2003), ch. 4, 114–156.

2. Some Examples from the Environment<sup>3</sup>

Diogenes Laertius writes (7.120; in the section on Zeno): “The Stoics approve also of honouring parents and brothers in the second place next after the gods.” The very connection expressed by the phrase “next after the gods” shows that among human beings parents are to be honoured before all others; however, the “gods” have a priority over parents. We can find further examples in the writings of Hierocles.<sup>4</sup> The titles given by him to the sections imply a certain ranking: he discusses conduct first towards the gods, then towards one’s country.<sup>5</sup> Then he writes: “After considering the gods and our country, what person deserves to be mentioned more than, or prior to our parents? . . . No mistake, therefore, will be made by him who says that they are as it were secondary or terrestrial divinities.”<sup>6</sup> Although between the gods and parents there is mention of the fatherland, it is nevertheless clear that among human beings parents are to be placed first. The text implies honour as a duty, and parents are ranked very close to the gods in the list of those to whom honour is due.

Cicero has a similar sequence of the triad gods—country—parents in Off. 1.45.160: “even in the social relations themselves there are gradations of duty (gradus officiorum) so well defined that it can easily be seen which duty takes precedence over any other: our first duty is to the immortal gods; our second, to country; our third, to parents; and so on, in a descending scale, to the rest.” Cicero can also refer to the “fatherland” (patria) and parents without mentioning the gods (Off. 1.17.58): “Now, if a contrast and comparison were to be made to find out where most of our moral obligation is due, country would come first, and parents; for their services have laid us under the heaviest obligation; next come children and the whole family, who look to us alone for support and have no other protection . . .”.

<sup>3</sup> See chs. 2 and 3 in Balla, The Child-Parent Relationship, 41–111.

<sup>4</sup> Karl Praechter has marshalled arguments in favour of his thesis that the fragments of Hierocles preserved by Stobaeus are best understood as the work of a Stoic; Praechter, Hierokles der Stoiker (Leipzig: Dieterich’sche Verlags-Buchhandlung, 1901). I quote the texts in David R. Fideler’s translation; Fideler, ed., The Pythagorean Sourcebook and Library: An Anthology of Ancient Writings Which Relate to Pythagoras and Pythagorean Philosophy (Grand Rapids, MI: Phanes Press, 1987), 275–279.

<sup>5</sup> Ibid., 275–77.

<sup>6</sup> Ibid., 277; Greek text in Praechter, Hierokles, 45.

We note the argument that parents support and protect their children; this implies that children owe them a return. Once again, we observe that parents are accorded the first place among human relationships.

Seneca writes: “not to love one’s parents is to be unfilial” (parentes suos non amare impietas est; Ben. 3.1.5). Thus love and pietas are inseparable. Seneca also says that children “owe” their parents the provision of care. In Ben. 6.23.5 he writes: “We owe filial duty to our parents” (debemus parentibus nostris pietatem). In this latter context he refers to the gods as well as to nature as providing for us; inasmuch as they give life to children through their parents, the gods and nature can be seen as the ground for saying that children owe their parents provision in return.

Having seen some pagan sources, let us refer to a few Jewish examples. One of our main sources is Philo of Alexandria. Philo has numerous short remarks on the relationship between children and parents. In her essay entitled “Parents and Children: A Philonic Perspective,” Adele Reinhartz affirms that comments related to the parent-child relationship appear “in every extant treatise of the Exposition.”<sup>7</sup> Philo has also longer sections where he discusses the Fifth Commandment.<sup>8</sup> A few quotations may suffice here.

In his treatise On the Decalogue, Philo treats the Fifth Commandment twice: first as it comes at its own place in the line of the Ten Commandments (Decal. 106–120); and then on the occasion of a summary towards the end of the treatise (165–167). Philo introduces his discussion of the Fifth Commandment in Decal. 106–120 with the following summary (106): “After dealing with the seventh day, He gives the fifth commandment on the honour due to parents.” We note that Philo summarizes the reference to “father and mother” in the Fifth Commandment as “parents”. He divides the Ten Commandments into two sets of five. Concerning the Fifth Commandment, he affirms (106): “This commandment He placed on the borderline between the two sets of five; it is the last of the first set in which the most sacred injunctions are given and it adjoins the second set which contains the duties of man to man.” This implies a very high view of parents, since the duty toward them is placed as the conclusion of the list of duties toward God. Inasmuch as the Old Testament does not tell us how the commandments are divided on the two tables of stone, Philo goes beyond the Old Testament when distinguishing the Fifth Commandment from other commandments concerning duties towards fellow human beings, and placing it on the “border-line between the mortal and the immortal side of existence” (Decal. 107).<sup>9</sup> Philo argues by referring to the procreative function of parents (107): They belong not only to the mortal, but also to “... the immortal [side of existence] because the act of generation assimilates them to God, the generator of the All.”

<sup>7</sup> Adele Reinhartz, “Parents and Children: A Philonic Perspective,” in The Jewish Family in Antiquity, ed. S. J. D. Cohen (Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press, 1993), 61–88, at 62.

<sup>8</sup> Although the commandments are not numbered in the Old Testament, Philo numbers them. I adopt his numbering which coincides with the numbering in my native church, the Reformed Church in Hungary, and in the Reformed churches in general. The Lutheran and Catholic churches refer to the commandment to honour father and mother as the Fourth Commandment.

Philo discusses the Fifth Commandment again in his treatise entitled On the Special Laws (2.224–241). We found in Greek and Latin writings that parents appeared in certain “rankings.” Philo also “ranks” parents; they come immediately after God (Spec. 2.235): “Honour therefore, he says, next to God thy father and thy mother, who are crowned with a laurel of the second rank assigned to them by nature, the arbitress of the contest”. It is interesting to observe here that even in a passage where Philo refers to the commandment itself, he expounds it with his own interpretation by referring to “nature.”

The Letter of Aristeeas refers to the duty that is required by God’s commandment. The letter has a long section which relates how during the seven days of a banquet the Egyptian king put questions to each of the translators of the Septuagint (Let. Arist. 187–294). In Let. Arist. 228 we read that the king “asked the sixth guest to answer. His question was, ‘To whom must one show favour?’ The answer was, ‘To his parents, always, for God’s very great commandment concerns the honour due to parents. Next (and closely connected) he reckons the honour due to friends, calling the friend an equal of one’s own self. You do well if you bring all men into friendship with yourself.’” Here we observe the priority of parents over all other human beings.

The Sibylline Oracles has a passage with a certain “ranking” as well. In the third book, lines 573–574 provide the context for our relevant passage: “There will again be a sacred race of pious men who attend to the counsels and intention of the Most High.” Then in lines 593–594 we read: “and they honour only the Immortal who always rules, and then their parents.” We note that in these examples the appearance of the duty right after the duty of honouring God can be seen as a “limit” in one’s duty toward parents: God has a priority over parents.

---

<sup>9</sup> I owe this point to Professor Eduard Schweizer (see Balla, The Child-Parent Relationship, 87 n. 16).

Pseudo-Phocylides provides further evidence that we may call a “ranking”. Line 8 reads: “Honour God foremost, and afterward your parents”. Pseudo-Phocylides is a significant source in the realm of ethical conduct in the household, on which he has a long passage (lines 175–227), which is of significance as regards formal parallels to the Household Codes in Colossians and Ephesians.

Jubilees mentions parents and neighbours as those to whom honour is due; once again, neighbours come only after the parents. In Jub. 7.20 we read: “And in the twenty-eighth jubilee Noah began to command his grandsons with ordinances and commandments and all the judgments which he knew. And he bore witness to his sons so that they might do justice and cover the shame of their flesh and bless the one who created them and honour father and mother, and each one love his neighbour and preserve themselves from fornication and pollution and from all injustice.” Though Jubilees refers to Noah here, it seems likely that the Fifth Commandment and the commandment to love one’s neighbour from Leviticus can be supposed to be in the background. We observe the significant order: 1. to bless the creator; 2. to honour father and mother; 3. to love one’s neighbour.

Fragments from Qumran also confirm the presence of the duty of honouring one’s parents in Palestine, not long before the time of Jesus. In 4Q416, frag. 2, col. III, lines 14–19a we read:<sup>10</sup>

14... Study the mystery that is to come, And understand all the ways of Truth, And all the roots of iniquity 15 thou shalt contemplate. Then thou shalt know what is bitter for a man, And what is sweet for a person. Honour thy father in thy poverty, 16 And thy mother in thy low estate. For as God (scarcely ‘the Father’) is to a man, so is his own father; And as the Lord is to a person, so is his mother; For 17 they are ‘the womb that was pregnant with thee’; And just as He has set them in authority over thee And fashioned (thee) according to the Spirit, So serve thou them, And as 18 they have uncovered thy ear to the mystery that is to come, Honour thou them for the sake of thine own honour And with [reverence] venerate their persons, 19 For the sake of thy life and of the length of thy days. vacat.

<sup>10</sup> Text in Emanuel Tov ed., Qumran Cave 4, XXIV: Sapiential Texts, Part 2, DJD 34 (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1999), 113. In another fragment we find the same text: 4Q418 9–10. Tov’s translation is based on a composite text (his italics).

These examples may suffice to show that both the Greek and Latin pagan authors and the contemporary Jewish sources attest the duty of honouring one's parents, and—not surprisingly—the Jewish sources even confirm the validity of the Fifth Commandment at the time of Jesus. Let us turn to texts in which Jesus can be seen as one fitting into this “environment.”

3. Jesus Observing the Fifth Commandment

There are two passages in the synoptic gospels where the Fifth Commandment, “Honour your father and your mother” (RSV), is quoted in a context where it is implied that the Ten Commandments are to be observed; they are seen by Jesus and his first followers as the primary Old Testament texts that direct their behaviour. There are also passages where the Fifth Commandment is not referred to, but sayings or actions of people imply its validity. These texts affirm that Jesus and his disciples shared the norm of their environment: parents are to be honoured; they are to be obeyed and, when they grow old, they are to be cared for.

The first occurrence of the Fifth Commandment in Mark is at 7:10, in the Korban pericope (7:9–13). This passage has a parallel only in Matthew (15:1–9), where it is located in the same context: the preceding and following pericopes correspond to those that surround the Markan passage. As regards the whole of the pericope, Matthew's version is shorter than that of Mark. In the verse containing the Fifth Commandment, there are differences as well as agreements. The major agreement is that both Mark and Matthew have a double quotation: after Exod 20:12a (or Deut 5:16a) they also quote Exod 21:16 (LXX; in MT 21:17; cf. also Lev 20:9, which has a similar content). In the second quotation, they agree verbatim with one another, and they both differ slightly from the Septuagint version of Exod 21:16.

I think we can maintain the authenticity of this Old Testament quotation on Jesus' lips.<sup>11</sup> As a Jew, Jesus most probably acknowledged the validity of the Ten Commandments. He shared with his Jewish and pagan environment the expectation that parents have to be honoured. It is significant that in this passage, reporting on a dispute with “Pharisees and scribes from Jerusalem,” the Fifth Commandment is reported to have been quoted by Jesus himself both in Mark’s and in Matthew’s version. The early church probably held that this attitude was an important element of the picture they had of Jesus.

---

<sup>11</sup> For a different view, see Harry Jungbauer, “Ehre Vater und Mutter”: Der Weg des Elterngedots in der biblischen Tradition, WUNT 2.146 (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2002), 266.

Having said this, it is to be acknowledged that our very passage also claims that the norm was not universally followed. Mark uses the Hebrew and Aramaic term korban, a gift offered to the temple, and its correct Greek equivalent, dōron, whereas Matthew uses only the latter, when they present the opponents of Jesus as finding an excuse not to fulfil the commandment. In Mark’s version we read (7:11–13): “but you say, ‘If a man tells his father or his mother, What you would have gained from me is Corban’ (that is, given to God) then you no longer permit him to do anything for his father or mother, thus making void the word of God through your tradition which you hand on.” In v. 12, the idea of “doing” something for parents probably means caring for them when they are old. The parallel version, Matt 15:5, clearly claims that helping one’s parents equals honouring them: “But you say, If any one tells his father or his mother, What you would have gained from me is given to God, he need not honour his father.”

Both Mark and Matthew (and/or the communities they represent) held that the Fifth Commandment was valid and should be observed without looking for reasons for exceptions. We observe that the Fifth Commandment is used here as an example of differentiating between the commandment of God and human tradition (cf. 7:8,13). It is significant that the child-parent relationship is taken as an example; this shows that this area has a special place in God’s will. In our pericope the verb “to honour” (timan) points to this connection: God is honoured with the lips alone (v. 6); this lip-service becomes evident from the fact that parents are not honoured (vv. 10–13).<sup>12</sup>

The other occurrence of the Fifth Commandment in Mark is at 10:19. The pericope of the “Rich Man,” often referred to as the “rich young ruler”, is transmitted by all three synoptic gospels (Mark 10:17–27; par. Matt 19:16–26 and Luke 18:18–27). The commandment to honour one’s father and mother is quoted by Jesus in all three versions.<sup>13</sup> It appears in a list of those elements of the Ten Commandments which concern fellow human beings—sometimes referred to as the second of the two tables of stones. The three versions are not exactly identical in content and order (and there are even variant readings within the individual gospel traditions), but they all agree in putting the commandment to honour father and mother at the end of the list.<sup>14</sup> We remember that Philo argued that this commandment is deliberately put at the boundary between obligations toward God and those toward fellow human beings. We may add that the position at the end of the list in the synoptic gospels can also be regarded as an emphasis. I agree with Joachim Gnilka who affirms that this position implies that the Fifth (or in his numbering the “Fourth”) Commandment is to be understood against the background of social duties toward parents.<sup>15</sup> The text does not say anything about the parents of the man who approached Jesus, but if he was indeed “rich” and “young” (as a conflation of the various synoptic accounts implies), then the social duties expressed by the commandments quoted may have been intended to have a special appeal to him: he probably did not kill anybody, but what about fair treatment of the poor and provision for his own parents?

---

<sup>12</sup> I owe this observation to Professor Gerd Theissen, Heidelberg (letter dated 6.1.2001).

<sup>13</sup> I note that according to Harry Jungbauer the citation of the commandment does not go back to Jesus, but is an addition of an early Christian “compiler” of this “categorical piece” (“Ehre Vater und Mutter,” 282–283).

We observe that the man claims that he has fulfilled these commandments, and Jesus does not challenge this claim (Mark 10:20–21). This raises the question how this pericope relates to the following one (in each of the synoptic gospels), which is about the disciples leaving everything behind. This latter pericope will be discussed later in this essay (section 5). It is appropriate to remark at this point that there are two possible interpretations. It may be argued that the latter pericope throws light upon the former, i.e. the rich man was also asked to leave his family when he was to sell everything. I would argue that the first pericope throws light on the second: observing the Fifth Commandment is expected, and the disciples’ leaving everything behind has to be seen against this background. In Matthew’s version, after the last part of the list from the Ten Commandment, that is, after the commandment to honour father and mother, Lev 19:18 is also added: “You shall love your neighbour as yourself.” Thus, at least for Matthew (and/or his community) these commandments belonged together, and they were both valid.

---

<sup>14</sup> For a clear summary of views of scholars on the differences of content in the lists, see Joel F. Williams, Other Followers of Jesus: Minor Characters as Major Figures in Mark’s Gospel, JSNTSup 102 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1994), 144 n. 2.

<sup>15</sup> Joachim Gnilka, Das Evangelium nach Markus, EKKNT 2.2 (Zürich: Benziger Verlag, 1979), 87.

At the end of this section we discuss briefly two further pericopes that support the picture gained in the exegesis of the previous passages. Each of them is special material of the gospel in which it is preserved: one from Luke and one from the Fourth Gospel. In Luke 2:41–52, the story of the twelve-year-old Jesus is narrated only by Luke, and even he brings it in only at the end of the birth narrative. There are scholars who doubt the historicity of this story.<sup>16</sup> Without attempting to solve this problem, I simply note that on the surface of the story we find a contradiction in Jesus' behaviour. On the one hand, he causes worry for his parents by staying behind in Jerusalem without any notice (Luke 2:48), though it has to be emphasized that it is not indicated either by the parents of Jesus or by the evangelist that Jesus was disobedient. On the other hand, at the end of the story Jesus joins his parents and returns with them to Nazareth. The text even stresses his obedience (2:51). There is no real contradiction here. Jesus simply follows the general rule we have seen in the environment (expressed in lists of those to whom honour is due): God always comes before parents. Accordingly, Jesus' answer to his parents indicates that he has his heavenly father in mind;<sup>17</sup> so the RSV inserts the term "house" into its translation (2:49): "How is it that you sought me? Did you not know that I must be in my Father's house?" Whether this story is to be labeled a legend (or anecdote) or not, we note that according to this story Jesus grew up in his parents' home, and it was presupposed in a natural way that he obeyed them. The early church must have thought that Jesus observed the Fifth Commandment; otherwise this story would not emphasize his obedience to his parents.

---

<sup>16</sup> François Bovon calls it an "anecdote", Das Evangelium nach Lukas, EKKNT 3.1,2 (Zürich: Benziger Verlag, 1989–1996), 1:154. According to him, Luke took it over from the tradition and reworked it.

<sup>17</sup> We note that if God is called "father", this implies that honour is due to fathers in general. For a discussion of the fatherhood of God in Jesus' sayings, see Dieter Zeller, "God as Father in the Proclamation and in the Prayer of Jesus," in Standing Before God: Studies on Prayer in Scriptures and in Tradition with Essays, ed. A. Finkel and L. Frizzell (New York: Ktav Publishing House, 1981), 117–129. He argues that Jesus did not speak "to his Father exclusively" (124). Rather, Jesus used the term "father" as it was known to his listeners from the "Old Testament" (118–120). Zeller concludes that (125): "The Father, whom Jesus brings close to his listeners, remains the faithful God of Israel."

We conclude this section by briefly mentioning a passage from the end of Jesus' earthly life: Jesus' conversation from the cross with his mother and with the beloved disciple, as narrated in John 19:25–27. In vv. 26–27 we read: “When Jesus saw his mother, and the disciple whom he loved standing near, he said to his mother, ‘Woman, behold, your son!’ (27) Then he said to the disciple, ‘Behold, your mother!’ And from that hour the disciple took her to his own home.” This little scene is often said to be editorial work designed to provide a basis for the Johannine congregation.<sup>18</sup> Jean Zumstein has argued that, together with the scene of the first sign at Cana in John 2, it forms an inclusio.<sup>19</sup> Zumstein lists four points of contact between the two stories: (1) the expression “mother [of Jesus]”, without giving her name; (2) the address “woman” in the vocative (gynai); (3) mention of the “hour”; (4) closeness and intimacy between mother and son in both scenes. Irrespective of one's view regarding the historicity of the scene at the cross, it is clear that the author of the Fourth Gospel (and/or his circle) did not see any problem in “relating the fact that the dying Jesus provided for the care of his mother after his death.”<sup>20</sup> This can be seen as a special way of fulfilling the expectation that children had to provide for their aged parents. It is plausible to maintain that the early church (or at least some part of it) thought that Jesus fulfilled the general expectation we have also met in the environment of the New Testament.

4. Jesus' Call as a Cause for Tension in the Family

We find a report of Jesus calling his first disciples in all four canonical gospels. Mark 1:16–20 and Matt 4:18–22 are similar enough to be called parallels, but Luke and John have different stories concerning the call (Luke 5:1–11; John 1:35–51). It is explicitly stated about James and John that they “left their father” (Mark 1:20b). Matthew says they left the boat and their father, but he does not mention the hired servants. Luke says in a concluding sentence (5:11) that they left “everything”

<sup>18</sup> So e.g. Udo Schnelle, Das Evangelium nach Johannes, THKNT 4 (Leipzig: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 1998), 288–289.

<sup>19</sup> Jean Zumstein, “Johannes 19,25–27,” ZTK 94 (1997) 131–54; references: 150.

<sup>20</sup> So Raymond E. Brown, The Gospel According to John. XIII–XXI, AB 29A (London: Geoffrey Chapman, 1970), 923.

(panta; the term “everything,” a neuter plural, can include persons as well).<sup>21</sup>

First we note that one pair of brothers, James and John, were working in the same trade as their father: they were fishing together. Although it is not stated explicitly, we may presume that the same was true of the other pair of brothers, Simon (Peter) and Andrew. They are reported to have left the boat, but there is no mention of their father. There is no enmity between children and parents implied in the calling narratives. James and John continued to be called “the sons of Zebedee” even after they became disciples of Jesus (see Mark 10:35 par. Matt 20:20; Matt 26:37; John 21:2), and Peter cared for the ill mother of his wife (Mark 1:29–31 par. Matt 8:14–15 and Luke 4:38–39). Nothing compels us to presuppose that they would not have provided for their father later if any need should have arisen.

Peter was prepared to return to his fishing business after Jesus’ death. Irrespective of the question of the authenticity of this scene reported only by the Fourth Gospel (John 21:3), it makes best sense if we presuppose that the author of the Fourth Gospel did not think that there was any enmity between Peter and his family. We emphasize again that the scene concerns Jesus calling disciples.

In their primary context, texts about “following” (Nachfolge) may be regarded as referring to exceptional cases, i.e. they do not apply to all disciples. David Mealand contends that the group of those who “left behind their home and family . . . probably exceeded twelve in number,” but he adds that “not all Jesus’s hearers followed him in the literal sense.”<sup>22</sup> In the following, there will be other passages, too, where the key to the interpretation will be the view that Jesus had two kinds of disciples: some who had to follow him, and those who returned to their homes right after they became disciples of Jesus. Thus not every saying applied to all of them.

John C. O’Neill takes this view a step further when he argues that some “hard sayings about discipleship—sayings about taking up the cross, about leaving all, about not loving father or mother more than him—...are only for the few who are called to rule” as ministers.<sup>23</sup> Whether or not one makes this further step of speaking about the rulers of the communities, one can agree with the distinction between circles of disciples to whom the individual sayings applied. This is not to deny the radicalism of the call. To some extent, we might see it as a parallel to what we can see in the environment: following the lifestyle of a teacher, as in the case of Josephus who spent some years as a pupil of Bannus, the ascetic (Vita 11). David Mealand has argued that in the case of those “who took up the Cynic way of life, it was often financial ruin or exile which made a man turn to philosophy.” He also affirms that “Jesus and his first disciples were not thoroughgoing ascetics.”<sup>24</sup> Thus the parallels from other movements may “help a little, but do not fully explain the way in which Jesus and his disciples abandoned family, and home, and previous occupation.” The question arises as to what kind of a leader Jesus was held to be by his first followers. I hold with Mealand that “the character of Jesus’s ministry arose from his conviction that the Reign of God was imminent, and...its coming must be announced throughout the land. It is from this necessity that the itinerant nature of his ministry came about.”<sup>25</sup>

---

<sup>21</sup> For an example where the neuter plural panta refers to people, see the variant reading at Rom 11:32.

<sup>22</sup> David L. Mealand, Poverty and Expectation in the Gospels (London: SPCK, 1981 [1980]), 73.

Here we cannot discuss views concerning Jesus’ understanding of the Kingdom and his messianic consciousness. I simply acknowledge that my working hypothesis is to suppose some kind of a messianic claim on Jesus’ side, and a positive response to it already by his first followers. This will be especially relevant in the course of discussing other passages where a call to follow Jesus is involved.

There is a further radical saying of Jesus that is witnessed to by Matthew and Luke (thus being assigned to Q by many scholars):<sup>26</sup> the saying concerning burying the dead. Matthew 8:21–22 and Luke 9:59–60 are not only close parallels in wording, but these verses appear in both gospels as the second part of a sequel with a common theme: Jesus speaking to individuals on the cost of discipleship. Darrell Bock has observed that “Luke 9:59–60 is one of the least doubted statements of Jesus.”<sup>27</sup> He notes that the Jesus Seminar “accepts these sayings as

---

<sup>23</sup> John C. O’Neill, Messiah: Six Lectures on the Ministry of Jesus (Cambridge: Cochrane Press, 1984), 84.

<sup>24</sup> Mealand, Poverty, 76.

<sup>25</sup> Ibid., 75.

<sup>26</sup> E.g. Donald A. Hagner, Matthew, WBC 33A (Dallas: Word Books, 1993), 213.

<sup>27</sup> Darrell L. Bock, Luke, BECNT (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 1996), 975.

authentic, printing them in pink type.” In Matthew, after Jesus talked to a scribe (8:19–20), we read (vv. 21–22): “Another of the disciples said to him, ‘Lord, let me first go and bury my father.’ (22) But Jesus said to him, ‘Follow me, and leave the dead to bury their own dead.’” Unlike Luke, Matthew does not have a third dialogue. He closes the scene with a further reference to “disciples” (8:23): “And when he got into the boat, his disciples followed him.”

After Jesus’ saying concerning the foxes and birds (parallel to Matthew), Luke writes (9:59–60): “To another he said, ‘Follow me.’ But he said, ‘Lord, let me first go and bury my father.’ (60) But he said to him, ‘Leave the dead to bury their own dead; but as for you, go and proclaim the kingdom of God.’” John O’Neill has argued that Jesus did not speak here about the spiritually dead; he used the term only in a literal sense. O’Neill holds that this hard saying of Jesus “makes the proclaimers of the Kingdom equivalent to those who have taken a Nazirite vow”.<sup>28</sup> This suggestion solves the problem of the seemingly hard attack of Jesus on those who do not follow him, but it does leave us with the radical saying of Jesus addressed to a would-be disciple: he should leave his dead father behind without a burial. In the environment of the New Testament, providing for a funeral was among the foremost duties of children. Most scholars emphasize the radicalism of Jesus’ saying in the light of the strong expectation in Judaism that a son should provide a funeral for his father.<sup>29</sup> However, it can be argued that in spite of its radicalism, this saying is not a witness to an anti-family attitude of Jesus. The following observations point to the likelihood that this saying does not imply that Jesus failed to fulfil the duty of honouring parents at this crucial point.

First we note that the Lukan version of this text seems to be nearer to the original in an important aspect:<sup>30</sup> Matthew says that it is a “disciple” who asks Jesus’ permission first to bury his father; it is more likely that Luke is right in referring to an unspecified “other” person who has the chance to become a disciple when meeting Jesus.<sup>31</sup> Thus the saying is part of a “call” to discipleship; not in the general sense of the word, but in the special sense of the few “itinerant” disciples.<sup>32</sup> Thus it can be argued that the emphasis of Jesus’ radical saying depends on an urgency in time and a priority to be given to Jesus’ call.<sup>33</sup>

<sup>28</sup> O’Neill, Messiah, 87.

<sup>29</sup> See e.g. I. Howard Marshall, The Gospel of Luke, NIGTC (Exeter: Paternoster Press, 1979), 411; C. F. Evans, Saint Luke, TPINTC (London: SCM Press, 1990), 441; Hagner, Matthew, 217.

<sup>30</sup> So e.g. Ulrich Luz, Das Evangelium nach Matthäus, 2nd ed., EKKNT 1.2 (Zürich: Benziger Verlag, 1990, 1996), 21.

Both Matthew and Luke express this priority in some way. In Matthew, it is the would-be disciple who addresses Jesus and offers to follow him. As an answer Jesus first says, “Follow me,” and then utters the radical saying immediately. In Luke, the call to follow Jesus is not uttered together with the saying concerning the dead, because it is Jesus who addressed the would-be disciple with this call at the beginning of the scene. It may also be argued that in the original scene it was Jesus who took the initiative to address a would-be disciple. Matthew may have assimilated the form to the preceding passage: in Matthew’s version Jesus is addressed first; his sayings are answers.<sup>34</sup> In Luke, Jesus’ radical saying is followed by another sentence: “but as for you, go and proclaim the kingdom of God” (which may be editorial).<sup>35</sup>

Both evangelists clearly indicate that the discipleship of Jesus has to be given precedence even over family ties. Howard Marshall’s observation concerning the whole pericope with the three little dialogues in Luke applies to this particular saying as well:<sup>36</sup> Jesus indicates “the stringent nature of discipleship” to three would-be disciples. Darrell Bock points to the significance of the person of Jesus who utters the call: “In fact, the remark may point to Jesus seeing himself as bringing in the new era. The ability to set priorities that go beyond the Ten Commandments may suggest the presence of messianic authority.”<sup>37</sup>

As we have seen above, J. C. O’Neill has argued that the would-be disciple is called to become the “equivalent” to those who have taken a Nazirite vow. He points to Num 6:6–8 where it is affirmed that people who have taken the Nazirite vow should not go near a dead

---

<sup>31</sup> So also Peter Kristen, Familie, Kreuz und Leben: Nachfolge Jesu nach Q und dem Markusevangelium (Marburg: N. G. Elwert Verlag, 1995), 110–112.

<sup>32</sup> See also O’Neill, Messiah, 87.

<sup>33</sup> So also Hagner, Matthew, 218; Bock, Luke, 981.

<sup>34</sup> For the view that “the arrangement in Matthew is probably secondary,” see William D. Davies and Dale C. Allison, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Gospel According to Saint Matthew, ICC 2 (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1991), 53.

<sup>35</sup> So e.g. Marshall, The Gospel of Luke, 412; Evans, Saint Luke, 441.

<sup>36</sup> Marshall, The Gospel of Luke, 408.

<sup>37</sup> Bock, Luke, 980.

body, even if it is their father or mother. The Nazirite vow can serve as a background to this saying: people around Jesus knew of that exception to the rule of burying one's parents, so the saying in itself was not scandalous to their ears (as Markus Bockmuehl has argued on the basis of a detailed analysis of the available texts).<sup>38</sup>

To sum up, the call uttered by Jesus is put in a way that should not be generalized. The saying is radical, but it does not imply that Jesus taught that his disciples do not have to fulfil their duty as children to their parents. Discipleship, Nachfolge, has to have precedence; people who would have remembered the example of how God has precedence in the case of the Nazirites could understand a radical call to become preachers of God's Kingdom.

5. Jesus' New Family

In the synoptic gospels, there is a report of a direct confrontation between Jesus and his mother and brothers (Mark 3:31–35 par. Matt 12:46–50 and Luke 8:19–21). There is no agreement among scholars as regards the historicity of this passage, or to what extent it reflects the situation of the household churches. It can be argued that it presupposes the separation of the Christian community from the synagogue.<sup>39</sup> However, it can also be argued that it is not likely that the early church created a story with such a negative attitude from Jesus' family.<sup>40</sup> The other two synoptic gospels introduce this scene in another context. It is significant that a preparatory comment is only to be found in Mark (3:21): "And when his family heard it, they went out to seize him, for people were saying, 'He is beside himself.'" In this translation, there are hidden two exegetical problems. First, the Greek text, hoi par autou ("those with him"), is not unambiguous: it can refer to the disciples or to the relatives of Jesus. It is more likely that the latter sense is to be applied here, because otherwise the scene reported in 3:31–35 is difficult to understand: why does Jesus refuse his mother and brothers if they had not given any reason for wanting to call him away?

<sup>38</sup> Markus Bockmuehl, "Let the Dead Bury their Dead' (Matt. 8:22/Luke 9:60): Jesus and the Halakhah," JTS 49 (1998): 553–581.

<sup>39</sup> So Walter Schmithals, Das Evangelium nach Markus, ÖTK 2/1 (Gütersloh: Gütersloher Verlagshaus Gerd Mohn, 1979), 212.

<sup>40</sup> So e.g. Gerd Theissen and Annette Merz, Der Historische Jesus: Ein Lehrbuch, 2nd ed. (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1997), 104.

Secondly, “people” is inserted in the translation; in the Greek the subject of elegon (“they said”) is not specified. This ambiguous expression may have referred to Jesus’ relatives as the speakers.<sup>41</sup> Thus, even if Mark 3:20–21 is a Markan addition to an earlier tradition, it is a necessary explanation of the background of the scene. For our understanding of vv. 31–35, the inclusion of vv. 20–21 means that Jesus’ identification of his true family was not meant to involve the abandoning of his blood relations. It can be seen as an answer to the intended action of his non-understanding family. Taeseong Roh has rightly pointed to the difference between Jesus’ own attitude and that which was expected from the disciples. He argues that whereas Jesus defines his own new family (v. 34: “And looking around on those who sat about him, he said, ‘Here are my mother and my brothers!’”), there is no expectation of any breach with one’s family on the side of the listeners.<sup>42</sup> We may add that Jesus was provoked by his “non-believing” family to praise those who were accepting what he taught (for a tradition that Jesus’ brethren did not believe in him during his earthly ministry, see also John 7:5). Thus this passage does not address the child-parent relationship in the case of the disciples. In Jesus’ case, it was not his own initiative; rather, it was a response to hostile behaviour on the part of his family. He did not follow them when they wanted to hinder him in his teaching ministry. The content of his teaching is not narrated, but from the concluding (perhaps editorial)<sup>43</sup> word we may infer that it was the priority of the will of God, the heavenly Father, that caused him to be disobedient to his mother and brothers. This text can be explained by seeing in it the priority of God over parents.

We have already seen that in each of the synoptic gospels the passage on the rich young ruler is followed by a short discussion between the

---

<sup>41</sup> For this view, see Timothy Dwyer, The Motif of Wonder in the Gospel of Mark, JSNTSup 128 (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1996), 106. Matthew and Luke do not have the negative claim made by Jesus’ relatives. Perhaps these evangelists did not transmit this tradition because of the later positive role of the relatives of Jesus. Ulrich Luz suggests that Matthew omitted the strong statement in Mark 3:21 (Luz, Matthäus, 287).

<sup>42</sup> Taeseong Roh, Die familia dei in den synoptischen Evangelien: Eine redaktions- und sozialgeschichtliche Untersuchung zu einem urchristlichen Bildfeld, NTOA 37 (Freiburg, CH: Universitätsverlag, 2001), 112.

<sup>43</sup> Roh (Die familia dei, 108–110) agrees with Dibelius in regarding Mark 3:35 as a redactional application of the preceding verses to “anyone” who is willing to do the will of God.

disciples and Jesus (Mark 10:28–31 par. Matt 19:27–30 and Luke 18:28–30). It is in this pericope that Jesus speaks about the reward for the disciples leaving everything behind. The synoptics present the scene with a very similar content, but there are also many differences. To point to but a few: only in Matthew do we read Peter’s question (“What then shall we have?”) added to his statement that the disciples have left everything. Even in the indicative sentence (“Lo, we have left everything and followed you”; Mark 10:28) there are some variations in the manuscripts: in Mark, some manuscripts have the perfect of the verb “followed,” some have the aorist; all MSS of Matthew and Luke have the aorist. NA27 prints the perfect in Mark as the main text (and the editors suggest that the aorist is due to the parallels); in this case there is a “minor agreement” between Matthew and Luke.

Matthew and Mark alone conclude the scene with the saying: “But many that are first will be last, and the last first” (Mark 10:31; Matt 19:30). Matthew repeats this saying at the end of his next pericope (his special material), the parable of the workers in the vineyard (20:16). Luke brings it as the conclusion of the saying about those who come from all four winds to sit at table in the Kingdom of God (13:30), with little changes in wording and in a reversed order. One might ask whether the meaning of this saying in Matthew and Mark at the end of our pericope differs from its meaning in the other places. Perhaps here it refers to the disciples who are last in the eyes of their fellow countrymen, because they have no financial security since they left their homes and families. Or perhaps it refers to those who think they are “first” because they keep to the good order of a settled family life—who are in fact the “last” if they do not follow Jesus.

In Mark’s version, however, there is another difference from Matthew and Luke: in Jesus’ answer, Matthew and Luke recount only the list of those whom the disciples have left, whereas in Mark’s version Jesus repeats the list when he assures the disciples of the reward for their following him. These lists are not exactly the same. In Matthew, some manuscripts have “houses or brothers or sisters or father or mother or children or lands” (NA27 print this as the main text, based primarily on Codex Vaticanus), many manuscripts (including the Byzantine “majority”) add “or wife” after “lands,” and some (including family 1) have “parents” instead of “father or mother”. Some have a variation in order: they give “houses” as the last item in the list. In Luke’s version, the codices Vaticanus and Sinaiticus (and some other MSS) have “house or wife or brothers or parents or children.” Many manuscripts

(including the Byzantine “majority”) have the same list but in a reverse order in the middle (“parents or brothers or wife”). Some manuscripts have this reverse order and not only “brothers,” but also “sisters.” Although there are variations in both lists, it is clear that Matthew and Luke do not have the same list. As we have indicated above, Mark has two lists. In Codex Vaticanus and the Byzantine “majority,” Jesus’ saying reads as follows (Mark 10:29–30): “Truly, I say to you, there is no one who has left house or brothers or sisters or mother or father or children or lands, for my sake and for the gospel, who will not receive a hundredfold now in this time, houses and brothers and sisters and mothers and children and lands, with persecutions, and in the age to come eternal life.”

The original “hand” of Codex Sinaiticus does not have the second list; its first corrector adds it with “mother” in the singular, and a second corrector (with some further MSS) adds “father.” Codex Bezae incorporates the second list as a new sentence: “whoever left... [list with some changes, e.g. “house” in singular, “sisters and brothers”]... will receive”. It is to be noted that the second list does not have “father” in most of the manuscripts.

Taeseong Roh has rightly pointed out that the sequence “mother and father” is unusual; in view of the leading role of the father in the family in antiquity, one would expect that the father should be mentioned first. He offers the following solution to the manuscript evidence seen above: Matthew has changed it to the “usual order” and Luke has chosen the summarizing term “parents.” Roh argues that the Markan order (together with the sequence of Mark 3:35, “brother, and sister, and mother”) points to the community of “settled sympathizers” of Jesus. Roh suggests that the omission of “father” in the second list (in Mark 10:30) is due to a view of community which has only God as “father” and which wants to resist the claim of wandering missionaries to become their leaders: they are accepted as brothers and not as fathers.<sup>44</sup>

Roh has taken up and applied to these texts the overall thesis of Gerd Theissen concerning the wandering charismatic character of the earliest stage of the Jesus movement. The present text is one of the significant passages for the thesis of Theissen; however, it has to be seen also

---

<sup>44</sup> Roh, Die familia dei, 127, 128, 136, 132.

