The aim of this web site is to promote interest in the history of the former Belfast & County Down Railway, and to allow railway enthusiasts and others to participate in the preservation and restoration of part of its route.

It is also to provide information about the Trust's plans for the restoration of part of the company's line as a Heritage Railway that will depict as closely as possible the image, the aura, and the character of the Belfast & County Down Railway during its hundred years of operation, whilst providing a major tourist attraction.

What is the B.& C.D.R. Museum Trust?

The Belfast & County Down Railway Museum Trust is a voluntary organisation that was established by a small group of railway enthusiasts in 1972, the primary aim being to preserve relics, artifacts, and photographic material relating to the railways of Ireland in general, and of the former Belfast & County Down Railway in particular.

The formation of the Trust was prompted by the loss in the early 1970's of a number of extensive collections of Irish railway archive materials which were not unfortunately protected in any way. As a safeguard therefore, the Trust was registered through the Northern Ireland Legal system at the time of its formation, thereby giving a guarantee of security to the materials and artifacts within its collection. The collection is overseen by a Board of Trustees who are charged with the responsibility of ensuring its continued preservation.

The day to day running of the Trust, is in the hands of a committee that is made up of members of the Trust who are elected at an A.G.M. each year. This Committee also has a representative from the Board of Trustees, who acts as the 'Go Between', being the link between the Trustees and the membership.

Soon after its formation the Trust proposed the development of a Working Railway Museum using a portion of the track bed of the former Belfast & County Down Railway, and indeed was the first railway preservation organisation in Ireland to promote the idea of an operational railway museum. The section of line chosen initially was that between Saintfield and Ballynahinch, which incorporated two miles of the former main line between Rowallane Gardens at Saintfield (The headquarters of the National Trust), and Ballynahinch Junction, and also the 3½ mile branch line from Ballynahinch Junction to Ballynahinch Town. This portion of the line was chosen in consultation with the Northern Ireland Tourist Board, but as stated above, these plans have now had to be abandoned following the uninvited intervention of other so-called railway enthusiasts.

Full details of the Trust's proposed developments, how you can help, and the present state of play can be found on other pages of this web site. These can be accessed by clicking on the links at the head of each page.

THE LAST TICKETS HAVE BEEN ISSUED, NEWCASTLE HAS SEEN THE LAST
TRAIN OFF, AND THE SHARP WHISTLE BLASTS THAT DAILY RENT THE
MORNING STILLNESS HAVE BEEN SILENCED AFTER EIGHTY YEARS.

A shade of sadness cast its sentimental gloom over sweet County Down when the last train passed over the many miles of the serpentine iron ribbon between Newcastle and Comber.

Yes, that train rocked and shook and passed by the hills and dales and vanished like a phantom on its journey into the past, and reminded one of the funeral cortege of a gallant warrior who had served his country well. Though there was no muffled drum, a death-knell did sound, not from a louvered belfry but from the occasional short blasts from the locomotive whistle, the signal of a duty being performed for the last time.

As those sonorous blasts died away in the evening air, so passed into the limbo of history a major portion of a railway whose embankments and cuttings will perpetuate it in the archaeological future when much of its story will have been long forgotten.

To those of us who remember its heyday, its decline and fall in this age of automotive transport on the highways and byways, the old 'County Down Railway will remain one of our most cherished memories.
