

Deputy Editor-in-Chief 2018/19

The role of RUMS Review Deputy Editor-in-Chief is simple: to work closely with with the Editor-in-chief to ensure the sustainment and creative direction of the magazine, and lead a fantastic team of students who make each issue possible. You will be closely supported in your role by both the Editor-in-Chief and Treasurer.

The role of Deputy allows you to develop a wide variety of skills; from editing and writing, to leadership, organisation and team-working skills. In brief, the role includes helping to source reading material on a broad range of medical topics, from students and experts alike, and direct the contents of the magazine. Thus, it provides a fantastic opportunity to explore self interests and connect with inspirational medical professionals. Alongside the Editor-in-Chief, you will oversee the work of half the editorial team, in addition to liaising with the english, design and online teams. You may also be asked to step in and represent the magazine at various events or meetings on behalf of the Editor-in-Chief if they are unable to attend.

This position automatically leads onto the role of Editor-in-Chief the following academic year if you so wish - the extensive experience gained during the year provides you with the knowledge and skills to optimally fulfil the position.

As RUMS Review Editor-in-Chief, you will become an ex officio member of the RUMS committee, and attend monthly meetings. This offers an exclusive insight into the workings of our student association and allows us to keep our readers up to date.

In addition to this, you will also be responsible for maintaining the magazine's relationship with senior members of the medical school, alumni and UCL; providing a unique and privileged opportunity to network.
