Biggin is an old village first mentioned in 1223, when it was called Newbiggin. At that time there was a monastic settlement of the Cistercian order, owned by the monks of Garendon Abbey in Leicestershire. They established a sheep ranch at Biggin Grange, which although rebuilt since monastic times, still retains one ancient outbuilding. Farming has continued to be an important occupation in the village ever since the monks set up their farm.

At the time when lead mining was at its height, there were several mines scattered throughout the parish. Quarrying was also important although all the quarries are now closed. Hartshead, near Heathcote supplied stones for making aerodrome runways in World War II. The small hamlets of Heathcote and Newhaven are both in the same parish as Biggin.

The remoteness, and the much harsher winter's of the past, have led to the Biggin residents finding themselves cut off from the outside world. In the severe winter of 1947, the roads were almost permanently blocked with snow. Fortunately, trains on the Ashbourne to Buxton line usually managed to get through.

For many years Biggin was the venue for the biggest sheep sales in the area. The sheep sales in October 1985, having over 20,000 sheep entered for purchase. Now sheep are sold at the market in the new Bakewell Agricultural Centre. The loss of the sheep sales meant the loss of some profitable business for the Waterloo Inn. This though has been compensated by the gradual increase in thirsty visitors to the village, mainly walkers. Increasing leisure time and early retirement have meant weekdays and not just weekends are busy in good weather conditions. It is a popular spot for walkers who come to walk beside the river Dove through Beresford Dale and Wolfscote Dale. The Tissington Trail provides one of many other options particularly when a circular walk from the village is planned.

The Waterloo is a popular inn, both with tourists and locals.
