PARENTS CORNER

EASY WAYS TO HELP YOUR CHILD UNDERSTAND FRACTIONS WITH WHAT YOU'VE GOT AT HOME

From the half dozen eggs you've got in the fridge to the many blocks that make up a whole slab of chocolate, use these things you've already got at home to introduce your child to the basics of fractions.

Here are a few ideas to test out at home with your kids:

1. Play around with fractions at meal time by asking them if they'd like their sandwich cut into halves or quarters. Alternatively, when dishing their food for supper, ask them how many potatoes, chicken cubes or spoonfuls of mash they'd like. Then have them look at their plate of food, count how many parts they have of a whole and divide their plate into halves, quadrants, etc.
2. Use fruit, made up of or cut into many segments, to show them a whole is made up of many parts, and allow them to play around with the fruit to make up a whole, a half and a quarter, equal to half, so that they understand there's more than one way of seeing and then writing out the same thing.
3. Use building blocks with dots on them to add and subtract fractions. Because they're already made up of 8,6,4,2, or 1 dot(s), and they're broken down in proportion, they can just be physically added or subtracted in front of them, for kids to then count how many dots there are after going through the sum they're presented with.
4. By using a slab of chocolate, or something similarly made up of many parts, you can do more complicated sums for them to visualise and then work out. Try this, with a slab made up of 21 blocks of chocolate:

If dad ate $\frac{6}{21}$ blocks of chocolate, mom had $\frac{3}{21}$, and Joe had $\frac{4}{21}$, how many blocks are left for me?

Understanding fractions and applying mathematical concepts to them isn't the easiest, nor the simplest of tasks. But doing so in a visual way will certainly make it easier for learners.
