This project began in the late 2000s when I was still an Assistant Professor of Sociology at John Jay College of Criminal Justice and the Graduate Center. It has been a long road to completing this book and a lot of people and organizations have provided much needed help and support along the way. Inevitably, I am going to forget to mention some of them, and for that I am truly sorry. John Jay College and the larger City University of New York have provided me with a number of small research awards, including those from the Professional Staff Congress, the Diversity Projects Development Fund, the LGBT Public Policy Board Member Annual Research Support Grant Program, and John Jay College's Research Assistance Program. Funding from these programs made it possible for me to hire Ph.D. students, who assisted me with this research and final preparation of this book. These people included Maggie Schmuhl, Lauren Paradis, and Christopher Thomas. I am especially grateful for the support of Chunrye Kim, who for the last several years has been providing research support. Likewise, I am really appreciative of the help I received from Yen-Chiao Liao, who was my translator, research assistant, and friend when I was conducting interviews in Taiwan. Since then she has enrolled in the Ph.D. Program in Sociology at the Graduate Center, City University of New York and has provided even more help with the final preparations for the book. I am also grateful for the many people who allowed me to interview them in Taiwan. They trusted me with their insights and information, and I hope I am able to do some justice to their thoughts.

Additionally, I was very fortunate to receive research funding from a number of organizations outside of my university. The Chiang Ching-kuo Foundation for International Scholarly Exchange provided support for me to spend several weeks in Taiwan conducting interviews, as well as quantitative analysis at the Institute of Sociology, Academia Sinica, where I worked with Yen-hsin Alice Cheng. To get research support to hand code over 800 newspaper articles, I received funding from the Jack Shand Research Award Program which is administered by the Society for the Scientific Study of Religion and the Association for the Sociology of Religion's Fitcher Research Grant Competition. During my sabbatical in 2013-2014 I was a Visiting Scholar at New York University's Department of Social and Cultural Analysis, where I was provided space to spend time writing and conducting research. The European Data Laboratory for Comparative Social Research in Cologne, Germany also provided me with three weeks of research time to use their cross-national data. While there I met a number of scholars, including Malina Voicu, Tilo Beckers, Anabel Kuntz, and Hermann Dülmer, who contributed to a rich and intellectually stimulating environment in which to conduct my research.

The findings presented in this book were also aided by several stimulating talks. In the early stages of writing the Center for the Study of Religion and Society's Colloquium on the Interdisciplinary Study of Religion at the University of Notre Dame provided fruitful ideas. Likewise, the Fifth Annual Meeting of the Quantitative Religion Research Working Group, which took place in Dusseldorf, Germany, provided rich discussions. I also gained a lot of intellectual stimulation from presenting preliminary findings at several national and international conferences, including the annual meetings of the: American Sociological Association, the Association for the Sociology of Religion, the International Society for the Sociology of Religion, the Southern Sociological Society, and the Eastern Sociological Association.

There were several people who spent time reading various chapters and providing valuable comments. These people include Paul Wong, Meredith Greif, Cecilia Strand, Christopher Scheitle, Hun-En Sung, Yuenmei Wong, and my sister, Jennifer Kil. In addition to reading the chapter on Catholic nations Monisa Felson provided much needed help with the book's final stages of preparation. Roger Finke gave advice with the book publishing process and Stephen Warner offered early encouragement. I am also indebted to Christopher Smith and Donna Freitas for helping me navigate the book publishing world. Additionally, I want to thank my editor, Maura Rosner, for recognizing the book's potential contribution and working quickly to make certain that the book would be published with the University of California Press. Two anonymous book reviewers provided thoughtful comments and ideas. Jacob Felson provided invaluable intellectual support in the development of these ideas and at times was a much needed sounding board for helping me work through the data and analysis. He also read and commented on several of the chapters. Finally, Donald Morissette has been with me throughout the process, reading all of the chapters, talking with me about the ideas, traveling with me to various places where I conducted research, and providing a great deal of encouragement and support along the way. I feel lucky to be able to spend time with him almost every day.
