Russian plane spills $368 million in gold and jewels all over Siberia

<http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-5504253/Plane-loses-265-million-cargo-gold-jewels.html>

A plane lost much of a £265 million cargo of diamonds, platinum and gold on takeoff in Siberia. The treasures fell out of a loose hatch in the plane's hold. Precious metals and diamonds rained over the runway and a swathe of Yakutia, the coldest region in Russia.

The hatch door fell off near a car market without causing injury.

The plane bound for Krasnoyarsk then made an emergency landing at Magan after discovery it had been haemorrhaging valuables. The nightmare happened on takeoff from Yakutsk, the regional capital.

The Search for Bonanza

The great discovery of gold in the Yukon that occurred in 1896 did not occur in a vacuum. It seems simplistic to say so, but gold discoveries are rarely serendipitous; people do not stumble over it while out for a walk. In order for gold to be found, there must be people looking for it. As had happened in California in 1849 and later in British Columbia, gold was discovered in the Yukon because miners knew or had good reason to believe it was there, and had spent years looking for it. If there was gold in the southern and central parts of the western mountain chain, then why should there not be gold in the north as well?

In 1872 three men came to explore the mineral possibilities of the upper Yukon valley. Leroy Napoleon McQuesten (who understandably preferred the nickname "Jack"), a farm boy from New England, had participated in the California gold rush and had later prospected on the Fraser and Finlay rivers in northern British Columbia. For a time he had worked in the north for the Hudson's Bay Company, learning survival and trading skills that were to serve him well in the Yukon. A good-natured, generous man, he later came to be called the "Father of the Yukon." Arthur Harper had emigrated from northern Ireland as a teenager in 1832 and had followed gold rushes in North America for two decades. It was Harper who reasoned that there ought to be gold in the northern part of the Rockies, since there had been plenty of it in the south. Alfred Mayo, a slight wiry man, was a former circus acrobat from Kentucky. A man who liked practical jokes, he was driven, like the other two, by a hunger for discovery and adventure.

While still in the south, the three men heard from a man who had worked at Fort Youcon that there were rumours in the north about gold. Stories had been circulating among the fur traders since the 1850s that there was gold in the tributaries of the Yukon River. One of the employees of the Hudson's Bay Company had written home in 1864 that gold had been found upriver in good quantities, but for some reason he did not investigate this story. Thus when the three men came into the Yukon in 1872 by way of the Bell and Porcupine rivers, the smell of gold was in the air. McQuesten later related a story he had heard about an early find:

One of the officers [of the Hudson's Bay Company] that came up on the steamer washed out of a jar of dirt near Fort Yukon and he had about a teaspoonful of something yellow in the pan and the officer threw it away remarking that it would not do to let the men see it as they would all leave the steamer... by the way the officer acted trying to hide it from the other men he supposed it must be gold. . . .
