DELIVERY / MANNER / STYLE

INTRODUCTION

We have now discussed both preparation and rebuttal. The techniques that we have examined are vital for developing simple and forceful concepts, whether they are your case approach, your individual arguments, or your response to the opposing team. However, debating is about more than merely concepts – it is about the effective presentation of those concepts. In this part, we will examine the most important techniques and principles for effectively presenting your ideas to the audience.

The 'presentation' aspect of debating has different names in different places. In Australia, for example, 'presentation' is referred to as 'manner'; at the World Schools Debating Championships, it is called 'style'. However, the essential techniques and principles remain the same.

BEING YOURSELF

All of us have a natural speaking style, whether we realize it or not. Each of us has our individual style, which has been evolving since our very first words. This is our natural style of speaking, our most comfortable way of communicating, and our most effective way of persuading. Unfortunately, a few debaters do not trust their natural style. Instead, they adopt a 'debating persona' – a completely different speaking style that emerges only for debates. Usually, this involves forced gestures, an uncomfortably rigid stance and a painfully careful pronunciation of almost every word. Ultimately, however, this approach is weak – rather than being persuasive, it simply appears insincere.

Instead, you must be yourself. Of course, you can always try to make your style more convincing and engaging. The ideas and pointers in this chapter are designed to help you do that. However, the aim of coaching manner is never to change a speaker's entire style – rather, it is to mould that style to be more effective. Naturally, this does not mean that a speaker can legitimately say, "Of course I mumble quickly and make no eye contact – that's my natural style!". However, it does mean that you should use these techniques in a way that feels natural and sincere to you.

VISUAL PRESENTATION

At first, it may seem strange that we should even be concerned with visual presentation. After all, debating is about the clash of arguments, and visual presentation does not directly relate to the arguments at all (at least, not in the same way that oral or verbal presentation does).

However, visual presentation is a vital part of a speaker's overall presentation, and hence a vital part of debating. This is because a speaker's visual presentation is an important aspect of a speaker's credibility, and a speaker who seems more credible will be a speaker who is more convincing.

The first issue relating to visual presentation is one that very few debaters think to ask: "When does it begin?". The simple answer is that your manner begins from the moment that you reach the middle of 'the floor', and start to speak. However, judges are entitled to penalize a speaker who delays in taking the floor, after having been introduced. More importantly, once you are introduced, your audience's eyes will immediately focus on you. If you spend the next 30 seconds writing a few notes and arranging your palm cards, you are hardly likely to exude credibility! Therefore, strictly speaking, your manner begins from the moment that you are called by the chairperson.

However, given the importance of visual presentation, the best answer is that your manner begins from the moment that you and your team enter the room. For example, it is common for many debaters to gesture wildly, shake their heads viciously, and speak audibly with their team at the table – while their opponents are speaking. This is not merely unsporting behaviour; it is likely to detract from the overall credibility of your presentation.

Eye contact

Eye contact (or the lack of it, to be more precise!) is a significant problem among many debaters, particularly young debaters. As humans, we are generally accustomed to looking into each other's eyes as we converse. It is nearly impossible to be an effective debater without maintaining effective eye contact.

This means making eye contact with specific individuals in the audience, and holding that contact for a time (as a general guide, from 5 seconds to 30 seconds). There are a number of ways that a speaker can fail to make effective eye contact:

- A speaker can simply read his or her notes. Among young debaters, this is usually the biggest cause of a failure to make adequate eye contact.

- A speaker can 'flicker' his or her eyes between notes and audience. Many debaters think that they are making adequate eye contact when, in fact, they are constantly 'flickering' their eyes between notes and audience. Audience members may be left with the impression that the speaker looked at them, but will not feel that the speaker spoke to them.
- A speaker can speak to his or her opposition and, in the extreme case, can address his or her speech to the opposition in the second person ('you said...'). You may convince your audience, but you will rarely ever convince your opponents.
- A speaker can look elsewhere in the room. Some speakers are sufficiently confident that they do not constantly read their notes; however, they are not confident enough to look the audience in the eye. Therefore, they address inanimate parts of the room – such as the door, a window, or a chair. A more sophisticated variant on this theme is for speakers to deliberately stare just over the heads of their audience, trying to give the impression of eye contact without actually making eye contact. Your audience will not be fooled!

Gesture

Gesture is a natural part of most people's everyday conversation. Watch people talking, particularly when they are standing, and you will often see them gesturing constantly – even if they are speaking on the phone! So what? As debaters, we should strive to appear credible and sincere – in other words, to look natural. Gesturing in conversation is natural, so it should be natural to gesture while speaking in a debate.

This is the most important point about good gesture – allow your natural gestures to occur. It can often be very tempting to grip your palm cards with both hands, particularly if you are nervous. However, this serves only to limit your natural tendency to gesture. Free your hands if you can, and let the gestures happen!

Some debaters, coaches and judges worry about fine details of how you should gesture – for example, a downward gesture is sometimes said to provide a sense of authority. However, paying excessive attention to your gestures – whatever those gestures may be – usually serves only to make those gestures seem artificial. In everyday conversation, we do not deliberately choreograph gestures to match our words (for example, by sweeping your hands outwards above your head when discussing 'the whole world'!). It therefore seems unnatural and insincere to pay significant attention to specific gestures during your speech. You are much better thinking about your arguments, and merely keeping the issue of gesture in the back of your mind.

Stance

As with gesture, the most important aspect of an effective stance is that you are natural. Many speakers worry about fine details of their stance, such as the position of their feet, the distribution of their weight, or the straightness of their back. However, the most effective way to have a natural stance is not to worry about your stance at all!

The only exception is the issue of movement. There is no rule that requires you to stand rooted to the one spot as you speak – you are welcome to move around the floor. Indeed, as long as it does not seem contrived, it can be quite effective to take a few deliberate paces between arguments. However, you must avoid movement that is repetitive or distracting. For example, many speakers 'rock' on the spot, by taking small steps forwards and then backwards, or left and then right. Similarly, many speakers wander around the floor without purpose, often in repetitive patterns. Pacing back and forth will not endear you to an audience who has to watch you for six minutes! The principle of movement is simple: by all means move, but be aware of what you're doing and move with a purpose.

Mannerisms

In debating, a mannerism is understood as a distinctive or idiosyncratic trait of visual presentation. For example, a speaker may have a particular unique gesture or way of moving.

Of themselves, mannerisms pose no problem – every debater will understandably have his or her own way of speaking. However, they become a problem when they are repetitive. In some cases, audience members who notice a speaker's mannerism will pay attention to little else! For example, you might have a tendency to look at a particular part of the room on a regular basis, to continually fiddle with your hair or (as we discussed earlier) to make the same gesture repetitively.

It is impossible to set out any kind of complete list of mannerisms, precisely because they are so idiosyncratic. However, you must nonetheless be aware of the dangers of mannerisms, and be alert to any elements of your visual presentation that could become repetitive and distracting.

VOCAL PRESENTATION

Vocal presentation concerns the way that you enunciate and deliver your words to the audience.

Unquestionably, the biggest issue concerning vocal presentation is speed – and the biggest problem is going too fast. Inexplicably, speaking before an audience can create a time dilation that relativity theory is only now beginning to recognize! That is, what may seem a perfectly normal speed to you, the speaker, can in fact be unbearably fast to your audience and judges. Initially, it can be difficult to recognize this as a speaker, so it is important to pay attention to what judges or audience members say about your speed of delivery. If you do need to slow down, there are at least two good ways of doing it. First, remember to start slowly, to reinforce the feeling of speaking at a measured pace to your audience. Second, many speakers like to write ‘SLOW DOWN’ on their palm cards. This can be a useful technique, as long as you don’t read those words out!

It is possible to have a speed problem by going too slowly, but this is unlikely. Usually, this is simply the result of not having enough to say, or not properly understanding those things that you do have to say. From a debater’s perspective (though not a judge’s), this is really a matter issue – you need to ensure that you have enough to discuss, and that you understand it in sufficient detail.

Volume is a significant component of vocal presentation. Perhaps the most important element of volume is that your volume should be appropriate for the context of your speech.

For example, if you are speaking to a large crowd in a big hall, it is important to project your voice loudly; if you are addressing a small group in a classroom, it is far more effective to adopt a conversational tone.

Some speakers feel that they always need to speak loudly and aggressively in order to appear confident and forceful. There is no question that this can be worthwhile, but if used continuously, it can have the opposite effect – the speaker can appear flustered and out of control. It is often more effective not to give the impression of taking your argument and “shoving it down your audience’s throat” – it is more effective to speak softly, almost as though letting your audience in on an important secret. This style has the advantage of forcing your audience to concentrate harder on what you are saying, and can itself give the impression of force and confidence, because you are comfortable enough to deliver your message in a more relaxed and subdued tone.

The ultimate goal with volume should be to present a confident speech that is appropriate to the context, and to be confident enough to vary your volume where appropriate.

Whether or not variety is indeed the spice of life, it can certainly help your manner mark! Of course, you can always have variety in your visual presentation – by using different kinds of gestures, for example. However, variety in manner is essentially an issue of vocal presentation. This is because, as a speaker, the monotone poses the greatest risk of monotony.

Perhaps the most important way to avoid a monotone is to use your palm cards effectively – simply reading your palm cards is the easiest way to fall into a comfortable (and boring!) monotone.

It is important, therefore, to vary your style of presentation throughout. For example, you can vary the pitch of your voice by speaking in an expressive and animated style, rather than in a monotone. You can vary your natural speaking rhythm by pausing. Ironically, the best way to regain your audience’s attention on what you are saying is often to say nothing – to pause quite deliberately between sentences, arguments or ideas. Finally, always remember variation in volume. There is no rule about how or when to do this, except that you should generally aim for sharp and noticeable changes, rather than subtle or gradual variation. For example, it can be very effective to finish one argument in a loud and aggressive style, take a significant pause, and then commence your next argument in a soft and analytical manner.

VERBAL PRESENTATION

Matter and method (content and strategy) are often described as comprising “what you say”. This, however, is not strictly true – in reality, matter and method comprise the ideas behind what you say. The way that you actually use words to express those ideas and concepts is best understood as being a component of manner – verbal presentation.

It is impossible to teach people how to express their ideas in words – that is a natural skill learned from a young age! However, this expression can be refined and improved for debating purposes.

Clarity is by far the most important element of verbal presentation. For many public speakers, ‘clarity’ refers to the way that they enunciate their words. That, however, is not the point here – we should be far more concerned with the actual words used to enunciate ideas. Too many debaters use long words and convoluted sentences to sound impressive – even if that means making their speeches difficult to understand and painful to follow.

The opposite should be true. You should always aim to express your ideas as simply and clearly as possible, using simple language and short sentences wherever possible. The underlying principle should be clear: you should aim to present an impressive case, not to use 'impressive' words and phrases! Of course, this is totally unrelated to the content of your argument itself – although arguments should be simple, there is no need to reduce your ideas to colloquial or banal concepts. Our concern here is the language used to express those concepts, however intricate they may (or may not) be. There are a number of important principles.

- Avoid complex vocabulary wherever possible. For example, there is no reason to accuse your opposition of 'naïve inductionism' – it is far simpler and hence more effective to say, 'our opposition assumes that because [X] has occurred in the past, it will continue to occur in the future'.
- Acronyms can cause great confusion to judges or audience members who don't understand them. Therefore, you should state what any acronym stands for the first time you use it. For example, it is not enough to simply refer to the 'WHO' – the first time that you do so, you should say something like, 'the WHO – the World Health Organization'.
- There can sometimes be value in using technical terms, but these need to be explained. For example, it is never enough simply to refer to 'economies of scale' – you need to explain the term as well ('declining average costs as production increases').
- Answer any rhetorical question! Rhetorical questions can be a useful way of directing your audience's attention to the core of your argument. However, there is nothing worse than leaving a rhetorical question unanswered (for example, "How can we possibly justify having killed innocent Iraqi civilians?"). Your opponents will happily answer the question for you – or rather, for them (for example, "Our case shows exactly why it was justified to take innocent Iraqi lives to avoid a much greater conflict in the future.").

Finally, this is as good a point as any to discuss the use of 'clever' verbal techniques. In other forms of public speaking, speakers are often encouraged to use various 'devices' when writing their speeches – for example, the frequent use of metaphors, 'triplets' or alliteration. There is nothing inherently wrong with these techniques, but they do understandably sound scripted. Therefore, in debating, they should be confined to those areas of your speech where the audience expects to hear well-crafted prose – essentially, to your conclusion and your formal introduction. A debater who presents substantive arguments (or even rebuttal) in cleverly crafted language will almost always suffer as a result, because these arguments will lack the sincerity and effectiveness of a more natural expression.

Humour

Humour in debating is a double-edged sword. If used effectively, it can significantly improve your connection with an audience; if used poorly, it can distract, confuse and reduce your credibility. Humour is very difficult to teach, but easy to practice. We will therefore simply examine some general pointers as to the use of humour in debating.

- You don't need humour! It is often easy, particularly in the company of funny and entertaining debaters, to see humour as an essential part of debating. It is not – some of the great argumentative speeches in history were presented without any humour (can you imagine, "I have a dream.... in fact, I have lots of dreams...what it is about dreams anyway...."?). Usually, a debater's sense of humour – and sense of when to use that humour – develops slowly and over many years. There is no need to rush this process.
- If you are using humour, make sure that it is appropriate for your context. If, for example, you are debating about sport or television, jokes are probably great. If, on the other hand, you are debating about terrorism or domestic violence, jokes will almost certainly go down poorly – and even if they are well received by the audience, they will hardly improve your credibility on the issue of debate.
- Obviously, there is no point using isolated jokes. If your humour does not directly relate to the issue and the debate, it will hardly be amusing. For example, general witticisms may raise a smile, but will not improve your credibility on the issue of debate (for example, "Our opposition's case is like a skyscraper – it has many 'flaws'".)
- Don't get personal or sarcastic – cracking personal jokes about your opponents is probably the easiest way to violate this principle.
- Keep it clean. Humour in debates is supposed to lighten the atmosphere and endear you and your arguments to your audience. Jokes that even some members of your audience may find lewd or rude will only harm your persuasive credibility as a speaker.
- Remember, laughter is not rebuttal. It does not matter how many jokes you make about your opposition's case, or how much your audience laughs – this does not in itself show why your opponents' arguments are wrong. Of course, you can use humour to assist your rebuttal, but it will never substitute for actual analysis and argument.
- Don't get distracted. It is very easy to become enthused because your audience is responding warmly to your jokes. At this point, you have a choice – either push on with your arguments (confident that your audience is responding well to your speech, and is listening carefully to what you say) or simply tell a few more jokes. Too many debaters in this situation choose the latter. Musicians sometimes say, "If you play for applause, that's all you'll ever get" – the same can be said of debaters who get carried away and manage to trade their argument for a few more laughs.
