Labor markets

Dimitri's Ph.D. dissertation at Columbia University was on the macroeconomic implications of segmented labor markets. He continued working on the intersection of macroeconomics and labor markets, including the impact of labor market institutions and regulations and pension reforms in Italy. He compiled one of the first in-depth surveys of unemployment in Greece, and was the first to show empirically the link between public sector employment and unemployment.