Sales of more than 20 of Dorothy's parenting books were robust in this country. The Japanese people embraced Dorothy and she truly enjoyed being in their presence.

In 2005, Crown Prince Naruhito of Japan was very touched by the poem 'Children Learn What They Live', saying he planned to raise his 3-year-old daughter, Princess Aiko, by its principles. He held a press conference, saying the poem "embodied all the important factors that are so easy to forget in today's society."

Following this event, book sales spiked and Dorothy's agent was bombarded with interview requests for months. To this day, the Japanese people look toward Dorothy's writings as they refine and improve their parenting skills.
