Why Your Valuation Matters

Knowing what your business is worth helps you make smarter decisions — whether you're planning to grow, secure funding, or explore new opportunities. Your valuation can unlock access to financing, attract investors, strengthen credibility, and inform your long-term business strategy.

Scope of This Analysis

This report uses your self-reported revenue, time in business, industry, credit score (if available), and online presence to estimate your business's value. The valuation is powered by Skip's proprietary formula, built on insights from over 1 million small businesses across the U.S.

What This Means for You

This valuation serves as a benchmark — a starting point to understand how your business compares to others in your industry and stage. It's not a formal appraisal, but a practical tool to guide strategic planning, funding readiness, and business growth.

Despite expectations that valuations rise steadily with business age, early-stage businesses (especially those under 1 year old) often report higher valuations due to inflated revenue projections or recent funding. Meanwhile, many 1–5 year-old businesses stabilize with lower, more realistic valuations. Valuations then rise again for more established 6–10 year and 10+ year businesses, reflecting sustained revenue growth and operational maturity.
