

Composition, 58f. Processions to holy places; formal repetition; formal repetitions in the sacred texts, 58. Genre scenes in reliefs, 60. The Buddhist heavens, 60f. The Kāśyapa legend in the reliefs on the east gateway at Sāñchi, 61f. The fire and water wonder at Uruvilvā, 62f. Successive scenes on one relief, 65. Accessories crowded in; the same also in the literature, 66. Buddha only indicated by a symbol, 67. Statues, 68. Intelligibility of the compositions, 68f. The association of reliefs on a monument, a guide to the interpretation, 69f. Architraves of the east gateway at Sāñchi: the embassy to Ceylon of a Maurya king, 70f. Buddha's footprint, 71. Description of the reliefs, 72-74.

CHAPTER III.—THE GANDHĀRA SCULPTURES. 75-167.

Political history, 75. The Graeco-Baktrian kingdom: Eukratides, Menandros, 76f. Intercourse between east and west, 78. Buddhist missions, 79. The Yueh-chi or Indo-Skythians; Kanishka and council at Alandhara, 79. Northern school of Buddhism, 80. Gupta dynasty in India, 80f. Manichaeism, the Paraclete, 81. Gandharoi and Indoi, 82. Discovery of Gandhāra remains; their discussion, 82f. Chronological data and inferences, 83f. Resemblances with Italian art, 84. The Gandhāra school represents an offshoot of ancient art, but the materials are clearly Indian; in the northern class the forms are continued, 84f. The types, 85f. The Buddha type; Gautama as Buddha, 85f. The nimbus, 86. Types of the gods; Brahmā and Śakra, 87. The supposed Devadatta and Māra, 88. Various types of thunderbolt-bearers; bearded and unbearded heads of gods, 89. Śakra re-named Vajrapāni, and attends on Buddha, 90. Vajrapāni in the Nirvāna scenes, 91. Māra rarely appears in Gandhāra art, 92. Greeks influenced the representations by their types, 93. Two figures with thunderbolts in one relief, 94. Śakra as a Yaksha, and Vajrapāni a Bodhisattva; Māra with bow and arrow, 95. Local divinities, guardians, 95f. Māra's army, 96-99. Earth-goddess; ancient Gē-type, 100. The type support the horse of the Bodhisattva, 102. Undetermined goddesses, 103. The of the Japanese Ben-ten. Sarasvatī, 105. Nāgas, 106f. Nāgi and Garudā; the Ganymede of Leochares, 108f. Devadāsī; nāgi girl standing under a tree, 111. Representation of Buddha's birth, 112. The figure at the feet of the dying Buddha: perhaps Kāśyapa, 113f. The Brāhmanas, 115. Kings, women, Yavumāni, 116. Mechanical reproduction of a series of complete types, 116. Early pattern compositions: the same continue in the northern schools, 117-118. The composition, 117f. Repetitions, et c. of the birth, the flight from home, preaching scenes, the death (Nirvāna); represented in fuller and briefer form, 117-118. Representations of the Nirvāna in Gandhāra, Tibet, China, and Japan, 118-123; derived from ancient sarcophagus reliefs, 123. Combination of more than one mode in the same panel (the old Indian scheme of successive scenes reappears) with equal sized figures (of earlier art); with unequal figures (later art), 125-126. The Kāśyapa legend as a combined composition, 127; as a single composition; and in much abbreviated detail, 128; another combined relief; the leaving home, 129. Side composition: Buddha or a Bodhisattva in the centre with two attendants, 130. Decorative elements; pediments, 131f. Giganto-machia, 131; crouching Atlantes or Garudās, 135; pillar figures; tribute-bearers, 135-136. World-protectors (Lokapālas) and art portraits, 136-137. Kubera and Virūdhakka, 138. Miscellaneous representations: two scenes connected with Buddha's birth, 138-139. Asita Rishi and the infant, 139; the birthing, 140; Buddha and an ascetic, 141. Śakra visiting Buddha, 142. The Dīpaṅkara Jātaka, 143. The sermon at Isipatana, 144. Feet-washing, 145. The pāṭa presented, 145. Ho-shang representative of the Mahāyāna system, 147. Large and small subordinate figures; Paigṇia; garland-bearers, 148. Pedestal sculptures, 149f. Wheel symbol and trident, 151. Architectural elements: Persian pillars; Hellenic capitals, 151f. Figures of Buddha in the capitals, 153. Gilding; model stupās, 154. Influence of the Gandhāra school on Indian art, 156f. Antiques in the Amarāvati sculptures, 157.

CHAPTER IV.—REPRESENTATION OF BUDDHA AND BODHISATTVA. 168-214.

Chakravartī, 168f. The seven jewels, 169. Apotheosis of Buddha; the greater and lesser beauty-marks, 169f. Hares of the Buddha figure and philosophic explanation of the ideal Buddha, 169f. The Buddha image modelled on the Apollo pattern, 169f. A double tendency,—an idealistic and a realistic aim with Indian degeneration of type, 169f. Indo-Baktrian art in China, Korea, Japan, 169f. Buddha with moustache, 169. Treatment of drapery, 169; Greek treatment of it persistent, 170. The sandal-wood statue of King Udayana, 170f. Legendary explanation of the Buddha figure, 171f. Buddha with bare right shoulder or covered, 172f; in Gandhāra, 173-174. Crowned Buddha figures in further India, 175. Various poses of the Buddha images, 176. Positions of the hands: the mudrās, 177f. Previous Buddhas and their succession, 179f. The Tathāgata, 180. Maitreya, 181. The Bodhisattvas represented in royal apparel, 182; they belong only to the Mahāyāna school; their probable genesis; relations to Hindū gods, 182f; their numbers and images, 184. How far the mudrās in the Gandhāra sculptures help to identify different Bodhisattvas, 185f. Modern representations of Maitreya, 186. Maitreya with a flask in Gandhāra, 187f. Buddha with dharmachakra-mudrā, 189. Kāśyapa Buddha, 189. The worship of Maitreya early developed; dominant in the Mahāyāna school, 190. Bodhisattva figures with lotus flowers, 191. Padmapāni; bears also the Amṛita flask; danger of confounding Avalokiteśvara with Maitreya, 192-194. The Dhyaṇi Buddhas, 195. Iranian elements; the Fravashis, 195. Repetition of Buddha and Bodhisattva images, 196f. Object of multiplied figures, 197. Adibuddha; colossal figures, 198. The Lotus throne, 198. Two later Bodhisattvas: Mañjuśrī and Padmapāni, 199. The Dhyaṇas, 200f. Padmapāni and Kuan-yin, 201f. Litany of Avalokiteśvara, 203. Groups of figures: triads, pentads; immense pantheon, 204f. Reaction, 205f. Lama portraits in Tibet, China, Japan, 206. Caricature in Japan, 207. Deeny of Art; artists handed down traditionally as Yakshas and Nāgas, 208. The national element manifested in repetitions of the same forms and in systematizing, 209. Additional illustrations: the coffin of Buddha, and probable identification of Kāśyapa, 209f. A model of a shrine, 210f. Head of Buddha, &c., 211f. Conclusion, 212-214.

BIBLIOGRAPHY... .. 215.

INDEX. ... .. 219.