

MUGHAL KINGSHIP AND NOBILITY

RAM PRASAD KHOSLA

954.025
KHO

CONTENTS

CHAPTER I

THE MUGHAL KINGSHIP—Page 1

Islam in its early home a perfect democracy. Principle of election. Hereditary nature of the Caliphate after the fourth Caliph. Islamic monarchy. Pathan kingship. Abul Fazl's conception of kingship. Divine Right of kings. Absence of any other political theory in Mughal times. The Holy Law and its theoretical supremacy. The king can do no wrong. The despotic origin of the authority of the Mughal king. No prime ministers in Mughal times. Akbar's sayings. Mughal kings chosen instruments of God. Influence of Persian monarchy. No division of powers. Personal nature of the administration. No machinery of a constitutional nature. Sher Shah's rebellion.

CHAPTER II

THE MUGHAL KINGSHIP (Continued)—Page 36

The Council

Subjects contented with strong monarchy. Absence of distinction between king and crown. Vizier's authority strictly limited. The imperial Seal. No Civil List in the Mughal times. Mughal king the parent of all administrative offices. Akbar's attempt at developing the personal rule into a system. Evidence of European travellers regarding Mughal kingship—Rev. Edward Terry, Tavernier, Mandelslo, Bernier. The Council. Council's power strictly limited. Council a part of administration. The Ghusal-Khana—procedure and functions. Compulsory attendance at the Council. Composition of the Council. Weakness of the Mughal system. Period of decadence. No genuine loyalty to the crown. King-makers. Worthless favourites. Nadir of Mughal sovereignty. Independence of provincial governors.

CHAPTER III

THE ROYAL PREROGATIVE—Page 71

royal prerogative, its meaning, its kinds. Music of sovereignty. Twelve Ordinances of Jahangir. Shikar-i-Jargah or Qamrgah. Rules of the royal hunt. Appointment of governors. Elephant-fights.

Authority to set up 'Kanat' in the Cathedral Mosque. Power to confer titles. Jharoka-Darshan. Use of a raised platform while holding Court. Purchase of precious stones. Ensigns of royalty. Reading of Khutba. Regulation of currency.

CHAPTER IV

THE LAW OF SUCCESSION—Page 82

Tribal feeling in Arabia. Principle of free election. Change under the Caliph Muawiyah. Practice under the Abbasides. Absence of Law of Primogeniture in Mughal India. Wars of succession. Lot of younger sons. Advantages of the absence of a fixed law of succession. Throne gained by sword and not by inheritance. Humayun versus Mehdi Khwaja Muhammad Zaman. Part played by Humayun's brothers—Kamran, Hindal, and Askari. Akbar's peaceful succession. Prince Salim versus Khusru. Jahangir's sons—Khusru, Khurram, and Shahryar. Bulaki as a stop-gap. Success of prince Khurram. Nur Jahan's failure. Murder of princes. Shah Jahan's partisanship of Dara Shukoh. Struggle among Shah Jahan's sons—Dara, Shuja, Aurangzeb, and Murad. Aurangzeb's success. Fate of Shah Jahan and his other sons. Struggle among Aurangzeb's sons—Muhammad Muazzam, Muhammad Azam, and Kam Baksh. Aurangzeb's will regarding partition of the empire. Bahadur Shah's policy towards his sons. Jahandar Shah's victory. Farrukhsiyar gets the throne with the help of Syed brothers. Blinding of princes. Crown practically the gift of some powerful noble after Aurangzeb. King-makers.

CHAPTER V

SECRET SERVICE—Page 118

The necessity of Secret Service. Waqai Navis or Recorder of Events Khufia Navis or Reporters of the Secret Service. Harkara or Superintendent of Spies. Duties of Khufia Navis. Connection between the Secret service and the postal work. Confidential messengers stationed at each provincial capital. Same system prevalent under the Abbasides. Secret agencies not always dependable. Evidence of Manucci, Catrou, Bernier, and Fryer.

CHAPTER VI

THE MUGHAL JUSTICE—Page 126

The injunctions of the holy Quran regarding justice. The quickness of decisions. Adalat Khana or the justice chamber. The Mughal emperor.

accessible to all. Absence of written laws. No administrative law for the protection of officials. The Mughal emperor as the supreme judge. Chain of Justice. Jahangir's love of justice. Shah Jahan's assiduity in administering justice. Aurangzeb's regular presence in his court of audience. Severity of punishments. Twelve Ordinances of Jahangir. Fatawa-i-Alamgiri. Mughal emperor as supreme law-giver and legislator. Judicial officers—Cadr-ul-Cadur, Cadr Kacheri-i-Sadarat, Kazi, the Court Vakil, Mufti, Muhtasib, and Mir-i-Adl. Secular nature of justice. Increased influence of the Kazis under Aurangzeb. Royal prerogative to decide cases of blood.

CHAPTER VII

A SECULAR STATE—Page 150

The Mughal emperor pre-eminently a political functionary enjoying no spiritual functions. All new laws merely interpretations of the Holy Law—a ruse. Fourfold law—Sacred Law of Islam, Custom, written Decrees of predecessors, and Sovereign Will of the reigning King. Contractual theory in Islam. Position of the Holy Law. Mughal emperors independent of any outside Caliph. Relations between Pathan Kings and the Caliph. Assumption of the title of the Caliph by Mughal emperors. Separation of Church and State. Subordinate position of Ulamas. Mughal State not a truly Islamic State. Jealousy of clericalism. Fakihis or Muslim legists. Secular nature of justice. Position of Mir-i-Adl. Worldly character of Ulama. Akbar as a heretic. Position of Cadr under Akbar. Sayurghal or Madad-i-Maash. Confiscation of church lands. Ulama's wranglings at the Ibadatkhanah. Doctrine of Infallibility. Khilafat and Imamat. Akbar's secular policy followed by Jahangir and Shah Jahan. Abandonment of Taimur's ideal. Subjects' obedience to the State based on utilitarian grounds. Change of policy under Aurangzeb. His religious exclusiveness. His ambition to be head of a Muslim State. His failure. Controversy regarding inclusion of the word 'Wasi' in the Khutba under Bahadur Shah.

CHAPTER VIII

A SECULAR STATE—(Continued)—Page 202

Religious Policy

Religious toleration under the Mughals. No distinction of caste or creed in matters of service. Mughals' imitation of the Abbaside and Fati-wide policy. Humayun not an austere Muslim. Adoption of Hindu customs. Freedom enjoyed by Christians, Hindus, Buddhists, and Zoroastrians. Akbar and Jahangir as tolerant rulers. Large number of Hindu grandees under Shah Jahan. Changed policy under Aurangzeb. Reimposition of Jizya. Discouragement of music. Discontinuance of sitting at the Jharoka. Mughals as national kings of Hindustan. Syed brothers' liberal policy. Hindustani party of nobles.

CHAPTER IX

THE MUGHAL NOBILITY—Page 225

The Mughal Court. Mughal nobility a hierarchy of pedigree. Mughal nobles only life-peers. Feudal aristocracy. Turani and Irani amirs, Afghans and Hindustanis. Taimurides or Mirzas. Every Mughal noble a military officer. Distinction between greater and lesser barons. Titles of Amir-ul-Umara and Khan Khanan. Conferring of rank by proxy. Precedence among nobles. Mughal nobility contrasted with the nobility of western Europe. Confiscation of an amir's property at his death. This rule not applicable in the case of Hindu Rajas. Different titles of nobility. Emoluments of nobles. Their expenses and establishments. State ownership in land. Lack of loyalty among nobles who were either servile or openly rebellious. Nobles under the later Mughals. Their spirit of self-aggrandizement responsible for many ills. Weakness of central authority encouraged anarchy. Mahabat Khan as a defender of the crown against the king. Syed brothers as king-makers. The causes of their fall.

CHAPTER X

THE MUGHAL NOBILITY—(Continued)—Page 270

Presents

Necessity of making presents to the emperor. Various occasions for making presents—emperor's birth-day, New year's Day, victory gained by royal arms, emperor's visit to an amir's house, birth of a prince etc. Presents made to princes. Presents as a substitute for income-tax. Presents as an investment.

Emperor's presents to the nobles. Khilats or robes of honour. Jagirs. Their popularity with the emperor and the nobles. Description of the Jagir system—Military feudal system. Condemnation of the system by De Laet and Bernier. Rewards and distinctions. Different kinds of Khilats. Jewelled ornaments, weapons, palkis, kettle-drums, flags, the Qur, Mahi-Maratib. Tuman-togh.

CHAPTER XI

CONCLUSION—Page 293

Mughal kingship a beneficial institution. Strong central government. Protection of peasants. Patronage of artists. Mughals encouraged art and architecture. Their liberality to learned men. Mughal India drew many poets from Persia. Princes and nobles also patrons of learning. Arts of peace. Justice, religious tolerance. Welfare of the people. Form of government in harmony with the spirit of the times. Military despotism softened with benevolence. Local institutions and customs undisturbed. The Great Mughal a great statesman.